DICTIONARY OF MUSIC AND MUSICIANS
VOL. III
K—O

KADE, (1) Otto (b. Dresden, May 6, 1819; d. Doberan, near Rostock, July 19, 1900), writer on music, showed a decided predilection for music while still a pupil at the Kreuzschule. He received lessons in harmony and counterpoint from Julius Otto and Moritz Hauptmann, and in pianoforte and organ-playing from J. G. Schneider. In 1846 he made a prolonged stay in Italy for the purpose of musical study, especially of the older vocal music. On his return he founded and conducted a Caccilien-Verein or mixed choir for the performance of older vocal works. In 1860 he received the first prize from the Maatschappij tot bevordering der Toonkunst in Amsterdam (Society for the Furtherance of Music) for his valuable monograph on 'Mattheusle Maistre, a former Kapellmeister to the court of Saxony. In the same year he accepted the invitation from the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Friedrich Franz II., to be musical director of the Schloss-kapelle at Schwerin. The Schloss-chor, which was organised on similar principles to the Berlin Domchor, was brought by Kade to a high pitch of artistic refinement. During the same time he was entrusted with the musical editorship of the Cantionale für die evangelisch-lutherischen Kirchen im Grossherzogtum Mecklenburg-Schwerin, which appeared in parts from 1868-87. Along with this Cantionale he also published a 'Choralbuch' for four voices, harmonised on the strict diatonic system of the 16th century. The first edition of this 'Choralbuch' appeared in 1869, a second in 1886. It appears to have been Kade who gave the first impulse to the foundation by Eitner of the Gesellschaft für Musikforschung, which led to the publication of the Monatshefte für Musikgeschichte from 1869. Kade edited for the Gesellschaft Johann Walther's Wittenbergisch geistlich Gesanbuch of 1524, and was joint-editor with Eitner and Erk of Ott's Liederbuch of 1544. In 1862 Kade had been commissioned by the firm of Leuckart, the publishers of Ambros's Geschichte der Musik, to edit a supplementary volume, containing specimens of the most celebrated masters of the 15th and 16th centuries. This volume only appeared in 1882, but represents the fruits of many years' research in the various libraries of Italy and Germany. In 1892 he published a volume entitled Die älteren Passionskompositionen bis zum Jahre 1631 (Gütersloh, 1892), which gives an account of the various compositions of the Passion in the 16th century, and gives the actual notes of the Obrecht, Walther and Scandelli Passions. As part of his official work at Schwerin he published, in 1896, a Catalogue of the Grand-Ducal Musical Collection. Other works of Kade are Der neu-aufgefundene Luther-Codex (with facsimiles), 1871, and Die deutsche weltliche Liedweise, 1872. He retired from active service in 1893.

(2) REINHARD (b. Dresden, Sept. 25, 1859), son of the above, became professor of the Royal Gymnasium at Dresden and compiled the catalogue of the musical collection in the Royal Library (1890). He contributed the results of his researches to the publications of the Int. Mus. Ges. (Riemann).

KAFENDA, BEDŘICH (b. at Mošovce, 1883), Slovak composer and professor at the Slovak Music School, Bratislava, received his musical education at the Leipzig Conservatorium, and afterwards conducted light opera in Germany. He served in the army 1915-20, was taken prisoner, and joined the Czech legionaries. He entered upon his present appointment in 1920. His tendencies are classical and he has composed sonatas for violin and pianoforte, and violoncello and pianoforte; a string quartet; Slovak songs for solo and for chorus; 'Ave Maria,' for soprano solo and organ; and church music

R. N.

KAHN, ROBERT (b. Mannheim, July 21, 1865), studied with Lachner in his native town, with Kiel in Berlin and Rheinberger in Munich, and afterwards profited by the society of Brahms in Vienna and of Joachim in Berlin. In 1890 he undertook the direction of a choir of women's voices in Leipzig, a post which he held for three years, writing many compositions for female voices with and without orchestra. He became teacher of composition in the Hochschule of Berlin, and his chamber compositions are highly esteemed throughout Germany. A sonata for piano and violin in G minor, op. 5, was played in Mar. 1896 by Joachim at a Monday Popular Concert in London.

His principal compositions are:

String quartet in A minor, op. 60.
Quintet for PF. and strings in C minor.
Three quartets for PF. and strings, opp. 14, 30, 41.
Trios for PF. and strings, opp. 19, 33, 35.
Clarinet Trio, op. 46.
Three sonatas, violin and PF., opp. 5, 20, 50.
Suite, violin and PF., op. 69.
Two violoncello sonatas, opp. 37, 56.
'Mahomet's Gesang,' choir and orch.
Many songs, piano pieces, etc.

M., with addns.

KAHRER, LAURA (b. Vienna, Jan. 14, 1853; d. Dresden, Aug. 2, 1925), a distinguished pianist.

On the nomination of the Empress Elisabeth she became a pupil of the Conservatorium at Vienna, under Dachs and Dessoff, from 1866-1869. After taking the first prize, she made a tour to the principal towns of Germany, ending at Weimar. There she studied under Liszt, and matured that beauty of touch, precision, fire, and intelligence which raised her to the first rank of pianists in Germany, and which induced Herr von Bülow—no lenient critic—to praise her playing of Beethoven's op. 106 in the highest terms. In 1874 she married Eduard RAPPOLDI (q.v.). She was the worthy colleague of her husband in the best concerts of Dresden.

KALCHER, JOHANN NEPOMUK (b. Feising, Bavaria, 1766; d. Munich, 1826), studied at Freising under the court organist Berger, and from 1790 under Grätz, at Munich, through whose recommendation he was appointed as court organist at the latter town in 1798. In purity and power his playing was considered unparalleled. Among his pupils was Carl Maria von Weber, then aged 13, who dedicated to him the second of his published works, 6 Variations for pianoforte (1800), in the dedication of which he expresses his sincere admiration of, and gratitude to, his revered master. Kalcher composed symphonies, masses, concertos, sonatas, songs, etc., of which most have remained in MS. (See Q.-L. and Mendel.)

KALINNIKOV, BASIL SERGEIVICH (b. Government of Orlov, Jan. 13, 1866; d. Yalta, Jan. 11, 1901; Dec. 29, 1900 O.S.), composer. He was the son of a police official, and was educated in the Orlovsky Seminary, where for a time he directed the choir. In 1884 he came to Moscow in great poverty, but succeeded in entering the Music School of the Philharmonic Society. He studied the bassoon and also composition under Ilyinsky and Bلامberg. Having completed a brilliant course at this school, Kalinnikov was appointed assistant conductor to the Italian Opera, Moscow, for the season 1893-94. Unhappily the privations he had undergone had told upon his health. Symptoms of consumption now began to show themselves, and he was ordered to relinquish his work and winter in the Crimea. The remaining years of his life were devoted entirely to composition. His first symphony is a spirited work, full of fresh and healthy inspiration, and very national in style. It met with great success in Russia, was heard in Vienna (1898), Berlin (1899), Paris (1900), and reached England in 1908, when it was heard both in London and at the Bristol festival. His principal works, published mostly by Jürgen-son, include:

Cantata, 'St. John Chrysostom.'
Two symphonies (G minor and A major).
Two orchestral intermezzi.
Orchestral Suite.
Two symphonic sketches.
Incidental music to A. Tolstoy's play, 'Tear Boris' (1899).
String quartet.
'The Roussalka,' ballad for solo, ch., and orch.
Songs and pianoforte pieces.

KALKBRENNER, FRIEDRICH WILHELM MICHAEL (b. 1788; d. Enghien, near Paris, June 10, 1849), pianist and prolific composer for his instrument. He was born while his mother was on a journey between Cassel and Berlin. His father, Christian Kalkbrenner (1755-1806), of Hebrew extraction and a musician of considerable ability, began his son's training early.¹ In 1798 Friedrich entered the Conservatoire at Paris, and left it, after four years of assiduous study, with 1st prize for pianoforte-playing and harmony. In 1813 he played in public at Berlin and Vienna, heard Clementi, made Hummel's acquaintance, and was introduced by Haydn to Albrechtsberger, from whom he had lessons in counterpoint. From 1814-23 he resided in London, much sought after as a player and fashionable teacher. He was a champion of the system of Lœcher and the chiroplast. In 1824 he settled in Paris as a member of the pianoforte-making firm of Pleyel & Co. In Paris, too, his success as a performer and teacher was very great; he was a shrewd man of business and managed to amass quite a fortune. Madame Camille Pleyel was his best pupil. When Chopin came to Paris in 1831, Kalkbrenner's reputation was at its height: his compositions, mostly written for the market and now forgotten, were upon the desks of all dilettanti, and his playing was upheld as a model. Chopin, who was then only 22 years of age, but had already written his two concertos, the études, op. 10, the first scherzo and ballade, etc., called on him and played his concerto in E minor, whereupon Kalkbrenner came forward with the astounding proposal that Chopin should bind himself to be his pupil for three years and thus under his guidance become a good artist! Chopin took no lessons, but attended certain class-meetings, and soothed Kalkbrenner by dedicating the concerto to him. In a letter dated Dec. 16, 1831, Chopin speaks in high terms of Kalkbrenner's technique, praises his charming, equable touch and quiet self-possession, and says that Herz was a zero compared with him. Still Chopin seems from the first to have been of Mendelssohn's opinion, who said to him soon after, 'You had nothing to learn from Kalkbrenner; you play better than he does.'

Professor Marx used to tell a story of how Kalkbrenner called on him in 1834 at Berlin, anxious to make a good impression, as the Professor was then editor of the new Berliner Musikzeitung, and an influential personage. The visitor in moving terms deplores the decay of the good old art of improvisation, saying that since Hummel had retired he was the only one who still cultivated it in the true classical spirit. He opens the piano and improvises for a quarter of an hour with fluent fancy and great neatness, interweaving all manner of themes, even a little fugue, much to the Professor's edification. Next day a parcel of music just printed at Paris arrives for review. The Professor, greatly interested, opens the topmost piece—'Effusio musica, par Fred. Kalkbrenner': when lo and behold! he has yesterday's improvisation before him, fugue and all, note for note!

An instruction-book with études belonging to it¹ is the best thing Kalkbrenner left.² His attainments as a musician are shown in four pianoforte concertos, one for two pianos, a septet, sextet, and quintet, and various sonatas: all well written for the instrument, but dull and trite, spite of the glitter of what was called a 'brilliant' style.³

Kalkbrenner died of cholera at Enghien, near Paris.

KALLIWODA (KALŭŏDA), (1) JOHANN WENZESLAUS (b. Prague, Mar. 21, 1800; d. Carlsruhe, Dec. 3, 1866), a violin-player and popular composer. From 1811–17 he was a pupil of the Conservatorium, under Dionys Weber and Pixis, and from 1817–23 a member of the orchestra of that town. During a visit to Munich he was introduced to Prince Fürstenberg, who took a lively interest in his talent, and appointed him conductor of his private band at Donaueschingen, which post Kalliwoda retained, in spite of various offers from more important places, for the rest of his professional life, till he retired on a pension in 1853.

Kalliwoda, as a violinist, is regarded as one of the best representatives of the Prague school under F. W. Pixis. Without possessing very startling qualities of execution or style, his performances showed a well-finished technique, a sympathetic but not large tone, and were altogether more remarkable for elegance and a certain pleasantness than for vigour or depth of feeling. His compositions consist of:

Seven Symphonies—F minor (1826); 1b; D minor; C; B minor (op. 106); G minor; and F.
Overtures, 'Concertinos', and other Solo-pieces for the viola and other orchestral instruments, especially the clarinet.
Quartets for stringed instruments.
Violin-Duets, Pianoforte-pieces, and a number of songs.

Many of his works enjoyed for some time, and chiefly in amateur circles, a considerable popularity; and the index of the Leipzig A.M.Z. shows a long list of performances. Their day is now over, but Schumann⁴ speaks of Kalliwoda's fifth symphony with enthusiasm, and further testified his esteem by dedicating his Intermezzi (op. 4) 'al Sign. Kalliwoda.'

His son (2) WILHELM (b. Donaueschingen, July 19, 1827; d. Carlsruhe, Sept. 8, 1893) was for a short time a pupil of Mendelssohn at Leipzig in 1847, and at Hauptmann in 1848. He held various posts at Carlsruhe with credit to himself, and succeeded his father as conductor at Carlsruhe, but was compelled by ill-health to give up his work in 1875. P. D.

KANDLER, FRANZ SALES (b. Kloster-Neuburg, Lower Austria, Aug. 23, 1792; d. Baden, near Vienna, Sept. 26, 1831), a musical historian, to whom we owe an admirable condensation of Baini's Palestrina. He belonged to the War Office, and went as interpreter with the army to Venice and Naples in 1817 and 1821. He died of cholera. His two works are Cenni storico-critici alla vita ed opere del . . . G. Ad. Hasse (Venice, 1820; 2nd ed., Naples, 1820), and that above mentioned, Über das Leben und die Werke des . . . Palestrina, etc. This was published after Kandler's death by Kieseewetter (Leipzig, B. & H., 1834). Another posthumous publication, collected from Kandler's contributions to musical periodicals, was Cenni storico-critici sulle vicende e lo stato attuale della musica in Italia (1836).

KAPSBERGER, JOHANN HIERONYMUS (d. circa 1633), a prolific composer and skilled musician, flourished at Venice about 1604, and elsewhere in Italy. He attained great skill on instruments of the lute family, and among his publications were three books of 'Intabolutura di chitarrone' (1604, 1616, 1626); four of 'Villanelle' for voices, with chitarrone accompaniment (1610, 1619, 1619, 1623); besides motets, arias, a wedding chorus (1627), and an Apotheosis of Ignatius Loyola (1622). He is mentioned with great eulogium by Kircher (Musurgia). He seems to have died about 1633, as no work of his of later date is known. (For list see Q.-L.; also Ambros, Gesch. d. Mus. vol. iv. p. 126.)

² He also wrote a Traité d'harmonie du piano (1840).

KARAJAN, THEODOR GEORG, RITTER VON (b. Vienna, Jan. 22, 1810; d. Apr. 28, 1873), Dr. juris., philologist, and historian; clerk (1841) and custos (1854) in the court library, appointed vice-president (1851), and president (1859) of the Akademie der Wissenschaften; received the order of Leopold in 1870. His philological works are numerous and important; but his title to admission here is his pamphlet, J. Haydn in London, 1791 und 1792 (Vienna, Gerold, 1861). In addition to matter from the well-known pamphlets of Dies and Griesinger, it contains a number of Haydn's letters, chiefly from London and Estoras, to his friend Maria Anna von Genzinger, the wife of Leopold Peter, Edler von Genzinger, an esteemed physician, with four from the lady herself. She played the piano well and even composed. Haydn wrote several sonatas for her, and whenever he was in Vienna spent much of his time at her house, where a pleasant musical society was generally to be found. Karajan also furnished his friend Otto Jahn with valuable material for his book on Mozart. C. F. P.

KAREL, RUDOLF (b. Pilsen, now Plzen, Czechoslovakia, Nov. 1880), composer and teacher.

Karel attended the Gymnasium, first in Plzen and then in Prague, and later studied law in the Prague University. These studies, however, were not congenial to him, and finally, against his father's wish, he entered the Prague Conservatoire, where he became a pupil of J. Klička (organ) and Antonín Dvořák (composition). On completing his course, in 1904, he devoted himself exclusively to composition. For ten years he lived quietly in Prague, until the summer of 1914. He was then taking a holiday in Russia, where, on the outbreak of war, he was interned as an Austrian subject. After a few months, he was sent to teach in the State Music School at Taganrog, and two years later was appointed professor in the Conservatoire at Rostov-on-Don. When, in the autumn of 1917, the Bolshevik upheaval took place, Karel was forced to fly to Irkutsk, in Siberia. But even there he was pursued, and only rescued by the Czechoslovak Legionaries, whose ranks he joined. Finally he was appointed conductor of the Symphony Orchestra of the Legion, in which capacity he eventually succeeded in getting home. He is now on the teaching staff of the Prague Conservatoire.

Karel is chiefly an instrumental composer; a typical 'absolute' musician, even when he occasionally adopts a programme for his work (see below). In this respect he is a true pupil of Dvořák, in fact, his only successor among the Czech composers. Karel started with a thorough study of Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Dvořák and Brahms, and afterwards found his own personal and modern idiom wherewith to fill the mould of classical instrumental forms. Thence his relationship to Bruckner, with whom he shares the tendency to breadth of structure, and also to Reger, and, in his later period, to Hindemith, and others. Like the Russians he usually employs in his works the old church tonalities. His instrumental music is epic rather than lyrical; it is not impressionistic; it lacks the softer qualities and is pervaded by a certain austerity. At the same time, much passion is often concealed within its broad themes. Karel's adagios are remarkable for their depth and are generally the strongest of his movements. In his scherzos, the humour is rather biting than careless, and Slavonic rhythms may be clearly heard. His themes are broad, his harmony rich; and the whole plan of modulation constructed upon the apparently simple relations of keys, combined at the same time with the allied church tonalities, a method which gives rise to new and interesting complications. His instrumentation avoids all affectations and is pithy, sane and real. In the 'Renaissance' symphony (by which is meant the renaissance of classical music) he simplifies his orchestral resources so much, and strives for such a peculiarly transparent quality of tone, that he only uses a small orchestra (like Beethoven and Brahms he holds back the trombones for the last movement) in which, wherever possible, each instrument plays an independent part, and the tone of the full orchestra almost disappears. Hence the polyphonic tendency of Karel's work.

A special feature of Karel's art is his remarkable capacity for the use of the variation form. When he introduces a theme, he continues to elaborate it, so that his work actually consists of a continuous development. For this reason he likes to combine sonata-form or rondo-form with variation-form. It is characteristic of him that immediately after the composition of the Theme and Variations for piano, op. 13, he started to write a monothematic sonata (op. 14) in four movements on the same motive. Also his Capriccio for violin, op. 21, varies the same theme used in the preceding violin concerto, op. 20, which the composer calls a symphony for violin and orchestra. Besides these works, the symphonic epic, 'The Ideals,' the string quartet in E flat, and the pianoforte quartet in

A minor, are all monothematic; on the other hand, Novák points out Karel's great power of thematic invention as shown in the 'Renaissance' symphony and the violin sonata.

Karel's programme music—'The Ideals,' 'Demon,' and 'The Awakening,' are not constructed on literary bases. They treat personal or universal problems, and merely originate from some definite idea, but their further structure is purely musical; therefore it is impossible to attach to them any detailed programme. He has also a very marked feeling for dramatic art. In his youth he made a diligent study of Wagner and Smetana. His only opera, 'Ilseina srdce' (Ilse's Heart), the libretto of which is taken from the modern artistic world of Bohemia, shows that the author possesses a powerful dramatic talent, with a special sense for stagecraft and scenic effect. Various external obstacles delayed the first production of this work for fifteen years after its composition. On this account, Karel has not up till now shown any wish to write a new work for the theatre. He has recently delighted his public with a song cycle of an epic character (op. 24).

ORCHESTRAL MUSIC

Orchestral Suite, op. 4 (arrangement for 4 hands, J. Otto, Prague); Comedy Overture (MS.), op. 5; Scherzo-Capriccio, op. 6 (score, parts and piano arrangement, 4 hands, Smircek); Fantasia for orchestra, op. 8 (MS.); 'The Ideals,' op. 11, symphonic epic (MS.); Renaissance Symphony, op. 15, in E flat minor (MS.); Four Slavonic Dances, op. 16 (score and arrangement 4 hands, Smircek); Symphony (concerto?) for violin and orchestra, op. 20 (MS.); Symphony (concerto?) for violin and orchestra, op. 21 (MS.); Symphonic poem 'Demon,' op. 23 (score and parts, Smircek); incidental music to K. P. Humm's drama 'The Game of Life,' op. 26 (also arranged as a Concert Suite, MS.); 'Awakening,' op. 27, a symphony for soli, chorus and orchestra (not quite finished).

CHAMBER MUSIC

String Quartet in D minor, op. 3 (MS.); Pianoforte Trio in G minor, op. 7 (MS.); String Quartet in B flat, op. 12 (Smircek); Pianoforte Quartet in A minor, op. 22 (only two movements out of seven preserved in MS.); Violin Sonata in D minor, op. 17 (Smircek).

PIANO

'An Eternal Legend,' op. 1, melodrama for piano (MS.); pieces for piano, op. 2 (J. Otto, Prague); Nocturne, op. 9 (Smircek); Thema con variazioni, op. 13 (Smircek); Sonata in C minor, op. 14 (Smircek); Three Valses, op. 18 (Smircek); Burlesque, op. 19 (Smircek).

VOCAL AND CHORAL

'V. Zlaté Hlasy, echo Slunce' (In the Glow of the Bohemian Sun) op. 24, four songs with Czech and German words (Hudební Matice, Prague); Regimental Marching Song, op. 25 (MS.).

OPERATIC

'Ilseina srdce' (Ilse's Heart), op. 10, opera in 3 acts, first performance National Theatre, Prague, Nov. 11, 1924; pianoforte score published by Hudební Matice, Prague.

KARGEL (KARGEI), SIXT, a 16th-century lutenist, in the service of the Prince-Bishop of Strassburg c. 1571; living at Zabern, Alsace, 1586. He published a number of important collective books of lute pieces, the first of which has apparently been lost, as the first known, dated 1571, is a reprint; five books are enumerated in Q.-L.

R. v. d. s.

KARG-ELERT, SIGFRID (b. Oberndorf-on-Neckar, Nov. 21, 1879), composer. His real name was Karg, the 'Elert' having been added early in his career at the suggestion of his concert-agent. He studied at Leipzig Conservatoire under Reinecke, Jadassohn, Homeyer, etc., served for a time as professor at Magdeburg Conservatoire, and was appointed in 1919 to Leipzig Conservatoire, where he taught pianoforte, theory and composition. Though his earliest ambitions lay in the direction of composition, his chief distinction during his student days, and for some years after, was as a pianist of unusual brilliance. Some meetings with Grieg turned his ambitions once more towards composition, and the result has been a very large output in a great variety of forms—over 100 songs, sonatas for violin, pianoforte, etc., many sets of pieces for pianoforte, a symphony, string quartet, and much music for organ, etc.

There is also a valuable series of studies and pieces written specially for the 'Kunst-Harmonium,' an instrument, usually of two manuals, with considerable resources in tone-colour of the imitative-orchestral type. Karg-Elert toured as a recitalist on this instrument, and his works for it range from little pieces of delicate fancy to lengthy works, including a sonata and a highly original Passacaglia, the latter being subsequently re-written for organ, in which shape it ranks with the finest examples of the type. Probably this association with the 'Kunst-Harmonium' led Karg-Elert to take up the study of the organ, mainly with a view to composing for the instrument. (For a time he acted as accompanist and soloist at St. John's, Leipzig.) There can be little doubt that he found his true métier as an organ composer. Few modern organ works have been more widely and deservedly esteemed than his 'Sixty-six Choral Improvisations,' 'Twenty Choral Preludes and Postludes,' 'Ten Poetic Tone Pictures,' the Passacaglia in E flat minor, and, among lighter works, the 'Three Impressions,' and 'Three Pastels.' He shows great harmonic resource—a factor that appears to advantage in his frequent treatments of ground basses—and an easy mastery of contrapuntal devices. His strong feeling for colour no doubt led to his great interest in organ registration—indeed his enthusiasm and ingenuity in devising subtle schemes of organ tone-colour often lead to demands that few players or instruments can meet. A tendency to extravagance shows itself in other ways, e.g. over-chromaticism, the piling up of gigantic stacks of notes, with chords of three (and even four) notes for pedal, a too-frequent employment of prestissimo rushes up the keyboard, violent dynamic contrasts, etc. But his pronounced mannerisms are trifling blemishes on an organ output of nearly 200 pieces, some of large scale and many of rare beauty and originality. He is at his best in his numerous treatments of chorales. It is not too much to say that the present revival of interest in the Chorale Prelude in this country is largely due to the impression made on English organists by his 'Sixty-six Chorale Improvisations,' which appeared in 1909. They show a variety of treatment, an intimacy of expression, and a wealth of harmonic and contrapuntal resource that make the collection the nearest approach, and a worthy successor, to Bach's labours in the same field. There appears to be no method of treatment used by Bach that Karg-Elert does not also employ, plus some devices of his own, e.g. an ingenious use of dance measures as rhythmical bases. But whatever the chosen form may be, the music is intensely alive and expressive. He has also written effectively for other instruments in combination with the organ; and in certain of his larger solo works has added, in the Coda, parts for brass and drums. Interest in England is almost confined to the organ works, a list of which is appended:

- Op. 255. Passacaglia in E flat minor.
- 340. Improvisation.
- 366. Interdium.
- 396. Fantasia and Fugue in D.
- 46. Canzone.
- 65. Sixty-six Chorale-Improvisations.
- 72. Three Impressions.
- 73. Chaconne, Fugue-Triology and Chorale.
- 74. Ronatina in A minor.
- 75. (a) Fugale; (b) Improvisation on 'In dulci jubilo'; (c) Two Chor. Improvisations.
- 80. Twenty Preludes and Postludes (Chorale-Studier).
- 85. Three Symphonic Canzones.
- 86. Ten Characteristic Pieces.
- 87. Three Symphonic Chorales.
- 92. Three Pastels.
- 96. Seven Pastels from the Luke of Constance.
- 108. Cathedral Windows (Six Pieces on Gregorian Tunes).
- Homage to Handel (Fifty-four studies in Variation Form on a ground base of Handel).

KASHKIN, NICHOLAS DMITRIEVICH (b. Voronezh, Dec. 9, 1839; d. circa 1909), received his first instruction in music from his father, a bookseller, who was self-taught in the art. As early as 13, Kashkin found himself obliged to give music lessons on his own account. In 1860 he went to Moscow, where he studied the piano under Dubuque. N. Rubinstein observed his talents, and offered him a post as teacher of pianoforte and theory at the classes of the Musical Society, which in 1866 developed into the Conservatoire. He retained this position until 1896, and was one of the most popular teachers in Moscow. Kashkin, an able writer, was musical critic of the Russky Viedomosti from 1877-78, and again from 1886-97. He was also on the staff of the Moscow Viedomosti. He is best known abroad by his Reminiscences of Tchaikovsky (1896), with whom he was long associated in intimate friendship.

KASHPEROV, VLADIMIR NIKITICH (b. Simbirsk, Russia, 1827; d. July 8, 1894), composer and teacher of singing, first studied with Fotta and Henselt in St. Petersburg, and in 1850 composed an opera, 'The Gipsies' ('Tsiganer'), some scenes from which were performed. In 1856 he visited Berlin, where he worked under the celebrated theorist Dehn. From Germany Kashperov went to Italy. Here he made a special study of vocal art. His opera, 'Marie Tudor' (1859), was produced at Milan with some success. Other operas followed: 'Rienzi' (Florence, 1863), 'Consuelo' (Venice). 'The Storm' (St. Petersburg, 1867), libretto by Ostrovsky, was an attempt at national opera. as was also 'Taras Boulba' (Moscow, 1893). From 1866-72 Kashperov was professor of singing at the Moscow Conservatoire. He did great service to the musical life of the town by organising gratuitous choral classes, which were very much appreciated.

KASTALSKY, ALEXANDER DMITRIEVICH (b. Moscow, Nov. 16/28, 1856), Russian composer and authority on the church music. He studied from 1878-82 at the Moscow Conservatoire under Tchaikovsky and Taneiev. In 1887 he was appointed teacher of piano in the Moscow Synodal School, of which he became director in 1900. After the revolution the Synodal School became the People's Choral Academy, abolished in 1923. Kastalsky led a new and progressive movement in Russian church music, and wrote a number of liturgical works. His Requiem for the Fallen Heroes of the Allied Army was given at Birmingham, Nov. 22, 1917, by the Festival Choral Society under Sir Henry J. Wood. It is an ambitious attempt to unite East and West in a solemn commemoration of the heroic dead. Ecclesiastical themes from the Eastern Orthodox, Western Catholic and Anglican liturgies are employed; and even the Hymn to Indra and the song of the Japanese soldiers are included. Kastalsky had in view the lofty, but impracticable, aim of a performance for which each of the allied nations should furnish its own choir. Though coldly received, it is the work of a highly-cultured church musician of broad-minded ideals. Kastalsky also composed an opera, 'Clara Milich' (based on Turgenev's tale); a Georgian Suite; a symphony of the tilling of the soil; and wrote a book on the harmonisation of the folk-songs by the people.

KASTNER, (1) JEAN GEORGES (b. Strassburg, Mar. 9, 1810; d. Paris, Dec. 19, 1867), was destined to theology; but music conquered, and the successful performance of his opera, 'Die Königin der Sarmaten,' induced the town council of Strassburg to grant him the means of going to Paris in 1835, where he finished his studies under BERTON and REICHA, and resided till his death. In 1837 he published his Traité général d'instrumentation (2nd ed. 1841), the first work of the kind published in France, and the beginning of a long series of elementary treatises. Though fruitful as a dramatic composer—'Beatrice,' opera (German), 1839; 'La Maschera,' opéra-comique, 1841; 'Le Dernier Roi de Juda,' biblical opera given in concert form at the Conservatoire, Dec. 1, 1844, under Habeneck; 'Les Nonnes de Robert-le-Diable,' 1845, and a number of vocal and instrumental compositions large and small, including his Livres-Partitions, half music, half treatises—he cannot occupy a high rank amongst the masters of the French school. On the other hand, his theoretical works and musical literature have acquired for him a solid reputation. Besides the numerous works enumerated below, Kastner was a voluminous contributor to the Gazette musicale, the Ménestrel, and the Revue étrangère, as well as to the German periodicals, Iris, Allg. musikalische Zeitung, Neue Zeitschrift, Cecilia, and many others. Every spare moment was directed to the preparation of a vast Encyclopædia of Music, which remained unfinished at his death. Kastner was made a free member of the Académie des Beaux-Arts in 1859, and was also decorated by a very large number of institutions outside of France.

For the details of his honourable and useful life we must refer to the exhaustive biography by Hermann Ludwig (Breitkopf & Härtel, 3 vols., 1886), with complete lists, indexes, etc., a monument raised to Kastner's memory by the devotion of his widow. His library was acquired by the Paris Conservatoire.

Kastner's son, (2) GEORGES FREDERIC EUGEN (b. Strassburg, Aug. 10, 1852; d. Bonn, Apr. 6, 1882), devoted himself to physical science, especially to research on the law of vibrations. He was the inventor of the 'Pyrophone,' a small organ, the pipes of which were set in vibration by jets of lighted gas. He brought the subject before the Académie des Sciences, Mar. 17, 1873; and issued a book, Le Pyrophone: Les flammes chantantes, which reached its 4th edition in 1876. (See also Journal of Society of Arts, Feb. 17, 1875). His memoir occupies the concluding chapters of his father's life by H. Ludwig (B. & H., 1886). o.; rev. M. L. P.

KAUFFMANN, GEORG FRIEDRICH (b. Ostermondra, Merseburg, Feb. 14, 1679; d. Merseburg, Mar. 1735), pupil of Buttstedt of Erfurt and Alberti of Merseburg, whom he succeeded as court organist, afterwards becoming also Kapellmeister at the court. He composed an oratorio, 4 cantatas, and a considerable number of organ pieces. (See Q.-L.)

KAUFFMANN, PAUL, a 16th-17th century music publisher, who was manager of the business of 'Wittwe Katharina Gerlach' at Nuremberg in 1590, which business he afterwards took over. Between 1597 and 1614 he published a number of collective volumes, an account whereof is given in Q.-L.

KAYSER, ISRID, an 18th-century monk of the Praemonstratenses at Marchthal, where he was also Kapellmeister. He was a composer of masses, psalms, and other church music, as well as 3 suites (Parthiae), op. 4, for harpsichord, mostly published at Augsburg between 1743-54. E. v. d. s.

KAYSER, MARGARETHE SUSANNA, of Hamburg, the first woman to sing as soloist in a Hamburg church choir, on Sept. 17, 1716, when Mattheson led her personally to the choir. She was also an excellent oratorio and operatic singer between 1716 and 1746, and between 1729 and 1733 undertook, with great success, the management of the opera, which she rescued from a critical condition. She appeared also at various times at Copenhagen opera. Her husband, JOHANN (d. 1729), was conductor of the band of the Hamburg council, and instituted oratorio performances with the assistance of his wife. E. v. d. s.

KAYSER, PHILIPP CHRISTOPH (b. Frankfort-on-M., Mar. 10, 1755; d. Zurich, Dec. 24, 1823), pianist and composer. From 1775 he lived as music teacher at Zurich, whence Goethe called him to Rome in Nov. 1787 to discuss the composition of some of his Singspiele, as well as the music to Egmont. Goethe was a great friend and admirer of Kayser, and had often given him financial assistance when the loss of pupils, caused often through his eccentric behaviour which offended the parents, had reduced him to dire straits. There are many references to Kayser in Goethe's works and letters, while several essays and books have been written about their relations. Apart from Singspiele, motets, and cantatas, Kayser wrote songs and some harpsichord sonatas (Q.-L.).

KEARNS, WILLIAM HENRY (b. Dublin, 1794; d. Prince's Place, Kennington, Dec. 28, 1846), a prominent figure in London musical life in the middle part of the 19th century. He came to London in 1817, where he played the violin at Covent Garden Theatre. He wrote an operetta in that year, called 'Bachelors' Wives, or the British at Brussels.' He soon, however, became the musical adviser to Arnold and Hawes, and 'Der Freischütz,' 'Azor and Zemira,' 'Robert the Devil,' and many other foreign operas were brought out under his direction at Covent Garden. Kearns wrote the additional wind accompaniments to the 'Messiah' and 'Israel in Egypt' for the Festival at Westminster Abbey in 1834, as well as for Handel's choruses at provincial festivals. In 1845 he assisted Gauntlett in editing the Comprehensive Tune-book. Henry Smart was among his pupils. a.

KEEBLE, JOHN (b. Chichester, 1711; d. London, Dec. 24, 1786), was brought up as a chorister in Chichester Cathedral under Thomas Kelway. He afterwards became a pupil of Dr. Pepusch, and was in 1737 appointed successor to Thomas Roseingrave as organist of St. George's, Hanover Square, allowing Roseingrave one-half of the salary until his death in 1750. Keeble was also organist at Ranelagh Gardens. In 1784 he published The Theory of Harmonics, or, an Illustration of the Grecian Harmonics, a work which attracted attention. He published five books of organ pieces, and, jointly with Kirkman, '40 Interludes to be played between the verses of the Psalms.'

W. H. H.

KEEL, FREDERICK (b. London, May 8, 1871), studied as a baritone singer at the R.A.M. and at Milan, and made his début in London at Queen's Hall (1898). Though successful as a singer and now teacher of singing at the R.A.M., it is as arranger of old songs that Keel is most widely known. He was honorary secretary of the FOLK-SONG SOCIETY (q.v.) (1911-19) and editor of that Society's journal. His editions of Elizabethan songs have done much to popularise many fine melodies. c.

KEELEY, MRS. (MARY ANNE GOWARD) (b. Ipswich, Nov. 22, 1805; d. London, Mar. 12, 1899). Being endowed with a pure soprano voice of remarkable compass, she was apprenticed for seven years to the well-known teacher of music, Mrs. Smart (a sister-in-law of Sir George Smart and mother of Henry Smart), under whom she made her first appearance on the stage at Dublin in Nov. 1823. On July 2, 1825, she appeared in London at the Lyceum, then under the management of Arnold. The performance consisted of 'The Beggar's Opera' (with Thorne, Miss Stephens and Miss Kelly), Shield's 'Rosina' and 'The Spoiled Child,' in which last two pieces Miss Goward played. The event is thus chronicled in The Times (July 4):

'Miss Goward, the débutante, appeared as Rosina in the opera of that title. She is young, of a slender figure, and with intelligent features. Her voice is pretty, and after she had overcome the first embarrassments of her entrance she went through the part very successfully. She sang the songs in a simple manner, which deserved the applause she received. It is dangerous to prophesy at first appearances, but we may, nevertheless, venture to say that this young lady promises to make a very fine actress. . . . Miss Goward played Little Pickle in the "Spoiled Child" very well indeed.'

In the same season she sang Annetta in 'Der Freischütz' with Braham and Miss Paton. On Apr. 12, 1826, on the production of Weber's 'Oberon' at Covent Garden, she undertook the small but important part of the Mermaid, the music of which had been previously tried by Miss Love and Miss Hammersley, both of whom declined to sing it owing to the difficulty of hearing the delicate orchestral accompaniments at the back of the vast stage where the Mermaid had to appear. 'Little Goward shall sing it,' said Weber, and she overcame this obstacle, as J. R. Planché states (Recollections and Reflections, vol. i.): 'She was even then artist enough to be entrusted with anything,' and her singing of the Mermaid's music earned for her the personal thanks of the composer. For the next few years Miss Goward continued to sing in English opera, but after her marriage with the well-known comedian, Robert Keeley (which took place on June 26, 1829), she devoted her talents entirely to comedy, in which she was one of the greatest artists of the English stage.

W. B. S.

KEINSPECK (KÜNSPECK), MICHAEL (called ALEXANDRINUS), of Nuremberg, a 15th-century musician. He wrote Lilium musice planæ, Michaelis Keinspeck Musici Alexandrini (Basle, 1496), one of the earliest books containing printed music, which was engraved on wood blocks. The book, which was used as a music text-book at the University of Basle, went through several editions. In the preface Keinspeck says that he studied music in foreign lands, and after weary and adventurous travels came to France and Lorraine, where the 'unconquerable kings' had dedicated chapels, and drawn there many eminent men under whom he had perfected himself (Q.-L.).

KEISER, REINHARD (b. Teuchern, near Weissenfels, Leipzig, 1673¹; d. Hamburg, Sept. 12, 1739), an eminent German opera-composer.

He was grounded in music by his father, a sound church composer, and afterwards attended the Thomasschule of Leipzig, under Johann Schelle, at the same time coming frequently before the public at the many concerts renowned even then for their excellence. In 1692 he was at the court of Brunswick with Kusser (see COUSSER), where his opera 'Basileus' was produced. A pastorate, 'Die widergesundenen Verliebten,' was also given there (1695), and revised as 'Ismene' was later produced at Hamburg (1699) with extraordinary success. In 1694 he removed to Hamburg, presently succeeding Kusser as chief composer to the opera there, and retaining his pre-eminence, despite varying fortunes, through some forty years. 'Irene' (1697) was the first of a series of 116 operas composed for the Hamburg theatre, each containing from 40 to 50 airs, besides operas in collaboration with others, and sacred music. Keiser was luxurious and self-indulgent, and led an adventurous life, but without sacrificing his love of art or his taste for intellectual enjoyments. In 1700 he opened a series of winter-concerts, which formed a remarkable combination of intellectual and sensual gratification; the most accomplished virtuosi, the finest and best-looking singers, a good orchestra, and carefully selected programmes, furnishing the former, and a banquet of choice viands and wines the latter. In 1703 he assumed the direction of the opera in conjunction with Drüsicke, but his partner absconded, and the whole burden fell upon the shoulders of Keiser. He proved equal to the emergency, for in one year (1709) he composed eight operas, married the daughter of a Hamburg patrician and musician to the municipality 'Oldenburg,' and, having completely reinstated his affairs, plunged into all his former extravagant indulgence. In 1716 he resumed his concerts, visited Copenhagen in 1717, and was at the court of Stuttgart from 1719-21; in 1722 he revisited Copenhagen to superintend the production of his opera 'Ulysses' and was appointed Kapellmeister to the King of Denmark; in 1728 was made cantor and canon of Hamburg Cathedral, and again turned his attention to sacred music. He composed operas up to the year 1738. His wife and daughter are said to have been accomplished singers.

Keiser exercised an important though not a permanent influence on German opera. The perfection to which at first he raised the opera at Hamburg speedily degenerated into mere outward show and trivial if not vulgar farce; but the sensation he produced at first is described by his contemporaries as extraordinary. Mattheson, who was not likely to exaggerate the successes of a rival, in his life-like picture of the musical condition of Hamburg, calls Keiser the first dramatic composer in the world, and says that no other music than that of 'dieser galante Komponist' was either sung or listened to.¹ His melodies were smooth and graceful, and fell upon the ear 'like charmed accents after the dull pedantries of the contrapuntists of the day.' That his melody was spontaneous his facility itself proves, and he was conspicuous in his endeavour to convey the sentiment of the character in the music. This was the secret of his success, and it was by this that he enabled German opera to hold its own against the declamation of the French, and the melody and fine singing of the Italians.

In sacred music he shines chiefly in oratorio, which he treated dramatically, but with an earnestness and dignity surprising in a man of his character. His sacred compositions include 'Der für die Sünde der Welt gemarterte und sterbende Jesus,' 1712; 'Der verurtheilte und gekreuzigte Jesus,' published 1715 (poem by Broekes of Hamburg); a Passion according to St. Mark, and other historical oratorios, motets, cantatas and psalms. He published extracts from the two first-named works, viz. 'Auserlesene Soliloquia' (1714), and 'Selige Erlösungs-Gedanken' (1715); airs from various operas, cantatas for a single voice, and several vocal collections with various titles, such as 'Gemüthsergötzung' (1698); 'Divertimenti serenissimi' (1713); 'Musikalische Landlust' (1714); 'Kaiserliche Friedenspost' (1715), etc. Important modern reprints of Keiser's works are 'Octavia' (supplement to Händelgesellschaft edition (1902) and 'Krosus' and 'Inganno fedele,' D.D.T. xxxvii. and xxxviii. Portions of his operas and sacred works have been published by Lindner, in his Erste stehende deutsche Oper, ii. 3-15; Reissmann, in his Allg. Geschichte der Musik, iii. 54-73 and App. Nos. 7 and 8; and von Winterfeld in his Evangelische Kirchengesang, vol. iii. Examples are also to be found in the Oxf. Hist. Mus., vol. iv., The Age of Bach and Handel. Adam Hiller included an unaccompanied motet—'Kindlich gross'—in his Vierstimmige Motetten, etc., vol. ii.; and there is a fugue for four voices, 'Gott ist offenbaret,' in the Auswahl vorzüglicher Musikwerke. A full catalogue of his works is in the Vierteljahrsschrift, vol. vi. pp. 196-203, and a condensed list in Q.-L. A. M., rev.

KÉLER BÉLA (ADALBERT VON KÉLER) (b. Bartfeld, Hungary, Feb. 13, 1820; d. Wiesbaden, Nov. 20, 1882). After attempting both the law and farming he settled himself to music, and in 1845 began regular study at Vienna under Schlesinger and Sechter, playing the fiddle in the band of the Theatre 'an der Wien' at the same time. On May 7, 1854, he took the command of Gung'l's band in Berlin, and began his career as conductor, solo player and composer. After a few months in Berlin he returned to Vienna, and succeeded to Lanner's position at the head of that celebrated band in 1855. This again he left in 1856 for an infantry regiment. As bandmaster to the latter he was called to Wiesbaden in 1863, and in 1870 became Kapellmeister of the Kur orchestra there, a post which he resigned from ill-health in 1872. He celebrated his silver anniversary on May 7, 1879. His works, which reach op. 130, consist of overtures, dance music, and pieces for solo violin, all distinguished for showy, brilliant style and clever orchestration. Among the most popular are his 'Hoffnungssterne' waltz, 'Hurrah-Sturm' galop, and 'Friedrich-Karl' march. G.

KELLER, FORTUNATO, see CHELLERI.

KELLER, GODFREY (d. before 1707), a teacher of music who settled in London near the and of the 17th century. In conjunction with Godfrey Finger he produced 'A set of Sonatas in five Parts for Flutes and Hautboys.' With this date John Cullen issued an engraved folio, A Complete Method for Attaining to Play a Thorough-Bass upon either Organ, Harpsicord, or Theorbo Lute, by the late famous Godfrey Keller. This, in its day, was a greatly esteemed work, and in 1731 it was reprinted in full, with corrections, as an appendix to Holder's Treatise on Harmony. F. K.

A set of six suites for 2 violins and flutes in unison, with violins ad lib and bass, MS. from the Granville Library, is now in private hands. E. v. d. s.

KELLER, KARL (b. Dessau, Oct. 16, 1784; d. Schaffhausen, July 19, 1855), a famous flute virtuoso, son of the court organist and chamber musician, Joh. Gotthilf Keller. He was engaged successively at the courts of Berlin (till 1806), Cassels (till 1814), Stuttgart (till 1816), Donaueschingen, where he was also Kapellmeister at the theatre, and his wife (Wilhelmine Meierhofer) operatic singer, 1817-49. In the latter year he retired to Schaffhausen on a pension. Keller composed chiefly for the flute (concertos, solos, etc.), and songs, some of which attained to great popularity (Mendel).

KELLEY, EDGAR STILLMAN (b. Sparta, Wisconsin, U.S.A., Apr. 14, 1857), an American composer and writer on musical subjects. He was a pupil, first, of F. W. Merriam, from 1870-1874; then of Clarence Eddy and N. Lodochowski in Chicago for two years. He went then to Stuttgart, where he studied for four years under Seifritz, Krüger, Speidel and Friedrich Finck. Kelley spent much of his time, upon his return to America, in California, acting as organist in San Francisco and Oakland, and as music critic, from 1893-95, for the San Francisco Examiner. While there he devoted some attention to study of the music of the Chinese, who dwell in large numbers on the Pacific coast. The influence of these observations is seen in his 'Aladdin' suite, in which he has used Chinese motives. In 1890 he conducted a comic operetta company in the eastern States, and in 1892 he brought out a comic operetta of his own, entitled 'Puritania,' in Boston, where it had a success that was denied to it in other cities. In 1901-02 he was acting professor in Yale University. He taught pianoforte and composition in Berlin from 1902-10. Since 1910 he has been teacher of composition in the Cincinnati Conservatory and has held a fellowship from the Western College for Women at Oxford, Ohio, to enable him to devote himself to composition. Kelley's compositions, which are chiefly in manuscript, include, beside 'Puritania,' op. 11, and 'Aladdin,' op. 10, incidental music to Macbeth for orchestra and chorus, op. 7; incidental music to the play of Ben Hur, op. 17, for orchestra, solos, and chorus; a pianoforte quintet; an original theme with variations for string quartet, op. 1; a Wedding Ode for tenor solo, male chorus and orchestra, op. 4; 'Pilgrim's Progress,' a cantata; 'Gulliver,' a symphony; 'New England Symphony'; quintet for pianoforte and strings; quartet for strings; and a number of songs and pieces for the pianoforte. He published, in 1913, Chopin the Composer. R. A.

KELLNER, DAVID (b. Leipzig, 1670; d. Stockholm, Apr. 6, 1748), organist and carillon-player at the time of his death. He was a captain in the service of the town of Hamburg, and an excellent musical theorist and lute-player. He went later into Swedish service, and was Kapellmeister at the German church at Stockholm (c. 1745). His Treulicher Unterricht im General-Bass (instructions in thorough-bass), Hamburg, 1732, appeared in many editions, the last being in 1797, and was translated into Swedish and Dutch. Thelemann wrote a preface to the second edition, and Dan. Solander of Upsala to the third, but Mattheson apparently wrote an adverse criticism. Kellner wrote also a book of lute pieces (1747). E. v. d. s.

KELLNER, (1) JOHANN PETER (b. Gräfenrode, Thuringia, Sept. 24, 1705; d. there, 1788), received his musical instruction chiefly from J. C. Schmidt, the organist of Zella St. Blasii, by whom he was early introduced to the works of Sebastian Bach. In 1725 he obtained the post of cantor at Frankenhain, but exchanged it in 1728 for a similar post at his birthplace, where, in spite of many tempting offers elsewhere, he remained till his death. It was his pride in later days to recall his personal acquaintance with Bach and Handel. For them and their works he always expressed the utmost veneration, and we owe the preservation of some of Bach's works to copies made by him. We are also told that once when Bach happened to come into the church where Kellner was playing, Kellner improvised in a masterly way a fugue on the theme b-a-c-h. From Kellner's manuscript of 1738 Spitta has printed Bach's Vorschriften und Grundsätze zum vierstimmigen Spielen des General-Bass oder Accompagnement für seine Scholaren in der Musik.¹ Kellner's own published works are:

1. 'Certamen musicum bestehend aus Präludien, Fugen, Allemanden,' etc., in six Suites (Arnstadt, 1739-49). Another edition in eight Suites (1749-56).

2. 'Manipulus Musices oder eine Hand voll kurzweiliger Zeitvertreib fürs Clavier' (Arnstadt, 1753-56), four pieces partly Suites, partly Sonatas.

3. Two Choralbearbeitungen for two Clav. and Pedal. Other organ works and church cantatas exist in MS.

Seiffert² expresses the opinion that Kellner's clavier works have been most undeservedly neglected by modern collectors and editors of the older music. He reckons the suites, more especially, as among the best of those produced after the form had been perfected by Muffat and Bach. Naturally, various reminiscences of Bach and Handel occur in Kellner's works.

J. R. M.

His son, (2) JOHANN CHRISTOPH (b. Gräfenrode, Thuringia, Aug. 15, 1736; d. Cassels, 1803), pupil of his father and of Georg Benda, toured in Germany and Holland, and lived for some time at Amsterdam and the Hague. On his return he became organist at the court church at Cassels. He was an eminent theorist and composer of an operetta, a cantata, concertos, sonatas, organ pieces; he wrote a book on thorough-bass (Mendel; Q.-L.).

KELLOGG, CLARA LOUISE (b. Sumterville, South Carolina, July 12, 1842; d. New Hartford, Connecticut, May 13, 1916), opera singer. She was of northern extraction. Her mother had considerable talent as a musician, and Clara was her only child. In 1856 they removed to New York, where she received the whole of her musical education. She made her first appearance there, at the Academy of Music (Opera), as Gilda in 'Rigoletto,' in 1861, and sang that season ten or twelve times. On Nov. 2, 1867, she made her début in London at Her Majesty's as Margherita, and sang also as Violetta, Linda, Martha and Zerlina ('Don Giovanni'), appearing in the last-named part on the night before the theatre was burnt down, Dec. 6. In 1868 she sang, with the company of Her Majesty's Theatre, at Drury Lane, and at various important concerts in the same season, and at the Handel Festival. From 1868-72 she was touring in the United States. On May 11, 1872, she reappeared in London at Drury Lane, Her Majesty's Opera, as Linda, and sang during that season also in 'Lucia,' and other parts. On her return to the United States she continued to sing in Italian opera till 1874, when she organised an English troupe, herself superintending the translation of the words, the mise en scène, the training of the singers, and the rehearsals of the chorus. Such was her devotion to the project, that in the winter of 1874-1875 she sang no fewer than 125 nights. She reappeared at the rebuilt Her Majesty's Theatre in 1879 as Aida, and Philine in 'Mignon.' In 1881 she returned to America, singing principally in concerts. She married her manager, Carl Strakosch, in 1887, and soon afterwards retired. Her musical gifts were great. She is said to have been familiar with forty operas. She had great conscientiousness as an artist, ardent enthusiasm, and a voice of great compass and purity.

KELLY, FREDERICK SEPTIMUS (b. Sydney, May 29, 1881; d. Beaumont on the Ancre, France, Nov. 13, 1916), pianist and composer, was educated at Eton and Balliol College, Oxford (where he gained a musical scholarship, 1899), and later studied the piano under Knorr at Frankfurt.

Kelly's musical influence among his contemporaries at Oxford was strong. He took his turn as president of the University Musical Club, and was active in promoting the Sunday evening concerts at Balliol. In connection with both, his fine taste and his admirable qualities as a pianist, particularly in concerted chamber music, made their mark. That he was also known as a first rate oarsman¹ naturally served to popularise the interests of his art among undergraduates. After his period of study abroad he was in London and acted as adviser to the CLASSICAL CONCERT SOCIETY (q.v.). His influence was exerted to direct that society's interests towards modern music and to combine it with the existing repertory of classical works, and he was largely responsible for the important place held by the society through several years. In 1911 he revisited Australia and gave some concerts at Sydney. He returned to London and gave an interesting series of chamber concerts in 1912. In 1914, on the outbreak of war, he joined the Royal Naval Division; after distinguished service in Gallipoli he attained the rank of Lieutenant-Commander and was killed in action in France, Nov. 13, 1916. As a composer Kelly was chiefly known through some piano pieces which he had produced at his recitals, but a memorial concert of his compositions (Wigmore Hall, May 2, 1919) included an Elegy for small orchestra, written in Gallipoli (1915), in memory of his friend, Rupert Brooke, who had died there a few days before, a Serenade for flute solo and small orchestra (5 movements) and a number of songs. Other works are a sonata in G for violin and PF. played by Jelly D'Aranyi and Leonard Borwick at a concert of the Classical Concert Society; 'Monographs' and 'Allegro de Concert' for PF.; Theme, Variations and Fugue for two pianofortes. c.

KELLY, MICHAEL (b. Dublin, Christmastide, 1762; d. Margate, Oct. 9, 1826), the son of Thomas Kelly, wine merchant and dancing-master, of Mary Street, Dublin, was a tenor singer, composer and author of much quoted Reminiscences.

When a lad in Dublin he took part in the 'Fantoccini' organised by Kane O'Hara at the theatre in Capel Street, and he was taught the piano by Morland (1770-72) and by Michael Arne (1777-1778)—his singing-masters being Passerini, Peretti and St. Giorgio. He finished his piano lessons with Dr. Cogan, and had a short course of instruction from Rauzzini. On May 1, 1779, he left Dublin for Naples. Before quitting Dublin, however, a fortuitous circumstance led to his appearance on the stage as the Count in Piccini's 'Buona Figliuola,' and that again to his performing the hero in Michael Arne's 'Cymon,' and Lionel in 'Lionel and Clarissa.'

¹ He rowed in the Eton eight (1899), then in the Oxford eight and won the 'Diamond Sculls' three times at Henley.

At Naples he placed himself under the tuition of Finaroli, head of the Conservatorio di La Madonna di Loreto. He subsequently studied under Aprile, with whom he visited Palermo, and then went successively to Leghorn, Florence, Bologna, Brescia, Verona, Gratz in Styria, and Venice, ultimately reaching Vienna, where he was engaged at the Court theatre. There he remained four years, enjoying the intimate friendship of Mozart, who on the production of his 'Nozze di Figaro' (May 1, 1786) allotted to Kelly (whose name he spells 'Oechely' in his MS. catalogue) the parts of Basilio and Don Curzio. Being anxious to visit England, Kelly obtained leave of absence from the Emperor, and in Feb. 1787 quitted Vienna in company with Stephen Storace, his mother and sister—Signora Storace—and Attwood. He appeared at Drury Lane on Apr. 20, as Lionel, in 'Lionel and Clarissa,' and continued there as first tenor until he quitted the stage. He also sang at the Concerts of Antient Music, the Handel performances in Westminster Abbey, and in the provinces.

In 1789 he made his first appearance as a composer by the production of the music to two pieces called 'False Appearances' and 'Fashionable Friends,' and from that date till 1820 furnished the music for sixty-two dramatic pieces,¹ besides writing a considerable number of English, Italian and French single songs, etc. In 1793 he was engaged at the King's Theatre, of which he was for many years acting manager. On Jan. 1, 1802, he opened a music-shop in Pall Mall adjoining the Opera House, but this promising speculation failed owing to his inattention, and in 1811 he was made a bankrupt. He also engaged in the wine trade, and this circumstance, combined with the suspicion that some of Kelly's compositions were derived from foreign sources, led Sheridan to propose that he should inscribe over his shop, 'Michael Kelly, Composer of Wines and Importer of Music.' On Oct. 1, 1811, in Dublin, Kelly made his last appearance on the stage at his own benefit, when he sang 'The Bard of Erin,' composed by himself.

In 1826 he published his Reminiscences in 2 vols. 8vo. This entertaining work, which reached a second edition in the same year, was written by Theodore Hook from materials furnished by Kelly. Its personal notices of Mozart are both interesting and important, and have been done justice to by Otto Jahn (Mozart, ii. 242, etc.). Kelly died at Margate, and was buried in the churchyard of St. Paul's, Covent Garden. The following is a list of the pieces for which he composed the music:

'False Appearances' and 'Fashionable Friends,' 1789; 'A Friend in Need,' 'The Last of the Family,' 'The Chimney Corner,' and 'The Castle Spectre,' 1797; 'Blue Beard,' 'The Outlaws,' 'The Captive of Spielberg' (with Dussek), and 'Aurelio and Miranda,' 1798; 'Feudal Times' and 'Pizarro,' 1799; 'Of age to-morrow,'

'De Montfort,' and 'The Indians,' 1800; 'Deaf and Dumb,' 'Adel-morn the Outlaw,' and 'The Gipsy Prince,' 1801; 'Urania,' 'Algonah,' and 'A House to be sold,' 1802; 'The Hero of the North,' 'The Marriage Promise,' and 'Love laughs at Locksmiths,' 1803; 'Juchella,' 'The Counterfeit,' 'The Hunter of the Alps,' 'The Gay Deceivers,' 'The Bad Bargain,' and 'The Land we live in,' 1804; 'The Honey Moon,' 'A Prior Claim,' and 'Youth, Love and Polly,' 1805; 'We fly by night,' 'The Forty Thieves,' and 'Adrian and Ortila,' 1806; 'The Young Hussar,' 'Town and Country,' 'The Wood Demon' (with M. P. King), 'The House of Morville,' 'Adelgitha,' and 'Time's a tell-tale,' 1807; 'The Jew of Mogador,' 'The Africans,' and 'Venoni,' 1808; 'The Foundling of the Forest,' and 'The Jubilee, 1809; 'Gustavus Vasa' and a Ballet, 1810; 'The Peasant Boy,' 'The Royal Oak,' and 'One o'clock,' 1811; 'The Absent Apothecary,' 'The Russians,' 'Polly,' 'The Illusion,' and 'Harlequin Harper,' 1813; 'Remorse,' 1814; 'The Unknown Guest,' 1815; 'The Fall of Taranto,' 1817; 'The Bride of Abydos,' 1818; 'Abudah,' 1819; and 'The Lady and the Devil,' 1820.

Of his many songs, 'The Woodpecker' is the only one that has survived until the present time. W. H. H.; addns. W. H. G. F. and D. N. B.

KELLY, THOMAS ALEXANDER ERSKINE, SIXTH EARL OF (b. Sept. 1, 1732; d. Brussels, Oct. 9, 1781), an amateur composer of some degree of celebrity, and a violinist. He succeeded to the title in 1756, and died a bachelor. He studied music in Germany under Stamitz, and about the middle of the 18th century became famous for the composition of minuets, overtures and symphonies. His overture to 'The Maid of the Mill,' 1765, was long a popular piece. Robert Bremner of London and Edinburgh published his earlier compositions, and his copyright grant for them for nineteen years is dated 1761. Afterwards Lord Kelly's compositions were issued by William Napier. In 1836 Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe edited a small quarto publication of his minuets and other pieces, with a biographical notice and list of compositions. It is likely that Lord Kelly formed one of that group of musicians among whom were James Oswald, Charles Burney and Captain (afterwards General) Reid, who formed the 'Society of the Temple of Apollo.' The compositions of this Society were for a time published anonymously by James Oswald of St. Martin's Lane.

KELWAY, (1) JOSEPH (d. probably May 1782), a pupil of Geminiani, was organist of St. Michael's, Cornhill, about 1730, but resigned the post in 1736, on being appointed organist of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields vice Weldon deceased. Upon the arrival of Queen Charlotte in England in 1761, Kelway was appointed her instructor on the harpsichord. As a harpsichord-player he was remarkable for neatness of touch and rapidity of execution, and for his ability in performing Scarlatti's pieces. As an organist he excelled in extemporaneous performance, of which he was such a master as to attract the most eminent musicians in London (amongst them Handel) to the church in order to hear him. Burney (iv. 665) characterises his playing as full of a 'masterly wildness . . . bold, rapid, and fanciful.'² A fine portrait of Kelway seated at the harpsichord, probably by Battone, exists. Also a pastel from it.³

His elder brother, (2) THOMAS (d. Chichester, 1800), was also an organist.

² See also Mrs. Delany's Letters, i. 579, ff. 61, and other books referred to in the D. N. B.

³ The portrait belonged (1915) to Miss Musgrave, 63 Cadogan Gardens, London; the pastel to Miss Loat of Yelverton, Devon.

May 21, 1749), was educated as a chorister in Chichester Cathedral, and became organist there in 1726. Seven services and nine anthems by him are contained in a MS. volume in the library of Chichester Cathedral. His Evening Service in B minor is printed in Rimbault's Cathedral Music, and two others in A minor and G minor are published by Novello. His epitaph may be read in West's Cath. Org. W. H. H.

KELZ, MATTHIAS, of Schongau, Upper Bavaria, was at Augsburg from 1658-69. He is the composer of 'Primitiae musicales' and 'Epidigma harmoniae novae,' 2 books of sonatas and dance movements for one or two violins and viola da gamba.

KEMANTCHE (Arab. Kemangeh), a Persian bowed instrument with three strings, dating from unknown antiquity. The body is globular with flattened open ends, and made preferably of 'tut' (mulberry) wood. One end is covered with skin upon which rests the bridge; the tailpin is of metal, and lengthened for resting on the ground during performance. There are three strings, two of silk and one of metal, and the long bow is strung with black horse-hair (PLATE LII, No. 3). Amongst the Arabs the instrument takes a simpler and less ornamental form, the body being made out of a cocoa-nut or a hollow gourd, and there are generally but two strings of twisted horse-hair. The word means 'a little bow,' and the Arabic epithet à gouz ('ancient') is usually added. It is undoubtedly one of the earliest of all bowed instruments, claiming identity with or descent from the somewhat mythical Ravanastrum of India, from which the Urheen (Erhsien) of the Chinese is also supposed to have sprung. (See VIOLIN FAMILY.) F. W. G.

KEMBLE, ADELAIDE (b. circa 1814; d. Aug. 4, 1879), younger daughter of Charles Kemble, the eminent actor, was educated for a concert singer. She appeared first in London at a concert of Ancient Music on May 13, 1835, and afterwards at the York Festival, but with little success. She then went to Paris for improvement, and from thence in 1837 to Germany, and early in 1839 to Italy, when she had lessons from Pasta on the Lake of Como. In that year she made her appearance at La Fenice, Venice, as Norma with decided success. In 1840 she sang at Trieste, Milan, Padua, Bologna and Mantua with increasing reputation. In 1841 she returned to England, and on Nov. 2 appeared in an English version of 'Norma' with marked success. In 1842 she sang in English versions of 'Lo Nozze di Figaro,' 'La Sonnambula,' 'Semiramide,' and 'Il Matrimonio Segreto.' In 1843 she was married to Edward John Sartoris, and retired from the profession. In 1867 she published her delightful A Week in a French Country House.

KEMP, JOSEPH, Mus.D. (b. Exeter, 1778; d. London, May 22, 1824), was placed as a chorister in the cathedral under William Jackson, with whom he continued as a pupil after quitting the choir. In 1802 he removed to Bristol on being appointed organist of the cathedral. In 1807 he resigned his appointment and settled in London. In 1808 he took the degree of Mus.B. at Cambridge, his exercise being a War Anthem, 'A Sound of Battle is in the Land' (composed 1803). In 1809 he was, by special dispensation, permitted to proceed Doctor of Music; his exercise being an anthem entitled 'The Crucifixion.' On Oct. 25, 1809, 'The Jubilee,' an occasional piece by him, was produced at the Haymarket Theatre. In 1810 a melodrama called 'The Siege of Isca (Exeter); or, The Battles in the West,' written by Kemp, with music by himself and Domenico Corri, was produced at the theatre in Tottenham Street. In the same year he lectured on his New System of Musical Education, probably the first method propounded in England for teaching music to numbers simultaneously. In 1814 he returned to Exeter, resided there till 1818, then went to France, remained until 1821, and again returned to Exeter. Dr. Kemp published:

An anthem, 'I am Alpha and Omega.'

'Twelve Psalmic Melodies,' 1818.

'Twelve Runps,' 1799.

'Twenty Double Chants.'

A set of pianoforte sonatas, published at Exeter.

The Vocal Magazine.

The New System of Musical Education, Part I.

Numerous single glees, songs, duets and trios.

KEMPIS, NICOLAS À (b. Florence, mid-17th cent.), organist of St. Gudule, Brussels. He composed a book of 8-part masses and motets; also Symphonies 1, 2, 3 violinorum (Antwerp, 1644); Symphonies 1, 2, 3, 4 et 5 instrum. . . op. 2 (Antwerp, 1647). His violin sonatas of 1644 show considerable progress in the cantabile style. (See his sonata in A in Riemann's 'Alte Kammermusik,' Schott.) E. V. D. S.

KENN, P., a famous German horn-player who went to Paris in 1782. He became 2nd horn at the Opéra in 1783; joined the Garde Nationale in 1791; was teacher at the Conservatoire from 1795-1802, and retired from opera with a pension in 1808. He composed horn duets, trios, etc. Fétis declared him one of the finest of all low horn players.

KENNEDY, (1) DAVID (b. Perth, Apr. 15, 1825; d. Stratford, Ontario, Oct. 12, 1886), Scottish singer.

He received his first lessons in music from his father, an enthusiastic musician, and at the age of 18 assisted him as precentor of the North United Secession Church, Perth. At the age of 20 he succeeded his uncle as precentor of South Street Church in the same city. At an early age he was apprenticed to a house painter in Perth. During this time, while working at a house ten or twelve miles distant, he resolved to hear Templeton, who was singing at the Perth Theatre. He started after leaving off work, running all the way, and clearing the distance in two hours. Having no money to pay for admission, he stood throughout the whole performance, in the pelting rain, with ear to key-hole, and then took to the road again to be ready for work at six in the morning. He afterwards worked as a journeyman in Edinburgh and London, but returned to Perth to start business on his own account. He had, however, the never-ceasing desire to become a public singer, and made frequent visits to Edinburgh to receive singing-lessons from Edmund Edmunds. Having secured an appointment as precentor in Nicolson Street United Presbyterian Church, Edinburgh, he struggled hard to support himself and family by occasional concert giving, teaching, etc., in Edinburgh and neighbourhood.

In January 1859 he received his first important engagement, for the Burns centenary at St. George's Hall, Liverpool. In the autumn he gave twelve concerts in Buccleuch Street Hall, Edinburgh. Every programme being different, he tested about 150 songs. Professor Aytoun and Robert and William Chambers were in the habit of attending; they became his personal friends, and gave him many friendly hints and great encouragement at the outset of his career. In 1860 he made short tours in Scotland, and 1861 went as far as the Orkneys. In the summer of 1862 he made his first appearance in London, at the Hanover Square Rooms. Four concerts were given, and the programmes contained selections from 'The Gentle Shepherd,' 'Noctes Ambrosianae,' etc., etc. The veteran John Templeton was present upon each occasion, and was one of the first to offer his warm congratulations. In December of the same year Kennedy gave a long series of concerts in the Egyptian Hall. After tours in the south of England and in Scotland he returned to London in 1864 to give a series of concerts in Store Street Hall, with fresh programmes, which included selections from 'Waverley,' and an entertainment called 'The Farmer's Ingle.' His eldest daughter, Helen, scarcely in her teens, had now become his accompanist. At one time or another his eleven sons and daughters all assisted in the entertainments. In the summer of 1866 he visited Canada and the United States, and sang in every city of importance North and South. For the next twenty years he toured at home and abroad, travelling through Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and India, and revisiting Canada several times. One of his first acts when at Quebec in 1867 was to visit the grave of John Wilson, the Scottish singer, who died there in 1849. He had photographs taken of the tombstone, and arranged that the grave should be tended and cared for in perpetuity. Kennedy's last appearance in public was at a 'Burns Night,' in Sarnia, Oct. 4, 1886. The last concert given by the 'Kennedy Family' was at Stratford, Ontario, on the following evening. Kennedy being too ill to appear, his daughters carried out the programme, the Mayor of Stratford taking the chair. Kennedy probably hastened his end by resolving to revisit the grave of Wilson with the shadow of death almost upon him. He went out of his way to do so, and died in a few days. The body was embalmed and brought to his native land by his widow; a public funeral took place from his own house in Edinburgh to the Grange Cemetery. An interesting sketch, David Kennedy, the Scottish Singer, by his daughter MARJORY (Mrs. Kennedy Fraser; see below), was published in 1887. It contains also a condensation of three books, previously published, entitled Kennedy's Colonial Tour, Kennedy in India, and Kennedy at the Cape. One son and two daughters perished at the burning of the Théâtre des Italiens at Nice on Mar. 23, 1881. His eldest son was DAVID (b. Perth, 1849; d. Pietermaritzburg, Dec. 5, 1885). His youngest daughter, JESSIE, married Tobias MATTHAY (q.v.). Only a few years before his death Kennedy was at Milan receiving valuable hints from Lamperti; a true lover of his art, he ever felt the necessity for constant application and study. Among the Scottish singers who gave similar entertainments to those of Wilson and Kennedy, the Fraser family deserves mention. Its head was JOHN FRASER (b. Renfrewshire, c. 1794; d. Mar. 1879). He and his daughters attained considerable merit in their line.

(2) MARJORY (Mrs. Kennedy Fraser) (b. Perth, Oct. 1, 1857), is the most distinguished of David Kennedy's children on account of her important work as collector and editor of Hebridean Folk-song. She, like the other members of the family, shared the travels and the musical activities of the father, whom she accompanied on the piano at the age of 12. He began her training as a singer, which was completed under Mathilde Marchesi in Milan and Paris. Her marriage to A. J. Fraser, a mathematician and schoolmaster of Glasgow, took place after her father's death, and, her husband dying not long after, she pursued her artistic career through many lecture-recitals on various aspects of song. Ducoudray's collection of Breton songs stimulated her interest in folk-song, and in 1905 she first visited the islands of the Outer Hebrides. Her own collections of Hebridean song, her extensive studies therein, and the numerous lecture-recitals by which she has brought these songs before the general public, have accomplished for the folk art of the Hebrides a popularity comparable to that achieved by Cecil Sharp for the folk-songs of Somerset. Mrs. Kennedy Fraser visited New York in 1913, and has lectured in the United States. She made an appearance on the stage in the first production (1924) of Bantock's opera, 'The Seal Woman,' of which she was the librettist, and the music of which is largely founded on melodies of her collection. The following are her principal publications:

'Songs of the Hebrides,' 3 vols. (English and Gaelic text), 1909, 1917, 1921.
'Hebridean Suite,' vcl. and PF.
'Scots Folk Tunes.'
Unison Songs for Schools.
Three handbooks, viz.:
Laws of Interpretation and Hebridean Song.
Lowland Scots Song.
Pronunciation of Lowland Scots.

Her daughter, (3) PATUFFA KENNEDY-FRASER (b. Edinburgh, June 10, 1888), is well known for her singing to the harp of 'Songs of the Hebrides.' She has toured in America. She married J. C. F. Hood.

KENNIS, GUILLAUME-GOMMAIRE (b. Lierre, Feb. 9, 1719; d. Louvain, May 10, 1789), maître de chapelle at Lierre Church, 1742-50; at St. Pierre, Louvain, 1750-89. He was an excellent violinist, and was presented with a Jac. Stainer violin by the Empress Maria-Theresa. (See Burney's Diary, p. 62.) He composed 6 sinfinie a quattro, trio sonatas, duets, and violin sonatas with basso continuo (Q.-L.).

KENT, JAMES (b. Winchester, Mar. 13, 1700; d. there, May¹ 6, 1776), son of a glazier, became a chorister of the cathedral there under Vaughan Richardson, from 1711-14, but was shortly afterwards removed to London and entered as a chorister of the Chapel Royal under Dr. Croft. There he attracted the attention of the sub-dean, Rev. John Dolben, through whose influence he obtained, in 1717, the post of organist of the parish Church of Finedon, Northamptonshire, the seat of the Dolbens. He resigned his office at Finedon in 1731, on obtaining the organistship of Trinity College, Cambridge, which he held till 1737, when on Jan. 13 he succeeded John Bishop as organist of the cathedral and college of Winchester. He married Elizabeth, daughter of John Freeman, a singer at the theatre in the time of Purcell, afterwards a member of the choirs of the Chapel Royal, St. Paul's, and Westminster, and who died Dec. 10, 1736. It was not until the decline of life that Kent could be induced to publish; he then printed a volume containing twelve anthems. In 1774 he resigned his appointments in favour of Peter Fussell. After his death a volume containing a Morning and Evening Service and eight anthems by him was published under the editorship of Joseph Corfe. Kent assisted Dr. Boyce in the compilation of his 'Cathedral Music.' His anthems have been extravagantly extolled by some, and decried by others; in both cases unjustly. They are smooth and even productions, generally pleasing, but rarely rising above mediocrity. His 'Hear my Prayer' was at one time a great favourite, but it is a poor composition. He borrowed freely from Italian composers, without acknowledgment, as is shown by a volume full of his notes formerly in the possession of Sir F. A. G. Ouseley. (See BASSANI.)

KERAULOPHON (from κεραιή, a horn-blower, and φωνή, a voice). An 8-foot organ manual stop, of a reedy and pleasant quality of tone. It was invented by Messrs. Gray & Davison, and used by them for the first time in 1843 in the organ they made for St. Paul's Church, Wilton Place. An example was introduced by the French firm of Ducroquet into their organ at St. Eustache, Paris, erected in 1854.

KERLE, JACOB VAN (b. Ypres, c. 1531; d. Prague, Jan. 7, 1591²), a Flemish master who appears to have spent the earlier part of his musical career in Italy, whence the dedications of his earlier works from 1558 are dated. From 1562-75 he was in the service of the Cardinal-Archbishop of Augsburg—Otto von Truchsess—partly in Rome and partly in Augsburg. He is said to have accompanied the cardinal to the later sessions of the Council of Trent, 1562-63, and at any rate was commissioned by him to compose the music for a set of special prayers on behalf of the Council (see title below). He afterwards obtained a canonry at Cambrai, which he continued to hold while also in the service of the Emperor Rudolf at Vienna and Prague (1583 and 1585). His works are:

1. Hymni totius anni, etc., 4. Rome, 1558, 23 n.
2. Magnificat octo tonum, 4. Venice, 1561.
3. Sext missae, 4 and 5. Venice, 1562. Dedicated to Duke Albert of Bavaria. It is in the title of this work Kerle is described as composer to the Cardinal of Augsburg.
4. Proces species pro salubri generali concilii successu et conclusionis, novissime Christiani salute ac unione, etc., 10 Responsoria. 4. Venice, 1562.
5. Cantiones sacrae, 4 and 5. Nürnberg, 1571. 14 Motets and Te Deums.
6. Liber modularum sacrorum, 5 et 6 voc., quibus addita est recens cantio, 8 voc., de sacro fodere contra Turcas (this last composition being a thanksgiving for the victory at Lepanto over the Turks). Munich, 1572.
7. Two other Books of Motets, 4-6. 33 n. Munich, 1573.
8. Cantiones sacrae, 4 and 5. Munich, 1575, 9 n.
9. 4 Missae, 4, with Te Deum, 4. 5. Martin, Antwerp, 1583 (this work a reprint).
10. Alloquot moduli, 4-8, etc. Prag, 1585. Te Deum, Magnificat, Asperges and motets.

Ambros speaks very highly of Kerle's masses and motets. While still belonging to the older school of composition, they have a character of their own of grandeur and power. Proske's 'Musica Divina' contains a vigorous motet by

KERLL (KERL, CHERLL), JOHANN CASPAR ¹ (b. Adorf, Saxony, Apr. 9, 1627 ²; d. there, Feb. 13, 1693 ³), celebrated organist.

Mattheson's Ehrenpforte contains details of his life. He came early to Vienna, and learnt the organ from Valentini, then organist, afterwards Kapellmeister to the court, on whose recommendation Ferdinand III. sent him to Rome to study under Carissimi. In all probability he also learnt from Frescobaldi, possibly at the same time as his countryman Froberger. Having returned to Germany he entered the service of the Bavarian Elector on Feb. 22, 1656, and in that capacity was present at the coronation of Leopold I. at Frankfurt (July 22, 1658), where he is said to have been presented by Schmelzer, vice-court-Kapellmeister, to the Emperor, and invited to improvise on a given theme in presence of the court. Some doubt is thrown on this by the fact that Schmelzer did not become vice-Kapellmeister till Jan. 1, 1671; but he may well have been in attendance on the Emperor at Frankfurt, and at any rate Kerll's reputation as an organist dates from the coronation. Kerll remained at Munich until 1674. For the Italian singers there he composed a 'Missa nigra,' entirely written in black notes, and a duct for two castrati, 'O bone Jesu,' the only accompaniment of which is a ground bass passing through all the keys. Besides other church works, sonatas for two violins and a viola da gamba, and a 'Modulatio organica super Magnificat' (Munich, 1686), Mattheson mentions toccatas, canzonas, ricercars and batailles of his composition for the organ. In 1674 he threw up his post and went to Vienna, where he gave lessons at what was then a high scale of remuneration. He was appointed court organist there in 1677, and seems to have retained the post until 1692, when it is supposed that he returned to Munich.

His style is remarkable for the frequent introduction of discord resolved in a new and unexpected manner, in which respect he is deservedly considered a predecessor of Sebastian Bach. He wrote the music of the operas 'Oronte,' 1657; 'Erinto,' 1661; of the serenata in honour of the birthday of the wife of the Elector (Nov. 6, 1661), 'Le pretensioni del Sole': and of 'I colori geniali' (1668). One of his canzonas has been preserved to the world in a singular but most efficient way—owing to its insertion by Handel in 'Israel in Egypt' to the words 'Egypt was glad when they departed.' Hawkins gives the canzona in its original form in his History, chap. 124. His masses and motets are catalogued in Q.-L., as well as his other compositions in MS. A selection of his instrumental works is published in D.D.T. (second series), ii. 2.

KES, WILLEM (b. Dordrecht, Holland, Feb. 16, 1856), violinist and conductor, studied with many professors, at first under Tyssens, Nothdurft and Ferdinand Böhm, and then, provided with a stipend by the King of Holland, with Ferdinand David at the Leipzig Conservatorium (1871), with Wieniawski at the Brussels Conservatoire, and finally (1876) with Joachim at Berlin. But his career has been rather that of conductor than violinist. For several years he divided his time between his native town and Amsterdam, accepting in the latter city the post of conductor of the Park Orchestra, and Felix Meritis Society (1876), the Parkscheouwburg Concerts (1883), and the Concertgebouw Concerts (1890), directing also the Society Concerts at Dordrecht. In 1895 he undertook the conductorship of the Scottish Orchestra in Glasgow, and in 1898 was appointed conductor of the Moscow Philharmonic Society and director of the Moscow Conservatoire. He returned to Leipzig in 1904 for a few months; then removed to Dresden, and afterwards to Coblenz, with musical activities in both towns. He has written a symphony, a 'Ballade' for chorus, solo voice and orchestra, besides smaller works.

KETTEN, HENRI (b. Baja, Hungary, Mar. 25, 1848; d. Paris, Apr. 1, 1883), attained a rapid success as a pianist, being trained in Paris by Marmontel and Halévy. His compositions enjoyed a great vogue in their day, but are of essentially trivial quality. M.

KETTERER, EUGÈNE (b. Rouen, 1831; d. Dec. 18, 1870), entered the Paris Conservatoire, obtaining a second prize for solfège in 1847, and a premier accessit in 1852, under Marmontel. From that time until his death, which took place during the siege of Paris, he appeared constantly as a pianist, and wrote multitudes of brilliant fantasias and drawing-room pieces, which obtained ephemeral popularity. KEUCHENTHAL, JOHANNES, described as 'Pfarrherr auf dem St. Andreasberge,' published at Wittenberg in 1573 a comprehensive collection of liturgical music for the use of the Lutheran Church (Kirchengesang lateinisch und deutsch). It contains plain-song melodies of the Introits, Sequences, Antiphons, Responsoria, parts of the Mass and other offices of the Church for all Sundays and Holydays, besides some Deutsche Lieder, and a German Passion-Music with the 'Turbæ' set in falso-bordone style for four voices. Otto Kade (Die ältere Passionscompositionen, 1893) has proved

KEY, an English word applied to music mainly in two senses, viz. (1) in relation to scales and (2a and 2b) as part of the mechanism of instruments, as follows:

(1) Equivalent to Fr. tonalité; Ger. Tonart; Ital. tonalità. In this sense the term is applicable to all European music written in accordance with either of the two modes, called major or minor, which were evolved by the process of harmony from the older melodic modes (see MODES, ECCLESIASTICAL). It is not coterminous with SCALE (q.v.), because the scale is merely the chart or outline of the key, and notes not contained in the scale are usable in the key (see ACCIDENTALS). Every note is possible as the key-note of two keys, based on the major and minor scales beginning from that note. The key is shown in notation by a group of sharps or flats placed after the clef on the staff and called the Key SIGNATURE (q.v.). For the historical development of key and its importance as a factor in composition, see the articles HARMONY and TONALITY.

C.

(2a) Equivalent to Fr. touche; Ger. Taste; Ital. tasto. A key of a pianoforte or similar instrument is a lever, balanced see-saw fashion near its centre, upon a metal pin. It is usually of lime-tree, because that wood is little liable to warp. Besides the metal pin upon the balance rail of the key-frame, modern instruments have another metal pin for each key upon the front rail, to prevent too much lateral motion.¹ A key is long or short according to its employment. Those representing the notes of the natural scale are long, those of the intervening semitones (five to the octave) are short. Each long key is covered as far as it is visible with ivory or equivalent substance: and each short or raised key bears a block of ebony or other hard black wood. In old instruments the practice in this respect varied. (See KEYBOARD.)

A. J. H.

(2b) Equivalent to Fr. clef; Ger. Klappe; Ital. chiave, the name given to the levers on wind instruments which serve the purpose of opening and closing certain sound-holes.

They are divided into open and closed keys, according to the function which they perform. In the former case they stand normally above their respective holes, and are closed by the pressure of the finger; whereas in the latter they close the hole until lifted by muscular action. The closed keys are levers of the first, the open keys usually of the third mechanical order. They serve the purpose of bringing distant orifices within the reach of the hand, and of covering apertures which are too large for the last phalanx of the finger. They are inferior to the finger in lacking the delicate sense of touch to which musical expression is in a great measure due. In the bassoon, therefore, the sound-holes are bored obliquely in the substance of the wood so as to diminish the divergence of the fingers. Keys are applied to instruments of the flute family, to reeds, such as the oboe and clarinet, and to instruments with cupped mouthpieces, such as the key bugle and the OPHICLEIDE (q.v.), the name of which is a compound of the Greek words for Snake and Key. (See articles on these instruments.) In the original SERPENT (q.v.) the holes themselves were closed by the pad of the finger, the tube being so curved as to bring them within reach.

The artistic arrangement of keys on all classes of wind instruments is a recent development. Flutes, oboes, bassoons and clarinets, up to the beginning of the 19th century or even later, were almost devoid of them. The bassoon, however, early possessed several in its bass joint for the production of the six lowest notes on its register, which far exceed the reach of the hand. In some earlier specimens, as stated in the article referred to, this mechanism was rudely preceded by plugs, requiring to be drawn out before performance, and not easily replaced with the necessary rapidity. (See BASSOON.)

The older flutes, clarinets and oboes only possess three or four keys at most, cut out of sheet metal, and closely resembling mustard-spoons. The intermediate tones, in this deficiency of keys, were produced by what are termed 'cross-fingerings,' which consist essentially in closing one or two lower holes with the fingers, while leaving one intermediate open. A rude approximation to a semitone was thus attained, but the note is usually of a dull and muffled character. БОРИМ (q.v.), in the flute named after him, entirely discarded the use of these 'cross-fingered' notes. (See FLUTE.)

Keys are now fashioned in a far more artistic and convenient form, a distinction in shape being made between those which are open and those normally closed; so that the player may be assisted in performance by his instinctive sense of touch. (See BASSOON.) Besides the Bassoon, the Corno di Bassetto affords a good example of this contrivance, the scale being carried down through four semitones by interlocking keys, worked by the thumb of the right hand alone.

W. H. S.

KEYBOARD (Fr. clavier; Ger. Klavatur; Ital. tastatura), a frame or, technically, a 'set' of keys. The influence of the keyboard upon the development of modern music is as conspicuous as it has been important. To this day C major is 'natural' on the keys, as it is in the corresponding notation. Other scales are formed by substituting accidental sharps or flats for naturals, both in notation and on the keyed instruments, a fact which is evidence of the common origin and early growth together of the two. But the notation soon outgrew the keyboard. It has been remarked by Huxley that the ingenuity of human inventions has been paralleled by the tenacity with which original forms have been preserved. Although the number of keys within an octave of the keyboard are quite inadequate to render the written notation of the four-and-twenty major and minor modes, or even of the semitones allied to the one that it was first mainly contrived for, no attempts to augment the number of keys in the octave or to change their familiar disposition have yet succeeded. The permanence of the width of the octave again has been determined by the average span of the hand, and a Ruckers harpsichord of 1614 measures but a small fraction of an inch less in the eight keys than a concert-grand piano of the 20th century. We are without definite information as to the origin of the keyboard. A primitive keyboard is exhibited in the HYDRAULUS (q.v.). There is reason to believe that the little portable organ or regal may at first have had a keyboard derived from the T-shaped keys of the HURDY GURDY. The first keyboard would be diatonic, with fluctuating or simultaneous use of the B \flat and B \natural in the doubtful territory between the A and C of the natural scale. Praetorius, 1619, speaks of organs with such keyboards as being still in existence, i.e. with B \flat and B \natural only, making three semitones in the octave (really four: e-f, a-b \flat , b \flat -b \natural , b \natural -c). When the row of sharps was introduced, and whether at once or by degrees, we do not know. They are, doubtless, due to the frequent necessity for transposition, and we find them complete in trustworthy pictorial representations of the 15th century. There is a painting by Memling in the Hospital of St. John at Bruges, whence it has never been removed, dated 1479, wherein the keyboard of a regal is depicted exactly as we have it in the arrangement of the upper keys in twos and threes, though the upper keys are of the same light colour as the lower, and are placed farther back. Another painting of the Flemish school may be seen at Holyrood Palace, Edinburgh, wherein a positive organ has a perfect chromatic keyboard beginning at B \natural . This picture has been proved by the late Mr. Laing, F.S.A., to date about 1484. The instrument is 'short octave,' there being two pipes for the deep G and A. The keys are white naturals and black sharps.

EARLY KEYBOARDS DESCRIBED.—The oldest keyed instruments we have seen with undoubtedly original keyboards are a spinet¹ in the museum of the Conservatoire at Paris, bearing the inscription 'Francisci de Portalupis Veronen. opus. MDXXIII.' the compass is four octaves and a half tone (from E to F') and the natural notes are black with the sharps white; and a very interesting Roman Clavicembalo, acquired by the Victoria and Albert Museum in 1879. The date is 1521, and it was made by Geronimo of Bologna; it has boxwood naturals, compass from E to d''', nearly four octaves. There was a spinet in the loan collection of the Bologna Exhibition (1888), made by Pasi of Modena, which was said to be dated 1490. (See also SPINET.) The Flemings, especially the Ruckers, oscillated between black and ivory naturals. The clavichords of Germany and the clavecins of France which we have seen have had black naturals, as, according to Dr. Burney, had those of Spain. Loosemore and the Haywards, in England, in the time of Charles II., used boxwood for naturals; a clavichord of four and a half octaves existing near Hanover in 1875 had the same—a clue perhaps to its date. Keen and Slade, in the time of Queen Anne, used ebony. Dr. Burney writes that the Hitchcocks also had ivory naturals in their spinets, and two of Thomas Hitchcock's still existing have them. But one of John Hitchcock's, dated 1630, said to have belonged to the Princess Amelia, subsequently owned by Mr. W. Dale, has ebony naturals. All three have a strip of the colour of the naturals inserted in the sharps, and have five octaves compass—from G \flat to g''', sixty-one keys! This wide compass for that time—undoubtedly authentic—may be compared with the widest Ruckers to be mentioned farther on.

COMPASS OF SPINETS AND HARPSICHORDS.—Under CLAVICHORD we have collected what information is trustworthy of the earliest compass of the keyboards of that instrument. The Italian spinets of the 16th century were nearly always of four octaves and a semitone, but divided into F and C instruments with the semitone E or B \natural as the lowest note. But this apparent E or B may from analogy with 'short octave' organs—at that time frequently made—have been tuned C or G, the fourth below the next lowest note.² Another question arises whether the F or C thus obtained were not actually of the same absolute pitch (as near as pitch can be practically said to be absolute). We know from Arnold Schlick (Spiegel der Orgelmacher, 1511,³ that F and C organs were made on one measurement or pitch for the lowest pipe, and this may have been carried on m spinets, which would account for the old tradition of their being tuned 'in the fifth or the octave,' meaning that difference in the pitch which would arise from such a system.

The Antwerp (Ruckers) harpsichords appear to have varied arbitrarily in the compass of their keyboards. We have observed E—c''' forty-five notes, C—c''' forty-nine, B,—d''' fifty-two, C—e''' fifty-three, C—f''' fifty-four, G,—d''' or A,—e''' fifty-six, G,—e''' or G,—f''' (without the lowest G♯) fifty-eight F,—f''' sixty-one, and in two of Hans Ruckers (the eldest) F,—g''' sixty-three notes. In some instances, however, these keyboards have been extended even, as has been proved, by the makers themselves.

COMPASS OF THE PIANOFORTE.—The English seem to have early preferred a wide compass, as with the Hitchcocks, already referred to. Kirkman and Shudi in the next century, however, in their large harpsichords never went higher than f''', although the latter, towards the end of his career, about 1770, increased his scale downwards to C. Here Kirkman did not follow him. Zumpe began making square pianos in London, about 1766, with the G,—f''' compass (omitting the lowest G♯)—nearly five octaves—but soon adopted the five octaves, F,—f''' in which John Broadwood, who reconstructed the square piano, followed him. The advances in compass of Messrs. Broadwood and Sons' pianofortes are as follows. In 1793, to five and a half octaves, F,—c'''. In 1796, six octaves, C,—c''': this was the compass of Beethoven's Broadwood Grand, 1817. In 1804, six octaves F,—f'''. In 1811, six and a half octaves, C,—f'''. In 1844 the treble g''' was attained, and in 1852 the treble a'''. But before this the A,—a''' seven octave compass had been introduced by other makers, and soon after became general. The Broadwoods were late in adding these extreme notes: Pleyel's semigrand, used by Chopin in Paris, on his return from Majorca, had C,—g'''. Liszt played on a Erard C,—c''' in Paris in 1824, and in London in 1825. Even c'''' appears in recent concert grands, and composers have written up to it; also the deepest G, which was, by the way, in Broadwoods' Exhibition grands of 1851. (See STAVELESS NOTATION.)

EXPERIMENTAL KEYBOARDS.—Innumerable attempts have been made during the last century to modify the keyboard either in order to approximate it to the system of just intonation or to gain some supposed facility in performance. None has yet (1926) gained any acceptance. The nature of these experiments is indicated by the following examples.

The invention of a 'symmetrical' keyboard, by which a uniform fingering for all scales, and a more perfect tuning, might be attained, was attempted by R. M. Bosanquet, of St. John's College, Oxford, who had constructed an enharmonic harmonium with one. In An Elementary Treatise on Musical Intervals and Temperament (Macmillan, 1876), he described this instrument—with passing reference to other new keyboards independently invented by Poole and Colin Brown. In Bosanquet's harmonium the number of keys in an octave available for a system proceeding by perfect fifths was 53. But in the seven tiers of his keyboard he had 84, for the purpose of facilitating the playing of a 'round' of keys.

In Germany an arrangement was proposed, almost identical with the 'sequential keyboard' invented and practically tried in England by William A. B. Lunn under the name of Arthur Wallbridge in 1843, in which six lower and six upper keys were grouped instead of the historical and customary seven and five in the octave. This gives all the major scales in two fingerings, according as a lower or upper key may be the keynote. The note C becomes a black key. In 1876–77 the partisans of the new German keyboard formed themselves into a society, 'Chroma - Verein des gleichstüfigen Ton-systems,' with the view of settling the still more difficult and vexed question of the reconstruction of musical notation. It published a journal, Die Tonkunst (Berlin, Stilke), edited by Albert Hahn, whose pamphlet, Zur neuen Klaviatur (Königsberg, 1875), with those of Vincent, Die Neuklaviatur (Malchin, 1875), and of Otto Quanz, Zur Geschichte der neuen chromatischen Klaviatur (Berlin, 1877), gives particulars of the system evolved. The inventor appears to have been K. B. Schumann (d. 1865), a physician at Rhinow in Brandenburg. Prussia of Berlin constructed the keyboard with C on a black key; width of octave 14 centimetres¹ (5½ inches nearly), and with radiating keys by which a tenth became as easy to span as an octave is at present.

A later application of the principle (1887–88) is the invention of Paul von JANKÓ (q.v.). In this keyboard each note had three finger-keys, one lower than the other, attached to a key lever. Six parallel rows of whole tone intervals were thus produced. In the first row the octave was arranged c, d, e, f♯, g♯, a♯, c; in the second row c♯, d♯, f, g, a, b, c♯. The third row repeated the first, the fourth the second, etc. The sharps were distinguished by black bands intended as a concession to those familiar with the old system. The keys were rounded on both sides and the whole keyboard slanted. The advantage claimed was a freer use of the fingers than is possible with the accepted keyboard. Von Jankó's invention was introduced to the English public by J. C. Ames at the Portman Rooms on June 20, 1888.

The fact that the fingering of the right hand upwards is frequently that of the left hand downwards led to the construction of a 'Piano à doubles claviers renversés,' shown in the Paris Exhibition of 1878 by Mangeot frères of that city. It was in fact two grand pianos, one placed upon the other, with key-boards reversed as the name indicates, the lower starting as usual with the lowest bass note at the left hand; the higher having the highest treble note in the same position, so that an ascending scale played upon it proceeded from right to left; the notes running the contrary way to what has always been the normal one. By this cumbersome contrivance an analogous fingering of similar passages in each hand was secured, while other advantages were claimed.

KEYED GUITAR. Towards the end of the 18th century a mechanical device was frequently attached to the English guitar or either consisting of little buttons placed at the side of the instrument which, by a lever action, plucked the strings with small points or plectra, as in the spinet, or else struck the strings with small hammers, as in the pianoforte. For this latter purpose a detachable box furnished with 6 keys and 6 hammers (one for each set of strings) was affixed to the guitar just over the bridge, but notwithstanding the subsequent addition of so-called Trumpet, Harp, Hautboy and Cremona stops the keyed guitar failed to hold its own against the Spanish instrument (PLATE XXXI. No. 3; see GUITAR).

KEYRLEBER, JOHANN GEORG (b. Württemberg, 2nd half of 17th cent.), Magister philosophiae et artium liberalium, possessed a great facility for writing canons in any known species. For the birthday of the Emperor Joseph I., in 1691, he wrote an 'Aggratulatione musica-poetica' in a 'canon perpetuo' of 16 trebles and 16 violins of different melody, which could be increased to 256 vocal and 256 instrumental parts, i.e. 512 distinct parts. He also wrote circle and other trick canons in many parts (Mendel).

KHOVANTCHINA, opera in 5 acts; text and music by Moussorgsky. Completed (finale to last act) and orchestrated by Rimsky-Korsakov. Produced St. Petersburg, 1885; Drury Lane, July 1, 1913; in English (Beecham), Covent Garden, Nov. 25, 1919.

KHUEN (KUEN), JOHANN (b. Mosbach (or Mosach), Bavaria; d. Nov. 1675), beneficiary of St. Peter's, Munich; a prolific composer of sacred songs, some of which have appeared in modern editions (Q.-L.).

KIALLMARK, (1) GEORGE (b. King's Lynn, Feb. 1781; d. Islington Mar. 1835), studied the violin under Barthélemon and Spagnoletti, and became leader in various orchestras. He wrote many songs which were popular in their day, and a great number of fantasias for the pianoforte. His son, (2) GEORGE FREDERICK (b. Islington, Nov. 7, 1804; d. Dec. 13, 1887), studied the piano under Moscheles, Logier and his father; also at Paris under Kalkbrenner. He lived in London as a player and teacher (Brit. Mus. Biog.)

KIDSON, FRANK (b. Leeds, Nov. 15, 1855; d. there, Nov. 8, 1926), was an antiquary who combined to a remarkable degree enthusiasm and accuracy, as his numerous publications show. He was among the earliest modern collectors of folk-songs, one of the founders of the Folk-Song Society and an editor of its journals. He contributed many articles on old English music and publishers to this Dictionary, in both the 2nd and the present editions, and his contributions always gave evidence of original, conscientious research. His speciality was the popular music, more particularly the songs, ballad operas, dances and publishers of the 18th century in this country, as to which he might be regarded as the leading authority. He was also a recognised authority on Leeds Pottery, on which he collaborated with his brother, J. R. Kidson, in writing a book, Historical Notes of the Leeds Old Pottery (1892), which is always quoted as the chief source of information on the subject. His local knowledge was shown in the valuable notes on music and musicians, painting, etching and pottery, which he contributed to the Handbook of the 'Old Leeds Exhibition' of July 1926. The honorary M.A. conferred on him by Leeds University in 1923 was a suitable recognition of his work.

His publications include:

Old English Country Dances (1890); Traditional Tunes (1891); British Music Publishers, Printers and Engravers, from Queen Elizabeth's Reign to George the Fourth's (1900); English Folk-song (1900); The Beggar's Opera, its Predecessors and Successors (1922).

He also edited, jointly with Alfred Moffat, several collections of old songs. (See also under LIBRARIES.)

KIEL, FRIEDRICH (b. Puderbach on the Lahn, Oct. 7, 1821; d. Berlin, Sept. 14, 1885), son of a schoolmaster, who taught him the pianoforte. At 14 he began the violin under Schulz, Konzertmeister to Prince Carl von Wittgenstein-Berleberg, and soon entered the band of the reigning Prince, who sent him first to Caspar Kummer at Coburg, and in 1843 to Dehn at Berlin. While there he received a salary from King Frederick William IV. His first compositions were for the pianoforte, 'Canons und Fugen' opp. 1 and 2; variations and fugue, op. 17; and several pieces for PF and violoncello, of which the 'Reisebilder' are specially interesting. In 1862 his Requiem (op. 20), a remarkable work, was performed oy Stern's Choral Society — also by the University Musical Society of Cambridge, May 21, 1878. In 1865 he composed a 'Missa solennis,' and in 1871-72 an oratorio 'Christus.' A second Requiem (op. 80) was brought out a few years before his death. He was a member of the council of the Berlin Akademie der Künste from 1869, and was professor of composition in the Hochschule für Musik, in which capacity he was much esteemed. Kiel was a distinguished teacher of counterpoint and fugue, and as such forms one of the race of musicians of whom the late Moritz Hauptmann may be considered the chief. His compositions are of the sound classical school. F. G.

KIENLEN, JOHANN CHRISTOPH (b. Ulm, 1784; d. Dessau, 1830), appeared as a prodigy, both of the voice and the piano, at the age of 7, and was sent by his Munich patrons to Paris, where he studied under Cherubini. On his return he became municipal music director of Ulm. In 1810 he produced his composition of Goethe's Claudine von Villa Bella at Leipzig with scant approbation. It met with a better reception at Stuttgart in 1811, and achieved distinct success at Berlin in 1818 after revision and a partial rewriting. About this time he received the title of 'Royal Bavarian Director of Music.' In 1811 he went to Vienna where he became the teacher of Schwyder von Wartensee. Between that time and 1823 he held various appointments and produced several operas. In the latter year he became singing-master at the Berlin opera. In 1828 a symphony was produced at Posen. He wrote an introduction and romance to E. T. A. Hoffmann's composition of Goethe's Scherz, List und Rache, many songs, and two pianoforte sonatas. He died in poverty. E. v. d. s.

KIENZL, WILHELM (b. Waizenkirchen, Austria, Jan. 17, 1857), composer principally of operas, was the son of a lawyer. His father was elected in 1861 mayor of the town of Gratz, where Kienzl has lived nearly all his life. Kienzl studied composition under Dr. W. Mayer, who also had as pupils Weingartner and Busoni. Later he attended the Conservatorium at Prague, and concluded his studies in Munich under Rheinberger. Encouraged by the advice of Adolf Jensen and the sympathy of Liszt, he began to compose, simultaneously continuing his abstract studies, his work in this direction finding expression in a highly interesting and valuable work on musical declamation, which attracted the attention of Wagner, to whom Kienzl felt himself drawn by the similarity of their musical opinions. Kienzl stayed for some time at Bayreuth on terms of intimacy with the family, until his outspoken admiration of Schumann put an end to their amicable relations. Nevertheless, Kienzl remained, musically speaking, in the Wagnerian fold, and did not desert the tenets of Bayreuth.

His first opera, 'Urvasi,' which was produced at Dresden in Feb. 1886, attracted more attention by its melodic charm and the beauty of its orchestration than by the action of the drama, which was weak. His next opera, 'Heilmars der Narr,' was held in abeyance for some ten years owing to difficulties in the staging. In the meantime his third and best-known opera, 'Der Evangelimann,'¹ which had a conspicuous success all over Germany and Austria, rivalling that of Humperdinck's 'Hänsel und Gretel,' appeared in 1894. It was given at Covent Garden, July 3, 1897. In 1898 another opera, on the subject of Don Quixote, was produced in Berlin. In all these works Kienzl, like Humperdinck, retained the constructive features of the Wagnerian creed, but discarded the purely heroic drama, proving that the methods of Bayreuth are capable of being brought nearer to the people than their first propounder ever intended. His style, which is less intricate than that of Humperdinck, is full of musical interest, and is superior to most of the productions of his German contemporaries by the attractiveness of the material he uses. Later stage works of Kienzl are 'In Knecht Rupprechts Werkstatt' (Gratz, 1907), 'Der Kuhreigen' (Vienna, 1911), 'Das Testament' (Vienna, 1916), and 'Hassan der Schwärmer' (Riemann). 'Der Kuhreigen' was given in English as 'The Dance of Death' by the Moody-Manners Opera Company at Liverpool and London in 1914.

Besides his operas Kienzl has published over 100 songs, of which a representative selection exists, in the form of an album obtainable in the 'Universal Edition,' other interesting sets being op. 55, six songs, and op. 66, three songs. Further, some 150 piano pieces, amongst which the 'Dichterreise,' op. 46, and the 'Tanzbilder,' op. 41, the latter for piano duet, deserve mention. He has also contributed copiously to orchestral and chamber music, and has published a large number of smaller choral works. His most important production in musical literature, besides the book mentioned above, is an interesting monograph on Wagner, which appeared in 1903. In the same year a marble relief monument in his honour was unveiled in his native town.

KIESEWETTER, RAPHAEL (GEORG, EDLER VON WIESENBRUNN (b. Holešov, Moravia, Aug. 29, 1773; d. Baden, near Vienna, Jan. 1, 1850), uncle to Ambros the historian of music, Imperial councillor from 1803, and learned author on musical subjects. He settled in Vienna in 1794. In 1816 he began to form a collection of scores of the old masters, and made his house a rendezvous for the first musicians of Vienna. There also, during Advent, Lent and Holy Week, a first-rate amateur choir performed the principal works of the old Italian composers, and of Bach, Handel, etc. He was ennobled for his services as an official in the Kriegs-rath, taking his title from his estate. Innumerable societies elected him a member in acknowledgment of his services as a musician. He left his musical MSS. and his correspondence with musical men of letters to Aloys Fuchs, and to the court library his invaluable collection of scores, with the condition that they should be kept together as the Kiese-wetter collection. He was buried in the cemetery at Vienna, 'vor der Währinger Linie.'

That he was a most prolific writer the following list of his principal works will show:

1. Die Verdienste der Niederländer um die Tonkunst (received the gold prize-medal, Amsterdam, 1828).
2. Geschichte der europäischen Abendlandarten, das ist unserer heutigen Musik (Breitkopf & Härtel, 1834, 2nd ed. 1846, translated into English by R. Müller, 1844).
3. Über die Musik der Neupriechen, with remarks on ancient Egyptian and ancient Greek music; three treatises (ibid., 1838).
4. Guido von Arezzo, life and works (ibid., 1840).
5. Schicksale und Beschaffenheit des weltlichen Gesanges, from the early Middle Ages down to the discovery of the dramatic style and rise of opera (ibid., 1841).
6. Die Musik der Araber, from original sources (ibid., 1842).
7. Über das Leben, und die Werke Palestinas, a condensation of Balini's work left unpublished by Kandler, edited with preface and remarks (ibid., 1844).
8. Der neue Aristonaxer verzeigte Aufsatze (ibid., 1846).
9. Über die Oratorien des Pythagoras, supplement to the preceding (Vienna, 1846).
10. Catalog über die Sammlung der Partituren aller Musik, etc. (Vienna, 1847), with preface and appendix Galerie der alten Contrapuntisten, a selection from their works, chronologically arranged.

Also about fifty scattered articles in different periodicals, reviews, etc. A letter from him to R. L. de Peersall, dated 1838, and expressed in very queer English, is printed in the Mus. T., 1902, p. 93, from the original in the B.M.

KILBURN, NICHOLAS (b. Bishop Auckland, Durham, Feb. 7, 1843; d. there, Dec. 4, 1923), a zealous and able amateur, who did a great work for the cultivation and appreciation of good music in the north of England. He graduated Mus.B. (Cantab.) in 1880, and received the hon. degree of Mus.D. from Durham University, 1914. His activity as a conductor was in connexion with three important northern societies: the Bishop Auckland Musical Society from 1875, the Middlesbrough Musical Union from its foundation in 1882, and the Sunderland Philharmonic Society from 1886. His independent position as an honorary conductor and adviser allowed him great freedom in arranging his programmes, which, while by no means neglecting the great classics of choral and orchestral music, introduced many works which were either new to the country or at least unfamiliar. His habit of attending the principal festivals, at home and abroad—he was a frequent visitor to Bayreuth—enabled him to keep in close touch with current music, and his influence on the music of the district in which he worked was healthful and enduring. He was an efficient organist, pianist and violoncellist, and composed several works for chorus and orchestra, of which the latest, a 'Choral In Memoriam, for Voices, Violins and Trumpet' (Novello), composed 'in memory of our brave soldiers and sailors, 1914 and after,' may be cited. KIND, JOHANN FRIEDRICH (b. Leipzig, Mar. 4, 1768; d. Dresden, June 25, 1843), author of the words of 'Der Freischütz'; was brought up to the law, but frequented the Thomasschule of his own accord. He began to practise literature as early as 1800, and after much success with novels and tales, settled in 1814 at Dresden, became a Hofrath, and definitely renounced the law for a literary life. Here Weber met him, at the house of von Nordstern. About Feb. 15, 1817, Kind read to him his Vandyck's Landleben, which so pleased the composer that he at once consulted him as to an opera-book. The choice of a source fell on Apel's Gespenssterbuch (Ghost Stories). Weber had, several years before, been attached to the story of the Freischütz, and so entirely did his enthusiasm communicate itself to Kind, that by the evening of Feb. 23 he had completed the first act of the opera. This was the only important joint composition of the two, but Jähns's Catalogue contains eleven other pieces, the words of which were supplied by Kind. The chief of these is the 'Jubel Cantata,' another cantata called 'Natur und Liebe,' five songs, two part-songs, and a chorus. Some of these were taken from operas of Kind's—'Der Weinberg an der Elbe,' 'Der Abend am Waldbrunnen,' and 'Das Nachtlager in Granada.' The last of these was set to music by Conradin Kreutzer. Kind seems to have supplied Spanish materials for 'Preciosa,' and Weber had two librettos by him—'Alcindor,' 1819, and 'Der Cid,' 1821—under consideration, but 'Der Freischütz' is the one which Weber adopted in full. Kind's 'Holzdieb' (Wood-thief) was composed by Marschner in 1824. He is described by Weber's son as a small person, with a great opinion of himself and a harsh voice. Two volumes of his works were published, Leipzig, 1821.

KINDERMANN, AUGUST (b. Berlin, Feb. 6, 1817; d. Munich, Mar. 6, 1891), began his career at the opera as a chorus-singer, received instruction from Meyer, and played both bass and baritone parts at Leipzig in 1839-46, after which he was engaged at Munich, where he obtained a life engagement, and was always a great favourite, being a very versatile artist. He celebrated his twenty-fifth anniversary of his engagement there on June 15, 1871, as Figaro in 'Nozze,' the Cherubino being his elder daughter Marie, then engaged at Cassel. He sang Titirel at Bayreuth in 1882; and on Sept. 9, 1886, he celebrated the jubilee of his career, and the fortieth year of his engagement at Munich, playing the part of Stadinger in Lortzing's 'Waffenschmied.' For his daughter Hedwig, see REICHER-KINDERMANN.

KINDERMANN, JOHANN ERASMUS (b. Nuremberg, Mar. 29, 1616;² d. Apr. 14, 1655), Nuremberg organist. His chief work is entitled Harmonia organica in tabulaturam Germanicam composita, etc., first published in 1645, and republished in 1665. It is remarkable, as being one of the earliest specimens of German copper-plate engraving, and is also of importance in the history of organ-playing and organ composition. As the title indicates, the music is given in the old German tablature notation.¹ The work opens with fourteen preludes mainly in the church tones, followed by fugal fantasias on Choral-tunes, and concludes with some Magnificat intonations and verses. The pedal is treated obbligato throughout. Ritter gives three examples from the work in modern notation. Kindermann's other works are partly sacred, partly secular compositions for voices with basso continuo and occasional viol and violin accompaniment. Selections from his works have been reprinted in D.D.T. (2nd series) xiii. and xxi. He also composed a large number of Choral-tunes, harmonised for three voices, to the Nuremberg preacher Dillherr's Evangelische Schlussreimen und Göttliche Liebesflamme, 1649-52. Some works for instruments only, partly viols, partly wind instruments, are also mentioned, but do not seem to exist complete. (See Eitner, Q.-L.)

KINDERSLEY, ROBERT, a 16th-century English composer, who wrote 2 anthems in Leighton's 'Teares and Lamentacions' (1614). One of these was also given in Myriell's 'Tristitia remedium' (1616). A sacred partsong mentioned in Q.-L. is not traceable from indications given, but apparently refers to an incomplete edition of one of the former.

KING, CHARLES, Mus.B. (b. Bury St. Edmunds, 1687; d. London, Mar. 17, 1748), became a chorister of St. Paul's under Dr. Blow and Jeremiah Clarke. He was next a supernumerary singer in the choir at the small annual stipend of £14. On July 12, 1707, he graduated as Mus.B. at Oxford. On the death of Clarke, whose sister he had married, he was appointed almoner and master of choristers of St. Paul's. In 1708 he became also organist of St. Benet Fink, Royal Exchange. On Oct. 31, 1730, he was admitted a vicar choral of St. Paul's. King composed several services and anthems, some of which are printed in Arnold's Cathedral Music, and others in Page's Harmonia Sacra; and there are some in the Tudway Collection (Harl. MSS. 7341 and 7342). Although his compositions evince no originality they are vocal and long continued in frequent use in choirs, particularly his services in F and C. They have justified the joke of Dr. Greene, that King was a serviceable man. Six of them in all are published by Novello, besides five anthems. Hawkins intimates that his inferiority was the result rather of indolence than want of ability.

KING, (1) MATTHEW PETER (b. London,

1773; d. there, Jan. 1823), studied composition under Charles Frederick Horn. His first productions were 'Three Sonatas for the Pianoforte,' 'Eight Songs and a Cantata,' and three other sets of Pianoforte Sonatas. In 1796 he published Thorough-Bass made clear to every Capacity, and in 1800 A General Treatise on Music, etc., a work of repute, with second edition, 1809. On June 1, 1816, his oratorio, 'The Intercession,' was produced at Covent Garden. One of the songs in it, 'Must I leave thee, Paradise?' (known as 'Eve's Lamentation') became very popular, and long found a place in programmes of sacred music. King was also the composer of several glees (among them the popular 'Witches'), and of numerous pianoforte pieces. He composed several dramatic pieces, chiefly for the English Opera House, Lyceum, as follows:

'Matrimony,' 1804; 'The Invisible Girl,' 1806; 'False Alarms' (with Brahms); 'One o'clock, or The Wood Demon' (with Kelly); and 'Flia Rosenberg,' 1807; 'Up all night,' 1809; 'Flots' and 'Oh, this Love,' 1810; 'The Americans' (with Brahms); 'Timour the Tartar,' 1811; and 'The Fisherman's Hut' (with Davy), 1819.

His son, (2) C. M. KING, published in 1826 some songs which were favourably received.

KING, ROBERT, Mus.B., was one of the Royal band, appointed Feb. 6, 1679-80 vice John Bannister deceased. At Christmas 1689 a licence was granted to him to establish a concert.² He graduated at Cambridge in 1696. He was the composer of many songs published in 'Choice Ayres, Songs and Dialogues,' 1684; 'Comes Amoris,' 1687-93; 'The Banquet of Musick,' 1688-92; The Gentleman's Journal, 1692-94; and Thesaurus musicus, 1695-96. He composed the songs in Crowne's comedy, 'Sir Courtly Nice,' which were printed in The Theater of Music, Book ii. 1685. In 1690 he set Shadwell's Ode on St. Cecilia's Day, 'O Sacred Harmony.' In 1693 he set an Ode 'on the Rt. Hon. John Cecil, Earl of Exeter, his birthday, being the 21 of Sept.' beginning 'Once more 'tis born, the happy day,' the words by Peter Motteux. A collection of twenty-four songs by him, entitled 'Songs for One, Two, and Three voices, composed to a Through-Basse for y^e Organ or Harpsicord,' engraven on copper, was 'sold by John Crouch at the Three Lutes in Princes St., Drury Lane' (1690). The date of his death has not been ascertained. He was living in 1711.

KING, WILLIAM (b. Winchester, 1624; d. Oxford, Nov. 17, 1680), son of George King (d. 1665), organist of Winchester Cathedral, was admitted a clerk of Magdalen College, Oxford, Oct. 18, 1648. He graduated B.A. June 5, 1649, and in 1652 was promoted to a chaplaincy at Magdalen College, which he held until Aug. 25, 1654, when he became probationer-fellow of All Souls' College. On Dec. 10, 1664, he was appointed successor to Pickhaver as organist of New College. He composed a service in B \flat and some anthems (a setting of the Litany remained in use in Lichfield Cathedral, and was republished by J. Bishop of Cheltenham and J. B. Lott), and in 1668 published at Oxford 'Poems of Mr. Cowley [The Mistress] and others, composed into Songs and Ayres, with a Thorough Basse to the Theorbo, Harpsicon, or Basse Violl.' He was buried in New College Cloister.

KING COLE CHAMBER MUSIC CLUB, THE. This Club was founded Dec. 8, 1900, by Jan Mulder, a musical enthusiast of Dutch origin. Its object was to obtain performances of chamber music under more intimate and social conditions than in a concert hall. The season consists of 10 concerts and has been carried on continuously since the foundation, the meetings being held in a room lent by the proprietor of an hotel, who undertakes to serve dinner to the guests before the music begins. The venue was in the first instance at the Caledonian Hotel, Adelphi, and more recently at the Great Central, Marylebone.

Most of the leading instrumentalists of the period, 445 in number, have been engaged at these concerts, at which 380 works, including nearly all the masterpieces of chamber music, have been performed. Several modern works, and 66 by British composers, have up to 1925 appeared on the programmes, some for the first time. The aims and objects of the King Cole Club may be said to be unique.

KING SAUL, see SAUL (2).

KING'S BAND OF MUSIC, THE. The custom of the kings of England to retain as part of their household a band of musicians, more or less numerous, is very ancient (see CHAPEL ROYAL). We learn that Edward IV. had 13 minstrels, 'whereof some be trumpets, some with shalmes and smalle pypes.' Henry VIII.'s band in 1526 consisted of 15 trumpets, 3 lutes, 3 rebecks, 3 taborets, a harp, 2 viols, 10 sackbuts, a fife and 4 drumslades. In 1530 his band was composed of 16 trumpets, 4 lutes, 3 rebecks, 3 taborets, a harp, 2 viols, 9 sackbuts, 2 drumslades, 3 minstrels and a player on the virginals. Edward VI. in 1548 retained 8 minstrels, a player on the virginals, 2 lutes, a harper, a bagpiper, a drumslade, a rebeck, 7 viols, 4 sackbuts, a Welsh minstrel and a flute-player. Elizabeth's band in 1581 included trumpets, violins, flutes and sackbuts, besides musicians whose instruments are not specified; and six years later it consisted of 16 trumpets, lutes, harps, a bagpipe, 9 minstrels, 2 rebecks, 6 sackbuts, 8 viols and 3 players on the virginals. Charles I. in 1625 had in his pay 8 performers on the hautboys and sackbuts, 6 flutes, 6 recorders, 11 violins, 6 lutes, 4 viols, 1 harp and 15 'musicians for the lute and voice,' exclusive of trumpeters, drummers and fifers, Nicholas Lanieri being master of the band; and in 1641 his band included 14 violins, 19 wind instruments and 25 'musicians for the waytes,' besides a serjeant trumpeter and 18 trumpeters.

Charles II. in 1660 established, in imitation of Louis XIV., a band of 24 performers on violins, tenors and basses, popularly known as the 'four and twenty fiddlers.' This band not only played while the king was at meals, but was even introduced into the royal chapel, anthems being composed with symphonies and ritornels between the vocal movements expressly for them. After the death of Charles the band was kept up, but was somewhat changed in its composition; it no longer consisted exclusively of stringed instruments, but some of its members performed on wind instruments. Besides its ordinary duties it was employed, together with the gentlemen and children of the Chapel Royal, in the performance of the odes annually composed for the King's birthday and New Year's day; on the discontinuance of the production of such odes, its duties were reduced to attendance on royal weddings and baptisms, and other state occasions. The Band of Queen Victoria was reconstituted by Prince ALBERT (q.v.) on the lines of a modern orchestra. It was thus employed for State concerts, which, however, were discontinued by King Edward VII. The following is the succession of the 'Masters of the Musick' responsible for the Band from the Restoration onwards:

Robert Cambert is sometimes said to have held the office of Master of the Musick, but this is doubtful. Sir Edward ELGAR (q.v.) succeeded Sir Walter Parratt as Master, but the position is now advisory rather than executive.

KING'S CONCERTS, THE, see ANCIENT CONCERTS.

KING'S THEATRE, THE. In the early part of the 18th century, Sir John Vanbrugh, the architect and dramatist, proposed to the performers at Lincoln's Inn Fields Theatre to build them a new and splendid theatre in the Haymarket, and, his offer being accepted, he raised a subscription of £30,000 in sums of £100 each, in return for which every subscriber was to have a free admission for life. The undertaking was greatly promoted by the Kit-Cat Club, and the first stone of the building, which was wholly from the designs of Vanbrugh, was laid in 1704 with great solemnity by the beautiful Countess of Sunderland (daughter of the great Duke of Marlborough), known as 'The little Whig.' Congreve, the dramatist, was associated with Vanbrugh in the management, and the theatre was opened on Apr. 9, 1705, under the name of 'The Queen's Theatre,' which name was changed on the accession of George I. in 1714 to 'King's Theatre,' by which it continued to be called until the death of William IV. in 1837, after which it was styled HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE (q.v.), the reason for not resuming the name 'Queen's Theatre' being that the theatre in Tottenham Street at the time bore that appellation.

Vanbrugh's erection, although internally a splendid and imposing structure, was totally unfitted for its purpose, owing to the reverberations being so great as to make the spoken dialogue almost unintelligible. The defect necessitated extensive alterations. In the course of a few years the house became the established home of Italian opera. In it the greater part of Handel's operas and his early oratorios were first performed (see HANDEL). On the evening of June 17, 1789, the building was burned to the ground. It was rebuilt in 1790 from designs by Michael Novosielski, the lyre-shaped plan being then first adopted in England. When completed it was refused a licence for dramatic representations, but a magistrates' licence being obtained it was opened with a concert and ballet on Mar. 26, 1791. (See HAYDN.) A regular licence was, however, soon afterwards granted. The interior of the theatre was the largest in England; there were five tiers of boxes, exclusive of slips, and it was capable of containing nearly 3300 persons. It was admirably adapted for conveying sound. On the east side was a large and handsome concert-room, 95 feet long, 46 feet broad, and 35 feet high, on a level with the principal tier of boxes. About 1817 an important alteration was made in the exterior of the theatre by the erection of the colonnades on the north, south and east sides, and the formation of the western arcade. The northern colonnade was afterwards removed.¹ (See LAPORTE.) The theatre was again destroyed by fire on Friday night, Dec. 6, 1867. W. H. H.

KINGSTON, MORGAN (b. Wednesbury, Staffs, Mar. 16, 1881), operatic tenor. Something of romance attaches to the early life-story of this talented artist. He sang as a boy in the parish church choir, and when his voice broke he strengthened his chest by playing tenor horn in a brass band. He was then 14, and four years later he began work as a miner, hoping to become a mining engineer. He was still thus occupied at the age of 27 when his singing at a local bazaar drew attention to the exceptional beauty of his voice, and it was decided that he should enter the profession. After nearly three years' training under various teachers, he began his career as an oratorio and concert singer, quickly earning a reputation both in England and on the Continent by the singular purity and genuine tenor quality of his voice, the steadiness and ease of his sostenuto, and the dramatic ring of his high notes. These attributes pointed to his suitability for the operatic stage, and by 1913 he was ready for the American career which was to prove such a brilliant success for him. He made his début at the Century Theatre, New York, as Radamès in 'Aida,' and, consequent upon the enthusiasm of his reception, his contract was extended with double fee from that night. He met with no less success in oratorio, and sang in his first season at no fewer than fifteen festivals, including Cincinnati. In 1916 he became a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and for seven or eight seasons held a high place in that world-famous troupe. Returning in 1924, he made his first appearance at Covent Garden as Canio in 'Pagliacci' on June 25, and met with emphatic success. He then remained in London for a long rest, the benefit of which was made apparent by the freshness and power of his singing at an Albert Hall concert in Jan. 1925, when he was heard to equal advantage in four languages. H. K.

KIRBYE, GEORGE (d. Bury St. Edmunds, Oct. 1634), one of the best English writers of madrigals of the graver kind, may have been a native of Suffolk, where his life was chiefly spent.

The first mention of his name occurs in 1592, when he contributed to East's 'Whole Book of Psalms.' As he furnished more settings of tunes to this book than any other of the composers employed, excepting John Farmer, it is to be assumed that he had already made some reputation as a musician. In 1597 he published what he calls the 'first fruites of my poore knowledge in Musicke,' a set of twenty-four madrigals for 4, 5 and 6 voices, dedicated to two of the daughters of Sir Robert Jermyn of Rushbrooke, near Bury St. Edmunds, in whose house he seems to have lived as music-master, or domestic musician. On Feb. 16, 1597/8, George Kirbye married Anne Saxye, at Bradfield St. George, near Rushbrooke.

In 1601 appeared the 'Triumphes of Oriana,' for which Kirbye wrote a 6-part madrigal. In some copies of the 'Triumphes' his composition appears to the words 'With angel's face and brightness,' elsewhere to the words 'Bright Phoebus greets most clearly,' the music being the same in both cases. It may be conjectured that Kirbye wrote his music to the words 'With angel's face,' to which it seems better suited, but that, as these words were also set by Daniel Norcome, the editor of the 'Triumphes' may have thought it advisable to supply new words to Kirbye's composition.

In 1626 Kirbye was living in Bury St. Edmunds. On June 11 of that year the burial of his wife is recorded in St. Mary's parish registers there, and in 1627-28 his name twice appears in the same registers, probably as one of the churchwardens. On Oct. 6, 1634, his burial is entered in St. Mary's registers. His will, dated Mar. 10, 1633, and proved at Bury, Oct. 7, 1634, shows that he owned property in Whiting Street, Bury St. Edmunds, which he left to his servant, Agnes Seaman, kinswoman to his late wife, together with all his goods, chattels and personal estate; excepting small legacies to his brother, Walter Kirbye; his sister, Alice Moore, widow; and a few others. There is a note in a set of MS. part-books, copied by Thomas Hamond, of Cressners, Hawdon, near Bury St. Edmunds, between the years 1631 and 1660 (Bodl. MS. Mus. f. 1-6), to the effect that the 'Italian songs to 5 and 6 voyces' contained in them were 'collected out of Master Geo. Kirbles blacke bookes wch were sold after ye deccase of the said Geo. to the right worth S^r Jo. Holland in ye yeare 1634. And he paid as they said Kirbles maid, 40s.'

This note is of interest as showing that Kirbye possessed copies of motets, etc., by the best Italian composers of the day.

A large number of unpublished madrigals and motets by Kirbye exist in the Bodleian Library, and in the libraries of the R.C.M. and of St. Michael's College, Tenbury. Unfortunately they are all imperfect, excepting a 4-part madrigal, 'Farewell, false love,' in the R.C.M. Library. In the British Museum is an imperfect pavan for viols (Add. MSS. 30,826/8) and a 5-part hymn, 'O Jesu, look' (Add. MSS. 29,372/7). The complete sets of madrigals are published in Arkwright's OLD ENGLISH EDITION (q.v.), Nos. 3, 4, 5 and 21. Kirbye's 'First set of English Madrigalls' (1597) with his Oriana madrigal (including both sets of words) are republished in ENGL. MADR. SCH. vol. xxiv. G. E. P. A.

KIRCHENMUSIK, AKADEMISCHES INSTITUT FÜR, see BERLIN.

KIRCHER, ATHANASIUS (b. Geisa, near Fulda, May 2, 1602; d. Rome, Nov. 28, 1680), early became a Jesuit, and taught mathematics and natural philosophy in the Jesuit College at Würzburg, where he was professor in 1630. About 1631 he was driven from Germany by the Thirty Years' War, and went in 1633 to the house of his Order at Avignon, and thence by way of Vienna (1635) to Rome, where he remained till his death. He acquired a mass of information in all departments of knowledge, and wrote books on every conceivable subject. His great work Musurgia universalis sive ars magna consoni et dissoni, two vols. (Rome, 1650), translated into German by Andreas Hirsch (Hall in Swabia, 1662), contains, among much rubbish, valuable matter on the nature of sound and the theory of composition, with interesting examples from the instrumental music of Frescobaldi, Froberger and other composers of the 17th century. The second volume, on the music of the Greeks, is far from trustworthy; indeed Meibomius (Musici antiqui) accuses Kircher of having written it without consulting a single ancient Greek authority. His Phonurgia (Kempten, 1673), translated into German by Agathus Carione (apparently a nom de plume), with the title Neue Hall- und Thonkunst (Nördlingen, 1684), is an amplification of part of the Musurgia, and deals chiefly with acoustical instruments. In his Magnes, sive de arte magnetica (Rome, 1641) he gives all the songs and airs then in use to cure the bite of the tarantula. His Oedipus aegyptiacus (Rome, 1652-54) treats of the music contained in Egyptian hieroglyphics. (See J. E. Matthew's Literature of Music, p. 57.) F. G.

KIRCHGESSNER, MARIANNA (b. Waghäusel, near Rastatt, Baden, 1770; d. Schaffhausen, Dec. 9, 1809), performer on the glass HARMONICA (q.v.). An illness in her fourth year left her blind for life, but this misfortune was compensated by a delicate organisation for music. She learned the harmonica from Schmittbauer of Carlsruhe, and made numerous successful concert tours. Mozart heard her in Vienna (1791), and composed a quintet for her (Köchel, 617). In London, about 1794, Fröschel made her a new instrument, which in future she always used. Here also she recovered a glimmering of sight under medical treatment. Much as they admired her playing, musicians regretted that she failed to bring out the true qualities of the harmonica, through a wrong method of execution. After living in retirement at Gohlis, near Leipzig, she undertook another concert tour, but fell ill and died at Schaffhausen. C. F. F.

KIRCHHOFF, GOTTFRIED (b. Mühlbeck, near Bitterfeld, Sept. 15, 1685; d. Halle, Jan. 21, 1746), a pupil of Zachau, was Kapellmeister of the Duke of Holstein-Glücksburg in 1709; organist of the Benedictine Church, Quedlinburg, in 1711; and succeeded Zachau as organist of the Liebfrauenkirche, Halle, July 13, 1714. He was one of the foremost organ composers of the 18th century. (List of works in Q.-L.)

KIRCHNER, THEODOR (b. Neukirchen, near Chemnitz, Saxony, Dec. 10, 1823; d. Hamburg, Sept. 19, 1903), one of the most gifted disciples of Schumann, a composer of 'genre pieces' for the pianoforte, had his musical training at Leipzig, under C. F. Becker, from 1838. Having completed his schooling at Leipzig and Dresden, he took the post of organist at Winterthur in Switzerland in 1843, which town in 1862 he left for Zürich, where he acted as conductor and teacher. In 1873 he became director of the Musikschule at Würzburg, but after two years he threw up that appointment and settled at Leipzig, until 1883, when he moved to Dresden as a teacher of ensemble in the Conservatorium. In 1890 he moved once more to Hamburg, where he died.

Kirchner's works extend to over 100 opus numbers. Except a string quartet, op. 20, a 'Gedenkkblatt,' a 'Serenade' and 'Novelletten,' op. 59, for piano, violin and violoncello, some violin pieces, op. 63, and eight pieces for violoncello, op. 79, and a number of Lieder, they are all written for pianoforte solo or duet, are mostly of small dimensions, and put forth under suggestive titles such as Schumann was wont to give to his lesser pieces. The stamp of Schumann's original mind has marked Kirchner's work from the first; yet though sheltered under Schumann's cloak, many minor points of style and diction are Kirchner's own, and decidedly clever. At best, his pieces are delicate and tender, frequently vigorous, now and then humorous and fantastic; at worst, they droop under a taint of lachrymose sentimentality. They are always carefully finished and well shapen, never redundant, rarely commonplace. Among his early publications, 'Albumblätter,' op. 9, became popular as played by Madame Schumann; and among his later, "Still und bewegt," op. 24, and particularly 'Nachtstücke,' op. 25, deserve attention. E. D.

KIRKMAN. The name borne by a family of eminent harpsichord and subsequently pianoforte makers. (1) JACOB KIRCHMANN (afterwards KIRKMAN) (d. 1778), a German, came to England early in the 18th century, and worked for Tabel, a Flemish harpsichord maker, who had brought to London the traditions of the RUCKERS (q.v.) of Antwerp. Another apprentice of Tabel was SHUDI (q.v.) (properly Tschudi), who became Kirkman's rival, and founded the house of Broadwood. Tabel would have been quite forgotten but for these distinguished pupils, and for the droll anecdote, narrated by Dr. Burney, of Kirkman's rapid courtship of Tabel's widow, and securing with her the business and stock-in-trade. He proposed at breakfast-time, and married her (the Marriage Act being not then passed) before twelve o'clock the same day, just one month after Tabel's demise. Jacob Kirkman was organist of St. George's, Hanover Square; he wrote several sets of pieces for organ and pianoforte, and published them himself at the sign of the King's Arms in Broad Street, Carnaby Market, now No. 19 Broad Street, Soho. Dr. Burney places the arrival of Jacob Kirkman in England in 1740, but he rented a house in Great Pulteney Street East from June 1739 to the end of 1745 (the rate-book of St. James's is missing for 1750). An interesting advertisement apropos of the date appeared in the Daily Gazetteer for May 8, 1739:

'Whereas Mr. Hermann Tabel late of Swallow Street, the famous Harpsichord maker, dead, hath left several fine Harpsichords to be disposed of by Mr. Kirkman, his late Foreman; this is to acquaint the Curious, that the said Harpsichords, which are the finest he ever made, are to be seen at the said Mr. Kirkman's the corner of Pulteney Court in Cambridge Street, over against Silver Street, near Golden Square.'

Shudi was probably established by that time in Meard's Street, Dean Street, Soho, whence he removed in 1742 to the premises in Great Pulteney Street. There is no reason, however, to doubt the same generally excellent authority that Kirkman's death took place about 1778, and that he left nearly £200,000.

Burney, in Rees's Cyclopædia, gives Jacob Kirkman's harpsichords high praise, regarding them as more full in tone and durable than those of Shudi. These instruments retained certain features of the Antwerp model as late as 1768, preserving André Ruckers's keyboard of G, -f''' (nearly five octaves), with lowest G# wanting. This, as well as the retention of the rosette in the sound-board, may be seen in the Kirkman harpsichord of that year which belonged to the late C. K. Salaman, and in which we find King David playing upon the harp, between the letters I and K. Dr. Burney met with no harpsichords on the Continent that could at all compare with those made in England by Jacob Kirkman and his almost life-long competitor, Shudi.

Jacob Kirkman, having no children by his marriage, was succeeded by his nephew (2) ABRAHAM, whose son, (3) JOSEPH, followed him. The piano was introduced in Kirkman's workshops in the time of Abraham Kirkman, as there is record of a square piano inscribed Jacob and Abraham Kirchmann, which was dated 1775. A grand piano dated 1780 was also theirs, and the manufacture of both kinds of instrument went on side by side for some years, as there was a single harpsichord in the possession of the firm, dated 1778, and the double harpsichord, in the possession of Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland, is dated 1798; it is inscribed 'Josephus Kirkman.' His son, (4) JOSEPH, died at the advanced age of 87 in 1877, his second son, (5) HENRY, to whom the business owed its extension, having died some years before. The war-rooms were for many years in Soho Square. In 1896 the business was amalgamated with that of COLLARD (q.v.). The Kirkmans were the English agents for Signor Caldera's attachment known as the Melopiano. A. J. H.

KIRMAIR, FRIEDRICH JOSEPH (d. Gotha,

1814,¹ an 18th century pianist-composer, teacher of the Prussian Crown Princess at Berlin in 1795; from 1803 Konzertmeister to the Duke of Gotha. He composed a Mass, trios, sonatas, variations for pianoforte, etc. (Q.-L.).

KIRNBERGER, JOHANN PHILIPP (b. Saalfeld, Thuringia, Apr.² 1721; d. Berlin, July 27, 1783), composer and writer on the theory of music, learnt the rudiments of music at home, the organ from Kellner of Gräfenrode, and the violin from Meil of Sondershausen. Gerber, court organist there, taught him to play Bach's fugues, and recommended him to Bach, whose pupil he was from 1739-41. Several years were passed at Leipzig, in Poland, and at Lemberg. On his return to Germany he resumed the study of the violin under Zickler of Dresden, and in 1751 entered the service of Frederick the Great at Berlin as violinist. In 1758 he became Kapellmeister to Princess Amalie, and remained with her until his death, in Berlin, after a long and painful illness. During these twenty-five years he formed such pupils as Schulz, Fasch and Zelter, and devoted his leisure to researches on the theory of music. Of his many books on the subject, Die Kunst des reinen Satzes, two vols. (Berlin, 1771-76), alone is of permanent value. He also wrote all the articles on music in Sulzer's Theorie der schönen Künste, and warmly criticises Marpurg's Kritische Briefe, in which various charges had been brought against him. (See Q.-L.) He prided himself on the discovery that all music could be reduced to two fundamental chords, the triad and the chord of the seventh, and invented a new interval bearing the relation of 4 : 7 to the keynote, and which he called I :—but neither of these ideas has stood the test of time. As a composer his most interesting works are his fugues, remarkable for their correctness. In 1773-74 he edited a large collection of vocal compositions by Graun, who was a kind friend to him, and 'Psalmen und Gesänge' by Leo (Leonhard) Hassler. The autograph scores of several motets and cantatas, and a quantity of fugues, clavier-sonatas and similar works, are preserved in the State Library at Berlin and elsewhere. (See Q.-L.) Kirnberger was of a quarrelsome temper, and fond of laying down the law, which made him no favourite with his fellow-musicians. F. G.

KISTLER, CYRILL (b. Grossaitingen, near Augsburg, Mar. 12, 1848; d. Kissingen, Jan. 2, 1907), composer of operas, displayed early taste for music, was a choir-boy at the age of 8, and could play the flute.

At first intended for the Church, he afterwards entered upon the career of a school-master, and taught in various schools from 1867-75. In 1876 he entered the Munich Conservatorium, and studied regularly under

Wüllner, Rheinberger and Fr. Lachner. The last of these took him as a private pupil after his leaving the Conservatorium, and did all in his power to counteract the strong influence of Wagner which had even then declared itself. In 1883 he was appointed teacher of theory, etc., at Sondershausen, and in 1884 his most important work, an opera or music-drama, 'Kunibild,' was brought out at that place. It was not until its revival at Würzburg in 1893 that it was widely recognised as a piece of any great significance. It then excited a good deal of comment, stimulated by the polemical attitude adopted by the composer towards theatrical managers and others, and expressed in a series of Musikalische Tagesfragen, published between 1884 and 1894. The opera is constructed on purely Wagnerian principles, with numerous 'leading-motives.' Occasionally the composer declines into a style that is more akin to that of the usual German partsong, in choruses and such things, for, during his earlier life, he had written much music of a less ambitious aim. After 1885 he lived at Bad Kissingen, as principal of a private music-school, and as a publisher. In 1889 his comic opera, 'Eulenspiegel,' was brought out at Würzburg without much success, although in some ways it is more original than 'Kunibild.' 'Arm' Elselin' was given at Schwerin in 1902, 'Röselin im Hag' at Elberfeld in 1903, and 'Baldurs Tod' at Düsseldorf in 1905. He left a 3-act opera, 'Die deutschen Kleinstädter' (published), unperformed at the time of his death. Besides these dramatic works, Kistler published many pieces for orchestra, among them an interesting 'Trauerklänge,' choruses, songs, organ pieces, etc., method of harmony on Wagnerian principles (Harmonielehre, 1879 and 1903), a Musikalische Elementarlehre, a Volkschullehrer (1880), a Tonkünstler-Lexikon, which reached its third edition in 1887, and Der einfache Kontrapunkt (1904). KISTNER, a music-publishing firm of Leipzig. The business was founded in 1823 by PROBST, who was succeeded in 1831 by (1) KARL FRIEDRICH KISTNER (b. Leipzig, Mar. 3, 1797; d. Dec. 21, 1844), a man of some gifts for music and great business powers. The new name was not assumed till 1836. Kistner greatly improved the business, and secured important works of Mendelssohn, Schumann, Chopin, Moscheles, Sterndale Bennett, etc. He was succeeded by his son (2) JULIUS (d. May 13, 1868), who followed in his father's steps with equal success. He added the names of Hiller, Taubert and Rubinstein to the catalogue of the house, and will long be remembered by those who had to do with him for his kindness and liberality. He withdrew from the business in 1866 in favour of Karl Friedrich and 'Taschengeige,' though pochette is also applied to an instrument of long and narrow form resembling a sordine. It was usually about 16 inches long over all: the woodcut shows its size relatively to that of the violin. Sometimes, however, the neck was longer and broader,¹ for convenience of fingering, which gave the Kit a disproportioned look (see also PLATE LXXXVII. No. 5).

The origin of the name may be connected with the beginning of some form of the word Cithara.² In Florio (1598 and 1611), Beaumont and Fletcher, Ben Jonson and Drayton, it seems evident that it is used without reference to size as a synonym for Crowd, Rebeck or Pandora. Cotgrave (1611) defines it as 'a small Gitterne.' Grew, in 1681, speaks of 'a dancing-master's Kit,' and as dancing-masters' Kits would naturally be smaller than other Kits, the name gradually adhered to them, as that of viol or violin did to the larger sizes. KITCHINER, WILLIAM (b. London, 1775; d. there, Feb. 27, 1827), M.D. (Glasgow), an accomplished amateur musician, the son of a coal merchant, from whom he inherited an ample fortune, was educated at Eton. He composed an operetta entitled 'Love among the Roses, or, The Master Key,' and was author of Observations on Vocal Music, 1821, and editor of 'The Loyal and National Songs of England,' 1823; 'The Sea Songs of England,' 1823; 'The Sea Songs of Charles Dibdin,' 1824; and 'A Collection of the Vocal Music in Shakspeare's Plays.' He was also author of some eccentrically written but useful books, including The Cook's Oracle (1817), The Art of Invigorating and Prolonging Life (1822), The Housekeeper's Ledger (1825), The Economy of the Eyes (1824), The Traveller's Oracle (1827). (The titles of other books are given in the D.N.B.) In his fine musical library was the MS. collection of airs containing the supposed original of 'God save the King,' which, coming after Kitchiner's death into the possession of Richard Clark, was tampered with and has now totally disappeared. KITTEL, JOHANN CHRISTIAN (b. Erfurt, Feb. 18, 1732; d. there, May 18, 1809), one of the last pupils of J. S. Bach.

His first post was that of organist at Langensalza (1751), which he left in 1756 for that of the Predigerkirche at his native place. His pay was wretched, and had to be eked out by incessant and laborious teaching. Even when nearly 70 he was forced to make a tour to Göttingen, Hanover, Hamburg and Altona. In the latter place he stayed for some time, to the delight of the musicians there, and published a book of tunes for the Schleswig-Holstein Church (Neues Choralbuch, Altona, 1803). Thence he crept home to Erfurt, where he died in great poverty, but was saved from actual starvation by a small pension allowed him by Prince Primas of Dalberg. The fame of his playing was very great, but is hardly maintained by his works, which are not very important. The best are grand preludes for the organ in two books (Peters); six sonatas and a fantasia for the clavier (Breitkopf); and an organ school (Der angehende praktische Organist, in three books, 1801-08; Erfurt, Beyer; third edition, 1831). His papers were inherited by his pupil, C. H. Rinck, one of many famous organists who perfected themselves under him. Fétis tells us—and we may accept the story as true, since he was intimate with Rinck—that Kittel had inherited a full-sized portrait of Bach, and that when satisfied with his pupils he drew the curtain, and allowed them a sight of the picture as the best reward he could afford them. It is a story quite in accordance with the devotion which Bach is known to have inspired in those who had to do with him. G.

KITTEL, KASPAR, a 16th-century composer, was sent to Italy for study from 1624-28 by the Elector of Saxony. He studied also under Heinrich Schütz. In 1630 he was teacher of the theorbo at Dresden; in 1632 inspector of instruments; later court organist, which position he still held in 1669. A follower of the school of Caccini, he composed arias and cantatas 1, 2, 3, and 4 v. with basso continuo, op. 1 (1638), edited in score by Naue, Halle, 1824. R. v. d. s.

KJERULF, HALFDAN (b. Christiania, Sept

15, 1815; d. Grefsen, near Christiania, Aug. 11, 1868), became known as a composer in Norway and the surrounding countries during the time of Norway's struggle for freedom, and the consequent renaissance of her intellectual and artistic spirit.¹

In 1834 he was a graduate of the Christiania University, and he had as a matter of course devoted himself to the study of jurisprudence, for his father's high post under Government would have ensured for him a good start in official life. On the death of his father in 1840, a decided step was at last taken by Halldan Kjerulf, and he began his professional career at the age of 25. He settled down as a teacher of music, and published some simple songs even before he had been introduced to the theory of music by some resident foreigner. In 1850 or thereabouts Kjerulf had begun to attract public attention; the Government awarded to him a grant by which he was enabled to study for a year at Leipzig under Richter. On his return to Christiania he did his best to establish classical subscription concerts in that city, but with no lasting success. In 1860 he was in active co-operation with Björnson, who wrote for him many poems; and it was during these years—1860–65—that Kjerulf did his best work, resigned to a contemplative and lonely existence, and content to exercise a quiet influence upon those who sought him out. Grieg, amongst others, was very glad of the older master's moral support.

The portraits of Kjerulf represent him with a mild and pensive face, with traces of pain in the expression. He had indeed suffered for long from extreme delicacy in the chest, and death overtook him when he had withdrawn to a retreat at Grefsen, near Christiania. A wave of deep emotion and sympathy, the fervour of which would have astonished the composer himself, passed over the country he had loved and served so well.

The value of Kjerulf's stirring quartets and choruses for men's voices, as reflecting the national sentiment in the way most acceptable to his countrymen, has already been commented on. As absolute music they are of slight interest, but by their vigour and their straightforward simplicity they may be said to possess all the virtue which belongs to complete appropriateness to the subject. His few piano-forte pieces fully maintain the highly artistic standard to which Kjerulf was always faithful.

Consideration of the purely musical side of Kjerulf's songs shows the perfect genuineness of their inspiration, and also the limits of that inspiration in intellectual depth and power. Among the Northern ballads and lyrics are to be found some really characteristic and quaintly fascinating ditties. Such are Björnson's 'Synnöve's Song,' 'Ingrid's Song,' 'Young Venevil,' 'Evening Song' and the Scotch 'Taylor's Song,' Munch's 'Night on the Fjord,' Theodor Kjerulf's 'Longing.' Several songs that spring from Kjerulf's sojourn at Leipzig recall the influence of Schumann, while his treatment of some English poems is almost startling. The polished verses of Moore are made the vehicle of outpourings in which the gentle Kjerulf is seen in his most impassioned mood—for instance, 'Love thee, dearest, love thee.' 'My heart and lute,' on the other hand, has inspired the composer with an intensity of dreamy melancholy. Unfortunately a certain amount of licence has been taken in the settings, and where the poem as a whole gains by the suggestiveness of the music, the lines and words now and then suffer from false accentuation. This is especially the case with some familiar verses by the late Lord Houghton. It would be impossible to enumerate all that is worthy of note in the collection of more than one hundred songs by Kjerulf; but notice must be taken of the successful colouring of some Spanish subjects, and of the pleasing settings of Victor Hugo's Romances. Many of the songs are familiar to English amateurs through the compilation by T. Marzials, published by Messrs. Stanley Lucas, Weber & Co. Further testimony to the value of the Norwegian composer's work can be read in the Musikalisches Wochenblatt of Jan. 24, 1879, in an article from the pen of Edward Grieg.

KLAFSKY, KATHARINA (b. Szt. Janos, Wieselburg, Hungary, Sept. 19, 1855; d. Sept. 22, 1896), famous Wagnerian singer, was the daughter of a poor shoemaker. In 1870 her mother died, and she left home for Oedenburg, where she had to beg her daily bread. Later she went to Vienna and entered service there as a nurserymaid. Her singing attracted the attention of her employers, who introduced her to Neuwirth, the organist of the Elizabeth Kirche, who gave her instruction. She was engaged in 1874 as a chorus-singer at the Komische Oper. There her voice attracted the attention of the conductor, the younger Hellmesberger, who induced Mme. Marchesi to teach her gratuitously. She was engaged in 1875 at Salzburg as a chorus-singer. In 1876 she married a merchant of Leipzig, and for a very brief space of time retired from the stage, but circumstances compelled her to accept an offer of Angelo Neumann to play small parts at the Leipzig theatre. From 1876–82 she gradually won recognition as Venus in 'Tannhäuser,' and especially, Jan. 2, 1882, as Brangäne, on the production of 'Tristan' at Leipzig. In this last part she made a great success, after a fortnight's study only under the tuition of Paul Geisler, then chorus-master at Leipzig. In the same year she accompanied Neumann on his 'Nibelungen' tour, still in an inferior capacity, and when the Trilogy was produced at Her Majesty's Theatre, London, Frau Klafsky's modest débuts were made, May 5 and 6, as Wellgunde ('Rheingold') and Waltraute ('Walküre'). From 1883-86 she played all the principal parts, and in 1885 played the title part in a revival of Geisler's 'Ingeborg.' From 1886-95 she was the principal singer at Hamburg, and established her reputation as one of the greatest artists in Germany in an extraordinary number of parts. She also sang in opera and concerts at Stuttgart, the Rhenish Festival at Cologne, at St. Petersburg, etc. On July 2 she reappeared in England at Drury Lane in 'Fidelio,' and made an immediate success as Leonora, as Brünnhilde in the 'Trilogy,' and as Isolde and Elizabeth, singing both at Drury Lane and Covent Garden. In 1894 she made a welcome reappearance at Drury Lane, and sang for the first time here as Elsa, and Agatha in 'Der Freischütz.' Later in the year she sang at the Lamoureux Concerts, Paris. In the autumn she and her third husband, Otto Lohse, went to North America as principal singer and conductor of the Damsch German Opera Company. In Aug. 1896 Frau Klafsky reappeared at Hamburg as Elizabeth, and on Sept. 11 appeared on the stage for the last time as Fidelio. Her life was written by Ludwig Ordemann (Fuendeling, Hameln and Leipzig, 1903), and has been of material assistance in the preparation of this notice.

KLAPPENHORN. Horns of the bugle type, fitted with keys to close or open side-holes, preceded those with the cylinder or valve action. They all come under the Klappenhorn group in German nomenclature and comprised instruments in various pitches, from soprano to bass. The alto instrument in C or B flat, corresponding to the English 'Key' or 'Kent-bugle,' (see PLATE LXXIV. No. 9) was (and still is when fitted with pistons) known more particularly as the Flügel horn. (See BASS-HORN, BUGLE, FLÜGEL HORN.)

KLEBER, LEONHARD (b. Göppingen, Württemberg, c. 1490; d. 1556), organist at Pforzheim, Baden, is known as the writer and compiler (from 1520-24) of a large MS. collection of organ and clavier music, in old tablature notation, now in the State Library, Berlin. A full account of the work will be found in Ritter's Geschichte des Orgelspiels, pp. 103-5, also in a monograph by H. Löwenfeld, Berlin, 1897. It has two parts, one for clavier alone in 3-part harmony, the second part requiring the use of the pedals. There are in all 116 pieces, some with the names of their composers, consisting of a certain number of preludes in various keys, described as being in ut, re, mi, fa, sol with and without B flat, la with and without B flat, and a large number of fantasias and organ arrangements of sacred and secular songs. Ritter says:

'The whole collection shows the South German organ-playing in a very advantageous light; it extends and completes the work begun by Schlick, on whose principles it is based.'

Seventeen preludes and a fantasia are given in modern notation in the M.f.M., 1888, and three other pieces by Ritter. J. R. M.

KLEEBERG, CLOTILDE (b. Paris, June 27, 1866; d. Brussels, Feb. 7, 1909), was educated at the Conservatoire under Mme. Emile Réty and Mme. Massart, where she carried off the first piano prize at 12 years of age. Shortly afterwards she played Beethoven's C minor concerto with conspicuous success at one of Padeloup's concerts, and from that time onwards she made annual appearances at all the most important Parisian concerts. In 1883 she came to England, and appeared at a recital, at Mann's benefit at the Crystal Palace, and elsewhere. In the following year she appeared at the Philharmonic Society, and at all the first-rate London concerts. Richter, hearing her play in a private house, engaged her forthwith for the Philharmonic Concerts at Vienna, where she made a great success, as she did in Berlin in 1887, where Von Bülow greeted her with enthusiasm. She married the sculptor, Charles Samuel, and settled in Brussels. Her interpretative power was very remarkable, and her vigorous, artistic and unaffected playing was fully appreciated wherever she was heard. She was perhaps at her best in Bach and Schumann, and she made a speciality of the works of the old French clavecinists. M.

KLEIN, BERNHARD (b. Cologne, Mar. 6, 1793; d. Berlin, Sept. 9, 1832), a composer, whose father was a bass-player in Cologne.

In 1812 he found means to get to Paris, where Cherubini's advice, the hearing of fine performers, and the study of the library of the Conservatoire, advanced him greatly. On his return to the Rhine he conducted the performances in Cologne Cathedral, and profited by an acquaintance with Thibaut and his fine library at Heidelberg. His first important works were a Mass (1816) and a Cantata on Schiller's 'Worte des Glaubens' (1817). In 1819 he was sent officially to Berlin to make acquaintance with Zelter's system of teaching, and to apply it in Cologne Cathedral. He, however, found it more profitable to remain in Berlin, where he became connected with the Institut für Kirchenmusik, then recently established, and was made director of music and teacher of singing in the University. These occupations in no wise checked his productivity. He composed many sonatas and songs, an oratorio, 'Job' (Leipzig, 1820), and two grand operas, 'Dido,' to Rollstab's text (1823), and 'Ariadne' (1825). In 1823 he married and went to Rome, where he enjoyed intercourse with Baini, and copied from the ancient treasures of music there. On his return to Berlin he composed an oratorio, 'Jephthah,' for the Cologne Festival, 1828, and another, 'David,' for Halle, 1830.¹ He died suddenly in Berlin. Besides the compositions already mentioned, he left a Mass in D, a Paternoster for eight voices, a Magnificat and Responsoria for six voices, an opera, 'Irene,' and an oratorio, both nearly finished, eight books of psalms, hymns, and motets for men's voices, and other pieces both sacred and secular. His vocal music was much used by singing societies after his death. Hullah reprinted one of the 4-part psalms, 'Like as the hart,' in his collection called 'Vocal Scores.' It is sweet, dignified, religious music, very vocal in its phrases. a.

KLEIN, HERMAN (b. Norwich, July 23, 1856), an able critic and teacher of singing, who was himself a pupil of Manuel Garcia. He edited Garcia's Hints on Singing, taught at the G.S.M. for 13 years, and has trained many professional singers privately.

Klein began work as a musical journalist in 1875 in London, was critic to The Sunday Times (1881-1901), and at the end of this period produced his book Thirty Years of Musical Life in London (1903), a valuable chronicle. He spent the years 1902-09 in America and wrote much for the New York Herald. Returning to England he resettled in London, resumed teaching work, and has been active in many musical and other societies, notably the Critic's Circle, of which he became chairman in 1924. He wrote The Reign of Patti (1920), the official life of the great singer, whom he had known personally and for whom he retained an unbounded admiration. The Art of the Bel Canto (1924), which followed, may be described as a study in Patti's method. A second book of chronicles, Musicians and Mummies, more an autobiography than its predecessor was, appeared in 1925. He was a contributor to the second edition of this Dictionary as well as to the present one. c.

KLEINHEINZ, FRANZ XAVER (b. Mindelheim, Algäu, July 3, 1772; d. ? Budapest, c. 1832). After studying at Memmingen, he joined the Munich orchestra, went to Vienna c. 1803, where he studied under Albrechtsberger, and arranged Beethoven's pianoforte sonatas for string quartet. He was for a time Kapellmeister at Brünn, and in 1809 was in the service of Count Brunswick at Budapest. He composed a Mass, 2 operas, 1 cantata, settings of some of Schiller's poems, quintet for wind instruments, clarinet trio, pianoforte concerto, violin and pianoforte sonatas, etc. (Thayer's Beethoven: Mendel; Q.-L.).

KLEINKNECHT, a remarkable family of musicians. (1) A 17th-18th century Kleinknecht is represented with a piece in a lute-book in the Augsburg town library (Q.-L.) (2) JOHANN, an early 18th century Konzertmeister and second organist at Ulm Cathedral. (3) JOHANN WOLFGANG, eldest son of Johann (2) (b. Ulm, Apr. 17, 1715; d. Anspach, Feb. 20, 1786), studied the violin under his father, with whom he toured as a prodigy c. 1723. He was chamber musician at Stuttgart in 1733, after filling similar positions at Eisenach and Bayreuth (1738), whence the court chapel was transferred to Anspach in 1769. He was one of the best violinists and orchestral leaders of his time. According to Q.-L. the Brussels Conservatoire possesses in MS. a violin concerto with orchestra. The authorship of the 3 sonatas for 2 violoncelli, given in the same place, is at least doubtful, as no Christian name is given on the title-page. (4) JAKOB FRIEDRICH, (b. Ulm, June 8, 1722; d. Anspach, Aug. 4, 1794) second son of Johann (2) In 1743 he was flautist, in 1747 violinist, in 1749 second Konzertmeister, then court-composer, and in 1761 Kapellmeister at the Bayreuth court. He composed sinfonia concertata, concerto 2 flutes and orchestra, 5 trios, 2 flutes and bass, sonatas to flute, for violin, for pianoforte, etc. (see Q.-L.) (5) JOHANN STEPHAN, third son of JOHANN (2) (b. Ulm, Sept. 17, 1731; d. Anspach, c. 1803), studied the flute under his father, followed his brothers to Bayreuth in 1750, where he completed his studies under Döbbert and Götzl and became a member of the court chapel. In 1766 he toured successfully in Germany, and followed the chapel to Anspach in 1769. His autobiography appeared in Cramer, i. 772, and again in J. J. Meusel's 'Miscellaneen,' Part 12, p. 334. KLEINMICHEL, RICHARD (b. Posen, Dec. 31, 1846; d. Charlottenburg, Aug. 18, 1901), pianist and composer, received his first instruction from his father (Friedrich H. H. Kleinmichel, 1827-94, a military and operatic conductor). In 1863-66 he completed his studies at the Leipzig Conservatorium, and settled at Hamburg, where he published many works of some importance, mostly for his own instrument. His second orchestral symphony was given at the Gewandhaus at Leipzig with success. In that town he held for some time the position of Kapellmeister at the Stadttheater, and subsequently held similar posts at Danzig and Magdeburg. His first opera, 'Manon,' was successfully produced at Hamburg in 1883, and his 'Pfeifer von Dusenbach' at the same place in 1891. He has also made 'simplified' arrangements of the pianoforte scores of Wagner's later works. M.

KLEMM. This well-known Leipzig music publishing firm and circulating library was founded in 1821 by Carl August Klemm in the house known as the 'Hohe Lilie,' 14 in the Neumarkt. Klemm succeeded Wieck, the father of Madame Schumann, who had for some time carried on a musical lending library on the premises. In 1847 the house opened a branch at Chemnitz, and in 1856 at Dresden. Among the original publications of the house are to be found the names of J. S. Bach, Dotzauer, F. Abt, Dreyschock, Mendelssohn, Schumann (opp. 34, 35), Lachner, F. Schneider, Julius Rietz, Marschner, etc. etc. G.

KLEMM (KLEMM), JOHANN (b. Oederan, near Zwickau, Saxony, before 1600; d. after 1651), was received as a boy into the choir of the Electoral Chapel at Dresden. He was afterwards sent, by the Elector Johann Georg I., for his further musical education, to Christian Erbach at Augsburg, with whom he remained from 1613-15. Returning to Dresden he became the pupil of Heinrich Schütz for composition, and was appointed court organist in 1625. He deserves honourable mention in musical history as having generously undertaken the publication of several of the works of Schütz, when Schütz was unable to bring them out at his own expense. The work by which he himself is known as a composer is an instrumental work entitled, 'Partitura seu Tabulatura Italica, exhibens 36 fugas, 2, 3 et 4 vocibus, ad duodecim consuetos tonos musicos compositas . . . non tantum organo sed aliis quoque instrumentis accommodatas,' Dresden, 1631. On this work see Seiffert-Fleischer, Geschichte der Klaviermusik, Bd. I. p. 101. (For other works see Q.-L.) J. R. M.

KLENAU, PAUL VON (b. Copenhagen, Feb. 2, 1883), composer and conductor, studied the violin with Hilmer, and composition with Otto Malling at Copenhagen.

In 1902 he went to Berlin and entered the Hochschule, continuing the violin with Halir and composition with Max Bruch. Proceeding to Munich, he had lessons with Ludwig Thuille until joining the opera at Freiburg i. B. in 1907. The following year he was appointed to the opera at Stuttgart, and took the opportunity of working further with Max Schillings. In 1914 he returned for a time to Freiburg and thereupon settled again at Copenhagen in order to devote himself chiefly to composition. His gifts as conductor and his interest in modern music led to the foundation of the Copenhagen Philharmonic (Dansk filharmonisk Selskab), which he still directs. He is also director of the Wiener Konzerthausgesellschaft and of the Singakademie in Vienna. His work as a conductor is animated with a sincere enthusiasm, which easily communicates itself to the orchestra. In Denmark he has played the part of a pioneer, introducing the works of numerous contemporary composers of all countries. In Vienna and in Central Europe he is noted for his performances of Delius, and was chosen to conduct the festival concert given at Frankfurt in 1924, on the occasion of the composer's sixtieth birthday. In 1925 he conducted, at a Philharmonic concert in London, Delius's 'A Mass of Life,' which he had given some months previously in Vienna. He also directed the first Viennese performance of Milhaud's 'L'homme et son désir' and of the revised version of Schönberg's 'Gurre-Lieder.'

As a composer his most important works are the opera 'Gudrun auf Island' (a revised and more concise version of 'Kjartan und Gudrun') and the series of symphonic poems or 'fantasies' based upon Dante's Inferno. This cycle originated in a Dante symphony, which was performed at Dresden in 1913 and afterwards modified. It now comprises three sections, to which, however, more may be added. The 'Paolo and Francesca' section, originally the slow movement of the symphony, was written as far back as 1904, and, though attractive musically, is less representative of the composer than the later sections. A ballet, 'Klein Idas Blumen' (after Andersen), produced at Stuttgart in 1916, has been performed on several of the more important stages of Central Europe. It is graceful, unpretentious music, and contains a waltz which has become popular. Apart from a feeling for harmonic warmth, the most salient attributes of Klenau's music are its lyrical quality and its sensitiveness to 'mood.'

KLENGEL, AUGUST ALEXANDER (b. Dresden Jan. 27, 1783; d. there, Nov. 22, 1852), son of a well-known portrait and landscape painter, first studied music with Milchmayer, inventor of a piano which could produce fifty different qualities of tone (see Cramer's Magazin der Musik, i. 10). In 1803 Clementi visited Dresden, and on his departure Klengel went with him as his pupil. The two separated on Clementi's marriage in Berlin, but, the young wife dying shortly after, they went together to Russia, where Klengel remained till 1811. He then spent two years studying in Paris, returned to Dresden in 1814, went to London in 1815, and in the following year was appointed court organist at Dresden, which remained his home till his death. During a visit to Paris in 1828 he formed a close friendship with Fétis, who with other musicians was much interested in his pianoforte canons. Of these he published only 'Les Avant-coureurs' (Paul, Dresden, 1841). After his death Hauptmann edited the 'Canons et fugues' (Breitkopf & Härtel, 1854), with a preface, in which he says:

'Klengel was brought up on Sebastian Bach, and knew his works thoroughly. It must not be supposed, however, that he was a mere imitator of Bach's manner; it is truer to say that he expressed his own thoughts in the way in which Bach would have done had he lived at the present day.'

He left several concertos, and many other works. His visit to London was commemorated by the composition of a quintet for piano and strings for the Philharmonic Society, which was performed Feb. 26, 1816, he himself taking the pianoforte. There is a pleasant little sketch of him in a letter of Mendelssohn to Eckert, Jan. 26, 1842. r. o.

KLENGEL, (1) JULIUS (b. Leipzig, Sept. 24, 1859), violoncellist and composer. He came of a musical family, his father, a Professor of Law, being the son of a professional musician, and himself an excellent amateur player. Moreover, his sister and brothers were all skilled performers on either piano or strings, so that the family circle was in a position to provide a full pianoforte quintet. Julius showed exceptional musical gifts at a very early age, and when still quite a small boy was intimate, through these family performances, with all the best chamber-music, an experience to which he constantly refers with gratitude both for its educational value and its sheer musical delight. He studied the violoncello with Émile Hegar, and theory and composition with S. Jadassohn. In 1874, at the age of 15, he became a member of the famous Gewandhaus Orchestra, and in 1881 was appointed its principal violoncellist, a post which he held until his resignation in 1924. He was appointed, also in 1881, teacher at the Leipzig Conservatorium, with the title of 'Royal Professor,' and he still carries on his duties there.

Klengel began his career as soloist in 1875, since when he has travelled repeatedly over the greater part of Europe, including the British Isles, both as soloist and with the Gewandhaus Quartet, of which he is still a member. On his leaving the orchestra in 1924 after fifty years' service, his 'Jubiläum' was celebrated with great enthusiasm. At the first Gewandhaus Concert of that season, on Oct. 9, with Furtwängler conducting, he played the violoncello part in a fine double concerto for violin and violoncello, which he had specially composed for the occasion. It is an interesting coincidence that his grandfather had also played, as a first violin, for 50 years in the Gewandhaus Orchestra, without missing a single concert.

As a performer Klengel ranks very high on the musical as well as on the purely technical side. He makes his effects by subtlety of accent and emphasis rather than by violent contrasts or emotional climaxes. He is a fine and scholarly musician, with an admirable taste and sense of style, and nowhere is this more conspicuous than when he is taking part in chamber-music or interpreting such music as the Beethoven sonatas or the Bach solo-suites. On the technical side there is probably no one who has surpassed him. His least strong point is in the matter of tone, which, though clear and effective, is a little lacking in beauty of quality. He is an admirable teacher and has trained many hundreds of pupils, of whom Mme. Suggia, Paul Grümmer and Emanuel Feuermann are probably the best known. He has composed a great deal of excellent music, without perhaps any pronounced individuality of idiom but showing a fine gift of melody and finished workmanship. He has also edited many works of other composers—concertos, sonatas, Bach suites, etc.—and has written a large number of first-rate technical exercises. Amongst his best compositions are the second concerto for violoncello in D minor, the double concerto for two violoncellos in E minor, the 'Caprice in the form of a Chaconne' for violoncello alone, and the double concerto, already referred to, for violin and violoncello. Mention should also be made of the beautiful 'Hymnus' for 12 violoncellos, which was performed at Nikisch's funeral service and has been repeated many times since.

(2) PAUL (b. Leipzig, May 13, 1854), violinist, pianist and composer, elder brother of the above, was a pupil of the Leipzig Conservatorium from 1868-72 and afterwards graduated at Leipzig University, and in 1876 took the degree of Doctor of Philosophy with a dissertation on 'Æsthetic in Music.' He conducted the 'Euterpe' Concerts at Leipzig, 1881-86; was second Hofkapellmeister in Stuttgart, 1887-91; conducted the 'Arion' and 'Singakademie' choral Societies at Leipzig, 1892-98; was conductor of the 'Deutsche Liederkranz' in New York from 1898-1903, and then returned to Leipzig as conductor of the 'Arion' Society. He is now (1925) on the teaching staff of the Leipzig Conservatorium.

He is a man of wide general culture and an admirable example of the good all-round musician. As a violinist he possesses a sound and competent technique, especially of the left hand, but he is not the 'born violinist,' and it is probably unfortunate that he did not concentrate in his youth on the piano, for which he has very high natural qualifications, including an exquisite touch, which makes him an ideal accompanist. He is a gifted composer, especially of songs and pieces in small form. His compositions, without any marked originality, are beautifully finished in their workmanship, and deserve to be better known than they are. In particular, his two suites for violin would make a pleasant addition to the repertory of any violinist, for they are both attractive as music and capitably written for showing off the possibilities of the instrument. He has done a great deal of 'arranging,' in which he shows exceptional skill and tact, occasionally amounting almost to genius. His arrangement of Brahms's clarinet quintet as a pianoforte and violin sonata is one of the best examples. It sounds at least as beautiful as the three genuine pianoforte and violin sonatas, and it won Brahms's enthusiastic approval, as well as Joachim's, who played it in public on more than one occasion with Professor Paul Klengel himself.

H. B.

KLENOVSKY, NICHOLAS SEMENOVICH (b. Odessa, 1857), composer and conductor, was a pupil of the Moscow Conservatoire, under Hubert and Tchaikovsky. He was selected by N. Rubinstein to assist him in organising the first performance of Tchaikovsky's 'Eugene Onegin' (1879). Klenovsky was afterwards conductor of the University orchestra, and assistant conductor at the Imperial Opera, Moscow. Deeply interested in all that concerned racial music, he was associated with MELGOUNOV (g.v.) in collecting and harmonising the Russian folk-songs. In 1893 he became director of the Music School at Tiflis, which gave him the opportunity of studying the music of the various Caucasian races. He was the first to organise 'Ethnographical Concerts' in Russia. In 1902 he was appointed sub-director of the Imperial Chapel. He composed several successful ballets; incidental music to plays, 'Messaline,' 'Antony and Cleopatra,' etc.; cantatas and a 'Georgian Liturgy' a cappella (1902).

R. N.

KLIČKA, JOSEF (b. Klatovy, 1855), Czech composer, attended the Organ School as a pupil of Skuherský and began his musical life as an organist. From 1876-81 he acted as assistant conductor at the Czech theatre; choirmaster of the choral society Hlahol from 1890-97; professor of organ in the master-school of the Prague Conservatoire since 1920. He has composed much music for choir and organ: the cantatas, 'The burial on the Kaňk'; 'The coming of the Czechs to the Říp-hill'; A Ballad of Czech music, 'Blaník'; some choral works of a humorous character—'The Good-man of the Mill,' 'The Gnat,' 'The Thistle,' etc.; masses, concert-fantasias for organ (his 'Fantasia on the Choral, St. Wenceslaus' and 'Legend' are published in the 'Maîtres contemporains d'orgue,' Paris); an organ sonata in F sharp minor; some chamber music.

R. N.

KLINDWORTH, KARL (b. Hanover, Sept. 25, 1830; d. Stolpe, July 27, 1916), was in early youth an accomplished performer on the violin. From his 17th to his 19th year he acted as conductor to a travelling opera troupe; he then settled in Hanover and took to playing the piano and composing. In 1852 he went to Weimar to study pianoforte-playing under Liszt, and had Hans von Bülow, W. Mason and Dionys Pruckner as his fellow-pupils.

In 1854 he came to London, where he remained fourteen years, appearing in public at intervals as a pianist and conductor of orchestral concerts, but in the main living the quiet life of a student and teacher. His first appearance in London was at one of Ella's 'Musical Winter Evenings' on Mar. 30, 1854, and he played Henselt's concerto at the New Philharmonic concert on July 4, 1855. He organised two series of three chamber concerts in the spring of 1861 and 1862, and a series of three orchestral and vocal concerts in the summer of 1861, under the title of the 'Musical Art Union.' The most remarkable compositions brought forward at the latter were Rubinstein's 'Ocean' symphony; Gade's 'Erl King's Daughter'; Cherubini's Requiem, No. 1; Schumann's PF. concerto. They were well carried out, but were discontinued for want of capital. In 1868 Klindworth was appointed to the post of professor of the pianoforte at the Conservatorium of Moscow, and while there he brought out the works which have made his name famous, the pianoforte scores of Wagner's 'Der Ring des Nibelungen,' begun during Wagner's visit to England in 1855, and his critical edition of Chopin; the latter beyond all praise for rare insight into the text and minute care bestowed on the presentation of it; the former quite wonderful for the fidelity with which the transcript is contrived to reflect Wagner's complicated orchestration. In 1882 he returned to Germany, and was conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic Concerts, jointly with Joachim and Wüllner, and was also conductor of the Berlin Wagner Society. He established a school of music in Berlin, which existed until 1893, when he retired to Potsdam, and devoted himself to private teaching. He visited London once again to conduct a concert given by F. Dawson, on May 15, 1898.¹ His arrangement of Schubert's symphony in C major for two pianofortes, and the four-hand arrangement of Tchaikovsky's poème symphonique, 'Francesca da Rimini,' as also, amongst his original compositions, a very difficult and effective polonaise fantasia for pianoforte, should be particularly mentioned. The manuscripts of a masterly rescoring of Chopin's concerto in F minor, and a condensation and orchestration of C. V. Alkan's concerto in G♯ minor (Études, op. 39), were well known to his friends. The new version of Chopin's concerto has been often played, and in the opinion of a large class of musicians the work is improved thereby, though others consider that the slighter accompaniment designed by the composer is really more effective.

Kapellmeister at Augsburg Cathedral. In 1580 he was still studying under J. de Cleve. He composed 'Rosetum Marianum' (1604); 'Sacr. Symphoniarum,' Book i. (1607); single numbers are in various collective volumes (Riemann; Q.-L.).

KLÖFFLER (KLÖFLER), JOHANN FRIEDRICH (d. Castle Steinfurt, near Münster, 1792), a late 18th century flute virtuoso and instrumental composer. He was Kapellmeister of Count Bentheim-Steinfurt, Castle Steinfurt, near Münster, c. 1787. He composed a piece of programme music, 'The Battle,' which he produced in 1782 in Berlin and in 1783 in London. He wrote: Zergliederung eines Instrumental Tonstückes von . . . 1787 (probably the analytical programme of the above); composed symphonies, flute-concertos, trios 2 flutes and basso continuo; quartets 4 flutes, a nonet, sonatas, etc. E. v. d. s.

KLOTZ, the name of a numerous family of violin-makers who lived at the little town of Mittenwald, in the Bavarian Alps, and founded a manufacture of stringed instruments which makes Mittenwald to this day only less famous than Markneukirchen in Saxony, and Mirécourt in the Vosges.

A variety of the pine, locally known as the 'Hasel-fichte' (Bechstein calls it the 'harte oder späte Roth-tanne'), of delicate but strong and highly resonant fibre, flourishes in the Bavarian Alps. The abundance of this material, which the ingenious peasants of the neighbouring Ammerthal use for wood-carving, led to the rise of the Mittenwald violin manufacture. For about two centuries there was held in the town a famous fair, greatly frequented by Venetian and other traders. In 1679 this fair was removed to Botzen, and the Mittenwalders attribute the rise of the violin industry to the distress which thereupon ensued.

(1) EGIDIUS KLOTZ had already made violins at Mittenwald. Tradition says that he learned the craft from Stainer at Absam. He is more likely to have learned it from seeing Stainer's violins, which he imitated with success. His son, (2) MATTHIAS or MATTHEW (1653-1743), followed in the same path. He travelled, however, into Italy, sojourning both at Florence and Cremona. Tradition reports him to have returned to Mittenwald about 1683, and to have at once begun to instruct many of the impoverished Mittenwalders in the mystery of fiddle-making. The instruments found a ready sale. They were hawked about by the makers at the churches, castles and monasteries of South Germany; and Mittenwald began to recover its prosperity. Most of the instruments of Matthias Klotz date from 1670-96. They are well built, on the model of Stainer, but poorly varnished.

His son (3) SEBASTIAN surpassed him as a maker. His instruments, though Stainer-like in appearance, are larger in size, of flatter model, and better designed: and his varnish is often of a good Italian quality. Another son of Matthias, (4) JOSEPH, still has a good reputation as a maker.

Until about the middle of the 18th century, a distinctive German style prevailed in violins, of which the above-mentioned makers are the best exponents. In several towns of Italy there were Germans working in their own style side by side with Italian makers. Tecchler worked thus in Rome, Mann in Naples, and the three Gofrillers (Gottfriedl) in Venice. It is certain, too, that there was a demand for German violins in Cremona itself. Two Germans, named Pfeilschneider and Fricker, who made violins of their own ugly pattern, gained a subsistence there in the golden days of Stradivarius; and the famous Veracini always used a German violin. But this competition could not long endure. The superiority of the Italian violin was established in the earlier half of the century: and wherever stringed instruments were made, imitation of the Italian models began. It penetrated to Mittenwald, as it did to London and Paris.

This stage of the art is represented by (5) GEORG KLOTZ, whose fiddles date from 1750-1770. They have lost their distinctive Tyrolese cut, without gaining the true Italian style, and are covered with a thin brittle spirit varnish, laid upon a coat of size, which keeps the varnish from penetrating the wood, and renders it opaque and perishable. Besides George, we hear of (6) MICHAEL, (7) CHARLES and (8) EGIDIUS, second of the name. Nine-tenths of the violins which pass in the world as 'Stainers' were made by the Klotz family and their followers.

KLUGHARDT, AUGUST FRIEDRICH MARTIN (b. Cöthen, Nov. 30, 1847; d. Dessau, Aug. 3, 1902), was for twenty years a theatrical conductor before becoming court music-director, first at Weimar in 1869, then at Neustrelitz in 1873, and at Dessau in 1882. Under Liszt's influence he threw himself into the modern school of music, but stopped short of the extremes towards which many of Liszt's followers were led. Five overtures, five symphonies, two suites, concertos for oboe, violin and violoncello respectively, the oratorios 'Die Grablegung Christi,' 'Die Zerstörung Jerusalems' (his best-known work), and 'Judith,' two psalms for soli and chorus, and much chamber music, represent his chief work apart from the stage, to which he contributed 'Miriam' (Weimar, 1871), 'Iwein' (1879), and 'Gudrun' (1882), both produced at Neustrelitz, and 'Die Hochzeit des Mönchs' (Dessau, 1886), given as 'Astorre' at Prague in 1888. (Riemann.)

KNABE & COMPANY, an eminent firm of American pianoforte manufacturers with headquarters in Baltimore. Its founder, William Knabe, was born in Kreutzburg, Saxe-Weimar, in 1797, and died in Baltimore in 1864. He began the business of making pianofortes in 1837, and some years later entered into partnership with Henry Gachle. In 1854 he bought the latter's interests, and associated his son, Ernst (1837-94), with him, as also another son William (1841-89) a little later, and a son-in-law, Charles Keidel. In 1908 the firm was merged in the American Piano Co. H. E. K.

KNAPP, WILLIAM (b. 1698; d. 1768), the author of a L.M. psalm tune called 'Wareham,' which was long a favourite in churches. He was parish clerk of Poole. He published a 'New Sett of Psalms and Anthems in four parts' in 1738 (2nd edition, 1741, 3rd, 1747, all from engraved plates, 4th, 1750, 7th, 1762, 8th, 1770, the latter from type). In 1753 appeared 'The New Church Melody' which was re-issued in 1756 and 1764, the last being the 5th edition. 'Wareham' is in both—in the former called 'Blandford,' and in common time, in the latter in triple time. Another tune by him is given by the Rev. Henry Parr, Church of England Psalmody. (Information from Rev. H. Parr, the parish clerk of Poole, J. F. R. Stainer and F. Kidson.) G.

KNAPTON, PHILIP (b. York, 1788; d. there, June 20, 1833), received his musical education at Cambridge from Dr. Hague. He then returned to York and followed his profession. He composed several overtures, pianoforte concertos and other orchestral works, besides arranging numerous pieces for the pianoforte and harp. He acted as one of the assistant conductors at the York Festivals of 1823, 1825 and 1828. His father, Samuel Knapton, was a music-publisher in Blake Street, and afterwards in Coney Street, York, at the end of the 18th century. Philip and others of the family, together with a York musician named White, kept on the business until about 1840, when it passed into the hands of a person named Banks.

KNECHT, JUSTIN HEINRICH (b. Biberach, Suabia, Sept. 30, 1752; d. there, Dec. 1, 1817), received a good education, both musical and general (Boeckh was one of his masters), and filled for some time the post of professor of literature in his native town. He combined with this the office of music-director from the year 1771. By degrees he gravitated to music, and in 1807 became director of the opera and of the court concerts at Stuttgart; but owing to successful intrigues against him, in a couple of years he resigned the post and returned to Biberach, where he died, with a great reputation as organist, composer and theoretician. In the last-named department he was an adherent of Vogler. The list of his productions as given in Q.-L. embraces many compositions, sacred and secular, vocal and instrumental, and eight theoretical and didactic works. Two of the former have an historical interest, and that from an accidental cause. The first is 'Le Portrait Musical de la Nature,' a grand symphony¹ for two violins, viola and bass, two flutes, two oboes, bassoons, horns, trumpets and drums ad lib., in which is expressed:

(1) A beautiful country, the sun shining, gentle airs and murmuring brooks; birds twitter, a waterfall tumbles from the mountain, the shepherd plays his pipe, the shepherdess sings, and the lambs gambol around.

(2) Suddenly the sky darkens, an oppressive closeness pervades the air, black clouds gather, the wind rises, distant thunder is heard, and the storm approaches.

(3) The tempest bursts in all its fury, the wind howls and the rain beats, the trees groan and the streams rush furiously.

(4) The storm gradually goes off, the clouds disperse and the sky clears.

(5) Nature raises its joyful voice to heaven in songs of gratitude to the Creator (a hymn with variations).

The second (if it be not an arrangement of a portion of the preceding) is another attempt of the same kind with a German title—'The Shepherds' pleasure interrupted by the storm, a musical picture for the organ.' These are precisely the subjects which Beethoven has treated, and Fétis would have us believe that Knecht actually anticipated not only the general scheme of the Pastoral Symphony but some of its figures and passages. But this is not the case. The writer purchased the score and parts of Knecht's work at Otto Jahn's sale, and is able to say that beyond the titles the resemblances between the two works are obviously casual, Knecht's being in addition commonplace, entirely wanting in that 'expression of emotions' which Beethoven enforces, and endeavouring to depict the actual sights and sounds, which he deprecates. G.

KNEISEL, FRANZ (b. Bucharest, Jan. 26, 1865; d. New York, Mar. 26, 1926), violinist, chiefly player and leader of chamber concerts.

His father, a native of Olmütz, Moravia, was the leader of a military band, and gave him his first musical instruction. He then studied at the Conservatorium in Bucharest, and had finished its courses and carried off the first prize for violin playing before he was 15 years old. In 1879 he entered the Vienna Conservatorium as a special pupil of Grün and Hellmesberger, devoting himself under the latter chiefly to chamber music. On the completion of his academic studies he took the first prize for violin playing in July 1882, and on Dec. 31 of the same year played Joachim's 'Hungarian' concerto at a Philharmonic concert. He was at once appointed solo violinist at the Hofburg Theatre as successor of Jacob Dont. In 1884 he went to Berlin as Konzertmeister of the Bülse Orchestra, remaining in that position one year, when, in the autumn of 1885, he went to

America, on the invitation of Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, to be principal and solo violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He performed the duties of that office uninterruptedly for eighteen years, resigning in May 1903 to devote himself thenceforward to solo work and the leadership of the KNEISEL QUARTET (q.v.).

As a lad Kneisel had conducted a Philharmonic Society of instrumentalists in Bucharest; in America similar duties of greater moment devolved upon him. In the absence of Arthur Nikisch he conducted the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the World's Fair in Chicago in 1893, and also a concert tour through Western cities lasting three weeks, in the early summer of that year. In 1902 and 1903 he was associate conductor of the Worcester Festivals in Massachusetts. He visited England in 1904, playing at two of the Broadwood Concerts in March with his quartet, and in 1905 was appointed violin professor in the new Institute of Musical Art in New York. In 1917 Kneisel disbanded the quartet in order to devote himself entirely to his work as head of the violin department of the Institute. He was made Doctor of Music of Yale University in 1911 and of Princeton in 1915. R. E. K.; addns. R. A.

KNEISEL QUARTET, a string quartet formed in 1885 by Franz KNEISEL (see above) for the cultivation of chamber music.

The original members were Franz Kneisel (1st violin), E. Fiedler (2nd violin), Louis Svecenski (viola) and Fritz Giese (violoncello). During the thirty-two years in which Kneisel led his quartet the following changes took effect:

Second violin: Otto Roth (1887), Karl Ondříček (1899), J. Theodorowicz (1902), Hans Letz (1914). Violoncello: Anton Hekking (1889), Alwin Schroeder (1891), Willem Willeke (1907). The quartet was disbanded in 1917, its last concert being given on Apr. 3 of that year. Its record was very fine and its services to music in America of the greatest. R. A.

KNIGHT, REV. JOSEPH PHILIP (b. Bradford-on-Avon Vicarage, July 26, 1812; d. Great Yarmouth, June 2, 1887), a popular song-writer.

At 16 he studied harmony and thorough-bass under Corfe, then organist of Bristol Cathedral. When about 20 Knight composed his first six songs, under the name of 'Philip Mortimer.' Among these were 'Old Times,' sung by Henry Phillips, and 'Go, forget me,' which was much sung both here and in Germany. After this he used his own name, and in company with Haynes Bayly produced a number of highly popular songs, among which the most famous were 'Of what is the old man thinking?' 'The Veteran,' 'The Grecian Daughter,' and 'She wore a wreath of roses.' He subsequently composed a song and a duet to words written for him by Thomas Moore—'The parting,' and 'Let's take this world as some wide scene.' In 1839 Knight visited the United States. To this time are due, among other popular songs, his best song, 'Rocked in the cradle of the deep,' sung with immense success by Braham. On his return to England he produced 'Venice,' 'Say what shall my song be to-night,' and 'The Dream,' to words by the Hon. Mrs. Norton—all more or less the rage in their day. Some years afterwards Knight was ordained by the Bishop of Exeter to the charge of St. Agnes in the Scilly Isles. G.

KNIGHT (KNIGHTE, KNYGHT), (1) THOMAS, organist and vicar choral of Salisbury Cathedral, 1535-40 or 45. He received an annuity out of the dissolved monastery of Spalding, 1545-47. It is as yet impossible to decide in most cases which of the compositions merely signed Knight (or Knyghte, etc.) belong to this or the following composer. The beautiful Magnificat arranged for Novello's Parish Choir Book, No. 898, by Royle Shore, is undoubtedly by Thomas, and probably also the Mass in the Peterhouse MS. (c. 1530-40), and Evening Canticles in John Day's 'Certaine Notes' (1560-65), which contains also the above Magnificat. Of the Mass and two motets (B.M. Add. MSS. 17,802-05) or the motet in Sadler's partbooks (Bodl. Lib.), it is so far impossible to say whether they are by Thomas or by (2) ROBERT, who was a contemporary of the former, though he may have reached farther into the century, and author of the five-part motet, 'Propterea maestum' at Peterhouse (W. H. Grattan Flood in Mus. T. vol. lxii. p. 331; Q.-L.). E. v. d. s.

KNITTL, KAREL (b. Polná, 1853; d. Prague, 1907), a Czech teacher and conductor who entered the Organ School, Prague, in 1882 and was afterwards appointed professor of harmony at the Conservatoire (1890). In 1901 he became the administrative director of this institution. Knittl was active in the journalistic world of Prague, and his judgment was independent and decisive. He was an excellent conductor, and, as director of the choral society, Hlahol, he produced Berlioz's 'Requiem,' Liszt's 'Christus,' Dvořák's 'Stabat Mater' and 'The Spectre's Bride' and other works. R. N.

KNÖFEL (KNEFELIUS) (b. Lauban, Silesia, latter half of 16th cent.), musician to the Duke of Liegnitz in 1571; in the service of the town of Breslau, 1575; from 1576-83 Kapellmeister of the Elector Palatine at Heidelberg; in 1592 organist and choirmaster of St. Henry's at Prague. He composed between 1571 and 1592 five books of sacred and secular songs, apart from single numbers in collective volumes. (See Q.-L.) composer and teacher. When only 4 years of age, he was taken by his parents to Southern Russia, and soon began his musical training under his mother, a moderate pianist. In the various small Russian towns in which at this time the Knorr family lived, the lad had much to do for himself, all the while absorbing the influence of the Slavonic folk-music which he heard. His first efforts at composition were made when he was 7 years of age, but it was not until 1868, when the family settled in Leipzig, that he determined to adopt a musical career.

On entering the Conservatorium Iwan became a pupil for pianoforte of Ignaz Moscheles, for theory of Richter, and for composition of Carl Reinecke. After passing through the Conservatorium Knorr returned to Russia and became professor of music in the Imperial Institute for Noble Ladies. There he had ample time for composition, but, doubtful of his ability, he submitted some compositions to Brahms, at that time unknown to him, with a request for a judgment. The work submitted was the series of variations on an Ukrainian Volkslied (op. 7) for orchestra, on which Brahms expressed so highly favourable an opinion that a few years later (1883) Knorr was appointed, on Brahms's recommendation, principal teacher of composition at the Hoch Conservatorium in Frankfurt - on - Main. There he numbered among his pupils many Englishmen: Cyril Scott, H. Balfour Gardiner, Norman O'Neill and Roger Quilter, for example. He believed firmly in training the mind of each pupil individually, and acted up to his belief; and he preferred the school of experience and the 'eternal laws' to the set 'rules' of composition. His text was that in harmony all is good that seems good to the thoroughly educated ear, whether it conform to the rules or not.

Knorr's published compositions include:

Op. 1, variations on a theme by Schumann for pianoforte trio; op. 3, pianoforte quartet; op. 6, the 'Ukrainische Liebeslieder' for vocal quartet and pianoforte, the poems by himself; op. 12, a symphonic Phantasia for orchestra; and a quantity of songs and pianoforte music for two and four hands.

In the mass of his manuscript music is 'Dunja'—a musical village-tale in two acts, which was successfully staged at Coblenz on Mar. 23, 1904, and a second opera, 'Durchs Fenster,' given at Carlsruhe in 1908. He wrote a biography of his friend Tchaikovsky (Riemann's Berühmte Musiker, 1900) and the following pedagogic works:

Aufgaben für den Unterricht in der Harmonielehre. (1903.)
Lehrbuch der Fugenkomposition. (1911.)
Fragen der wohltemperierten Klavier in bildlicher Darstellung. (1912.) R. H. L., with addns.

KNOTE, HEINRICH (b. Munich, 1870), operatic tenor. He learned singing from E. Kirschner in his native city, where he made his début at the Royal Opera in 1892. Deducting only a short stay at Hamburg, his career in Germany was exclusively restricted to Munich, Bayreuth and Berlin. From those centres his fame as a 'Heldentenor' was loudly trumpeted forth, and it must be admitted that he fully justified it on his first appearances in London (Covent Garden, 1901) and New York (Metropolitan Opera House, 1902-03), at both of which he sang frequently down to 1913. He was a typical interpreter of the heroes of Wagnerian music-drama; a particularly fine Siegfried, a noble Tristan, an impulsive Tannhäuser; his striking physique well matched by a clear, resonant, sympathetic voice and impressive declamation. In the summer of 1908 he sustained the rôle of Tristan (Miss Edyth Walker then making her first attempt as a soprano) in the 50th performance of 'Tristan und Isolde' at Covent Garden.

KNOTT, JOHN (b. probably Sevenoaks, Kent; d. Edinburgh, 1837), a composer and compiler of church melodies. His father was a Baptist minister at Sevenoaks. John Knott became a chorister in Durham Cathedral, and in 1811 was precentor in the West Church, Aberdeen, and a teacher of singing. While there he issued an interesting little oblong volume, Sacred Harmony, being a collection of Psalm and Hymn Tunes, 1814, 2nd ed. 1815. In 1824 he was in Edinburgh, and issued a Selection of Tunes in four parts, adapted to the Psalms and Paraphrases of the Church of Scotland. While in Edinburgh he was music-master at Heriot's Hospital, and precentor at the New North Church. F. K.

KNÜPFER, SEBASTIAN (b. Asch, Voigtland, Saxony, Sept. 7, 1633; d. 1676), received his education, musical and otherwise, at Regensburg. Coming to Leipzig to pursue his philological as well as musical studies, he succeeded, in 1657, Tobias Michael as Cantor of the Thomasschule and General Director of the Town Music. From the obituary notice contained in the so-called Leichenprogramm¹ or Funeral Invitation issued by the rector of Leipzig University we learn that, amongst his contemporaries, Knüpfer was as much esteemed for his philological as for his musical attainments. He is said to have edited Kircher's Musurgia, and the treatises of Guido, Boethius, Berno and others, although no traces of such works are now to be found. The only musical works published by him consist of a few Funeral Motets (Leichengesänge) for 4 to 8 voices; but the State Library at Berlin contains a collection of 22 of his church cantatas for 3 to 8 voices, with instrumental accompaniment, which Winterfeld characterises as a valuable possession, and as showing Knüpfer to have been a serious, solid, thoroughly trained musician. Four of these are reprinted in D.D.T. lviii. and lix. J. R. M.

KNYVETT, (1) CHARLES (b. Feb. 22, 1752; d. London, Jan. 19, 1822), descended from an ancient Norfolk family, was one of the principal alto singers at the Commemoration of Handel in 1784; he was also engaged at the Concert of Ancient Music. He was appointed a gentleman of the Chapel Royal, Nov. 6, 1786. In 1791 he, in conjunction with Samuel Harrison, established the VOCAL CONCERTS, which they carried on until 1794. On July 25, 1796, he was appointed an organist of the Chapel Royal, and a few years later resigned his former post.

His elder son, (2) CHARLES (b. London, 1773; d. Nov. 2, 1852), was placed for singing under William Parsons (afterwards Sir William Parsons), and for the organ and piano under Samuel Webbe. In 1801 he joined his younger brother William (3), Greateorex and Bartleman, in reviving the Vocal Concerts. In 1802 he was chosen organist of St. George's, Hanover Square. Besides this he taught the pianoforte and thorough-bass, wrote glees, etc., and published a 'Selection of Psalm Tunes,' 1823.

(3) WILLIAM, the younger son of Charles (1) (b. Apr. 21, 1779; d. Ryde, Nov. 17, 1856). In 1788 he sang in the treble chorus at the Concert of Ancient Music, and in 1795 appeared there as principal alto. In 1797 he was appointed gentleman of the Chapel Royal, and soon afterwards a lay-vicar of Westminster. In 1802 he succeeded Dr. Arnold as one of the composers of the Chapel Royal. For upwards of forty years he was principal alto at the best London concerts and all the provincial festivals, being greatly admired for the beauty of his voice and his finished style of singing, particularly in part music. Callcott's glee 'With sighs, sweet rose,' was composed expressly for him. In 1832 he became conductor of the Concert of Ancient Music, which office he resigned in 1840. He conducted the Birmingham Festivals from 1834-43, and the York Festival of 1835. He was the composer of several pleasing glees—one of which, 'When the fair rose,' gained a prize at the Harmonic Society in 1800—and some songs, and wrote anthems for the coronations of George IV. and Queen Victoria.

(4) DEBORAH (b. Shaw, near Oldham, Lancs; d. Feb. 10, 1876), second wife of William (3), and niece of Mrs. Travis, one of the Lancashire chorus singers engaged at the Concert of Ancient Music. In 1813 she was placed in the chorus of the Concert of Ancient Music, the directors of which, finding her possessed of superior abilities, soon withdrew her from that position, took her as an articulated pupil and placed her under Greateorex. In 1815 she appeared at the concerts as a principal singer with success. In 1816 she sang at the Derby Festival, in 1818 at Worcester and in 1820 at Birmingham. From that time she was constantly in request, particularly as an oratorio singer, until 1843, when she retired. She married William (3) in 1826. W. H. H.

KOBELIUS, JOHANN AUGUSTIN (b. Wähltitz, near Halle; d. Weissenfels, Aug. 17, 1731), studied under the Wähltitz organists Brausen and Schieferdecker, and afterwards (for composition) under J. Ph. Krieger. After a period of travel, which took him as far as Venice, he became a chamber musician at Weissenfels. In 1712 he was organist at Sangershausen; in 1713 Kapellmeister at Querfurt; and in 1725 a government official and Kapellmeister at the court of Weissenfels. He composed 20 operas between 1716 and 1729; also church music, overtures, serenades, concertos, sonatas, etc.

KOCH, HEINRICH CHRISTOPH (b. Rudolstadt, Oct. 10, 1749; d. there, Mar. 12, 1816), the son of a member of the ducal orchestra there. In 1768 he was admitted into the band as a violinist, having received instruction from Göpfert of Weimar, and in 1777 obtained the title of 'Kammermusiker.' He composed various pieces of small importance for the court, but his fame rests upon his contributions to musical literature. His Versuch einer Anleitung zur Composition appeared in three parts between the years 1782 and 1793; and his Musikalisches Lexicon in 1802. This was republished in a condensed form in 1807 and 1828, but its complete revision dates from 1865, and is the work of Arrey von DOMMER (q.v.). He wrote several other works of less importance on harmony and other subjects connected with the art. M.

KOCHETOV, NICHOLAS RAZOUMNIKOVICH (b. Oranienbaum, July 8, 1864), composer and musical critic. In 1889 he began to write for the Novoe Vremya, The Artist, The Moscow Viedemosti, etc. His compositions include: An opera, 'A Terrible Revenge,' on a subject from Gogol; 'Arabian Suite' for orchestra, op. 3; Symphony in E minor, op. 8 (1895); Valse Serenade for string orchestra; numerous pianoforte pieces, including 'In the Heart of Nature,' op. 11, and 'Eastern Sketches,' opp. 12, 13; about twenty-four songs. R. N.

KOCIÁN, JAROSLAV (b. Bohemia, Feb. 22, 1884), violinist, was from 1899-1901 pupil of Ševčík at the Prague Conservatoire. His successful concert tours in many countries spread the fame of his master's method and soon established his own reputation as a virtuoso of the first rank. His visits to England have been comparatively few but memorable. Important among them was the occasion of the Czechoslovak festival in London (1919), when he gave a performance of Dvořák's violin concerto with the orchestra of the Prague Philharmonic Society at the Queen's Hall. (See Mus. T., May 1915.) C.

KOCZALSKI, RAOUL (b. Warsaw, Jan. 3, 1885), was taught by his father, and from the age of 7 was allowed to display his exceptional abilities as a pianist in public and on various teurs. He appeared in London in May 1893, and a composition of his written about that time was marked op. 46; in 1896 he celebrated the 1000th appearance in public. M.

He has since attained an eminent position as a pianist, and has specialised in the performance of Chopin. When he returned to London, after a long interval, in Nov. 1924, he gave a series of four recitals of Chopin's music. His compositions include two operas, 'Rymond' (Elberfeld, 1902) and 'Die Sühne' (Mülhausen, 1909), a sonata in G and other works for the piano (Riemann). C.

KODÁLY, ZOLTÁN (b. Kecskemét, Hungary, Dec. 16, 1882), composer, entered the Budapest Conservatoire in 1900 and studied under Hans Kocssler. In his student days he was influenced at first by Brahms and afterwards by Debussy, but the immature works written under the sway of these two masters have remained unpublished. About 1905 he began the study of Hungarian folk-music, and became absorbed in the task of tracing the traditional tunes to their sources, which were greatly obscured by foreign and gipsy influences. Like Béla Bartók he began to collect the original melodies among the peasantry, in some cases by means of direct notation from their singing, in others with the aid of the gramophone. (The problems to be faced by the collector of Hungarian folk-music are set forth in the article, BARTÓK.) Kodály has collected between 3000 and 4000 traditional melodies, the majority of which are still in MS., although some are now published jointly with Bartók. He also wrote a book on The Pentatonic Scale in Hungarian Folk-Music.

In 1906 Kodály was appointed professor of composition at the Budapest Conservatoire. He was music critic to several prominent Hungarian papers for a number of years, and is still correspondent for some foreign musical periodicals.

Kodály's work reveals the influence of his country's folk-music no less unmistakably than that of Bartók, but it does so in a different way. Each composer filters the national idiom through his own personality. The fundamentals of folk-song provide merely the raw material, the vocabulary, as it were, which they fashion by the individuality of their creative gifts into works of art. Kodály's music is distinguished by an originality that appears startling at a first hearing, but on closer acquaintance reveals a certain leaning towards tradition. He does not abandon tonality and accepted forms, but creates a new music of astonishing vitality within their limits. His instrumental writing is extremely interesting, and there is a close interdependence between his creative impulse and the particular medium chosen for its expression. The piano pieces are predominantly harmonic and per-cussive, the string quartets contrapuntal, and the pieces for solo string instruments (opp. 7 and 8) abound in appropriate technical problems and striking effects.

KOEBERG, F. E. A. (b. The Hague, July 15, 1879), Dutch composer, received his musical education at the Conservatoire in his native town under W. F. G. Nicolai and Henri Viotta, and in Berlin at the Staatsakademie der Künste under Xaver Scharwenka. He played the violin and viola in various orchestras and also toured as a pianist, but on his return to Holland devoted himself to conducting, composition and teaching. He has been conductor of various amateur choruses and orchestras, the principal being the students' musical society, 'Sempre Crescendo,' at Leyden and the Orchestra 'Musica' at The Hague. He is professor of composition in the Netherlands Academy for Music at The Hague. As a composer he has specialised in music demanding large forces, and many of his works have been written for open-air plays and pageants. From this it will be gathered that his style is broad and free from any fussiness or unnecessary detail, his melodies being thoroughly national and bearing an evident relation to those of such songs as the 'Wilhelmuslied,' 'Wier Neerlandsch bloed,' 'Piet Heijn,' etc. The broad simplicity of his melodies has caused a number of them to be adapted for the clock carillons in the great towers at Leyden and Middelburg. Nevertheless, as long ago as 1901, when the music of the modern French schools was utterly unknown in Holland, he wrote a setting of Bürger's 'Lenore' that was 'atonal' throughout.

His compositions include:

Open-air plays: 'Ydylle' (Lucie Broedect), 'Bloemenproke' (Lily Green), 'Plato' (P. C. Boutens), 'Albanova' (Routens), 'Middelburg's Overgang in 1574' (Routens), 'Koninginne Kantate' (A. Heyting); an opera: 'Bloemenkind'; symphonic poems 'Zeelandia', 'Zevenzot', 'Zonnegew', 'Zotskap', 'Zelina', 'Minoe'; 'Kolna', besides three symphonies, a large number of overtures and songs, and shorter works for chorus, violin, piano and string quartet.

KÖCHEL, DR. LUDWIG, RITTER VON (b. Stein, near Krams on the Danube, Jan. 14, 1800; d. Vienna, June 3, 1877), learned musician and naturalist, tutor to the sons of the Archduke Karl (1828-42). From 1850-63 he lived at Salzburg, and from the latter year to his death at Vienna. His work as a botanist and mineralogist does not concern us: as a musician he has immortalised his name by his Chronologisch-thematisches Verzeichniss of all

W. A. Mozart's works, with an appendix of lost, doubtful and spurious compositions (Breitkopf & Härtel, Leipzig, 1862). As a precursor of that invaluable work, a small pamphlet should be named, Über den Umfang der musikalischen Productivität W. A. Mozarts (Salzburg, 1862). The complete edition of Mozart's works which Breitkopf & Härtel have published could scarcely have been made without his generous co-operation. In 1832 von Köchel was made an Imperial Councillor, and in 1842 he received the order of Leopold. Among his intimate friends was Otto Jahn, in whose work on Mozart he took an active interest. See Jahn's Mozart, second edition, p. xxxi. C. F. F.

KOECHLIN, CHARLES (b. Paris, Nov. 27, 1867), composer, belongs to an Alsatian family. He attended first the École Polytechnique, but soon changed the direction of his studies and entered the Conservatoire, where he learned harmony with Taudou, counterpoint with Gédalge and composition with Massenet, ultimately becoming a pupil of Fauré.

His first published compositions, settings of Rondels by Théodore de Banville and Charles d'Orléans, appeared in 1890, and one of them, 'Le Thé,' became almost immediately popular. Yet of the composer little was known, and his career has been not only uneventful, save for creative work, but isolated. At a time when the French composers of his generation were attracting world-wide attention to themselves, his growing list of compositions scarcely penetrated beyond a narrow circle. Few of them were published, and those in the larger forms were but rarely performed. Except as a songwriter, it is only since about 1921 that he has become more widely known. Now, not only the whole of his piano music and songs, but about half of his chamber music, and even a portion of his orchestral output is available in print, and it is gradually being discovered that Koehlin's contribution to the modern French movement has been far more important than was realised at the time. Though he never shared the delight of his contemporaries in recherches harmoniques, his writings as far back as the 'nineties abound in examples of harmonic independence. In other respects his style is remarkable for its unswerving sobriety and absence of all ingratiating concessions, amounting sometimes to dryness, but more often enlivened by melodic invention. He was an early exponent of the contrapuntal simplicity, the revival of which has been attributed to a more recent school; he has always had a fondness for extended melodic lines combined in the manner of the classic 'Invention,' and he has written many chorales. Apart from these features of his method his mode of thought is almost constantly lyrical, and in his later works characterised by a rhythmic freedom which frequently dispenses with time-signatures and even bar-lines. It is impossible to do more than enumerate his principal works. Those for orchestra include many extended series, such as the 'Heures persanes,' which comprise sixteen pieces.

ORCHESTRAL

La Forêt (opp. 25 and 26), 'En mer la nuit' (op. 27), 'Les Saisons' (opp. 30-47, 48-60), 'Études antiques' (op. 46), 'Nuit de Walpurgis classique' (op. 38), 'Rhapsodie sur des chansons françaises' (op. 62), 'Les Heures persanes' (op. 65).

Ballade piano and orchestra, op. 50.

Ballets: 1. La Forêt palenne, op. 45.
2. La Divine Vespère, op. 67.

Chorus and orchestra, L'Abbaye, op. 16.

CHAMBER MUSIC

3 String Quartets, opp. 51-57 and 72.

Quintet, piano and strings, op. 80.

Sonatas for piano with vin. (op. 64), vla. (op. 53), vcl. (op. 66), flute (op. 52), oboe (op. 58), clarinet (opp. 85 and 86), bassoon (op. 71), and horn (op. 70).

Sonata for two flutes (op. 75).

PIANO

Esquisses (op. 41), Sonatinas (op. 59), 'Paysages et marines' (op. 63), Pastorales (op. 77), and two sets of 'Petites Pièces.' A suite for two pianos (op. 6), and another for piano, four hands (op. 19).

Numerous songs and choral pieces.

KÖHLER, the name of an eminent family of military wind-instrument makers. The founder of the family was (1) JOHN KÖHLER, a native of Volkenrode, a hamlet near Cassel. He came to England, acted as bandmaster to the Lancashire Volunteers, and in 1780 established himself as a musical instrument maker at 87 St. James's Street. Having no children, he sent for his nephew, (2) JOHN KÖHLER, from Germany, who succeeded to his business in 1801. The latter was appointed musical instrument-maker to the Duke of York, then Commander-in-Chief, and the Prince of Wales successively. He was succeeded by his only son, (3) JOHN AUGUSTUS (d. June 20, 1878), who removed the business to Henrietta Street. His inventions in brass instruments were many, and were successful in their day. He obtained prize medals at the Exhibitions of 1851 and 1862, and was favourably mentioned in the Report of the latter. His eldest son, (4) AUGUSTUS CHARLES, now deceased, succeeded to his business. G.

KÖHLER, CHR. LOUIS HEINRICH (b. Brunswick, Sept. 5, 1820; d. Königsberg, Feb. 16, 1886), was educated at Brunswick and Vienna, being in the latter capital from 1839-43 as a pupil of Sechter for theory, and Bocklet for piano. He filled the post of conductor at Marienburg and Elbing, before settling down at Königsberg, which was his home from 1847 until his death. He wrote three operas, one of which, 'Maria Dolores,' was performed at Brunswick in 1844, and a ballet, 'Der Zauberkomponist,' at the same place in 1846. His chief work as a composer was in the direction of educational pianoforte music, such as studies of all kinds, arrangements of popular works, fantasias, etc. Two books of his studies, opp. 112 and 128, have more value than most of his works. He was a valued contributor to the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, in 1867-78, and to the Berliner Musik-Zeitung in 1871-76. M.

KÖLER, DAVID (b. Zwickau, Saxony, first half of 16th century; d. July 1565). His first appointment was at Altenburg, whence in 1563 he was called to be Kapellmeister at Güstrow in Mecklenburg. The town council of Zwickau afterwards called him back to his native town, giving him the post of cantor at St. Marien, the principal church.

His one published work consists of Ten Psalms with German words for four to six voices, composed throughout in several divisions ('Zehen Psalme Davids des Propheten mit vier, fünf und sechs Stimmen gesetzt durch David Köler von Zwickau,' Leipzig, 1554). The only known copy of this work is preserved in the public library at Zwickau. Otto Kade has the merit of first calling attention to this work, and rescuing its able composer from utter oblivion. Since then Dr. Georg Göhler of Leipzig has reprinted two of the Psalms, and conducted performances of them at Zwickau and elsewhere. In his preface to Psalm III. Dr. Göhler says:

'It may be considered as one of the most perfect pieces of contrapuntal art and genial interpretation of the text which we anywhere possess. . . . The realism of the musical drawing is as astonishing as the quite modern conception and presentation of the different parts of the text.'

In the Beilagen zu Ambros Kade printed from a MS. Köler's four-voice setting of the Geistliches Lied, 'O du edler Brunn der Freuden,' which is also an excellent piece of work. Among the few other works of Köler in MS. there is a Mass for seven voices on Josquin's Motet 'Benedicta es coelorum regina.' J. R. M.

KÖMPPEL, AUGUST (b. Brückenau, Aug. 15, 1831; d. Weimar, Apr. 7, 1891), a distinguished violinist, one of the best pupils of Spohr, whose quiet, elegiac style suited his talent precisely. His tone was not large, but very pure and sympathetic, his execution faultless. He was for a time member of the bands at Cassel and Hanover (the latter in 1852-61), and from 1863 was leader of that at Weimar. He retired on a pension in 1884. P. D.

KÖNIG, JOHANN BALTHASAR (b. 1691; d. 1758), director of church music at Frankfurt-am-Main, is best known as the editor of the most comprehensive Choral-book of the 18th century, Harmonischer Lieder-Schatz oder Allgemeines evangelisches Choral-buch, Frankfurt, 1738. It contains 1940 tunes, including those to the French Calvinistic Psalms, but the older tunes and the French Psalm-tunes have all been deprived of their original variety of rhythm, and the more modern tunes from the Freylinghausen and other hymn-books have all been simplified by the retrenchment of slurs and appoggiaturas and other superfluous ornaments. All the tunes have thus been reduced to a uniform pattern with notes of equal length, and while this simplification has been of advantage in the case of the Freylinghausen tunes it has rather spoilt the older melodies. The tunes are only provided with figured bass. J. R. M.

KÖNIGIN VON SABA, DIE, opera in 4 acts; words by J. Mosenthal, music by Carl Goldmark; produced Vienna, Mar. 10, 1875: in English, Carl Rosa Co., Theatre Royal, Manchester, Apr. 12, 1910. (See also REINÉ DE SABA, LA.)

KÖNIGSKINDER, dramatised fairy-tale in 3 acts, written by Ernst Rosmer, with music by Engelbert Humperdinck; produced Munich, Jan. 23, 1897; in English, Court Theatre, Oct. 13, 1897. Originally the action was carried on in declamation through continuous music. Later Humperdinck transformed the work into opera, and it was so given for the first time, Metropolitan Opera House, New York, Dec. 28, 1910; Berlin, Jan. 14, 1911; Covent Garden, Nov. 27, 1911.

KÖNIGSPERGER, MARIAN (MARIANUS) (b. Roding, Bavaria, Dec. 4, 1708; d. Oct. 9, 1769), received his early education in the Benedictine Abbey of Prüfening near Ratisbon, where he afterwards took the vows, and spent the rest of his life as organist and director of the choir, and occupied in musical composition.

He enjoyed great reputation in his time as an organ player, and composer of works for the church. Lotter, the music publisher of Augsburg, acknowledged that he owed the foundation of his prosperity in business to his publication of Königspurger's works, and the profits which were obtained for the composer himself were all generously devoted by him to the benefit of the Abbey, providing it with a new organ, purchasing valuable books for the library, and furnishing the means for the publication of literary works by the other brethren. His works are enumerated in Q.-L., and even more fully by Ernst von Werra in Haberl's Kirchen-musikalisches Jahrbuch, 1897, pp. 32-34. Both E. v. Werra and Eitner say that Königspurger wrote for the theatre as well as for the church, but the works, as they enumerate them, are all for the church, and consist of—

(1) A large number of masses, offertories, vespers, litanies, etc., all for voices with a considerable instrumental accompaniment—strings, horns, trumpets and drums.

(2) Sonatas or symphonies for strings and other instruments with organ, evidently for church use.

(3) Various sets of preludes and fugues or versets in the church tones for organ.

Ritter (Geschichte des Orgelspiels, pp. 80, 161) considers the organ works to show good schooling, and to have more substance in them than similar works of his South German contemporaries. None appear to be reprinted in modern times. J. R. M.

KOLB, KARLMANN (b. Köstlar, Bavaria, 1703; d. Munich, 1765), received his first musical instruction as a choir-boy in the Benedictine Abbey of Aschbach. Taking the vows at this Abbey in 1723, he was ordained priest in 1729, and acted as organist. Later on, with the permission of his superiors, he entered the service of a noble family in Munich as resident-tutor, and died there.

His musical work, published at Augsburg in 1733, is entitled 'Certamen Aonium id est, Lusus vocum inter se innocue concertantium,' etc., and consists of preludes, short fugues or versets, and cadences or concluding voluntaries, all intended for church use. Ritter (Geschichte des Orgelspiels) gives one of Kolb's preludes, and says of the work generally that it shows the composer to have been an original and capable musician, although it is also evident from extracts given in Seiffert (Geschichte der Klavermusik) that many of the pieces are written in a somewhat unecclesiastical style, a style more suitable to the harpsichord or pianoforte than to the organ. There are some bold experiments in chromatic and enharmonic progressions. The whole work is characteristic of the lighter style of organ playing which, owing to Italian influence, was chiefly cultivated in Catholic South Germany and Austria. E. von Werra has reprinted three of Kolb's pieces in his 'Orgelbuch.'

KOLISEK, ALOIS (b. Protivanov, Moravia, 1868), one of six brothers who all entered the priesthood. He has travelled much, is an accomplished linguist, and an active propagandist of the folk-art of Moravia and Slovakia. He is professor of æsthetics in the theological faculty at Bratislava. Dr. Kolisek has contributed valuable information on the subject of Slovak music to this Dictionary.

KOLLMANN, (1) AUGUST FRIEDRICH CHRISTOPH (b. Engelbostel, Hanover, c. 1756; d. London, Apr. 19, 1829), of a musical family, his father an organist and schoolmaster, his brother, George Christoph, an organist of great renown at Hamburg. Appointed organist at Lüne, near Lüneburg, about 1781, and in 1784 was selected to be chapel-keeper and schoolmaster at the German Chapel, St. James's, London. In 1792 George III. presented a chamber organ to the chapel, which was played by Kollmann under the title of 'clerk' till his death on Easter Day, 1829.

He was a person of much energy, and in 1809, during a large fire in the palace, is said to have saved the chapel by standing in the doorway and preventing the firemen from entering to destroy it. His works are numerous: Essay on Practical Harmony, 1796; Essay on Practical Musical Composition, 1799;¹ Practical Guide to Thorough Bass, 1801; Vindication of a Passage in Thorough Bass, 1802; New Theory of Musical Harmony, 1806; Second Practical Guide to Thorough Bass, 1807; Quarterly Musical Register, 1812 (two numbers only); Remarks on Logier, 1824 (some of these went through two editions); Analysed Symphony

(for piano, violin and bass), op. 3; First beginning on the PF., op. 5. 1796; 'Sinfonien,' i.e. trios for piano, violin and violoncello, op. 7; Concerto for PF. and Orchestra, op. 8; Melody of the 100th Psalm, with 100 harmonies, op. 9; Twelve analysed Fugues, for two performers on piano and organ, op. 10; Introduction to Modulation, op. 11; Rondo on the Chord of the Diminished Seventh. He is also said to have published an orchestral symphony, 'The Shipwreck, or the Loss of the East Indianman Halsewell,' a piece of programme-music quite in the taste of the time; songs, sonatas. He also proposed (1799) an edition of Bach's Wohltemperirtes Klavier.

His son, (2) GEORGE AUGUST (b. 1780; d. Mar. 19, 1845), was a good organ player, and on his father's death succeeded to his post as organist. On his death his sister, (3) JOHANNA SOPHIA (d. May 1849), succeeded him; and on her death the post was bestowed on F. Weber.

KONINK, SERVAAS VAN (d. Amsterdam, ? 1720), a 17th-18th century Dutch composer who composed music to Racine's Athalie (1697), an opera, church music, motets, songs, trios for various instruments, dance tunes, flute sonatas, etc. (Mendel, Q.-L.).

KONIUS, GEORGE EDWARDOVICH (b. Moscow, Sept. 30, 1862), studied at the Conservatoire of his native town under Tanciev and Arensky. From 1891-99 he held a professorship at this institution. In 1902 he transferred his services to the Music School of the Philharmonic Society. He was subsequently professor and director of the Saratov Conservatoire, and since the revolution (1916) professor at Moscow Conservatoire. His chief works are:

Orchestral suite, 'Child-life,' op. 1; Cantata in Memory of Alexander III., op. 8; Symphonic poem, 'From the World of Hudson,' op. 28; Symphonic poem, 'The Rustling Forest' (after Kunderlik), op. 33; Ballet, 'Duffin' (Moscow, 1896); about twenty pieces for pianoforte, opp. 3, 4, 5, 7, 13, 16, 17, 18, 24; over thirty songs, opp. 2, 5, 9, 12, 14, 20, 22.

KONTSKI, DE, a family of virtuosi, of which (1) CHARLES, the eldest (b. Warsaw, Sept. 6, 1815; d. Paris, Aug. 27, 1867), appeared as a pianist in public at the age of 7, but, like the majority of prodigies, did not fulfil the promises of childhood. He made his first studies in Warsaw, and continued them at Paris, where he settled as teacher.

(2) ANTOINE (b. Cracow, Oct. 27, 1817; d. Nowograd, Lithuania, Dec. 7, 1899) was a clever pianist, a pupil of Field at Moscow. He possessed great delicacy of touch and brilliance of execution, but was a superficial musician. He composed many 'pièces de salon,' of which the 'Réveil du lion' (op. 115) became widely popular. He lived in Paris till 1851, then in Berlin till 1853, in St. Petersburg till 1867, when he settled in London, where an opera, 'Les Deux Distracts,' was given in 1872. He was in the United States in 1885, and later, and in 1896-1898 made a professional tour round the world, ending at Warsaw.

(3) STANISLAS (b. Oct. 8, 1820), pianist and pupil of Antoine, lived at St. Petersburg and in Paris.

(4) APOLLINAIRE (b. Warsaw, Oct. 23, 1825; d. there, June 29, 1879) was a violinist. His first master was his elder brother Charles (1). He showed the same precocity of talent as the rest of his family, performing in public concerts at an age of not much over 4 years. Later on he travelled a great deal, chiefly in Russia, but also in France and Germany, and made a certain sensation by his really exceptional technical proficiency, not unaccompanied by a certain amount of charlatanism. In 1837 he is said ¹ to have attracted the attention of Paganini in Paris, and to have formed a friendship with the great virtuoso which resulted in his receiving some lessons ² from him (an honour which he shared with Sivori) and ultimately becoming heir to his violins and violin compositions. This, however, requires confirmation. He made tours in France and Germany in 1847, and in 1853 was appointed solo-violinist to the Emperor of Russia, and in 1861 director of the Warsaw Conservatoire. He played a solo at one of the Russian concerts given in connection with the Exhibition at Paris in 1878. His compositions (fantasias and the like) are musically unimportant.

(5) EUGENIE, sister of the above, was a competent pianist, who performed with Stanislas and Apollinaire (Riemann). P. D.

KONZERTMEISTER, see CONCERTMASTER.

KORBAY, FRANCIS ALEXANDER (b. Budapest, May 8, 1846; d. London, Mar. 9, 1913), the son of parents distinguished as amateur musicians. He studied the piano under various masters, and composition, etc., under Moronyi and Robert Volkmann; he was trained as a tenor singer under Gustave Roger, and sang in grand opera at the National Theatre in Budapest from 1865-68; the continued exertion was too much for his voice, and he took to the piano under the advice of his godfather, Franz Liszt. After touring in Europe as a pianist, he went to America in 1871, playing and teaching for two years. By this time his voice had recovered sufficiently to enable him to give song-recitals at which he accompanied himself, and to teach singing. He lectured and composed, besides singing and playing, during his residence in New York, and an orchestral piece, 'Nuptiale,' was often played in the United States. A Hungarian overture was performed in London (1912); a set of songs to Lennau's 'Schilfflieder,' and other single songs, have been published and often sung, but his arrangements of Hungarian national songs to English versions of his own are the things by which his reputation was made in England. He lived in London from 1894, and was a professor of singing at the R.A.M., 1894-1903. M.

KORESTCHENKO, ARSENE NICHOLAEVICH (b. Moscow, Dec. 18, 1870), composer and pianist. At the Conservatoire—which he quitted in 1891—Korestchenko carried off the first gold medal for proficiency in two branches: pianoforte (Taneiev) and theory (Arensky). He became professor of harmony at the Conservatoire, and took classes for counterpoint and musical form at the Synodal School, Moscow. He is a prolific composer, as will be seen from the following list of his works:

WORKS FOR THE STAGE

- 'Balthazar's Feast,' op. 7, opera in 1 act (Moscow Opera, 1892).
'The Angel of Death,' op. 10, opera in 2 acts, text from Lermonov.
Incidental music to 'The Trojans' of Euripides, op. 15.
Do. to 'Iphigeneia in Aulis,' op. 18.
'The Ice Palace,' op. 38, opera, subject from Lajchunikov (Moscow Opera, 1900).
'The Magic Mirror,' op. 39, ballet.

ORCHESTRAL WORKS

- Barcarolle, op. 6.
'A Tale of the Past,' op. 11.
'Scène nocturne,' op. 12.
Two Symphonic Sketches, op. 14.
'Armenian Suite,' op. 20.
'Noches nocturnas' (second suite), op. 21.
First Symphony (lyric), op. 23.

VOCAL AND ORCHESTRAL

- Cantata 'Don Juan,' op. 5.
'Armenian Songs,' opp. 8, 13.
'Prologue' for the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Moscow Concerts, op. 9.
'Georgian Songs,' op. 27C.

MISCELLANEOUS

- Choruses, opp. 16, 29, 32, 37.
80 songs, opp. 2, 26, 28, 31, 35, 36.
Pianoforte pieces, opp. 1, 3 (Concert Fantasia with orchestra), 19, 22, 30, 33.
String quartet, op. 25.
Melody for violin and piano, op. 4.
Do. for violoncello and piano, op. 34.

KORNAUTH, EGON (b. Olmuetz, Moravia, May 14, 1891), one of the most talented of the modern school of German composers. He studied in the Musikakademie in Vienna under Fuchs, Schreker and Schmidt, at the same time matriculating in Philosophy at the Viennese University. When taking this degree, he was writing his dissertation on the string quartets of Haydn which aroused general attention. A prolific writer, he pauses midway between the German romanticism and the modern school, and in many ways recalls the delicate intimacy of Schumann, the colour harmonic of Brahms, and the melodies of Reger.

WORKS.—Sonata, vin. and P.F. G flat min., op. 3; sonatas, vin. E min. and D maj., opp. 9 and 13; rhapsody, vin. and orch., op. 16; sonata, clar. in E min., op. 8; P.F. quintet, C min., op. 18; str. quartet, A min., op. 26; scherzo, fl. and P.F., op. 11; little evening music, str., op. 11; str. quartet, G min., op. 26; five pieces for P.F., op. 2; sonata, P.F. in A flat, op. 4; piano-fantasy, E flat min.; three P.F. pieces, opp. 23; songs, opp. 1, 12, 24, 25; songs with orch., opp. 7 and 24, unfinished; orch. in A min., op. 20; ballade, orch. and vcl., G min., op. 17; overture, E maj., op. 13; Symphony suite, op. 8; 'Gesang der späten Lieder' for female choir, and orch., op. 16; music to 'Traumland' str. quintet, 2 vins., 2 vcl., and vcl., op. 30.

KORNGOLD, (1) JULIUS (b. Brno, Dec. 24, 1860), studied law in Vienna (graduated Dr. Jur.) and music at the Conservatorium there. He succeeded Hanslick as critic of the Neue Freie Presse in Vienna, in which capacity he has wielded a considerable influence. His son, (2) ERICH WOLFGANG (b. Brno, May 29, 1897), early showed precocious talent as a composer. He was 11 years old when his pantomime, 'Der Schneemann,' was given at the Hofoper in Vienna. Two piano sonatas, an elaborate Lustspiel Overture for a large orchestra, and a Sinfonietta for orchestra and some chamber music followed in quick succession. His first opera was 'Der Ring des Polykrates'; two later operas, 'Violanta' (Vienna and Munich, 1916) and 'Die tote Stadt' (Hamburg, 1920), have been much acclaimed and frequently given. KOTO, see JAPANESE MUSIC.

KOTTER, HANS (b. Strassburg, c. 1485; d. Berne, between 1541-43), organist at Freiburg from c. 1504. As a Protestant he was imprisoned, tortured and exiled in 1522. At the instance of the Strassburg council he obtained his freedom in 1531 (?) and went to Berne c. 1532; but, as the Reformation had banished all church organs, the only employment he could find was that of a schoolmaster. He remained at Berne except for a few fruitless journeys to obtain a more suitable position. The organ-book in tablature written by him for Bonifazius Amerbach in 1513, now in the University library, Basle, is one of the oldest monuments of the German school of organ-playing. He wrote also a second organ book without name of author, and a Salve Regina a 3 v. for organ (in the same library) (Riemann, Q.-L.).

KOTZWARA (KOCZWARA), FRANZ (b. Prague; d. London, Sept. 2, 1791), published six songs in London in 1785, was in Ireland in 1788, and was engaged in 1790 as tenor player in Gallini's orchestra at the King's Theatre. He returned to London in the latter year, and in 1791 he hanged himself in a house of ill-fame in Vine Street, St. Martin's. He had been one of the band at the Handel Commemoration in the preceding May. Kotzwar was the author of the 'Battle of Prague,' a piece for PF. with violin, violoncello and drum ad libitum, long a favourite in London. A copy of John Lee's edition of this piece exists, bearing the MS. date 1788, so that it must have been published before the date usually given, 1789. He also wrote sonatas, serenades, and other pieces. g.; addn. w. H. G. F.

KOVAŘOVIC, KAREL (b. Prague, Dec. 9, 1862; d. there, Dec. 9, 1920), for twenty years (1900-20) chief conductor of the National Opera (Národní Divadlo) in PRAGUE (q.v.), and the composer of two very popular operas founded on national subjects: 'Pachlavci' (The Peasants' Charter) and 'Na starém Bělidle' (At the Old Bleaching House).

On leaving the Prague Conservatoire, where he had made the clarinet and the harp his special studies, Kovařovic joined the orchestra of the National Opera as harpist until 1885. He then studied theory with Fibich. Being also an excellent pianist, he was engaged as accompanist by the violinist Fr. Ondříček, and toured with him from 1886-88. During the next few years he was employed as conductor to several provincial societies, until in 1895 Prof. Hostinsky commissioned him to organise and direct an orchestra for the Ethnographical Exhibition in Prague. This brought his remarkable gifts as a conductor into prominence, and it was realised that he was the very man to be placed at the head of the National Opera. It was not without some opposition and delay that he was actually appointed conductor-in-chief, in 1900. His drastic methods raised the entire standard of performance, but naturally aroused some hostility in his professional surroundings. A stern disciplinarian with his personnel, he took also a very decided view as to the works suitable for production at the National Opera, and set his face against indiscriminate experimentalism. He was, however, an eclectic in his views, and his performances of Mozart were as carefully thought out and as exquisite in detail as were his famous revivals of Smetana's operas, which he popularised until they became a really vital part of the musical life of his people. Kovařovic put the National Opera in Prague on a level with the best continental opera houses, having regard to the size and resources of the city. As regards the appreciation and assimilation of very modern music he had his limitations, but made on the whole very few mistakes. His life and health were given ungrudgingly to the maintenance of first-rate opera, of which the Czechs were justly proud.

As a composer, Kovařovic appeared at first to be merely versatile and superficially gifted. As a young man he wrote several comic operas: 'Ženichové' (The Bridegrooms) (1884), 'Cesta Oknem' (The Way through the Window) (1886), and 'Noč Šimon a Judy' (The Night of Simon and Jude) (1892), besides a picturesque ballet, influenced by Delibes, 'Haschish' (1881), and 'Pohádka o nalezéném štěstí' (A Tale of Luck Found) (1886). A sense for the stage and a certain musical wit assured some success for these works, and also for a burlesque operetta on 'Œdipus Rex,' and the incidental music which he furnished for Tyl's Wood Nymph and The Excursions of Mr. Brouček. But none suspected that his talent, hitherto somewhat unworthily employed, was maturing and aspiring in secret until, in 1899, it manifested itself in a serious opera, written in honour of the Jubilee of the Association of the Národní Divadlo. 'Pachlavci,' translated into German as 'Bauernrecht' (The Peasants' Charter,) but meaning literally 'the Dog-heads,' is based on a tale by the popular historical novelist, Jirásek. The Choda, a small group of loyal peasants dwelling in the south-west of Bohemia, had proved such trusty guardians of the frontier that they were recompensed by various princes of Bohemia with unusual favours, amongst them the right to bear on their banners the symbol of a watch-dog's head. But in 1895 Austrian oppression touched its zenith, and the Chods were stripped of their privileges and treated with brutal injustice by their Governor, the implacable Laminger von Albenreuth, called 'Lomikar' by the Slavonic peasants. The judicial murder of one of their leaders, Kozina, who remains to this day a traditional local hero, furnishes material for a touching and dramatic libretto. The homely and historical setting of the story may possibly limit its universal significance, while offering as compensation many picturesque suggestions—the local costumes, dances and scenery; but the emotional scope is profound and untrammelled. There are stirring moments in 'Psohlavci': the mock trial scene in which the peasants' cherished charter is torn to shreds by the partial judge; the tense mental agony of the prison scene, when Kozina refuses pardon at the price of his honour; the sudden death of the sinister Lomikar in the banquet hall—these are strong situations, and Kovařovic knows how to make them not merely effective, but poignant. Here he sloughs off the facile eclecticism of earlier years and produces music of real value.

While aiming to follow in some respects the operatic traditions of Smetana, Kovařovic could not, because of his delicate and distinguished musical personality, prevent his own work from taking a more modern and individual form. Between the master and the disciple lies the development of a whole generation. The immediate success of 'Psohlavci' was sensational, and its popularity has lasted over a quarter of a century. Kovařovic followed this dramatic opera by a completely contrasting work. 'Na starém Bělidle' (At the Old Bleaching House), the libretto founded on Mme. Němcova's novel of rural life, Babička (Grannie), is not so much an opera as a series of idyllic scenes from the life of an earlier generation, enveloped in a tender and delicate musical tissue, shot through with the colour of the folk music, a little reminiscent of Massenet, and touched with a wistful calm and mellow beauty which, emanating from the personality of Grannie, pervades the entire work. A few gay dances, the singing of the girls as they spin by the light of the log fire in Grannie's bleaching house, the brightness of the costumes, and the atmosphere of youth contrasted with that of serene old age, all combine to make a delicate little poem of 'Na starém Bělidle.'

Among Kovařovic's miscellaneous works are the symphonic poem 'The Rape of Persephone' (1884), dramatic overture in C minor, incidental music to Šubert's play Raphael's Loves, and to Vojnovic's 'Equinox,' a violin sonata in F, a pianoforte concerto in F minor, string quartets in A minor, G major and E flat, romance for clarinet, a few charming songs in the national style, including the popular 'Slovak Song,' to words by Destinova, one or two melodramas and small choral works.

Kovařovic visited England in May 1919, when, with the orchestra of the Prague National Opera, he took part in the Czechoslovak Musical Festival in London. He was already in failing health, and a few months later underwent a severe operation which did little to alleviate his sufferings. He died at the age of 58, just at the time when the newly-won independence of Bohemia gave every hope that his devoted service to his country's art might become more widely appreciated.

KOVEN, HENRY LOUIS REGINALD DE (b. Middletown, Connecticut, Apr. 3, 1859; d. Chicago, Jan. 16, 1920), an American composer, chiefly of comic operas and songs. He studied at St. John's College, Oxford, where he took his degree in 1879, and then devoted himself to music successively at Stuttgart, Frankfurt, Florence, Vienna and Paris. He composed many light operas, beginning with 'The Begum' in 1887. By far the most successful of them was 'Robin Hood,' first heard in 1890, and for many seasons thereafter in America, and given in London as 'Maid Marion.' His 'Rob Roy' (1894), also gained considerable success. In 1902 De Koven formed the Philharmonic Orchestra in Washington, D.C., which he conducted for two seasons. In the season of 1916–17 his grand opera, 'The Canterbury Pilgrims,' was produced at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York; a second grand opera, 'Rip Van Winkle,' was produced in Chicago and in New York by the Chicago Opera Company in 1920. De Koven was also a fertile writer of songs: of 400 which he composed, some have gained a remarkable popularity. He had a gift for facile melody and, to a certain extent, for characterisation in comedy. But his powers did not extend to the successful creation of operas in the larger forms. His two 'grand operas,' comedies on a larger scale, show fundamental weaknesses; and especially in the matter of ensemble writing and orchestral scoring.

KOŽELUH (Ger. KOTZELUCH), (1) JOHANN ANTON (b. Welwarn, Dec. 13, 1738; d. Prague, Feb. 3, 1814), Bohemian musician, was choir-master first at Rakonitz and then at Welwarn. Desirous of further instruction he went to Prague and Vienna, where he was kindly received by Gluck and Gassmann, was appointed choir-master of the Kreuzherren church, Prague; and on Mar. 13, 1784, Kapellmeister to the cathedral, which post he retained till his death. He composed church-music, operas and oratorios, of which very little was published. Q.-L. gives a cantata for soprano, op. 7, as published by Artaria of Vienna, and contains a list of MS. works. Of much greater importance is his cousin and pupil,

(2) LEOPOLD (b. Welwarn, 1754¹; d. Vienna, May 7, 1818²). In 1765 he went to Prague for his education, and there composed a ballet, performed at the national theatre in 1771, with so much success that it was followed in the course of the next six years by twenty-four ballets and three pantomimes. In 1778 he went to Vienna and became the pianoforte master of the Archduchess Elizabeth, and favourite teacher of the aristocracy. When Mozart resigned his post at Salzburg (1781) the Archbishop at once offered it with a rise of salary to Koželuh, who declined it on the ground that he was doing better in Vienna. To his friends, however, he held different language:

'The Archbishop's conduct towards Mozart deterred me more than anything, for if he could let such a man as that leave him, what treatment should I have been likely to meet with?'

The respect here expressed was strangely at variance with his subsequent behaviour towards Mozart.³ At the coronation of the Emperor Leopold II. at Prague (1791) even his own countrymen, the Bohemians, were disgusted with his behaviour to Mozart, who was in attendance as court composer. He nevertheless succeeded him in his office (1792), with a salary of 1500 gulden, and retained the post till his death. His numerous compositions include two grand operas, 'Judith' and 'Deborah and Sisara'; an oratorio, 'Moses in Aegypten'; many ballets, cantatas, about thirty symphonies, and much pianoforte music, at one time well known in England, but all now forgotten. (See list in Q.-L.) It should be added that he arranged some Scottish songs for Thomson of Edinburgh, in allusion to which, Beethoven, in a letter of Feb. 29, 1812 (Thayer, iii. 449), whether inspired with disgust at Koželuh's underselling him, or with a genuine contempt for his music, says, 'Moi je m'estime encore une fois plus supérieur en ce genre que Monsieur Koželuh (miserabilis).'⁴ F. G.

KRAF, MICHAEL, a Frankonian, Kapellmeister and organist of the monastery of Weingarten, Württemberg, between 1620-27. He was a prolific composer of masses, motets, other church music, and of songs. (List in Q.-L.)

KRAFFT, (1) FRANÇOIS (b. Ghent, 1728; d. there, Jan. 13, 1795), choir-boy at Ghent Cathedral, maître de chapelle, Brussels. He was at Ghent Cathedral from 1770 or 1771. He left some 60 compositions, mostly in private hands. (2) FRANÇOIS (b. Brussels, Oct. 3, 1733), music teacher at Brussels, 1760, composer to the Royal Chapel, 1770-83. According to Fétis he was organist at Notre Dame au Sablon. Fétis quotes also FRANÇOIS-JOSEPH (b. Brussels, July 22, 1720). The history is so far greatly confused, and it is uncertain to which of the foregoing the sonatas in Haffner's 'Raccolta' or the 12 minuets, 13 pièces en écho mentioned in Q.-L. have to be attributed. It appears certain, however, that the masses and sacred songs at the collegiate church of Anderlecht (dated 1783) are by François (2).

KRAFT, (1) ANTON (b. Rokitzan near Pilsen, Bohemia, Dec. 30, 1752⁵; d. Aug. 28, 1820), distinguished violoncellist, son of a brewer and amateur, who had his son early taught music, especially the violoncello. He studied law at Prague, where he had finishing lessons from Werner, and at Vienna, where Haydn secured him for the chapel of Prince Esterhazy, which he entered on Jan. 1, 1778. On the Prince's death in 1790 he became chamber-musician to Prince Grassalkowitsch, and in 1795 to Prince Lobkowitz, in whose service he died. On one of his concert-tours he was at Dresden in 1789, and with his son played before Duke Karl, and before the Elector the night after the court had been enchanted by Mozart. Both musicians were staying at the same hotel, so they arranged a quartet, the fourth part being taken by Teyber the organist.⁶ Haydn valued Kraft for his power of expression, and for the purity of his intonation, and in all probability composed (1781) his violoncello concerto (André) for him. According to Schindler⁷ the violoncello part in Beethoven's triple concerto was also intended for Kraft. As he showed a talent for composition, Haydn offered to instruct him, but Kraft taking up the new subject with such ardour as to neglect his instrument, Haydn would teach him no more, saying he already knew enough for his purpose. He published three sonatas with accompaniment, op. 1 (Amsterdam, Hummel); three sonatas, op. 2 (André); three grand duos concertantes for violin and violoncello, op. 3, and first concerto in C, op. 4 (Breitkopf & Härtel); grand duos for two violoncellos, opp. 5 and 6 (Vienna, Steiner); and divertissement for violoncello with double bass (Peters). Kraft also played the baritone in Prince Esterhazy's chamber music,⁸ and composed several trios for two baritones and violoncello.

His son and pupil (2) NICOLAUS (b. Esterházy, Dec. 14, 1778; d. May 18, 1853), early became proficient on the violoncello, accompanied his father on his concert-tours (see above), and settled with him in Vienna in 1790. He played a concerto of his father's at a concert of the Tonkünstler-Societät in 1792, and was one of ⁵ This is the date in the baptismal register; 1751 and 1749 have been given.

⁶ Mozart also played with the Krafts his Trio in E (Köchel, 542) see Nohl's Mozart-Briefe, No. 251.

Prince Karl Lichnowsky's famous quartet party, who executed so many of Beethoven's works for the first time. The others were Schuppanzigh, Sina, and Franz Weiss, all young men.¹ In 1796 he became chamber-musician to Prince Lobkowitz, who sent him in 1801 to Berlin for further study with Louis Dupont. There he gave concerts, as well as at Leipzig, Dresden, Prague and Vienna on his return journey. In 1809 he entered the orchestra of the court-opera, and the King of Württemberg hearing him in 1814, at once engaged him for his chapel at Stuttgart. He undertook several more concert-tours (Hummel accompanied him in 1818), but an accident to his hand obliged him to give up playing. He retired on a pension in 1834. Among his pupils were Count Wihorsky, Merk, Birnbach, Wranitzky's sons, and his own son (3) FRIEDRICH (b. Vienna, Feb. 12, 1807), who became violoncellist in the chapel at Stuttgart, 1824.

Among Nicolaus's excellent violoncello compositions may be specified—

Fantasia with quartet, op. 1 (André); concertos, opp. 3, 4 (B & T.) and 5 (Peters); Scène pastorale with orchestra, dedicated to the King of Württemberg, op. 9 (Peters); 8 divertissements progressifs with second violoncello, op. 14 (André); three easy duos for two violoncellos, op. 15; and three grand duos for ditto, op. 17 (André). KRAKOVIAK (CRACOVIAK, or CRACOVIANNE), a Polish dance, belonging to the district of Cracow. 'There are usually,' says an eye-witness, 'a great many couples—as many as in an English country dance. They shout while dancing, and occasionally the smart man of the party sings an impromptu couplet suited for the occasion—on birthdays, weddings, etc. The men also strike their heels together while dancing, which produces a metallic sound, as the heels are covered with iron.' The songs, which also share the name, are innumerable and, as is natural, deeply tinged with melancholy. Under the name of Cracovienne the dance was brought into the theatre about the year 1840, and was made famous by Fanny Elssler's performance. The following is the tune to which she danced it; but whether that is a real Krakoviak, or a mere imitation, the writer is unable to say:

It has been varied by Chopin (op. 14), Herz, Wallace, and others. G.

KRANZ, JOHANN FRIEDRICH (b. Weimar, 1754; d. Stuttgart, 1807), violinist and composer, pupil of Göpfert, Weimar (violin), and Jos. Haydn, Vienna. From 1778–81 he was a member of Weimar court orchestra; was sent by the Duke to Italy for further studies; returned in 1789, and was appointed second Konzertmeister in the court orchestra and music director of the opera. He composed several Singspiele, especially those by Goethe, who mentions him in Tag und Jahreshefte, 1791 (vol. 21, p. 12). In 1803 he became Zumsteeg's successor as Kapellmeister of the Stuttgart court theatre, which post he held till the time of his death. E. v. d. S.

KRÁSNOHORSKÁ, ELIŠKA (b. Nov. 18, 1847), a distinguished Czech authoress who furnished librettos for many popular Bohemian operas in the second half of the 19th century. She showed musical talent in her girlhood, and studied singing and theory under Zvonář at the 'Zofin' Academy, but literature finally claimed her whole attention. The chief operas for which she wrote the texts were: Bendl's 'Lejla' (from Bulwer Lytton) (1868), 'Břetislava' (1870), 'Dítě Tabora' (The Child of Tabor) (1892), and 'Karel Škreta' (1883); Fibich's 'Blaník' (1881); while for Smetana she wrote the texts of 'Hudička' (The Kiss) (1876), 'Tajemství' (The Secret) (1878), and 'Čertova Stěna' (The Devil's Wall) (1882). She also made a very happy translation into Czech of Bizet's 'Carmen.' Krásnohorská has been a frequent contributor to the leading musical and other journals, and her articles on 'Czech Poetry and Music Drama,' 'Czech Musical Declaration,' and her reminiscences of Smetana are useful to the student, especially her brochure Bedřich Smetana, published in 1885 in Em. Chávil's series of Musical Essays (Rozprawy Hudební, Fr. Urbánek, Prague). R. N.

KRAUS, JOSEPH MARTIN (b. Miltenberg, near Mainz; d. Stockholm, Dec. 15, 1792), pupil of Abbé Vogler. He studied philosophy and law at Mainz, Erfurt and Göttingen; and went with a Swedish co-student to Stockholm, where he became conductor at the theatre in 1778 and Kapellmeister in 1781. In 1782 he travelled at the expense of, and partly with, the King of Sweden through Germany, Italy, France and England, returning to Stockholm in 1787. In 1788 he succeeded Uttini as court Kapellmeister. He composed 4 operas, church music, secular songs, symphonies, overtures and string quartets; he also wrote essays on music (anon.), poetry, and an autobiography. (List in Q.-L.)

KRAUS, FATHER LAMBERT (b. Pfreund, Palatinate; d. Nov. 27, 1790), abbot of the monastery of Metten in Bavaria. He composed sacred and secular 'Singspiele' (1762–70), 12 symphonies, 16 masses and other church music.

KRAUSE, CHRISTIAN GOTTFRIED (b. Winzig, Silesia, 1719; d. Berlin, July 21, 1779), son of a town musician. He studied at the University of Frankfort-on-Oder, and became a barrister in 1753. He was a song composer, whom Riemann calls 'the soul of the Berlin Liederschule,' and the author of important essays on music (A. Schering, Studie über Krause; see also Riemann).

KRAUSS, MARIE GABRIELLE (b. Vienna, Mar. 24, 1842; d. Paris, Jan. 5-6, 1906), received instruction at the Conservatorium in piano-forte playing and harmony, and in singing from Mme. Marchesi. She sang in Schumann's 'Paradise and Peri' at its publication in Vienna by the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, Mar. 1, 1858. She made her début at the opera there as Mathilde ('Tell') in July 1859, and played also Anna ('Dame Blanche') and Valentine. She became a favourite, and remained there for some years, until about 1867. She made her début at the Italiens, Paris, as Leonora ('Trovatore'), Apr. 6, 1867, and Lucrozia; became very successful, and was engaged there every season until the war of 1870. She gained great applause by her performance of Donna Anna, Fidelio, Norma, Lucia, Semiramide, Gilda, etc., in a new opera of Mme. de Grandval's, 'Piccolino,' Nov. 25, 1869, and in Halévy's 'Guido et Ginevra' (1870). She sang with great success at Naples in Petrella's 'Manfredo' (1871), and 'Bianca Orsini' (1874), also as Aida; with less success at Milan as Elsa on the production there of 'Lohengrin,' and in Gomes's 'Fosca,' Feb. 16, 1873. She returned to the Italiens for a short time in the autumn of 1873, accepted the offer of an engagement for the Opéra, previous to which she played at St. Petersburg in 1874. She made her début at the Opéra, at the inauguration of the new house, as Rachel in 'La Juive' (first two acts), Jan. 5, 1875, and in the same opera in its entirety, Jan. 8. With the exception of a short period, 1885-86, she remained a member of that company until the end of 1888. She played in operas produced there for the first time as the heroine (Mermet's 'Jeanne d'Arc'), Apr. 5, 1876; Pauline (Gounod's 'Polyeucte'), Oct. 7, 1878; Aida, Mar. 22, 1880; Hermosa (Gounod's 'Tribut de Zamora'), Apr. 1, 1881; Katharine of Aragon (Saint-Saëns's 'Henry VIII'), Mar. 5, 1883; the heroine on revival of Gounod's 'Sapho,' Apr. 2, 1884; Gilda ('Rigoletto'), Mar. 2, 1885; and Dolores (Paladilhe's 'Patrie'), Dec. 20, 1886.

'By degrees Gabrielle Krauss became as great an actress as she was a singer . . . and the French were right when they gave her the name of 'La Rachel chantante' (Marchesi).

After her retirement, she frequently sang at concerts, and for many years devoted herself to teaching. A. C.

KREBS, (1) JOHANN LUDWIG (b. Buttels-städt, Thuringia, Feb. 10, 1713; d. Altenburg, Jan.¹ 1780), distinguished organist. His father, JOHANN TOBIAS (b. Heichelheim, 1690; d. Buttelsstädt, after 1728), himself an excellent organist, for seven years walked every week from Buttelsstädt to Weimar, in order to take lessons from Walther, author of the Lexicon, who was organist there, and from Sebastian Bach, at that time Konzertmeister at Weimar. He was appointed organist at Buttelsstädt about 1721. He so thoroughly grounded his son in music that when in 1726 the latter went to the Thomasschule in Leipzig he was already sufficiently advanced to be at once admitted by Bach into the number of his special pupils. He enjoyed Bach's instruction for nine years (to 1735), and rose to so high a place in his esteem that he was appointed to play the clavier at the weekly practices to which Bach gave the name of 'collegium musicum.' Punning upon his pupil's name and his own, the old cantor was accustomed to say that 'he was the best crab (Krebs) in all the brook (Bach).'

At the close of his philosophical studies at Leipzig he was appointed organist successively at Zwickau (1737). Zeitz (1744), and Altenburg, where he remained from 1756 till his death. He was equally esteemed on the clavier and the organ, and in the latter capacity especially deserves to be considered one of Bach's best pupils. His published compositions include 'Klavier-Uebungen' (4 parts), containing Chorals with variations, fugues and suites; sonatas for clavier, and for flute and clavier; and trios for the flute. (See Q.-L.) Several of these have been reprinted in the collections of Körner and others. Among his unpublished works a Magnificat and two settings of the Sanctus with orchestral accompaniments are highly spoken of.

He left two sons, both sound musicians and composers, though not of the eminence of their father. The eldest, (2) EHRENFRIED CHRISTIAN TRAUOGOTT, succeeded his father as court organist and Musik-director at Altenburg, and on his death was succeeded by his younger brother, (3) JOHANN GOTTFRIED, who wrote cantatas, songs, etc. A. KREBS, a musical family of the 19th century. (1) KARL AUGUST (b. Nuremberg, Jan. 16, 1804; d. May 16, 1880), the head, was the son of A. and Charlotte Miedcke, belonging to the company of the theatre at Nuremberg. The name of Krebs he obtained from the singer of that name at Stuttgart, who adopted him. His early studies were made under Schelble, and in 1825 under Seyfried at Vienna. In Mar. 1827 he settled in Hamburg as head of the theatre, and there passed twenty-three active and useful years, till called to Dresden in 1850 as Kapellmeister to the court, a post which he filled with honour and advantage till 1871. From that date he conducted the orchestra in the Catholic chapel. His compositions are numerous and varied in kind—masses, operas ('Silva,' 1830, 'Agnes Bernauer,' 1835), a Te Deum, orchestral pieces, songs and pianoforte works, many of them much esteemed in Germany. In England, however, his name is known almost exclusively as the father of (2) MARIE KREBS (b. Dresden, Dec. 5, 1851; d. June 27, 1900), the pianist. On the side of both father and mother (ALOYSIA MICHALES, an operatic singer of eminence, b. Aug. 29, 1826, married Krebs July 20, 1850) she inherited music, and like Mme. Schumann was happy in having a father who directed her studies with great judgment. Marie appeared in public at the early age of 11 (Meissen, 1862). Her tours embraced not only the whole of Germany and England, but Italy, France, Holland and America. She played at the Gewandhaus first, Nov. 30, 1865. To this country she came in the previous year, and made an engagement with Gye for four seasons, and her first appearances were at the Crystal Palace, Apr. 30, 1864; at the Philharmonic, Apr. 20, 1874; and at the Monday Popular Concerts, Jan. 13, 1875. She enjoyed many years of great popularity in England and on the continent, and retired from the profession on her marriage with Herr Brenning.

KREHBIEL, HENRY EDWARD (b. Ann Arbor, Michigan, U.S.A., Mar. 10, 1854; d. Mar. 20, 1923), an eminent American critic and writer of music. He studied law in Cincinnati, but soon turned to journalism, devoting himself especially to music. He was music critic of The Cincinnati Gazette from 1874 to 1879, and then entered upon the same office for The New York Tribune, which post he held till his death. He occupied a position of outstanding authority and influence among American critics, was one of the ablest champions of musical progress, and at the same time a deep student of the classics. He did much to advance the understanding and love of Wagner's later music dramas in America, and was among the earliest to welcome and appraise discriminatingly the music of Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Dvořák and other modern composers. It was to some extent at any rate due to him that such work was made familiar in New York before it was widely known in many European capitals.

Krehbiel's activity was by no means confined to newspaper criticism. Amongst the list of his many books given below, the revised and completed edition of the English text of THAYER's Life of Beethoven is pre-eminent (see THAYER.) It was the work of his last years, and its publication was attained through the instrumentality of the Beethoven Association of New York.

(See BAUER, Harold.) Another line of original research in which his work is important was his study of the negro folk-songs, of which he made a large collection. His intimate and first-hand knowledge was ultimately embodied in Afro-American Folk-songs (1914). He was widely known as a lecturer; he accomplished a useful work for many years by means of the programme notes and analyses that he prepared for the principal New York concerts (see ANALYTICAL NOTES). He acted as editor for American matters to the second edition of this Dictionary and contributed to it many important articles. His principal books are as follows:

Notes on the Cultivation of Choral Music and the Oratorio Society of New York (1884); Review of the New York Musical Season (five volumes, 1886-90); Studies in the Wagnerian Drama (1891); The Philharmonic Society of New York: a Memorial published on the occasion of the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Founding of the Philharmonic Society (1892); How to Listen to Music (1897); Music and Manners in the Classical Period (1898); Chapters of Opera, a valuable history of opera in New York (1908, 2nd edition 1909); A Book of Operas (1909); The Pianoforte and its Music (1911); Afro-American Folk-songs (1914); A Second Book of Operas (1917); More Chapters of Opera (1919); Thayer's Life of Beethoven revised, completed and published for the first time in English (3 vols., 1921).

In 1900 he was on the jury for musical instruments at the Paris Exposition; and in 1901 received the cross of the Legion of Honour.

M.; addns. R. A.

KREHL, STEPHAN (b. Leipzig, July 5, 1864; d. Apr. 7, 1924), composer and theorist, was a pupil at the Leipzig and Dresden Conservatoriums. In 1889 he was appointed teacher of piano and theory at the Carlsruhe Conservatorium. In 1902 he went in a similar capacity to the Conservatorium at Leipzig, attaining the title of 'Royal Professor' in 1910, and in 1921 he succeeded Hans Sitt as director of that institution, a post which he occupied till his death. He was an admirable theorist, and possessed the invaluable gift of being able to express lucidly whatever he wished to say. In the main he followed Hugo Riemann's system of harmony and counterpoint, and wrote several handbooks for educational purposes, for the most part of an elementary kind: Praktische Formenlehre (1902); Fuge (1909); Allgemeine Musiklehre (1910); Harmonielehre (1911); Kontrapunkt (1912); and (more advanced) Theorie der Tonkunst und Kompositionslehre, 2 vols. (1921-24). His compositions, always well written and workmanlike, are in some instances attractive; notably his clarinet quintet, op. 19, and the 'Symphonic Prelude to Hannele,' op. 15. Amongst the better of his other compositions are a string quartet, op. 17, sonata for piano and violoncello, op. 20, a cantata called 'Tröstung,' op. 33, and a suite for string quartet written just before his death.

H. B.

KREISLER, FRITZ (b. Vienna, Feb. 2, 1875), violinist, displayed musical gifts of an uncommon order in earliest infancy. These were recognised by his father, an eminent physician and enthusiastic musical amateur, who instructed and encouraged him to such purpose that at the age of 7 he appeared at a concert for children given in Vienna by Carlotta Patti, and entered the Vienna Conservatorium, where he studied under Hellmesberger and Auer. This was a special privilege, pupils being as a general rule ineligible for admission in that institution before the age of 14. He was in fact the youngest child who had studied there, and justified to the full the opinion formed of his exceptional talents by carrying off, in 1885, the gold medal for violin-playing at the age of 10. Passing on to Paris, where he studied at the Conservatoire under Massart (violin) and Delibes (theory), he there achieved at the age of 12 another remarkable success, gaining the gold medal (Premier Grand Prix de Rome) against forty competitors, all of whom had reached the age of 20. After a few years of further study he visited America (in 1889), and made a successful tour of the States with Moritz Rosenthal, the pianist, at the conclusion of which he returned to his native town and temporarily broke away from the musical life. He entered the Gymnasium at Vienna to take up a course of medicine, studied art in Paris and Rome, prepared for and passed a very stiff army examination, and duly became an officer in a regiment of Uhlans. In short, he gave to other sides of his nature, besides the musical, a chance of development. During his year of military service he laid the violin completely aside, and, as a result of the training received, became physically the more fitted for a profession which makes serious calls upon the vitality of those who practise it. Then came a transition period, during which he made a few public appearances, but with so little success that he was moved to make a preliminary retirement into the country, during which he worked uninterruptedly at his violin for eight weeks, and emerged triumphant, having completely regained his command over the instrument. He was then able once more to shine as a solo player, making a brilliant debut at Berlin in Mar. 1899, in a programme which included concertos by Max Bruch and Vieuxtemps, and the 'Non più mesta' variations of Paganini. In the same year he revisited the United States, where the public was quick to perceive the quality of greatness which is now universally attributed to him. Subsequently he paid frequent visits to America, and lived chiefly in New York from 1915-24. On the eve of war (July 31, 1914), he was recalled to the Austrian army from Ragaz in Switzerland, and returned wounded to America three months later. His appearances in all the continental musical centres have been very numerous. In London he made his début at a Richter Concert on May 12, 1901. On May 19, 1904, he was presented at a Philharmonic Concert with the gold medal of the society; he played frequently in England up to the time of the war, and reappeared after it at Queen's Hall on May 4, 1921. His style of playing is full of glow and high courage, above all intensely individual, his readings and even his methods of fingering being quite his own. His programmes include frequently works of major importance—notably he was the first to perform Elgar's violin concerto (at a Philharmonic Concert) in London, St. Petersburg, Moscow, Vienna, Berlin, Dresden, Munich and Amsterdam; but the feature of his concerts lately has been his brilliant playing of his own works, a few of which are original (e.g. 'Caprice viennois,' 'Tambourin chinois,' 'Recitativo and Scherzo' for violin alone, and 'Polichinelle Sérénade'). The bulk of them, however, are clever arrangements of pieces ancient and modern, and they are so much to the taste of the general public that Kreisler may be said to be the world's most popular violinist at the present time (1926).

He has written one string quartet (A minor). It contains no quartet writing of the conventional kind, but is charged with very deep and very personal feeling, and is so well laid out for the strings that it is sure of its effect.

KREISLERIANA, a set of 8 pieces for piano solo, dedicated to Chopin and forming op. 16 of Schumann's works. Kreisler is the Kapellmeister in Hoffmann's Fantasiestücke in Callots Manier, so much admired by Schumann. (See BOHNER and HOFFMANN.) The pieces were written in 1838, after the Phantasiestücke (op. 12) and Novelletten (op. 21), and before the Arabeske (op. 18).¹ Schumann has added to the title 'Phantasien für das PF.' The Kreisleriana were published by Haslinger of Vienna shortly after Schumann's visit there (1838-39).

KREISSELE VON HELLBORN, HEINRICH (b. Vienna, 1812; d. Apr. 6, 1869), Dr. juris, Imperial Finance Secretary at Vienna, and Member of the Direction of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, finds a place here for his lives of Schubert, viz. F. Schubert, eine biographische Skizze, von Heinrich von Kreissle (small 8vo, Vienna, 1861), a preliminary sketch; and Franz Schubert (8vo, Vienna, Gerold, 1865), a complete and exhaustive biography, with a portrait. The latter has been translated in full by Arthur Duke Coleridge, The Life of Franz Schubert . . . with an Appendix by George Grove (giving a thematic catalogue of the nine symphonies, and mentioning other works in MS.), 2 vols., 8vo, London, Longmans, 1869. It has also been condensed by E. Willerforce. 8vo, London, Allen, 1866.

KRENEK, ERNST (b. Vienna, 1900), composer, of Czech family, studied composition with Franz Schreker in Vienna and Berlin, and is now domiciled in the latter city. His works, which have led to his recognition as one of the foremost composers of the younger generation in Germany, are remarkable for the austerity of his contrapuntal outlook. He appears to be swayed by strictly musical, not to say even technical, impulses, and rarely, if ever, allows his course to be deflected by emotional or temperamental considerations. He takes the 'linear' view of polyphony which prevails in so much recent German music, and is in fact one of its most uncompromising adherents. As with others, this has committed him to atonality, but rather as a corollary to his methods than as an integral feature of them, for he does not wilfully avoid the assertion of tonality where it presents itself in the course of development. His strong feeling for rhythm is possibly a racial trait, but if so it stands alone, for he has nothing in common with the Czech national movement. His reputation was established by performances at various festivals, notably of a string quartet in 1921 and a symphony in 1923, followed in 1924 by the production of a comic opera in three acts, 'Der Sprung über den Schatten' (op. 17).

The following is a list of his works :

1. (1) Double Fugue, and (2) 'Tanzstudie' for PF.
2. Sonata for PF.
3. Sonata, vln. and PF.
4. Reverie for (clar. vln., vla., and vcl.
5. Five Sonatas for PF.
6. String Quartet I.
7. Symphony I.
8. String Quartet II.
9. Songs.
10. Concerto grosso I. For 6 solo instr. (vln., vla., vcl., flute, clar. and bassoon) and str. orch.
11. Symphonic Music I. For 8 solo instr. (flute, oboe, clar., bassoon, 2 vlns., vla., vcl. and double-bass).
12. Symphony II.
13. Toccata and Chaconne for PF.
14. 'Zwillingburg.' Dramatic cantata.
15. Songs.
16. Symphony III.
17. 'Der Sprung über den Schatten.' Opera.
18. Piano Concerto in F sharp.
19. Songs.
20. String Quartet III.
21. Oryheus and Eurilike. Opera.
22. Three a cappella choruses.
23. Symphonic Music II. (Diverimento), for 9 solo instr.
24. String Quartet IV.
25. Concerto grosso II.
26. Two Suites for PF.
27. Concertino for flute, vln., cembalo and str. orch.
28. Violin Concerto.
29. 'The Seasons,' 4 short a cappella choruses (perf. Donaueschingen 1925).

Opp. 1 to 11 were composed whilst Krenck was studying with Schreker. E. F.

KRESS, JAKOB (d. ? Darmstadt, c. 1736), a 17th-18th century violinist and composer, Konzertmeister in the court orchestra. He composed a symphony, overtures, violin and flute concertos, quartets, trios (1 for flute, viol d'amour, cembalo or lute; and 1 for flute viola da gamba and cembalo, MS. Rostock libr.), and sonatas for various instruments. E. v. d. s.

KRESS (KRESSEN, CRESSE), JOHANN ALBRECHT (d. Stuttgart before 1701), vice-Kapellmeister of the court chapel at Stuttgart in 1674. He was a highly esteemed composer of sacred cantatas and songs and the author of a treatise on thorough-bass (Q.-L.).

KRETZSCHMER, EDMUND (b. Ostritz, Saxony, Aug. 31, 1830; d. Dresden, Sept. 13, 1908), organist and dramatic composer. His father, the rector of the school in Ostritz, gave him his early musical education. He studied composition under Julius Otto, and the organ under Johann Schneider at Dresden, where he became organist of the Catholic church in 1854, and to the court in 1863. He founded several 'Gesangvereine,' and in 1865 his composition, 'Die Geisterschlacht,' gained the prize at the first German 'Sängerfest,' in Dresden. Three years later he took another prize in Brussels for a Mass. His opera 'Die Folkunger,' in five acts, libretto by Mosenthal, was produced at Dresden, June 1875. It was well received and had a considerable run, but has since disappeared; nor has 'Heinrich der Loewe,' to his own libretto (produced at Leipzig, 1877), met with more permanent favour, though it was given on many German stages with success. The music is correct, and shows both taste and talent, but no invention or dramatic power. His vocal part-writing has little life; and his duets, terzets, finales, etc., are too much like part-songs. Another opera, 'Der Flüchtling,' was produced at Ulm in 1881, and 'Schön Rohtraut' in Dresden, Nov. 1887. Three later masses, 'Pilgerfahrt,' 'Sieg im Gesang,' for chorus and orchestra, and 'Musikalische Dorfgeschichten,' for orchestra, may also be mentioned. F. G.

KRETZSCHMAR, AUGUST FERDINAND HERMANN (b. Olbernhau, Saxony, Jan. 19, 1848; d. Gross-Lichterfelde, May 10, 1924), distinguished as a writer on music and as Joachim's successor as head of the Hochschule at Berlin (1909-20), was educated at the Kreuzschule at Dresden, where he was taught music by J. Otto, and was sent later to the Leipzig Conservatorium, where he was a pupil of Richter, Reinecke, Paul and Papperitz.

He took the degree of Dr.Phil. with a thesis on musical notation before Guido, and became in the same year, 1871, a teacher in the Leipzig Conservatorium. He conducted several musical societies, and overworked himself to such an extent that he was forced to give up Leipzig altogether; in 1876 he undertook the conductorship of the theatre in Metz; in 1877 went to Rostock as music director at the University, and from 1880 as town music director. In 1887 he succeeded H. Langer as music director of the Leipzig University, and conductor of a male choir. He soon became a member of various important musical institutions, such as the Bach Gesellschaft, and was made conductor of the Riedel-Verein in 1888. In 1890 he organised the Academic Orchestral Concerts, which had a successful career, with especial regard to historical programmes, until 1895. In 1898 he retired from his conductorships, but retained his professorship, and continued to give lectures on musical history. His compositions include only some organ works and partsongs.

He contributed critical work to the Musika- isches Wochenblatt, and the Grenzboten; published lectures on Choral Music, on Peter Cornelius, etc. One of his most useful undertakings is the Führer durch den Konzertsaal, the equivalent of our own analytical programmes, which began to be published in 1887, and have gone through many editions, being printed in separate portions in pamphlet form in 1898 and later. His collected essays (Gesammelte Aufsätze) appeared (1911), Geschichte des neuen deutschen Liedes (1912), Geschichte der Oper (1919), and Einführung in die Musikgeschichte (1920). He edited vols. viii. and ix. of D.D.T. He succeeded Joachim as director of the Berlin Hochschule in 1909.

KRETZSCHMER, FRANZ JOHANN KARL ANDREAS (called ANDREAS) (b. Stettin, Nov. 1, 1775; d. Anklam, Mar. 5, 1839), councillor of war at Berlin; musical theorist and composer of pianoforte pieces, songs, etc. He published, in conjunction with von Zuccalmaglio and Dr. Massmann, an important collection of German folk-songs; he also wrote an essay on musical theory (Q.-L.).

KREURÉ, CHARLES FRÉDÉRIC (b. Luneville, Nov. 5, 1777; d. near St. Denis, 1846), studied the violin, became conductor at Metz theatre, studied in 1800 under Rod. Kreutzer in Paris, and joined the orchestra of the opéra-comique as violinist, becoming 2nd conductor in 1805, and 1st conductor in 1816. He was pensioned Nov. 1828, and retired to his country house at St. Denis. He was a member of the Royal Chapel from 1814–30. He composed 16 operas, quartets, trios, violin duets, etc. (Fétis).

KREUSSER, GEORG ANTON (b. Heidingsfeld, 1743; d. Frankfort-on-M.¹ before 1811), studied under his brother Adam, the horn player, at Amsterdam, where he remained for some years as violinist; then went to Italy to study composition; returned in 1776, and became Konzertmeister in the Elector's orchestra, Mainz, before 1779. He gave a concert of his own compositions at Frankfort-on-M., Nov. 12, 1779, and a passion music, 'The Death of Jesus,' by Ramler, in 1780. He became Kapellmeister at the Frankfort theatre. Apart from his passion music, he composed symphonies, chamber music and songs (Fétis; Q.-L.).

KREUTZER, CONRADIN (b. Messkirch, Baden, Nov. 22, 1780; d. Riga, Dec. 14, 1849), German composer, son of a miller; chorister first in his native town, then at the Abbey of Zwiefalten, and afterwards at Scheussened. In 1799 he went to Freiburg in Breisgau to study medicine, which he soon abandoned for music. The next five years he passed chiefly in Switzerland, as pianist, singer and composer (his first operetta, 'Die lächerliche Werbung,' was performed at Freiburg in 1800); and in 1804 he arrived in Vienna. There he took lessons from Albrechtsberger, and worked hard at composition, especially operas. His first opera was 'Conradin von Schwaben' (Stuttgart, 1812), and its success gained him the post of Kapellmeister to the King of Württemberg; thence in 1817 he went to Prince von Fürstenberg at Donaueschingen; but in 1822 returned to Vienna and produced 'Libussa.' At the Kärthnerthor theatre he was Kapellmeister in 1825, 1829–32 and in 1837–40. From 1833–40 he was conductor at the Josephstadt theatre, where he produced his two best works, 'Das Nachtlager in Granada' (1834) and a fairy opera, 'Der Verschwander.' In 1840 he was appointed Kapellmeister at Cologne, and in 1841 conducted the 23rd Festival of the Lower Rhine. Thence he went to Paris, and in 1846 back to Vienna. He accompanied his daughter, whom he had trained as a singer, to Riga, and there died.

Kreutzer composed about thirty operas; incidental music to several plays and melodramas; an oratorio, 'Die Sendung Mosia,' and other church works; chamber and pianoforte music; Lieder, and partsongs for men's voices in Q.-L.; Fétis speaks of a one-act drama 'Cordelia' as the most original of his works. In his partsongs Kreutzer displays a flow of melody and good construction; they are still standard works with all the German Lieder- tafeln, and have taken the place of much weak sentimental rubbish. 'Der Tag des Herrn,' 'Die Kapelle,' 'Märznacht' and others are models of that style of piece. Some of them are given in 'Orpheus.'

KREUTZER,² (1) RODOLPHE (b. Versailles, Nov. 16, 1766; d. Geneva, June 6, 1831), violinist and composer. He studied first under his father, a musician, and a pupil of Antoine, son of John Stamitz, but he owed more to natural gifts than to instruction. He began to compose before he had learnt harmony, and was so good a player at 16, when his father died, that through the intervention of Marie Antoinette he was appointed first violin in the Chapelle du Roi. Here he had opportunities of hearing Mestrino and Viotti, and his execution improved rapidly. The further appointment of solo-violinist at the Théâtre Italien gave him the opportunity of producing an opera. 'Jeanne d'Arc,' three acts (May 10, 1790), was successful, and paved the way for 'Paul et Virginie' (Jan. 15, 1791), which was still more so.

The melodies were simple and fresh, and the musical world went into raptures over the new effects of local colour, poor as they seem to us. The music of 'Lodoiska,' three acts (Aug. 1, 1791), is not sufficiently interesting to counterbalance its tedious libretto, but the overture and the Tartars' March were for long favourites. During the Revolution Kreutzer was often suddenly called upon to compose opéras de circon- stance, a task he executed with great facility. In 1796 he produced 'Imogène, ou la Gageure indiscreète,' a three-act comedy founded on a story of Boccaccio little fitted for music. At the same time he was composing the concertos for the violin, on which his fame now rests. After the peace of Campo Formio (Oct. 17, 1797) he started on a concert-tour through Italy, Germany and the Netherlands; the fire and individuality of his playing, especially in his own compositions, exciting everywhere the greatest enthusiasm.

In 1798 Kreutzer was in Vienna in the suite of Bernadotte,¹ and acquired that friendship with Beethoven which resulted later² in the dedication to him of the sonata (op. 47) which will now be always known by his name—though he is said³ never to have played it—and he became 'first violin of the Academy of Arts and of the Imperial chamber-music'—titles which are attributed to him in the same dedication. He had been professor of the violin at the Conservatoire from its foundation in 1795, and on his return to Paris he and Baillot drew up the famous Méthode de violon for the use of the students. He frequently played at concerts, his 'Duos concertantes' with Rode being a special attraction. On Rode's departure to Russia in 1801, Kreutzer succeeded him as first violin-solo at the Opéra, a post which again opened to him the career of a dramatic composer. 'Astyanax,' three acts (Apr. 12, 1801); 'Aristippe' (May 24, 1808), the success of which was mainly due to Lays; and 'La Mort d'Abel' (Mar. 23, 1810), in three acts, reduced to two on its revival in 1823, were the best of a series of operas now forgotten. He also composed many highly successful ballets, such as 'Paul et Virginie' (June 24, 1806), revived in 1826; 'Le Carnaval de Venise' (Feb. 22, 1816), with Persuis; and 'Clari' (June 19, 1820), the principal part in which was sustained by Bigottini.

He was appointed first violin in the chapelle of the First Consul in 1802, violin-solo to the Emperor in 1806, maître de la chapelle to Louis XVIII. in 1815 and Chevalier of the Legion of Honour in 1824. He became vice-conductor of the Académie de Musique in 1816, and conductor in chief from 1817–24. A broken arm compelled him to give up playing, and he retired from the Conservatoire in the year 1825. His last years were embittered by the decline of his influence and the impossibility of gaining a hearing for his last opera, 'Mathilde.'

Besides his thirty-nine operas and ballets, all produced in Paris, he published:

Nineteen vln. concertos; duos, and two symphonies concertantes, for two vlns.; études and caprices for vln. solo; sonatas for vln. and vcl.; fifteen trios, and a symphony concertante, for two vlns. and vcl.; fifteen string quartets; and several airs with variations. (See Q.-L.) G. C.

Rodolphe Kreutzer is the third, in order of development, of the four great representative masters of the classical violin-school of Paris; the other three being VIOTRI, RODE and BAILLOT. His style, such as we know it from his concertos, is on the whole more brilliant than Rode's but less modern than Baillot's. Kreutzer did not require Beethoven's dedication to make his name immortal. His fame will always rest on his unsurpassed work of studies—'40 Études ou caprices pour le violon'; a work which has an almost unique position in the literature of violin-studies. It has been recognised and adopted as the basis of all scholastic execution on the violin by the masters of all schools—French, German or any other nationality—and has been published in numberless editions. In point of difficulty it ranks just below Rode's twenty-four caprices, and is generally considered as leading up to this second standard work of studies. P. D.

Kreutzer, on the testimony of Baillot (Art du violon, 1834, p. 183), and of A. L. Blondeau (Hist. Mus., 1847, ii. p. 161), was probably one of the greatest improvisers of his time. There is a medallion of him by Peuvrier (1823). M. P.

Rodolphe's brother, (2) AUGUSTE (b. Versailles, Sept. 3, 1778; d. Paris, Aug. 31, 1832), was a member of the Chapelle de l'Empereur and of the Chapelle du Roi (1804–30); and succeeded his brother at the Conservatoire, Jan. 1, 1826, retaining the post till his death. His son, (3) LÉON (b. Paris, Sept. 23, 1817; d. Vichy, Oct. 6, 1868), was musical critic to La Quotidienne; feuilletoniste to the Union; and contributed a number of interesting articles to the Revue contemporaine, the Revue et Gazette musicale and other periodicals. KREUZ, EMIL (b. Elberfeld, May 25, 1867), violinist and composer. Began to play at the age of 3, but did not begin to study for the profession until his 10th year (under Japha of Cologne). In 1883 he gained an open scholarship at the R.C.M., where he studied for five years under Holmes (violin) and Stanford (composition). During the last two years he made a special study of the viola, making his début with that instrument on Dec. 11, 1888, in the 'Harold in Italy' solo at a Henschel concert. He was soloist at Leeds Festival 1889, member of Gompertz Quartet 1888–1903, and of the Queen's Band 1900–3. He also played frequently at the Popular Concerts. In 1903 he joined the Hallé Orchestra in order to work under Richter. He left England before the war (1914). Amongst his compositions are a concerto for viola with orchestra, a trio for piano, violin and viola, op. 21, a prize quintet for horn and string quartet, op. 49, many songs and numerous pieces useful for teaching purposes. KŘÍČKA, JAROSLAV (b. Kelč, Moravia, 1882), Czech composer, choirmaster and professor at the Prague Conservatoire.

Kříčka entered the Conservatoire as a student in 1902, working at composition under Stecker. He belongs, however, to the group of musicians directly influenced by Vít. Novák. Leaving the Prague Conservatoire in 1905 he spent a little time in Berlin before visiting Russia. Fascinated by the artistic life of that country, he settled down for several years as professor of composition at the Music School at Ekaterinoslav. Kříčka was a great admirer of Rimsky-Korsakov, and this Russian period left its traces upon his earlier works. He returned to Prague in 1909, and quickly made a reputation as a choirmaster, directing the famous choral society 'Hlahol' until 1920. In the meantime he discarded external influences in his creative work and formed a clear personal style which deepens as time goes on. Kříčka enjoyed a happy childhood in beautiful surroundings, and in the companionship of a younger brother, Peter, now a poet of distinction. From this unspoiled past he has kept a simple and delightful humour which enables him to sympathise with children, for whom, and about whom, he has written charmingly and—what is rarer—appropriately. Although much of his music is optimistic, he is by no means without a shadow. In his later choral works he touches chords of tragic memory and profound human sympathy. He has also a sincere religious sense, which is finely expressed in his cantata for chorus, soli and orchestra, 'Pokušení' (The Temptation in the Wilderness). Kříčka's best work is lyrical and choral. His earlier song cycles 'Severní noci' (Northern Nights), containing the remarkable song 'The Albatross,' 'O lásce a smrti' (Of Love and Death), and 'Písň rozchodu' (Songs of Parting) would—if well translated—enrich the recital programmes of other lands. The later songs, including the 'Tři bajky' (Three Fables) and the 'Children's Songs' require more intimate interpretation. His overture to The Blue Bird of Maeterlinck is a happy inspiration. His short choral works are sung by all such Czech choirs as are equal to the demands they make upon the technical powers of the singers. Kříčka has only made one operatic essay: 'Hypolita,' based on a story from Maurice Hewlett's Little Novels of Italy, produced at the National Theatre, Prague, in 1917.

The following is a list of his chief compositions:

ORCHESTRAL: Symphony in D min., op. 3; 'Nostalgia,' for strings, op. 4; 'Věra' (Faith), symphonic poem, op. 6; Polonaise for Orchestra, op. 7a, and 8, Elegy on the Death of Rimsky-Korsakov; Children's Suite for small orchestra; 'Venkovské Scherzo' (Idyllic Scherzo); 'Adventus'; Overture, 'Modrý Pták' (The Blue Bird), 1912.
PIANOFORE WORKS: Intimate Pieces; Lyrical Suite, op. 30; 'Rozmar' ('Caprice'), op. 11.
CHAMBER MUSIC: Preludium for two violins and piano, op. 9; string quartet in D, op. 10; sonata for violin and piano.
CHORAL WORKS: Cantata, 'Pokušení' (The Temptation in the Wilderness), for chorus, soli and orch., op. 34 (1921-22); 'Zrození pramene' (The Fountain's Birth); 'Slovanská' (Slavonic); 'Koledy Vánoční' (Christmas Folk-songs), op. 22 (1917), for women's or children's voices; 'Zabělsky' (Gleanings), op. 26 (1917-1918), four choruses for mixed voices; 'Zornička' (Dawn-light), and other folk-songs and dances, op. 28 (1918-20), for male voice choir; 'Pozdrav' (Greeting), op. 31 A1 (1920), for mixed voices; 'Ve východní zemi' (In the Eastern Land), op. 31 A2 (1921), for mixed voices; 'Krutý Host' (The Grim Guest), op. 37 (1923), double chorus for male voices.

Song Cycles, etc.: 'Severní noci' (Northern Nights), op. 14; 'O lásce a smrti' (Of Love and Death), op. 15; 'Písň rozchodu' (Songs of Parting), op. 19; 'Tři bajky' (Three Legends), op. 21; 'Jaro pachtátko' (Spring, the Young Lad), op. 29, three recitatives for high voice and piano; 'Paměťník ze staré školy' (The Old Schoolhouse), op. 35, four songs for soprano.

KRIEGER, ADAM (b. Driesen in the Neumark, Prussia, Jan. 7, 1634; d. Dresden, June 30, 1666), was a pupil of Samuel Scheidt and Heinrich Schütz, and after being for a time organist at St. Nicholas, Leipzig, was appointed court-organist to the Elector of Saxony. He appears to have made an unsuccessful application for the post of cantor at St. Thomas's, Leipzig. He was poet as well as composer, and his compositions consist of so-called Arien on his own texts, songs for one, two, three and five voices with three or five-part instrumental Ritornelli between each verse. The Arias themselves have only basso continuo accompaniment, but are written in regular Lied form, while the Ritornelli have no thematic connexion with them. The original and complete edition of the Arien with their Ritornelli, published Dresden, 1676, has been republished in D.D.T. xix., with a valuable preface by Alfred Heuss. Specimens are given in the M.f.M. xxix.

KRIEGER, (1) JOHANN PHILIPP (b. Nuremberg, Feb. 26, 1649; d. Weissenfels, Feb. 6, 1725), travelled in Italy, and was for a while pupil of Johann Rosenmüller at Venice. Returning to Germany he was ennobled by the Emperor at Vienna, and after various wanderings entered the service of the Duke of Saxe-Weissenfels, first as chamber-musician and organist at Halle, in 1677, and afterwards as Kapellmeister at Weissenfels from 1712. For the Weissenfels court he wrote a quantity of Singspiele, the Arias of which for one, two and three voices were afterwards published with bass accompaniment only in two volumes published at Nuremberg, 1690, 1692. Specimens of them, with accompaniment written out, are given by Eitner in the M.f.M. xxix. Chrysander gives the titles of some operas of Krieger written for Brunswick-Wolfenbüttel in 1693, some of which were also performed in Hamburg in 1694. In 1693 Krieger published as his op. 2 an instrumental work consisting of twelve sonatas for violin and viola da gamba with cembalo accompaniment. The second and third of these sonatas are given in full by Eitner, M.f.M. xxix.-xxx. In 1704 there appeared also in Nuremberg 'Lustige Feld-Musik,' consisting of suites or 'Partien' (partitas) for four wind instruments (oboes and bassoons), or ad libitum for strings. Two of these 'Partien' are given in score by Eitner, who says of these compositions generally that they are so excellent in form and expression that one may unhesitatingly class them with similar works by Handel. Besides these published works by Krieger there exist a quantity of sacred compositions, arias for one, two, three and four voices, with various instrumental accompaniments, somewhat after the manner of Schütz, but of a lighter and more popular character. A selection is published in D.D.T. liii.-liv. Some of these are also given by Eitner, M.f.M. For a complete list see Q.-L.

(2) JOHANN (b. Nuremberg, Jan. 1, 1652; d. Zittau, July 18, 1735), younger brother of Johann Philipp, was for a time the pupil of his brother, and in 1672 became court organist at Bayreuth, which post, however, he gave up in 1677. After a transient connexion with Weissenfels he finally settled at Zittau, where in 1681 he was appointed town music-director, and in 1701 organist also at the church of SS. Peter and Paul. Johann is of greater importance in the history of music than his brother Philipp. Mattheson praises him specially as a composer of double fugues, and puts him beside Handel. Handel himself confessed how much he owed to Krieger. Eitner comments on his excellent gift of melodic invention, and the cleverness of his thematic work. His works are—

(1) 'Neue musicalische Ergetzlichkeit,' 1684. Part 1. 'Geistliche Andachten,' thirty numbers. Part 2 'Secular songs, thirty-four numbers.' Part 3 'Theatrical pieces performed in Zittau.'

(2) 'Sechs musikalische Partien,' Nuremberg, 1697. Suites for Clavier alone ('Nach einer Antiken Manier ausgesetzt').

(3) 'Anmuthige Clavierübung,' consisting of preludes, fugues, a chaconne and a toccata for pedal. Nuremberg, 1699.

It was this last work which Handel specially valued and recommended as a model for organ and harpsichord composers. It was one of the few musical works which he brought with him to England, his copy of which he gave to his friend Bernard Granville, who has recorded for us Handel's appreciation of the work.¹ Eitner considers the pedal toccata of this work as approaching the grand style of Sebastian Bach.² Besides these published works Johann Krieger left in MS. various organ works (specimens given in Ritter, Geschichte des Orgelspiels, Nos. 80, 81, and in D.D.T. (2nd series), xviii.), and a large number of sacred compositions for various combinations of voices and instruments, a full list of which is given in Q.-L.

KRIEGK, J. J. (b. Bibra, Merseburg, June 25, 1750; d. Meiningen, 1813), violinist at the court of Meiningen c. 1762, leader of Flemish opera, Amsterdam, 1773. In 1774 he accompanied the Marquis de Talleyfer to Paris, where J. L. Duport induced him to exchange the violin for the violoncello. After one year's study under that master he was for 4 years in the service of Prince Laval-Montmorency and thence went to Meiningen as chamber musician at the court, where he became a Konzertmeister in 1798. He composed 3 concertos and 4 sonatas with bass which belong to the better productions of that time for the violoncello (E. van der Straeten, History of the Violoncello).

KŘÍŽKOVSKÝ, PAVEL (b. Holasovice, in Bohemian Silesia, Jan. 9, 1820; d. Brno, Moravia, 1885). His baptismal name in the secular world was Karel. He was the first Czech composer whose technical grasp of his art, combined with deep penetration into the spirit of the folk-songs, enabled him to weld the two elements in a satisfactory way. He was therefore the true precursor of Smetana in national music, as the more famous composer gladly acknowledged when he observed that it was not until he had heard Křížkovský's choruses that he began to realise the full significance of the Czech and Moravian folk melody.

Křížkovský came of a family of poor but talented rural musicians who had suffered too many deprivations to wish that the boy should follow in their steps. He was forbidden to touch any musical instrument or even to speak about music. But once having heard High Mass in the Church of St. Mary at Opava, he escaped from home every Sunday and tramped the long distance between his village and the town. At first he only ventured to stand listening at the door leading into the choir, but as week after week went by he became familiar to the choristers, and one kind singer asked permission to bring him in and let him sit among the sopranos. Of course he was not intended to sing, but when the leading boy went astray in his solo, Křížkovský took up the part and sang it correctly to the end, much to the astonishment of the choirmaster. After this he was admitted to the foundation of the choir school. Extreme poverty hindered his career after his voice broke, but he managed at last to take the degree of doctor of philosophy at Brno University. Here he entered the Augustinian community of St. Thomas in 1845, and on the completion of his novitiate became a professor in the Divinity school at the head of which was F. Sušil, an assiduous collector of the Moravian folk tunes, who inculcated in the young monk a genuine love of the national music.

Křížkovský began to arrange some of the folk-songs for four-part male voice choir, and showed an aptitude for the work which delighted Sušil. Brother Pavel was sent to Prague to study music for six months. The director of the music in the church of the community was Bohumír Rieger (1764–1855), who helped and encouraged Křížkovský during his earlier years of study, and eventually resigned his post in favour of his pupil. Křížkovský therefore had a sound training and some Czech painter who in his travels has been an assiduous collector of the Slavonic folk-songs. The results of his labour have recently been published by the Hudební Matice, Prague, under the general title Slovanstvo ve svých zpěvech (The Slavs in their Songs); the volumes which have so far appeared deal with Russian, Czech, Moravian, Slovak, Slovene, Ruthenian, Serb, Croat and Montenegrin folk-songs. Before he became a painter Kuba studied music at the Organ School, Prague.

KUBELIK, JAN (b. Michle, near Prague, July 5, 1880), violinist, was born of Czech parents. When the young Kubelik at the age of 5 years expressed a desire to learn the violin, he received from his father, a gardener by profession and a keen amateur of music, a thorough training which laid an excellent foundation for the virtuosity exhibited in later years. In an incredibly short space of time he was able to play the earlier studies of Kreutzer, and in 1888 made his first appearance in public at Prague, playing a concerto of Vieuxtemps and pieces by Wieniawski. In 1892 he entered the Conservatorium, and was favoured by the circumstance that Ottakar Sevcík returned in the same year from Russia. Taking the youth in hand at the most receptive age, the professor saw his laboriously thought-out theories of violin teaching carried to a triumphant issue by his pupil, who, after six years devoted to hard practice under the Sevcík method, played the Brahms concerto, with his own cadenzas, at a students' concert given in the German theatre, and on the occasion of his final appearance as a student in 1898, gave a brilliant performance of the D major concerto of Paganini, with Sauret's cadenza, and was recognised by examiners and critics as a virtuoso player of the first rank. He was no less successful on the occasion of his first appearance away from home in the autumn of 1898, before a critical audience at Vienna. He then went to Budapest, and later made a prolonged tour through Italy, receiving, when in Rome, the order of St. Gregory at the hands of Pope Leo XIII. In 1900 he visited many continental cities, including Paris, and on June 18 of the same year made his London début at a Richter concert, giving also, during the season, five concerts of his own at St. James's Hall.

The moment was ripe for the appearance of such an artist as Kubelik. When it was perceived that he was able to execute the most dangerous flights of the virtuoso school with consummate ease and precision, there was a scene of wild enthusiasm; it was pronounced that the mantle of Paganini had fallen on his shoulders, and from that day to this he has secured crowded audiences whenever and wherever he has appeared.

His trip to America in 1902-03 produced remarkable financial results. He was less appreciated in Germany than elsewhere, but was the recipient of honours and decorations at several European courts. At Linz on the Danube he was once unable to appear through hostile demonstrations made by the anti-Czech population. In Hungary he married (Aug. 1903) the Countess, Czaky Szell, daughter of an ex-President of the Senate at Debreczin, becoming at the same time a 'Polgar' or naturalised Hungarian citizen. He visited Rome for the second time in 1905, and, in company with his wife, was received in audience by Pope Pius X. If his subsequent career has not quite equalled the brilliance of his first appearance, he yet holds an assured place as one of the foremost virtuosos of his age.

With regard to his technique, it may briefly be said that he possesses the complete equipment of the virtuoso player, but mention should be made of his exceptional facility in the playing of double harmonics. He has written three violin concertos, but has not achieved much success as a composer.

KÜCKEN, FRIEDRICH WILHELM (b. Bleckede, Hanover, Nov. 16, 1810; d. Schwerin, Apr. 3, 1882), composer. His father, a country gentleman, was averse to the musical proclivities of his son, and the boy had to thank his brother-in-law, Lührss, music-director and organist of Schwerin, for being allowed to follow his bent, which he did under Lührss and Aron in Schwerin, and as flute, viola and violin player in the Duke's orchestra there. His early compositions, 'Ach wie war's möglich dann' and others, became so popular that he was taken into the palace as teacher and player. But this did not satisfy him, and he made his way in 1832 to Berlin, where, while studying hard at counterpoint under Birnbach, he gradually composed the songs which rendered him famous. His opera, 'Die Flucht nach der Schweiz' (the Flight to Switzerland), was produced at Berlin in 1839, and proved very successful throughout Germany. In 1841 he went to Vienna to study under Sechter. In 1843 he conducted the great festival of male singers at St. Gall and Appenzel. Thence he went to Paris, where he studied orchestration with Halévy, and writing for the voice with Bordogni. His stay in Paris lasted for three and a half years; thence he went to Stuttgart, and brought out (Apr. 21, 1847) a new opera, 'Der Präbendent' (the Pretender), with the greatest success, which followed it to Hamburg and elsewhere in Germany. In 1851 he received a call to Stuttgart as joint Kapellmeister with Lindpaintner, filling the place alone after Lindpaintner's death (Aug. 21, 1856) till 1861, when he resigned. In 1863 he joined Abt and Berlioz as judges of a competition in Strassburg, and had an extraordinary reception. He composed sonatas for pianoforte and violin, pianoforte and violoncello, etc., but his immense popularity sprang from his songs and duets, some of which, such as 'Das Sternelein' and 'O weine nicht,' were extraordinarily beloved in their time. Almost exclusively, however, by amateurs and the masses; among musicians they found no favour, and are already almost forgotten. They were also very popular in England ('Trab, trab,' 'The Maid of Judah,' 'The Swallows,' duet, etc., etc.), and Kücken had an arrangement with Messrs. Wessel & Co. for the exclusive publication of them. G.

KÜFFNER, JOSEPH (b. Würzburg, Mar. 31, 1776; d. there, Sept. 8, 1856), studied law, then took up the violin and was member of the Würzburg court chapel from 1797. When Würzburg fell to Bavaria in 1802, Kuffner became a military bandmaster. He wrote an operetta, symphonies, overtures, chamber music, solo pieces, songs and pieces for military band (Q.-L.).

KÜHMSTEDT, FRIEDRICH (b. Oldisleben, Saxe-Weimar, Dec. 20, 1809; d. Eisenach, Jan. 10, 1858), composer. When 19, he left the University of Weimar and walked to Darmstadt (a distance of full 150 miles) to ask the advice of C. H. Rinck. The visit resulted in a course of three years' instruction in theoretical and practical music under that great organist. At the end of that time he returned to his family and began to write. His career, however, was threatened by a paralysis of his right hand, from which he never recovered, and which but for his perseverance and energy would have wrecked him. During several years he remained almost without the means of subsistence, till in 1836 he obtained the post of music-director and professor of the Seminar at Eisenach, with a pittance of £30 per annum. This, however, was wealth to him; he married, and the day of his wedding his wife was snatched from him by a sudden stroke as they left the church. After a period of deep distress music came to his relief, and he began to compose. As he grew older and published his excellent treatises and his good music, he became famed as a teacher, and before his death was in easier circumstances. He died in harness at Eisenach. His works extend to op. 49. His oratorios ('Die Auferstehung,' and 'Triumph des Göttlichen'), operas and symphonies are forgotten, but his fame rests on his organ works—his Art of preluding, op. 6 (Schotts); his Gradus ad Parnassum or introduction to the works of J. S. Bach, op. 4 (ibid.); his Fantasia eroica, op. 29 (Erfurt, Körner); and many preludes, fugues, and other pieces for the organ, which are solid and effective compositions. He also published a treatise on harmony and modulation (Eisenach, Börnker, 1838). G.

KÜHNAU, (1) JOHANN CHRISTOPH (b. Volkstädt near Eisleben, Feb. 10, 1735; d. Oct. 13, 1805). Coming to Berlin as school teacher in 1763, he took further lessons in harmony and musical composition from Kirnberger, and in 1788 was appointed cantor and director of the music at the Dreifaltigkeitskirche (Trinity Church) in Berlin. He did much to stimulate musical life in Berlin by conducting performances of the larger choral works. The only published work by which he has any particular claim to remembrance is his 'Vierstimmige alte und neue Choralgesänge mit Provinzial-Abweichungen,' the first part of which appeared 1786, and was followed by a second in 1790. His son, (2) JOHANN FRIEDRICH WILHELM, republished this Choralbuch in various editions from 1817 onwards, and in a compressed form, containing altogether 336 Chorals in four-part harmony. Eight of the tunes are by Christoph Kühnau himself. He also collected and edited a book of Choral-Vorspiele by various composers, including Emanuel Bach and Kirnberger. J. R. M.

KÜHNEL, AUGUST (b. Delmenhorst, Aug. 3, 1645; d. Cassel, c. 1700), one of the greatest German viola da gambists, whose claim upon posterity rests on the sterling merit of his sonatas.¹ He is said to have been a pupil in composition of Agostino Steffani. He was a member of the court chapel at Zeitz from 1661–1681. In 1665 he visited France to acquaint himself with the art of the French gambists. On his return he played at various courts with great success. He refused an engagement offered by the Bavarian court as it was conditional upon his conversion to Roman Catholicism. In Nov. 1685 he gave concerts in the City and at York Buildings, London, on the viol da gamba and the baritone, when he played his own sonatas, which were published in 1698. In 1686 he was Kapellmeister at the court of Cassel, where he remained to the end of his life. E. v. d. S.

KÜHNEL, AUGUST (d. Leipzig, 1684), court Kapellmeister at Zeitz about the same time as the above, their biographies often appearing confused. On Sept. 26, 1682, he was appointed organist of St. Thomas, Leipzig. E. v. d. S.

KÜHNEL, JOHANN MICHAEL (latter half of 17th cent.) virtuoso on the lute and bass viol, for some time at the court of Berlin. He went to Weimar in 1717 and afterwards entered the service of Marshal Flemming at Dresden. The latter part of his life he spent at Hamburg. He composed sonatas for 1 and 2 violas da gamba (1730). (E. van der Straeten, History of the Violoncello.) E. v. d. S.

KÜRZINGER, (1) JGNÄZ FRANZ XAVER, court Kapellmeister c. 1750 at Mergentheim (Württemberg). He composed 'David et Apollo' . . ., and eight 6-part symphonies for church or secular use, op. 1 (1758). His other compositions remained unpublished. He wrote also an instruction book for singing and for violin playing (Augsburg, 1763).

(2) PAUL (b. Würzburg, c. 1760), son of the former, showed early talent for music, but was destined by his father for the study of the law. Overcoming all obstacles, however, he entered the Munich court chapel and in 1773 achieved success with an opera, 'The Countess' (MS. now in Dresden Libr.). He intended to return to Würzburg, but finding no vacancy he went to Ratisbon, where he joined the chapel of the Prince of Turn and Taxis and wrote the music for the reception of the Emperor Joseph II., who was so pleased with his compositions that he engaged him for his court at Vienna, where he produced his operas, 'The Illumination' in 1792, and 'Robert and Calliste' in 1794. He wrote also some excellent church music, which was partly still in use during the latter part of last century; and secular songs. Kürzinger was still living in Vienna in 1807 as music director of an educational institute (Fétis; Mendel). E. v. d. s.

KUFFERATH, (1) HUBERT FERDINAND (b. Mühleim on Ruhr, Rhenish Prussia, June 10, 1818; d. Brussels, June 23, 1896), was the youngest of eight brothers, all musicians, and grew up in musical surroundings. As a child of 7 he was accustomed to tune the church organs of the neighbourhood, and played both piano and violin in public at a very early age. His eldest brother, Johann, director of the music-school at Utrecht, undertook to teach him, and eventually sent him to Cologne to complete his studies in violin playing and composition. At the Niederrheinische Festival of 1839 at Düsseldorf, he played a violin solo so much to Mendelssohn's satisfaction that the master urged him to go to Leipzig, where, after studying the violin under David, Kufferath took up the pianoforte, studying composition under Mendelssohn and Hauptman. In the winter of 1840 he played his capriccio for piano and orchestra at a Gewandhaus concert, and the piece was noticed by Schumann in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik. Kufferath was one of the band of brilliant students which included Bennett, Horsley, Verhulst, Eckert and Gade. On returning to Cologne in 1841 he became conductor of the Männergesangverein, and after spending some time as a travelling virtuoso, he settled in Brussels in 1844, where he was for some time conductor of the Choral Society, and, with Léonard and Servais, founded a regular series of chamber concerts, at which he played, alternately, pianoforte and viola. Schumann's concerted music was introduced to the Belgian public by this organisation, and Mme. Schumann occasionally took part in their concerts. The title of pianist to the King was conferred upon Kufferath by Leopold I. From 1872 until his death he held the post of professor of counterpoint and fugue at the Conservatoire; he wrote an École du Choral which is in use in Belgium and France. Among his pupils may be mentioned Charles de Bériot, Edouard Lassen, Franz Servais, Léon Jahin, Arthur de Greef and Edgar Tinel. Kufferath's works include a symphony, a piano concerto, a string quartet, a trio, many compositions for piano, books of songs, and an andante for violin and orchestra.

His son (2) MAURICE (b. Brussels, Jan. 8, 1852; d. there, Dec. 8, 1919) was a pupil of the two Servais for violoncello, took the degree of 'docteur en droit et en philologie' at the university, where a thesis on the theatre of Molière was rewarded with a prize. In 1873 he joined the staff of the Indépendance Belge and remained there until 1900. He was especially responsible for the articles on foreign politics, etc. Later on he contributed frequently to the Guide musical, and eventually became its editor and chief proprietor. Under his control the paper became known for its championship of the best modern tendencies in music. For the exhibition at Brussels in 1880 he wrote a report on musical instruments, and subsequently was sent by the Belgian Government to report upon the conditions of German and Austrian theatres. Among his literary works, the most famous are his interesting monographs on Wagner's later works, Les Maîtres Chanteurs, Lohengrin, Walkyrie, Siegfried, Tristan et Yseult, and Parsifal. Most of them have gone through many editions. Hector Berlioz et Schumann, and Henri Vieuxtemps are the subjects of two more volumes, and Kufferath translated into French certain famous books of Wagner, Richter, etc., as well as Wagner's letters to Roeckel; he wrote translations of the words of songs, etc., and of several operas, such as Mozart's 'Enlèvement au sérail,' etc. In 1900 he was appointed director of the Théâtre de la Monnaie with Guillaume Guidé. Under their direction the first complete performance of the Wagnerian trilogy in French took place, and the following operas were given for the first time: D'Indy's 'Étranger,' Ernest Chausson's 'Roi Arthus,' J. Albeniz's 'Pepita Jimenez,' and 'L'Ermitage fleuri,' Gilson's 'Captive,' and Block's 'Fiancée de la mer.' He was associated with Ysaÿe and Guillaume Guidé in founding the Ysaÿe concerts, was a member of the 'Comité de lecture des œuvres musicales,' a chevalier of the order of Leopold and of the Sauveur de Grèce, an officer of public instruction, and commander of the order of Alphonse XII.

BIBL.—L. BOLVAT, Notice sur M. Kufferath. Brussels, 1923.

The daughter of H. F. Kufferath, (3) ANTONIA (b. Brussels, Oct. 28, 1857), studied singing under Stockhausen and Mme. Viardot-Garcia. Her fine soprano voice and pre-eminently artistic singing were much admired at the Schumann Festival at Bonn in 1880, by which date she had made herself a name as an interpreter of Schumann and of Brahms's songs, etc., some of the latter of which were sung by her for the first time in public. She visited England in 1882, singing at the Popular Concerts, the Philharmonic, etc. On June 2, 1885, she married Edward Speyer, and retired from the regular exercise of her art. M.

KUGELMANN, HANS (d. 1542), said to have been born at Augsburg, was in 1519 trumpeter at Innsbruck in the service of the Emperor Maximilian, and afterwards as first trumpet-major and then Kapellmeister at Königsberg in the service of Duke Albert of Brandenburg and Prussia. In 1540 he brought out a harmonised Gesangbuch for liturgical use in the Lutheran Church, one of the earliest of the kind after Johann Walther's book of 1524. Its title is :

Concentus novi trium vocum ecclesiarum usui in Prussia praeceptis accommodati Neues Gesang mit dreym Stimmen dem Kirchlein und Schulen zu nutz . . . auch etliche Stück mit 8, 6, 5, 4 Stimm. hinzugegeben' (Augsburg, 1540).

It contains thirty-nine pieces, eight of them with Latin texts, including a Missa and Magnificat, mostly for three voices, thirty of them being the composition of Kugelmann himself. Towards the end there are a few more elaborate pieces. A complete Psalm by Stoltzer for five voices, another by Hans Heugel for six voices, etc. Kugelmann's book is the first source for the Choral-tunes, 'Nun lob mein' Seel' den Herrn' (of which there are three settings, a 3, a 5 and a 8), and 'Allein Gott in der Höh', this latter, however, being based on a Plain-song Gloria in Excelsis. Winterfeld, in his Evangelische Kirchenmusik, gives three of Kugelmann's pieces. J. R. M.

KUHE, (1) WILHELM (b. Prague, Dec. 10, 1823; d. Kensington, Oct. 8, 1912), was taught music by Tomaschek, with Schulhoff as a fellow-student. He made a concert tour with great success in 1844-45 at Linz, Salzburg, Innsbruck, Augsburg, Munich and Stuttgart. He visited London with Pischek in 1845, and played with success at the Musical Union in Mayseder's trio, op. 52, May 13. He then lived in England (London and Brighton) after 1847. Kuhe showed great enterprise by the annual festival held by him at Brighton from 1870-82, wherein he encouraged native talent by the new works composed at his instance and produced by him. He frequently appeared in London, where he gave an annual concert for many years from 1846. He was appointed a professor of the R.A.M. in 1886, a post he resigned in 1904. His numerous compositions include many drawing-room pieces, fantasias and studies, viz. 'Lieder ohne Worte,' op. 12; 'Le Carillon,' op. 13; 'Chanson d'amour'; 'Romance sans paroles,' op. 17; 'Le Feu Follet,' op. 38; 'Victoria Fantasia on National Anthem'; 'Fantasia on Austrian Anthem'; operatic fantasias, etc. In 1896 his Musical Recollections was published by Bentley & Sons.

His son (2) ERNEST is well known in London

as a musical journalist, on the staff of the Daily Telegraph.

KUHLAU, FRIEDRICH (b. Uelzen, Hanover, Sept. 11, 1786; d. Copenhagen, Mar. 12, 1832), a musician of some distinction in his day. He was born of poor parents, and had the misfortune to lose an eye at an early age. The loss did not, however, quench his ardour for music. During a wandering life he contrived to learn the piano and the flute, and to acquire a solid foundation of harmony and composition. He was, about 1800, in Hamburg, and previously in Brunswick. Germany was at that time under French rule, and to avoid the conscription he escaped to Copenhagen, where he became the first flute in the king's band. He then settled in Denmark, acquired a house in Lyngbye, near Copenhagen, to which he fetched his parents, composed half-a-dozen operas, was made professor of music and court composer, and enjoyed a very great popularity. In the autumn of 1825 he was at Vienna, and Seyfried¹ has preserved a capital story of his expedition to Beethoven at Baden with a circle of choice friends, of the way in which the great composer dragged them at once into the open air, and of the jovial close of the day's proceedings. Kuhlau, inspired by champagne and the presence of Beethoven, extemporised a canon, to which Beethoven responded on the spot, but thought it wise to replace his first attempt next morning by another, which is one reiterated joke on the name of his guest (and, whether intentionally or not, on the name 'Bach')— and was accompanied by the following note :

BADEN, September 3, 1825.

'I must confess that the champagne got too much into my head last night, and has once more shewn me that it rather confuses my wits than assists them; for though it is usually easy enough for me to give an answer on the spot, I declare I do not in the least recollect what I wrote last night. Think sometimes of your most faithful
BEETHOVEN.'

In 1830 Kuhlau suffered two irreparable losses—the destruction of the greater part of his manuscripts by fire, and the death of his parents. This double calamity affected his health, and he died at Copenhagen, leaving a mass of compositions, of which a few for flute and a few for piano are still esteemed. G.

KUHN AU, JOHANN (b. Geising, Bohemia, Apr.² 1690; d. June 25, 1722), a very remarkable musician, cantor of Leipzig, and one of the pillars of the German school of the clavier.

² Antizig Apr. 6, 1660.

As a boy he had a lovely voice and a strong turn for music. He was put to the Kreuzschule at Dresden about 1669, where he became a 'Rathsdiscantist,' and obtained regular instruction in music. On the breaking of his voice he worked the harder, and in addition to his music learned Italian. The plague in 1680 drove him home, but Geising was no field for his talent, and he went to Zittau and worked in the school, till the excellence of a motet which he wrote for the Rathswahl, or election of the town council, procured him the post of cantor, with a salary on which he could study at leisure. He began by lecturing on French. His next move was to Leipzig, in 1682, whither his fame had preceded him, and in that city of music he cast anchor for the rest of his life. In 1684 he succeeded Kühnel as organist at St. Thomas's. In 1688 he founded a 'Collegium Musicum,' or set of concerts. At the same time he was studying law, and qualified himself for the rank of advocate. In 1700 he was made musical director of the University and of the two principal churches, and in 1701 cantor. After this no further rise was possible. He left translations from Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Italian and French, and wrote satirical poetry of no common order. Of his works on music the following are named: Jura circa musicos ecclesiasticos (Leipzig, 1688); Der musikalische Quacksalber . . . in einer kurtzweiligen und angenehmen Historie . . . beschrieben (Dresden, 1700); Tractatus de tetrachordo; Introductio ad compositionem; and Disputatio de triade—the last three in MS. He wrote motets on Chorals, and other sacred pieces; but his clavier music is his glory, and he is the greatest figure among German composers for the clavier before Bach. He was the inventor of the sonata as a piece in several movements, not dance-tunes—the first of which, 'Eine Sonata aus dem B,' in three movements, is found in his 'Sieben Partien' (Leipzig, 1695). He followed this with thirteen others—'FrISChe Clavier-Früchte, oder sieben Sonaten' (Dresden and Leipzig, 1696); 'Biblische Historien nebst Auslegung in sechs Sonaten'—the last a curious offspring of the musician and the divine, and a very early instance of Programme music. J. S. Shedlock edited several of these quaint Bible sonatas for Novello & Co., and describes them fully in his Pianoforte Sonata. The whole set were published in the D.D.T., vol. iv., edited by K. Päsler. In addition to these he published 'Clavierübung aus 14 Partien . . . bestehend' (Leipzig, 1689)—a collection of Suites, that is, of dance-tunes. Becker has republished two of Kuhnau's pieces in his 'Ausgewählte Tonstücke'; and Pauer, who introduced several of them to the English public in his chronological performances in 1862 and 1863, printed a suite in his 'Alte Claviermusik' (Senff), and a Sonata in his 'Alte Meister' (Breitkopf).

KULLAK, (1) THEODOR (b. Krotoschin, province of Posen, Sept. 12, 1818; d. Mar. 1, 1882), was famous chiefly as teacher of the piano. His father held the post of 'Landgerichts-sekretär' at Krotoschin. He was first intended for the law, but preferred to devote himself to music. He was a pupil of Hauck from his eleventh year, having previously been under the tuition of Albert Agthe. In 1837 he went to Berlin to study medicine. In 1842 he became a pupil of Czerny, and in 1846 was made Hofpianist to the King of Prussia. He founded, in conjunction with Stern and Marx, a Conservatorium at Berlin in 1850; and in 1855, in consequence of some disagreement with his fellow-workers, he started a new institution under the name of 'Neue Akademie der Tonkunst' in the same city, where he resided until his death. He devoted his attention principally to the 'drawing-room' style of composition, and published many transcriptions and arrangements for the piano, which are very popular. Of his original works the following are the most remarkable:

Grand concerto in C minor for piano and orchestra (op. 55); Trio for piano and strings (op. 77); Duos for piano and violin, Balades, Boletos, etc., for piano solo. 'Les Étudeilles,' 'Les Danaïdes,' 'La Gazelle,' etc.; also collections of small pieces, such as 'Deux Portefeuilles de musique,' 'Kinderleben,' two sets of pieces (op. 81), 'Les Fleurs animées.' Among his later works may be mentioned 'Ondine' (op. 112), 'Concert-étude' (op. 121).

In 1877 he published a second edition of his 'Octave-school,' which is very valuable as an instruction book.

His brother, (2) ADOLF (b. Feb. 23, 1823; d. Berlin, Dec. 25, 1862), was a distinguished musical critic in Berlin, and wrote Das Musikalisch-Schöne (Leipzig, 1858), and Ästhetik des Clavierspiels (Berlin, 1861).

(3) FRANZ (b. Berlin, Apr. 12, 1844; d. there Dec. 9, 1913), son of Theodor, was educated in his father's Akademie, and produced some educational works as well as compositions. His opera 'Mes de Castro' was given in Berlin in 1877.

(4) ERNST (b. Berlin, Jan. 22, 1855), son of Adolf, became a well-known teacher of the piano and of composition in Berlin (Riemann).

KUMMER, FRIEDRICH AUGUST (b. Meiningen, Aug. 5, 1797; d. Dresden, May 22, 1879), a great violoncellist. His father (an oboist) migrated to Dresden, where the lad learnt the violoncello under Dotzauer. It was his ambition to enter the King's band, but as there was then no vacancy for a violoncellist, he took up the oboe, and soon attained such proficiency as to obtain the desired appointment, in Nov. 1814. In 1817 he again took up his original instrument, and in time became known as the most accomplished virtuoso in Germany. With the exception of occasional musical tours principally in Germany and Italy, his career was confined to Dresden. In 1864 he celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his appointment as a member of the Dresden orchestra, after which he retired on a pension, and was succeeded by F. Grützmacher. Kummer was a voluminous writer for his instrument. Of his works 163 have appeared in print, among which are Concertos, Fantasias, a good Violoncello School, etc. He also composed some 200 entr'actes for the Dresden Theatre. Among his many distinguished pupils, Goltermann of Stuttgart and Cossmann of Wiesbaden may be named.

His grandson, (2) ALEXANDER CHARLES (b. Dresden, 1850), was trained under David at the Leipzig Conservatorium, and lived for many years in London in high esteem as a violinist.

KUNC, JAN (b. Doubravice, Moravia, Mar. 27, 1883), composer, conductor, teacher and director of the State Conservatoire at Brno since June 1923.

He studied at the Organ School at Brno, under Leoš Janáček, passed his examinations in pianoforte and singing, and went on to the Conservatoire at Prague, where he worked first under Karel Stecker, and later under Vítězslav Novák for composition, and Kovařovic for conducting. He acted as musical critic for the leading Moravian paper, the Lidové Noviny, toured with his wife (a singer and also a pupil of the Prague Conservatoire) through Bohemia and Moravia (1918-19), was chorus-master and conductor at the Prague National Theatre (1919-20); appointed Secretary to the Brno Conservatoire, and, after it was taken over by the State in 1920, became successively Administrator and Director. Kunc is perhaps best known as a composer of choral works in the national spirit and as an interesting arranger of the folk-songs. But he has written in other styles, and his music is now beginning to be published in Czechoslovakia. His symphonic poem 'A Song of Youth,' op. 12, which won a prize offered by the Czech Academy, was produced at a concert of the Prague Philharmonic Society in 1920. Like many of his contemporaries, Kunc has found the urgent demands upon his services for the reorganisation of the educational life on a national basis a hindrance to creative activity. The following is a list of his principal works:

ORCHESTRA

Symphonic Poem for full orchestra, 'Píseň mládí' (Song of Youth), second prize of the Czech Academy of Arts.

CHAMBER MUSIC

Trio, op. 2, in F minor, for violin, violoncello and piano (MS.); String Quartet, op. 9, in G major, second prize of the Czech Academy (in the repertory of the Czech Quartet); A second String Quartet (still unfinished, 1923).

PIANOFORTE

Sonata in C minor, op. 1 (MS.) Nálady (Moods), op. 13; Miniatures, op. 19 (children's pieces, Paderlek, Brno).

CHORAL MUSIC

Male Voice Choruses, op. 4 (published separately by Fr. Urbánek, Prague, and by the Hudební Matice of the Society of Arts); 'Seventy-Thousand,' for chorus and orchestra, op. 8 (MS.); A KUNTZEN (KUNZEN). Three members of the family who bore this name, father, son and grandson, distinguished themselves as musicians of some consequence in their day. (1) JOHANN PAUL KUNTZEN (b. Leisnig in Saxony, Aug. 30, 1696; d. Mar. 20, 1757), whose father was a cloth manufacturer at Leisnig. While still attending the University of Leipzig in 1716, he was engaged at the Leipzig Opera, both as singer and instrumental performer. In 1718 he became Kapellmeister at Zerbst, and in 1719 at Wittenberg, where he established regular concerts. In 1723 he was invited to Hamburg as opera composer. In 1732 he was appointed organist to the Marien-Kirche at Lübeck, which post he held till his death. At Lübeck he also established regular concerts which may be considered as a continuation of the Advent Abendmusiken of Buxtehude. Mattheson speaks highly of his compositions (opera, oratorio, etc.), none of which, however, appear ever to have been printed.

(2) ADOLPH KARL (surname generally spelt KUNZEN), son of Johann Paul (b. Wittenberg, Sept. 22, 1720; d. 1781), early distinguished himself as a performer on the harpsichord and clavier generally, and made tours as a virtuoso, in the course of which he paid several visits to London. It was in London that his op. 1 appeared, 12 sonatas for the harpsichord, dedicated to the Prince of Wales. In 1749 he was appointed Konzertmeister to the Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, and in 1757 succeeded his father as organist at the Marien-Kirche, Lübeck, where he continued till his death. In his official capacity at Lübeck, as also previously in Schwerin, he produced a large number of Passions, oratorios and church cantatas (see Q.-L.). The library at Schwerin contains a large number of instrumental works by him (concertos, symphonies) and birthday serenatas for members of the ducal family. Besides the few for the harpsichord already mentioned, the only other works published by him are three collections of songs with accompaniment of figured bass only, 1748-56 ('Lieder zum unschuldigen Zeitvertreib').

(3) FRIEDRICH LUDWIG AEMILIUS (surname always spelt KUNZEN), son of Adolph Karl (b. Lübeck, Sept. 24, 1761; d. 1817), received his early musical instruction from his father, who in 1768 brought him to London, where, along with his equally talented sister, he appeared as a juvenile prodigy, playing in a concerto for two claviers. In 1781 he attended the University at Kiel for the study of law. There he made the acquaintance of Professor K. F. Cramer, a musical dilettante and writer, who encouraged him to devote himself to music. Giving up his legal studies in 1787, he obtained through Cramer's influence a minor post at the Copenhagen Opera, where in 1789 he produced his first Danish opera, 'Holger Danske' (Oberon), which the same year was also published in a piano score edited by Cramer. Shortly afterwards he went to Berlin, where, in conjunction with Reichardt, he edited a musical journal. In 1792 he was musical director of the theatre at Frankfurt, and in 1794 held a similar post at Prague. In 1795 he successfully produced his opera 'Das Fest der Winzer,' which also appeared in piano score. The same year he succeeded J. A. P. Schulz as director of the opera at Copenhagen, where he produced a large number of Danish operas. Most of these were published in piano score at Copenhagen. (For list see Q.-L.) J. R. M.

KUNTZSCH, JOHANN GOTTFRIED (d. 1854), one of those earnest, old-fashioned, somewhat pedantic musicians to whom Germany owes much; who are born in the poorest ranks, raise themselves by unheard-of efforts and self-denial, and die without leaving any permanent mark except the pupils whom they help to form. The 'Baccalaureus Kuntzsch' was teacher of the organ and clavier at the Lyceum of Zwickau when Schumann was a small boy, and it was by him that the great composer was grounded in pianoforte-playing. Kuntzsch celebrated his jubilee at Zwickau in July 1852, when Schumann wrote him a charming letter,¹ which his biographer assures us was but one of many. Schumann's studies for the pedal piano—six pieces in canon-form (op. 56), composed in 1845 and published in 1846—are dedicated to his old master, whose name is thus happily preserved from oblivion. Kuntzsch died at a great age.

G.

KUPSCH, KARL GUSTAV (b. Berlin, Feb. 24, 1807; d. Naumburg, July 30, 1846), demands a few lines as having been for a short time Schumann's instructor in the theory of music²—apparently in the latter part of 1830, after his accident to his finger. Kupsch was an average German Kapellmeister, and lived and worked in Berlin, Leipzig and Dresden as teacher, composer and conductor, till 1838, when he settled in Rotterdam as director of the Singing Academy, and one of the committee of the 'Eruditio musica' Society. In 1845 he returned to Germany, became director of the theatre at Freiburg im Breisgau, and at Naumburg, where he died.

KURTH, ERNST (b. Vienna, June 1, 1886), studied under Guido Adler, graduated D.Ph. 1908 with a thesis on Der Stil der Opera Seria von Chr. W. Gluck bis zum Orfeo (published in Adler's Studien) and, after holding a post at Wickersdorf in Thuringia, settled in 1912 as a teacher in Berne. He founded there his Collegium Musicum and received a professorship in 1920. He wrote in 1913 Die Voraussetzungen der theoretischen Harmonik, but his distinctive contribution to musical thought up to the present time is contained in two volumes, Grundlagen des linearen Kontrapunkts (1916) and Romantische Harmonik (1919). In the former he expounds his elaborate theory of 'linear counterpoint' as the result of a detailed examination of Bach's melodic style. Similarly the latter is based on the study of Wagner's 'Tristan.' Together these works are held to be an important landmark in the evolution of a modern theory of music based on the German classics.

C.

KURZ, SELMA, Austrian soprano, was famous as the chief lyric soprano at the court opera and the most popular singer in Vienna. Selma Kurz made her first appearance in London on June 7, 1904, at Covent Garden as Gilda in 'Rigoletto' and enjoyed nothing less than a triumph. As a singer pure and simple she made perhaps an even stronger impression when she played Oscar, the page in 'Un ballo in maschera,' the perfection of her shako astonishing half the singing-masters in London and provoking comparison with the most celebrated sopranos of the past. In other circumstances Selma Kurz would very likely have become a permanent attraction at Covent Garden, but though she reappeared in 1905 and sang in 'Rigoletto' with Caruso and Scotti, she was never a regular member of the company. Heard at Queen's Hall since the war, she sang as fluently as ever, with a quality of tone little impaired by time, but she was slightly uncertain in intonation.

KUSSER, see COUSSEY.

KUSSEVITZKY, SERGEI ALEXANDROVITCH (b. Tver, June 30, 1874), is famous both as a virtuoso of the double bass and as orchestral conductor.

Educated at the Philharmonic Music School in Moscow he first entered the Imperial Orchestra, but cultivating the double bass as a solo instrument he soon began to give recitals. He proved not only his complete technical command, but also that the musical qualities of the instrument were capable of unlimited development in the hands of a master. Kussevitzy's fame spread through Europe and his virtuosity was first shown to England in 1907, when he gave double-bass recitals at the Bechstein (now Wigmore) Hall. In the following year he returned, giving further double-bass recitals and conducting the LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA (q.v.) for the first time in a programme of Beethoven's works. This began an association which has been fruitful in many conspicuously fine performances both of Beethoven and of Russian orchestral music in the interpretation of which Kussevitzy excoels. Kussevitzy studied the methods of Nikisch in Berlin, but his genius as a conductor is of that intuitive kind which owes little to teaching. He formed an orchestra of his own in Russia with which he gave important symphony concerts in the great cities. He also founded a firm for the publication of Russian music. The revolution brought to an end his activities in Russia. Latterly he has conducted concerts in the capitals of Europe, and in 1924 was appointed to direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. (See BOSTON.)

KVAPIL, JAROSLAV (b. Fryšták, Moravia, Apr. 21, 1892), teacher and composer. He studied under Leoš Janaček at the Organ School, Brno, and immediately on completing his courses was appointed professor of organ and counterpoint. From 1911-13 he continued his education at the Leipzig Conservatorium, his teachers being Teichmüller (PF.), Max Reger (composition) and Hans Sitt (conducting). His diploma work consisted of Variations and a Fugue for Orchestra. Kvapil is at present professor of piano and composition at the State Conservatoire of Brno and conductor of the Brno Philharmonic Society. His works include:

2 Symphonies (A min., E maj.); a string quartet (G min.), a PF. trio, a PF. quartet; 2 violin sonatas, a violoncello sonata, a PF. sonata; many songs (some published by Hudební Matice, Prague) and piano pieces; a cantata for baryton solo, chorus and orchestra, etc.

KYRIE (Gr. Κύριε ἰλέησον; Kyrie eleison; 'Lord, have mercy').

(1) That portion of the Ordinary of the Mass which immediately follows the Introit, and precedes the 'Gloria in excelsis.' It is, historically speaking, the end of the litany which preceded the Mass. Originally Kyries were sung ad libitum, but in the early mediæval period the number was reduced to nine—a threefold 'Kyrie eleison,' a threefold 'Christe eleison,' and a threefold 'Kyrie eleison' repeated. The primitive music, as this history suggests, was very simple; but with the change in form came a change of music, and from the 9th or 10th century onward ninefold Kyries were composed, as St. Dunstan composed the 'Kyrie Rex Splendens,' or else adapted from older melodies. The next step was that the elaborate melodies were farced, i. e. provided with a set of words written so that a syllable went to each note; and from the incipit of these words they took their name. Similar tropes were inserted into other pieces of the services, but they dis-

When, after the invention of figured music, these venerable melodies were selected as themes for the exercise of contrapuntal skill, the Kyrie naturally assumed a prominent position in the polyphonic Mass; and at once took a definite form, the broad outlines of which passed, unaltered, through the vicissitudes of many changing schools. The construction of the words led, almost of necessity, to their separation into three distinct movements. Some of the earlier contrapuntists delighted in moulding these into canons, of excessive complexity. The great masters of the 16th century preferred rather to treat them as short but well-developed real fugues, on three distinct subjects, the last of which was usually of a somewhat more animated character than the other two.

(2) The Response, 'Lord, have mercy upon us, and incline our hearts to keep this law'; sung, in the service of the Church of England, after the recitation of the Ten Commandments.

As the custom of reciting the Commandments during the Communion Service is of later date than the First Prayer Book of King Edward the Sixth, in Merbecke's 'Book of Common Praier Noted' (1550) the old ninefold Kyrie is found in a simple form, borrowed from the Kyrie cited above. Dyce in his Book of Common Prayer with Plain Tune (1844) adapted this to the Kyrie of the present¹ Prayer Book, and his adaptation is in frequent use. The Kyrie provided by Merbecke for a burial was taken with less alterations from the melody which was used in the lesser Litany as well as in the Mass, and is probably the primitive form of Kyrie.

¹ The proposals for revision of the Book of Common Prayer issued in 1927 contain permissive use of the original Kyrie.

The treatment of the English Kyrie by the early composers of the polyphonic school was extremely simple and dignified; indeed, some of these responses, as set by Tallis (in the Dorian Mode), Byrd, Farrant, Gibbons and other old English writers, are perfect little gems of artistic beauty. LABITZKY, (1) JOSEF (b. Schönfeld, Eger, July 4, 1802; d. Carlsbad, Aug. 19, 1881), a well-known dance composer, was grounded in music by Veit of Petschau. In 1820 he became first violin in the band at Marienbad and in 1821 removed to a similar position at Carlsbad. He then formed an orchestra of his own, and made tours in South Germany. Feeling his deficiencies, he took a course of composition under Winter, in Munich, and in 1827 published his first dances there. In 1835 he settled at Carlsbad as director of the band, making journeys from Petersburg on the one hand, to London on the other, and becoming every day more famous. He lived at Carlsbad, and associated his son (2) AUGUST (b. Oct. 22, 1832; d. Aug. 28, 1903) with him as director from 1853. His second son, (3) WILHELM, an excellent violin-player, settled at Toronto, Canada, and his daughter was a favourite singer at Frankfurt.

Labitzky's dances are full of rhythm and spirit. Among his waltzes, the 'Sirenen,' 'Grenzboten,' 'Aurora,' 'Carlsbader' and 'Lichtensteiner' are good. In galops he fairly rivalled Lanner and Strauss, though he had not the poetry of those two composers. F. G.

LABLACHE, LUIGI (b. Naples, Dec. 6, 1794; d. Naples, Jan. 23, 1858), operatic singer. His mother was Irish, and his father, Nicolas Lablache, a merchant of Marseille, had quitted that place in 1791 in consequence of the Revolution. But another Revolution in 1799 overwhelmed him with ruin in his new country, and he died of chagrin. His family was, however, protected by Joseph Buonaparte, and Luigi at the age of 12 was placed in the Conservatorio della Pietà de' Turchini, afterwards called San Sebastiano.

Gentilli taught him the elements of music, and Valesi instructed him in singing; while, at the same time, he studied the violin and violoncello under other masters. His progress was not at first remarkable, for he was wanting in application and regularity; but his aptitude was soon discovered by a singular incident. One day a contrabassist was wanted for the orchestra of S. Onofrio. Marcello-Perrino, who taught young Lablache the violoncello, said to him, 'You play the violoncello very well: you can easily learn the double bass!' The boy had a dislike for that instrument, in spite of which he got the gamut of the double bass written out for him on a Tuesday, and on the following Friday executed his part with perfect accuracy. At this period his boy's voice was a beautiful contralto; his last use of it was to sing, as it was just breaking, the solos in the Requiem of Mozart on the death of Haydn in 1809. Before many months were passed, however, he became possessed of a magnificent bass, which gradually increased in volume until, at the age of 20, it was the finest of the kind which can be remembered, with a compass of two octaves, from Eb to e' 2.

Continually dominated by the desire to appear on the stage, the young Lablache made his escape from the Conservatorio no less than five times, and was as often brought back in disgrace. He engaged himself to sing at Salerno at 15 ducats a month (40 sous a day), and received a month's salary in advance; but, remaining two days longer at Naples, he spent the money. As he could not, however, appear decently without luggage, he filled a port manteau with sand, and set out. Two days later he was found at Salerno by the vice-president of the Conservatorio, while the impresario seized the effects of the young truant in order to recoup himself the salary he had advanced, but found, to his horror, nothing in the port-manteau but what Lablache had put there! ¹ To these escapades was due, however, the institution of a little theatre within the Conservatorio; and Lablache was satisfied for a time. A royal edict, meanwhile, forbade the impresario of any theatre, under severe penalties, to engage a student of the Conservatorio without special permission.

Having at length completed his musical education, Lablache was engaged at the San Carlino Theatre at Naples, as buffo Napolitano, in 1812, though then only 18. He made his début in 'La molinara' of Fioravanti. A few months later he married Teresa Pinotti, the daughter of an actor engaged at the theatre and one of the best in Italy. His young wife persuaded Lablache, not without difficulty, to quit the San Carlino, a theatre in which two performances a day were given, to recommence serious study of singing, and to give up the patois in which he had hitherto sung and spoken. Accordingly, a year later, after a short engagement at Messina, he went as primo basso cantante to the Opera at Palermo. His first appearance was in the 'Ser Mare-Antonio' of Pavesi, and his success was so great as to decide him to stay at Palermo for nearly five years. But the administration of La Scala at Milan engaged him in 1817, where he made his début as Dandini in 'Conerentola' with great success, due to his splendid acting and singing, and in spite of the provincial accent which still marred his pronunciation. Over the latter defect he soon triumphed, as he had over his want of application a few years before. It is said that at Naples he had enjoyed the great advantage of the society and counsels of Madame Méricofre, a banker's wife, known in Italy before her marriage as La COLTELLINI (q.v.). To such influence as this, and to that of his intelligent wife, Lablache perhaps owed some of the impulse which prompted him to continue to study when most singers cease to learn and content themselves with reaping the harvest; but much must have been due to his own desire for improvement.

The opera 'Elisa e Claudio' was now (1821) written for him by Mercadante; his position was made, and his reputation spread throughout Europe. From Milan he went to Turin; returned to Milan in 1822, then appeared at Venice, and in 1824 at Vienna, and always with the same success. At the last city he received from the enthusiastic inhabitants a gold medal bearing a most flattering inscription. After twelve years' absence he returned to Naples, with the title of singer in the chapel of Ferdinand I., and with an engagement at the San Carlo. Here he created a great sensation as Assur in 'Semiramide.' In 1829 we find him at Parma, singing in Bellini's 'Zaira.'

Although Ebers had endeavoured, as early as 1822, to secure him for London, on the strength of his reputation as 'perhaps even excelling Zucchini,' Lablache did not tread the English boards till the season of 1830, when he made his début on Mar. 30 in the 'Matrimonio segreto.' Here, as elsewhere, his success was assured from the moment when he sang his first note, almost from the first step he took upon the stage. It is indeed doubtful whether he was greater as a singer or as an actor. His head was noble, his figure very tall, and so atoning for his bulk, which became immense in later years: yet he never looked too tall on the stage. His strength was enormous. As Leporello, he sometimes carried off under his arm, apparently without effort, the troublesome Masetto, represented by Giubilei, a man of the full height and weight of ordinary men!

Like Garrick, and other great artists, Lablache shone as much in comic as in tragic parts. Nothing could exceed his Leporello; of that character he was doubtless the greatest known exponent. But he had, at an earlier date, played Don Giovanni. As Geronimo, the Podestà in 'La gazza ladra,' again, in 'La prova d'un' opera seria,' as Dandini and the Barone di Montefiascone, he was equally unapproachable; while his Henry VIII. in 'Anna Bolena,' his Doge in 'Marino Faliero,' and Oroveso in 'Norma,' were splendid examples of dignity and dramatic force. He appeared for the first time in Paris, Nov. 4, 1830, as Geronimo in the 'Matrimonio segreto,' and was there also recognised immediately as the first basso cantante of the day. He continued to sing in Paris and London for several years; and it may be mentioned that his terms were in 1828, for four months, 40,000 frs. (£1600), with lodging and one benefit-night clear of all expenses, the opera and his part in it to be chosen by himself on that occasion, as also at his début. The modest sum named above, in no degree corresponding with the value of Lablache in an operatic company, was a few years later (1839) the price paid by Laporte to Robert, to whom Lablache was then engaged at Paris, for the mere cession of his services to the London Opera.

In 1833 Lablache sang again at Naples, renewing his triumphs in the 'Elisire d'amore,' and 'Don Pasquale.' He returned to Paris in 1834, after which he continued to appear annually there and in London, singing in our provincial festivals as well as at the Opera, for many years. In 1852 he sang at St. Petersburg with no less éclat than elsewhere. Whether in comic opera, in the chromatic music of Spohr, or in that of Palestrina, he seemed equally at home. Let it be never forgotten that he sang (Apr. 3, 1827) the bass solo part in Mozart's Requiem after the death of Beethoven, as he had, when a child, sung the contralto part at a memorial service for Haydn; and let the former fact be a sufficient answer to those who say he had no notes lower than A or G. Be it recorded, at the same time, that he paid Barbaja 200 gulden for the operatic singers engaged on that occasion. He was also one of the thirty-two torch-bearers who surrounded the coffin of Beethoven at its interment. To him, again, Schubert dedicated his three Italian songs (op. 83), written to Metastasio's words and composed in 1827, showing thus his appreciation of the powers of the great Italian.

In 1856, however, his health began to fail, and he was obliged in the following spring to drink the waters of Kissingen, where he was met and treated with honour by Alexander II. of Russia. Lablache received the medal and order given by the Emperor with the prophetic words, 'These will do to ornament my coffin.' After this he returned for a few days in August to his house at Maisons-Lafitte, near Paris; but left it on the 18th, to try the effect of his native climate at his villa at Posilipo. But the bright, brisk air was too keen for him, and he had to take refuge in Naples. The relief, however, served only to prolong his life a short while, and he died Jan. 23, 1858. His remains were brought to Paris, and buried at Maisons-Lafitte.

Lablache had many children; one of his daughters married the great pianist, Thalberg. A Méthode de chant, written by Lablache, was published chez Mme. V^o Canaux, at Paris; but it rather disappointed expectation.

He was Queen Victoria's singing-master (1836-37),¹ and the esteem and even affection which that intercourse engendered are expressed more than once in warm terms in Her Majesty's published Diaries and Letters. J. M.

LACH, ROBERT (b. Vienna, Jan. 29, 1874), studied at the Conservatoire, 1893-99, with Robert Fuchs, and musical history and research under Wallaschek and Guido Adler. He graduated D.Ph. Prague in 1902. His studies in folklore and melody bore fruit in the papers contributed to the Sammelbände of the Int. Mus. Ges. In 1911 he became director of the musical department of the Vienna State Library; in 1915 a teacher of the University and in 1920 a professor. In addition to his important research work and his studies in the Wagnerian music drama, he has done much musical composition. He contributed to Adler's Handbuch, 1924, a chapter on Musik der Natur- und orientalischen Kultur-Völker. c.

LACHNER, a prominent musical family of the 19th century. The father was an organist at Rain, on the Lech, in Bavaria, very poor and with a very large family, a man of worth and character. He was twice married. One of the first family, (1) THEODOR (b. 1798; d. Munich, May 22, 1877), was a sound musician, but unambitious, who ended his career as organist at Munich, and chorus-master at the court theatre. The second family were more remarkable. Of the daughters, (2) THEKLA was organist of St. George's Church, Augsburg, and (3) CHRISTIANE (b. 1805) held the same post in her native place.

Of the brothers, (4) FRANZ (b. Apr. 2, 1803; d. Munich, Jan. 20, 1890) was solidly educated in other things besides music, but music was his desire, and in 1822 he prevailed on his parents to let him go to Vienna. He put himself under Stadler and Sechter, and was constantly in Schubert's company, with whom he became very intimate. In 1826 he was made vice-Kapellmeister of the Kärnthnerthor Theatre, and the next year, on the retirement of Weigl, principal Kapellmeister. He retained this post till 1834, and it was a time of great productivity. In that year he went to Mannheim to conduct the opera there, and in 1836 advanced to the top of the ladder as Hof-Kapellmeister—in 1852 general music director—at Munich, and there remained till 1865, when he retired on a pension. In 1872 the University of Munich gave him the honorary degree of Doctor of Philosophy. Lachner's writings are of prodigious number and extent. Two oratorios, 'Moses' and 'Die vier Menschenalter'; four operas ('Die Bürgschaft,' Pest, 1828; 'Alidia,' Munich, 1839; 'Catarina Cornaro,' Munich, 1841; and 'Benvenuto Cellini,' Munich, 1849); a Requiem; three masses; various cantatas, entr'actes, and other pieces; many large compositions for male voices; eight symphonies—among them those in D minor (No. 3), in C minor (op. 52)—which won the prize offered by the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde—and in D (No. 6), which Schumann finds twice as good as the prize one—seven suites, overtures, and serenades for orchestra, the orchestration of Schubert's 'Song of Miriam'; five quartets; concertos for harp and bassoon; a nonet for wind instruments, trios, duos, pianoforte pieces of all dimensions; and a large number of vocal pieces for solo and several voices. All that industry, knowledge, tact and musicianship can give is here—if there were but a little more of the sacred fire! No one can deny to Lachner the praise of conscientiousness and artistic character; he was deservedly esteemed by his countrymen almost as if he were an old classic, and held a similar position in the South to that of Hiller in the North.

The next brother, (5) IGNAZ (b. Sept. 11, 1807; d. Hanover, Feb. 24, 1895), was brought up to music, and at 12 years old was sent to the Gymnasium at Augsburg, where he is said to have had no less a person than Napoleon III. (then Count St. Leu) as a schoolfellow. In 1824 he joined his brother at Vienna, in 1825 was made vice-Kapellmeister of the Kärnthnerthor Theatre; in 1831 a court music-director at Stuttgart, and in 1842 rejoined his brother in a similar position at Munich. In 1853 he took the conduct of the theatre at Hamburg, in 1858 was made court Kapellmeister at Stockholm; and in 1861 settled down for good at Frankfurt, where he filled many musical positions, and retired in 1875. He also produced a long list of works—three operas ('Der Geisterthurm,' Stuttgart, 1837; 'Die Regenbrüder,' Stuttgart, 1839; and 'Loreley,' Munich, 1846); several ballets, melodramas, etc. etc.; with masses, symphonies, quartets, pianoforte works, and many songs, one of which—'Überall Du'—was very popular in its day.

The third brother, (6) VINCENZ (b. July 19, 1811; d. Karlsruhe, Jan. 22, 1893), was also brought up at the Augsburg Gymnasium. He began by taking Ignaz's place as organist in Vienna in 1834, and rose, by the same course of goodness and indefatigable assiduity as his brothers, to be court Kapellmeister at Mannheim from 1836-73, when he retired on a pension. He was in London in 1842, conducting the German Company. After his retirement he settled at Karlsruhe, where he taught in the Conservatorium from 1884. His music to Turandot, his prize song 'In der Ferne,' and other pieces, are favourites with his countrymen. G.

LACHNITH, LUDWIG WENZEL (b. Prague, July 7, 1746; d. Oct. 3, 1820), migrated to the service of the Duke at Zweibrücken, and thence to Paris, where he made his début at the Concert Spirituel as a horn-player. He was a clever, handy creature, who wrote not only quantities of all kinds of instrumental music, but at least four operas, and several pasticcios and other pieces. His most notable achievements, however, were his adaptations of great operas, by way of making them pleasant to the public, such as 'Les Mystères d'Isis,' for which both libretto and music of the 'Zauberflöte' were 'arranged' into what Fétis calls 'a monstrous compilation'¹ (Opéra, Aug. 23, 1801). No wonder that the piece was called 'Les Misères d'ici,' and that Lachnith was styled 'le dérangeur.' He was clever also at working up the music of several composers into one piece, and torturing it to the expression of different words and sentiments from those to which it had originally been set—as 'Le Laboureur chinois,' in which the music of 'several celebrated composers' was 'arrangée par M. Lachnith' (Feb. 5, 1813). In these crimes he had an accomplice in the elder Kalkbrenner, who assisted him to concoct two 'Oratorios in action'—'Saul' (Apr. 6, 1803), and 'The Taking of Jericho' (Apr. 11, 1805). We were as bad in England several years later, and many fine operas of Rossini, Auber and quasi-Weber were first made known to Londoners by much the same expedients as those of Lachnith, in the hands of T. P. Cooke, Lucy and others. G.

LACOMBE, LOUIS TROUILLOU (b. Bourges, Nov. 26, 1818; d. St. Vaast-la-Hougue, Sept. 30, 1884), entered the Paris Conservatoire under Zimmerman at the age of 11, and at 13 carried off the first piano prize. In 1832 he undertook a concert-tour with his sister, and in 1834 settled in Vienna, where he had lessons from Czerny, and studied theory, etc., with Sechter and Seyfried. From 1839 he lived in Paris, and devoted himself mainly to composition, writing numerous pieces for piano solo, studies, etc., a quintet for piano, violin, oboe, violoncello and bassoon, and two trios, his best-known pieces of chamber music; two dramatic symphonies—soli, choir and orchestra, 'Manfred' (1847) and 'Arva' (1850), as well as a melodrama with choruses, 'Sapho,' which received a prize in the Exhibition of 1878. The two operatic works performed in the composer's lifetime were 'L'Amour,' melodrama (Théâtre St. Marcel, Paris, 1859) and 'La Madone,' one act (Théâtre Lyrique, Jan. 16, 1861); the four-act 'Winklerod' was given Feb. 17, 1892, at Geneva; the two-act 'Le Tonnelier de Nuremberg' in Hugo Riemann's adaptation, as 'Meister Martin und seine Gesellen,' was given at Coblenz, Mar. 7, 1897, and the three-act 'Korrigano' at Sondershausen in 1901. A monument was erected to his memory in 1887 in his native town. In 1896 his treatise Philosophie et musique appeared. M.

LACOMBE, PAUL (b. Carcassonne, July 11, 1838), was taught harmony, counterpoint and fugue there by a former pupil of the Paris Conservatoire, an organist, François Teysserre. In 1866 he began to correspond with Bizet, and was his disciple until Bizet's death. Lacombe belonged to the group of composers whose desire was to reform French music after 1870. He has travelled in Europe, but resides in his native town. In 1901 he was elected 'corresponding member' of the Institut and was made chevalier of the Légion d'Honneur in 1902. He has produced more than 150 works—instrumental music, chiefly for piano, and songs. There are also some unpublished compositions. His first sonata for violin and PF. (1868) was played by Delaborde and Sarasate in 1869. A great many of his works have been performed at the Société Nationale de Musique, between 1872 and 1921. He also composed orchestral music: an 'Ouvverture symphonique' (Concerts Pasdeloup, 1876); 3 symphonies (the 3rd awarded the prize of the Société des Compositeurs de Musique, 1886); a suite for PF. and orch. In chamber music his important works are 3 sonatas (PF. and vln.), 1 sonata (PF. and vcl.), 3 trios, 1 quartet. His latest works are: 'Marche dernière' (orch.), 'Dialogue sentimental' (flute, bassoon and PF., 1917), 'Petite suite,' 'Deux pièces' (PF., 1922), 'Trois mélodies' (1922), 'Berceuse' (1924). Lacombe's music owes much to the romanticism of Mendelssohn, Chopin and Schumann. M. L. P.

LACY, FREDERICK ST. JOHN (b. Blackrock, Co. Cork, Mar. 27, 1862); studied at the R.A.M., of which he became Associate (1888) and Fellow (1911); member of the Philharmonic Society (1918); taught in London from 1886 to 1900; appointed lecturer in music at Queen's College, Cork, in 1906, and has been professor of music at University College, Cork, since 1908. He became examiner for musical degrees at the N.U.I. in 1909, and examiner in theory to the Intermediate Board of Education in 1922; Vice-President of the Cork Orchestral Union, 1905-09; President of Cork Literary and Scientific Society, 1915-17. In addition to various songs, partsongs, song cycles and sacred music, Prof. Lacy has composed a fine Serenade for Orchestra (op. 21), and a book of Irish tunes for Irish regiments. He is also well known as a lecturer. W. H. G. F.

LACY, JOHN (b. end of 18th cent.; d. Devonshire, c. 1865), bass singer, was a pupil of Rauzzini at Bath. After singing in London he went to Italy, where he became complete master of the Italian language and style of singing. On his return he sang at concerts and the Lenten oratorios, but although he possessed an exceptionally fine voice and sang admirably in various styles, circumstances prevented him from taking any prominent position. In 1818 he accepted an engagement at Calcutta, and, accompanied by his wife, left England, returning about 1826. Had he remained here he would most probably have been appointed successor to Bartleman.

Mrs. LACY, his wife, originally Miss Jackson (b. London, 1776; d. Ealing, May 19, 1858), appeared as a soprano singer at the Concert of Ancient Music, Apr. 25, 1798. In 1800 she became the wife of Francesco Bianchi, the composer, and in 1810 his widow. In 1812 she was married to Lacy, and sang as Mrs. Bianchi Lacy in 1812-15. She 'was the best representative of the great and simple style as delivered down by Mrs. Bates and Madame Mara, whilst her articulate delivery and pure pronunciation of Italian rendered her no less generally valuable in other departments of the art.'

LACY, MICHAEL ROPHINO (b. Bilbao, July 19, 1795; d. Pentonville, Sept. 20, 1867), son of an Irish merchant, learned music from an early age, and made rapid progress on the violin, appearing in public at 6 years old in a concerto by Jarnowick at a concert given at Bilbao by Andreossi. In 1802 he was at college at Bordeaux, and in 1803 was sent to Paris to finish his education, and attained to considerable skill as a linguist. Kreutzer was his principal instructor in music. About the end of 1804 he performed before Napoleon at the Tuileries. He was then known as 'Le petit Espagnol.' He played in the principal Dutch towns on his way to London, which he reached in Oct. 1805. He soon gave concerts at Hanover Square Rooms, under the sobriquet of 'The Young Spaniard,' his name not being announced until May 1807, when an engraved portrait of him by Cardon after Smart was published. He next performed at Catalani's first concert in Dublin, during a visit of Michael Kelly's opera company to Ireland, and was afterwards engaged for Corri's concerts at Edinburgh at 20 guineas per night. A few years later he quitted the musical for the theatrical profession, and performed the principal genteel comedy parts at the theatres of Dublin, Edinburgh, Glasgow, etc. In 1818 he was appointed leader of the Liverpool concerts vice Janiewicz, and at the end of 1820 returned to London and was engaged as leader of the ballet at the King's Theatre. Lacy adapted to the English stage both words and music of several popular operas; and his adaptations display great skill, although gross liberties were frequently taken with the original pieces, which can only be excused by the taste of the time. Among them are

'The Mads of Judah' from Ivanhoe, the music from 'Semitramide,' 1829; 'Cinderella,' the music from Rossini's 'Cenerentola,' Armida, 'Maometto Secondo,' and 'Guillaume Tell,' 1830; 'Fra Diavolo,' 1831; and 'Robert le Diable,' under the title of 'The Fiend Father,' 1832.

In 1833 he produced an oratorio entitled 'The Israelites in Egypt,' a pasticcio from Rossini's 'Mosè in Egitto,' and Handel's 'Israel in Egypt,' which was performed with scenery, dresses, and personation. In 1839 he brought forward a readaptation of Weber's 'Der Freischütz,' introducing the whole of the music for the first time. He rendered great assistance to Schœlcher in collecting the material for his Life of Handel.

LADURNER, (1) IGNAZ ANTON (b. Aldein, Tirol, Aug. 1, 1766; d. Massy, Seine-et-Oise, Mar. 4, 1839), eldest son of Franz Xavier, educated at the monastery of Benediktbeuern. From 1782-84 he filled his father's post as organist. He made further studies at Munich and went with a countess of Heimhausen to Bar-le-Duc. He was succeeded in the latter appointment by his younger brother. In July 1788 he went to Paris as composer and teacher, became professor at the Conservatoire, and teacher of Auber and Boëly. He retired to his country seat near Massy in 1836. Ladurner composed 2 operas, sonatas for PF. and for violin, divertissements, variations, etc.

His younger brother, (2) JOSEPH ALOYS (b. Algnud, Mar. 7, 1769; still living in 1835), was court chaplain, councillor of the consistory, etc., at Brixen. He was a talented composer of church music. (Works in Q.-L.)

LADY HENRIETTE, OU LA SERVANTE DE GREENWICH, see MARTHA.

LÄNDLER, LÄNDERER, OR LÄNDLERISCHE TANZ, a national dance popular in Austria, Bavaria, Bohemia and Styria. It probably derives its name from the Landel, a district in the valley of the Enns, where the dance is said to have had its origin; but according to some authorities the word simply means 'country dance,' i.e. a waltz danced in a country fashion. In fact the Ländler is a homely waltz, and only differs from the waltz in being danced more slowly. It is in 3-4 or 3-8 time, and consists of two parts of eight bars, each part being repeated two or more times. Like most early dances, it occasionally has a vocal accompaniment. Both Mozart (Köchel, No. 606) and Beethoven (Nottebohm's Cat. pp. 150, 151) have written genuine Ländler, but the compositions under this name of Jensen, Raff, Reinecke and other modern musicians have little in common with the original dance. The following example is the first part of a Styrian

Ländler (Köhler, Volkslänze: Brunswick, 1854):

The little waltz so well known as 'Le Désir,' usually attributed to Beethoven, though really composed by Schubert, is a Ländler. To know what grace and beauty can be infused into this simple form one must hear Schubert's 'Wiener Damen-Ländler' or 'Belles Viennoises' in their unsophisticated form, before they were treated by Liszt.

LAFONT, CHARLES PHILIPPE (b. Paris, Dec. 1, 1781; d. Aug. 23, 1839), an eminent violinist.

Fétis relates that he got his first instruction on the violin from his mother, a sister of Berthoume, a well-known violinist of that period, whom he also accompanied on his travels through Germany, performing successfully, when only 11 years of age, at Hamburg, Oldenburg and other towns. On his return to Paris he continued his studies under Kreutzer; and soon appeared at the Théâtre Feydeau, though not as a violinist, but as a singer of French ballads. After some time he again took up the violin, this time under the tuition of Roda, and soon proved himself a player of exceptional merit. Fétis credits him with a perfect intonation, a pure and mellow, though somewhat feeble tone, great powers of execution, and a remarkable charm of expression. From 1801–08 he travelled and played with great success in France, Belgium, Holland, Germany and Russia. In 1808 he was appointed Roda's successor as solo-violinist to the Emperor of Russia, a position in which he remained for six years. In 1815 he returned to Paris, and was appointed solo violinist to Louis XVIII. In 1816 he had a public contest with Paganini at Milan. (See PAGANINI for that artist's comment on the occasion.) In 1831 he made a long tour with Henri Herz, the pianist, which occupied him till 1839, when his career was suddenly ended by a carriage accident in the south of France, through which he lost his life.

Spohr, in his Selbstbiographie, praises his fine tone, perfect intonation, energy and gracefulness, but deplors the absence of deep feeling, and accuses him of mannerism in phrasing. He also relates that Lafont's repertory was confined to a very few pieces, and that he would practise a concerto for years before venturing on it in public—a method which, although leading to absolute mechanical perfection, appears absurd from an artistic or even musical point of view. Lafont's compositions for the violin are of no musical value; they comprise seven concertos, a number of fantasias, rondos, etc. He wrote a number of duos concertants in conjunction with Kalkbrenner, Herz, etc.; more than 200 ballads (romances), which for a time were very popular; and two operas. LAGARDE, N. DE (mid. 18th cent.), an excellent French singer and master of the children of the French Chapel Royal. He composed operettas, brunettes, aires, suites of songs with instruments, etc. (published 1742–1766).

LAGÉ (Ger.) = 'position,' used (1) of the positions in violin-playing (see FINGERING), and (2) of the positions of chords in harmony which in English are called INVERSIONS.

LAGKHNER, DANIEL (16th–17th cent.), of Marchburg, Styria, organist to Count Losenstein at Losdorf c. 1607. He composed motets 4–8 v. and other church music; also secular songs (published c. 1601–28) (Q.-L.).

LA GROTTÉ, NICOLAS DE, see GROTTÉ.

LAGUERRE, JEAN (b. circa 1700; d. London, 1748), commonly called Jack, was the son of Louis Laguerre, the artist who painted the greater part of Verrio's large picture in St. Bartholomew's Hospital, the 'Labours of Hercules' in chiaroscuro at Hampton Court, the staircase at Wilton, etc., and is immortalised by Pope in the line

'Where sprawl the saints of Verrio and Laguerre.'

This painter came to England in 1683, and died in 1721, his son Jean having, as it is supposed, been born about 1700. The lad was instructed by his father for his own profession, and had already shown some ability; but, having a talent for music, he took to the stage, where he met with fair success. He sang at concerts in 1723–25. It must be he whom we find, under the name of Mr. Legar,¹ playing the part of Metius in 'Camilla' (revived), 1726, which had formerly (1706 and 1708) been sung by Ramond, a low tenor. Again, he is advertised (Daily Journal, Mar. 13, 1731) as sustaining the added rôle of Corydon in 'Acis and Galatea,'² for the benefit of M. Rochetti, at Lincoln's Inn, Theatre Royal, on Friday 26th, his name being spelled as in the cast of 'Camilla.' In 1737 he sang in Capt. Breval's 'Rape of Helen' the part of Mercury, when his name was correctly spelled in the cast.

post of organist at Holy Trinity Church, Brompton, from 1847-74, and was well known also as a professor and composer. Lahee was the victor in various prize competitions for glees and madrigals: in 1869 with 'Hark, how the birds' (Bristol); in 1878, with 'Hence, loathed Melancholy' (Manchester); in 1879, with 'Away to the hunt' (Glasgow); and in 1880 and 1884, with 'Love in my bosom' and 'Ah! woe is me' (London Madrigal Society). Equally good work can be seen in his other choral songs, such as 'The Unfaithful Shepherdess,' 'Love me little, love me long,' and the popular 'Bells,' and in his anthems no less than in his various songs and instrumental pieces.

Good taste is shown by this composer in the choice of his words, and he has found Longfellow congenial with his musical style. The cantata 'The Building of the Ship' was written in 1869 for John Curwen, who desired a work of moderate difficulty for the use of Tonic-Sol-faists. It was performed on a large scale in the Hanover Square Rooms, attained considerable popularity in the provinces, and made its way to Africa and America. The subject of another cantata, Tennyson's 'The Sleeping Beauty,' afforded Lahee scope for a greater variety of treatment, and contains some graceful writing for female voices. It has been heard on the Continent and in America. L. M. M.

LA HÈLE, GEORGES DE, secò HÈLE.

LAHOUSAYE, PIERRE (b. Paris, Apr. 12, 1735; d. there, 1818), became a distinguished violinist much patronised by the nobility, and made a tour in Italy, where he was given a post by the Prince of Monaco. He spent the years 1770-75 in London, as director of the Italian opera,¹ and returned to Paris, where in 1779 he was given the direction of the Concert Spirituel, in 1781 that of the Comédie Italienne, and in 1790 that of the Théâtre de Monsieur, afterwards the Théâtre Feydeau. He was also professor in the Conservatoire. He died in Paris in the latter part of 1818. (Q.-L.)

LAIDLAW, ROBENA ANNA,² (b. Bretton, Yorks, Apr. 30, 1819; d. London, May 29, 1901), pianist, a lady whom Schumann distinguished by dedicating to her his 'Fantasiestücke' (op. 12), was educated at Edinburgh at the school of her aunt, and in music by Robert Müller, a pianoforte teacher there. Her family went to Königsberg in 1830, and there her vocation was decided, she improved in playing rapidly, and in three or four years appeared in public at Berlin with great applause. In 1834 she was in London studying under Herz, and played at Paganini's farewell concert. In 1836 she returned to Berlin, and played at a Gewandhaus concert in Leipzig on July 2, 1837. Soon afterwards she received the dedication of the 'Fantasiestücke,'³ and made the acquaintance of the composer. After a lengthened tour through Prussia, Russia and Austria, she returned in 1840 to London. She was appointed in that year pianist to the Queen of Hanover. In 1855 she married a Mr. Thomson, and retired. G.

LAJARTE, THÉODORE ÉDOUARD DUFAURE DE (b. Bordeaux, July 10, 1826; d. Paris, June 20, 1890), French writer on music, was a pupil of Leborne at the Paris Conservatoire, and in early life wrote a good many small operettas ('Monsieur de Floridor,' 1 act, Opéra-Comique, Oct. 11, 1880; 'Les Deux Jumeaux de Bergegame,' ballet, Opéra, Jan. 26, 1886), but was best known for his works on musical history. He published Bibliothèque musicale du Théâtre de l'Opéra (2 vols. 1876-79), a very important catalogue of the operas produced at the Opéra in Paris, with annotations based upon the archives of the institution; Instruments Sax et fanfares civiles (1867); a Traité de composition musicale (in collaboration with Bisson, 1880); a collection of 'Airs à danser' from Lully to Méhul, and a number of old operas and ballets in vocal score, in nine series, comprising in all forty compositions, under the title of Chefs-d'œuvre classiques de l'Opéra français (Paris); Curiosités de l'Opéra (1883).⁴ He was sub-librarian of the Opéra from 1873 to 1890. G. F.; rev. M. L. P.

LAKMÉ, opéra-comique in 3 acts, words by Goudinet and Gille; music by Delibes; produced Paris, Apr. 14, 1883; London, Gaiety Theatre, June 6, 1885; New York, Academy of Music, Mar. 1, 1886.

LALANDE, DESIRÉ ALFRED (b. Paris, Dec. 5, 1866⁵; d. London, Nov. 8, 1904), a distinguished oboe-player, being the son of a well-known bassoon-player. After studying for two and a half years at the Conservatoire he obtained his first important engagement under Lamoureux in that conductor's famous band. He came to England in 1886, joined the Hallé orchestra, and played in Manchester for five years. He next joined the Scottish Orchestra when conducted by Henschel, and subsequently became a member of the Queen's Hall orchestra, with which organisation he played till his death in London from pneumonia. It was during this latter part of his career that he may be said to have established his reputation completely as one of the most gifted instrumental players of his time, possessing, as he did, a beautiful tone, great powers of refined expression, and a perfect technique. He was also constantly in request for cor anglais solos. N. C. G.

near Paris, Sept. 7, 1867), operatic singer, daughter of Lamirault-Lalande, the chief of a provincial operatic company.

She made her début with success in 1814 at Naples: Fétis heard her, and admired her as an actress of opéra-comique, at Douai in the following year. She continued to sing till 1822, with equal success, in the principal towns of France, and was then engaged at the Gymnase Dramatique at Paris, Ebers having made an unsuccessful attempt to engage her for London. Clever enough to perceive, however, after hearing the singers at the Italian Opera, how utterly she was without the knowledge of the proper manner of producing her voice, she took lessons of Garcia, and made her first appearance, Apr. 3, 1823, in 'Les Folies amoureuses,' a pasticcio arranged by Castil-Blaze. About this time she became the wife of Méric, a horn-player at the Opéra-Comique. Rejecting the offer of an engagement at the latter theatre, on Garcia's advice she went to Italy, and received additional teaching from Bonfichi and Banderali at Milan. After singing with increased éclat at Venice, Munich, Brescia, Cremona, Venice (again), and other Italian cities, she at length appeared in London during the season of 1830.

* She arrived in England too late, and her place, moreover, had been filled by women of greater genius. She was a good musician, and sang with taste; but her voice, a soprano, ere she came had contracted a habit of trembling, in those days a novelty (would it had always remained so!), to which English ears were then averse. She gave little satisfaction.¹

Mme. Méric sang again in London in 1831. In Paris she pleased no better in these latter years, and at length retired, in 1833, as it is said, to Spain. A biography, with a portrait, of Mme. Méric-Lalande was published in the musical journal, Teatro della Fenice, Venice, 1826.

J. M.

LALANDE, MICHEL RICHARD DE (b. Paris, Dec. 15, 1657; d. Versailles, June 18, 1726), surintendant de la musique under Louis XIV. and XV., the best French writer of church music of his day. He spent forty-five years in the service of the court.

He was the fifteenth child of a tailor, and was at first a chorister of St. Germain l'Auxerrois, where he studied music under Chaperon, and learnt, almost entirely by himself, to play the violin, bass viol and harpsichord. When, on the breaking of his voice at the age of 15, he was obliged to leave the maîtrise, he bethought himself of turning his violin-playing to account, and applied for admission into Lully's orchestra. He was refused, and swore out of pique never to touch the violin again. He gave himself up to the organ, and made such progress that he was soon appointed organist of three different churches in Paris—St. Jean en Grève, Petit St. Antoine and the Jesuits of the Maison Professe, who confided to him the composition of symphonies and choruses for several of the tragedies performed at their college. He soon afterwards applied for the post of organist to the king, but though Lully pronounced him to be the best of the competitors he was refused on account of his youth. He was recommended by the Maréchal de Noailles, to whose daughters he taught music, to Louis XIV., and the king chose him to superintend the musical education of the princesses, afterwards the Duchesse d'Orléans and Madame la Duchesse. Lalande was so successful in this capacity that the king appointed him master of his chamber music; and in 1683, on the retirement of Henry du Mont and Robert from the superintendence of the chapelle, he obtained one of the appointments, for it was decided to appoint four officers to serve for three months by turns. Eventually the offices were united in the person of Lalande, who had now received several pensions and the cordon of the order of St. Michel. In 1684 the king had given him a wife, Anne Rebel, said to be the best singer of the court, had paid the expenses of the wedding, and given a dowry to the bride. In 1722, having lost his wife, and two gifted daughters, who died of smallpox in the same year as the Dauphin (1711), Lalande begged the king to allow him to remit three-quarters of his salary, thus returning to the original arrangement. He presented as his substitutes and assistants Campra, Bernier and Gervais. As a reward for his disinterested conduct the regent granted him a pension of 3000 livres. In the following year he married again—Mlle. de Cury, daughter of one of the Princesse de Conti's surgeons—and died three years later at the age of 68.

The cause of Lalande's superiority over his immediate rivals was that he knew how to adapt to French tastes the forms of concerted church music hitherto confined to the Italian school, and his compositions, besides possessing real imagination, show that, like the musicians of Lully's school, he gave special attention to declamation and to the proper agreement between words and music. He wrote no fewer than 42 motets for chorus and orchestra for the chapel at Versailles, which were published most luxuriously at the king's expense. They are contained in 20 books, and are usually found bound in 10 volumes. A copy in 7 volumes, containing in all 21 books (42 motets), is preserved (apparently the only copy known) in the Fitzwilliam Museum.² He did not contribute so much as is generally supposed to the ballet of 'Les Élémens,' by Destouches (Tuileries, Dec. 22, 1721; Académie de Musique, May 29, 1725), his portion being confined to a few pieces in the prologue. He wrote music for the heroic pastoral 'Mélécerte' (1698), begun by Molière and altered by Guérin.

He composed various works for the court theatres: a cantata called 'La Concert d'Esculape,' 1683; the 'Ballet de la jeunesse' (Versailles, 1686); 'Ballet de Flore, ou le Trianon,' 1689; 'Adonis' and 'Mirtil,' 1698; 'Ballet des fées,' 1699; 'L'Amour fléchi par la Constance' (Fontainebleau, 1697); 'L'Hymen champêtre,' 1700; 'Ballet de la paix,' 1713; 'Les Folies de Cardenio' (Tuileries, 1720); 'Ballet de l'inconnu,' Paris, 1720. He also composed 'Trois leçons de Ténébres miserere' for solo voice; 'Musique pour les soupers du Roy' (Collection Philidor). Fétis is of opinion that Lalonde worked at several operas without allowing anything to be represented under his own name, and gives as his authority Titon du Tillet, to whom we owe the biographical details of Lalonde; but du Tillet does not mention it in his article on Lalonde in the Parnasse Française (See The Age of Bach and Handel, Oxf. Hist. Mus. pp. 290-98, etc.)

LALLA ROOKH. Moore's poem has been the basis of a number of musical compositions.

1. An opera poem adapted by J. O'Sullivan, music by C. E. Horn, Dublin, June 4, 1818.

2. Spontini wrote introductory and incidental music for a set of tableaux vivants in Berlin, Jan. 27, 1821.

3. Opera, called 'Nurmahal,' to a libretto by Herklot in 2 acts, Berlin, May 27, 1822.

4. Opera in 2 acts ('Lalla Rookh'), words by Lucas and Carré, music by Félicien David, produced Opéra-Comique, May 12, 1862.

5. An opera in 2 acts by Anton Rubinstein (name afterwards changed to 'Feramors'), produced Dresden, March 1863.

6. Cantata, by Frederic Clay, produced Brighton Festival, 1877.

LALLOUETTE, JEAN-FRANÇOIS (b. Paris, c. 1651; d. Versailles, Sept. 1, 1728¹), pupil of Lully (composition) and Guy Leclerc (violin). He is said to have orchestrated and written the recitatives for some of Lully's operas. He was violinist and afterwards conductor at the Opéra (1668-77), but was dismissed for having claimed collaboration in Lully's 'Isis.' He then became maître de chapelle of Rouen Cathedral, and in 1695 of Notre Dame, Versailles. He composed one or more masses, 2 books of motets, some Misereres, as well as interludes and ballets for the opera.

LALO, (1) VICTOR ANTOINE ÉDOUARD (b. Lille, Jan. 27, 1823²; d. Paris, Apr. 22, 1892), a famous composer of Spanish origin, studied at the Lille Conservatoire under Muller for violin, and for violoncello under a German professor named Baumann, who had played at Vienna under Beethoven's conductorship.

When he came to Paris in 1839 he entered the Conservatoire, in Habeneck's violin class, and studied composition privately with the pianist Schuloff and the composer Crèvecoeur. He then played the viola in the Armingaud-Jacquard quartet from its foundation (1855). His first compositions date from about 1845, and he published in 1848 and 1849 songs bearing the mark of this epoch. He competed at the concours at the Théâtre Lyrique in 1867 with an opera, 'Tiesque' (1866), which took a third place; it was subsequently printed and partly performed at the Concert National, 1873. The ballet music from this work, under the title of a Divertissement, was given with great success at the Concert Populaire, Dec. 8, 1872. Lalo next composed a violin concerto in F, played by Sarasate at the Concert National, Jan. 18, 1874 (and at the London Philharmonic Society in the following May), and a 'Symphonie espagnole,' for violin and orchestra, played by the same artist at the Concert Populaire, Feb. 7, 1875. It was produced in England at the Crystal Palace, Mar. 30, 1878.

After these two great successes, which gave Lalo a first-class position as a composer for the concert-room, he produced an 'Allegro symphonique,'³ the overture to his opera 'Le Roi d'Ys,' a violoncello concerto, played by Fischer at the Concert Populaire, 1877, a scherzo⁴ for orchestra (all performed in Paris), and a 'Fantaisie norvégienne'⁵ for violin and orchestra, first given in Berlin. His 'Rhapsodie norvégienne' and his 'Concerto russe,' the latter played by Marsick at the Concert Populaire, were the last important works for the concert-room written before his ballet 'Namouna,' performed at the Opéra, Mar. 6, 1882. This work has something of a symphonic style, and is orchestrated in a manner far superior to that of many more popular ballets, but it was coldly received by the public. 'Namouna' was only given fifteen times, but when transferred to the concert-room in the form of an orchestral suite in five movements it achieved the success it deserved. An andantino, and two other movements from the same, arranged for violin and orchestra, were also received with favour at the Concerts Modernes, and a serenade, arranged for four stringed instruments, was also successful.

³ Composed from the allegro for PF. and v'cl., op. 16, 1875.

⁵ Partly transformed into the 'Rhapsodie norvégienne,' for orch. alone; 1st perf. Concerts Colonne, Oct. 26, 1879.

After this reparation for his former failure, Lalo again set to work and orchestrated the whole of his 'Roi d'Ys,' of which the general plan had been sketched some five or six years before, and wrote a symphony in G minor, performed at the Concert Lamoureux, Feb. 13, 1887, which was much praised by musicians. The opera was produced at the Opéra-Comique, May 7, 1888, with well-deserved success. It was not heard in England till 1901, when it was produced at Covent Garden on July 17. Thus far we have only spoken of Lalo's orchestral compositions. An allegro for violoncello and piano, a sonata for the same,¹ a serenade and 'Chanson villageoise' for violoncello and piano, a sonata in three movements for violin, three trios, of which one is the trio in A minor for piano and strings (given at Hallé's recital, June 15, 1888), a string quartet in Eb, op. 45 (2nd version of op. 19), composed c. 1855, a 'Romance Sérénade' for violin and orchestra (1880), a piano concerto in C minor (1889), played by Diémer in that year, a charming 'Aubade-allegretto' (1872) for ten instruments, wind and string; 'Néron,' pantomime in 3 acts (unpublished) (Hippodrome, Paris, Mar. 28, 1891); 'La Jacquerie,' an opera in 4 acts (only 1 act by Lalo; finished by A. Coquard, and produced at Monte Carlo, Mar. 8, 1895; Paris, Opéra-Comique, Dec. 23, 1895) and more than 20 songs complete the list of works by one who gained a reputation both in Germany and France, though his dramatic work has received but tardy recognition. His talent was of an extremely individual kind, and was formed, not by the discipline of the Conservatoire, nor by the influence of professors, but by the direct study of such masters as Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann, for whom he had a special predilection. His chief characteristics were the expressive grace of certain ideas, the piquancy of some of his themes, and, above all, the richness and skill of his orchestration. Lalo was one of the most distinguished of French composers, and fully deserved the decoration of the Légion d'Honneur conferred upon him in July 1880.

LAMB, BENJAMIN, organist of Eton College in the first quarter of the 18th century, and also verger of St. George's Chapel, Windsor, was the composer of some church music. An evening 'Cantate' service and four anthems by him are in the Tudway collection (Harl. MSS. 7341-42). He was also a composer of songs.

W. H. H.

LAMBARDI, CAMILLO (16th-17th cent.), maestro di cappella of the Church of the Annunciation, Naples; wrote church music for Holy Week for 2 choruses (1592), 2 books of madrigals, etc.

LAMBARDI, FRANCESCO (early 17th cent.), maestro (1607) and organist from 1614 of the Royal Chapel, Naples; composer of a villanelle and canzonette.

LAMBARDI, GIROLAMO (16th-17th cent.), Venetian composer of a large quantity of church music; some call him a pupil of Palestrina, others of Zarlino (Q.-L.).

LAMBE, WALTER (2nd half of 15th cent.), English composer of church music. An early 16th-century MS. in the Eton College Library, which, as an index shows, once contained 97 compositions, but now only contains 43 complete pieces, includes the following motets (Hymns to the Virgin) by Lambe:

'Ascendit Christi,' s 4; 'Nesciens Mater Virgo virum,' s 5; 'Salve Regina,' s 5; 'Stella oculi,' s 4; 'Magnificat et exultavit,' s 5.

Besides these, the MS. still contains imperfect copies of two others by him: 'O Regina celestis gloriæ' and 'O Maria, plena gratia.' A complete copy of this latter motet is at Lambeth. For a detailed description of it see H. O. Anderton, Early English Music. 'An Inventory of the Pryke Songys longynge to the Kyngys College in Cambraye (1529),' printed in The Ecclesiologist for Apr. 1863, refers to '6 bokys of parchmente conteynynge Wa[l]ter Lambes Exultavit.' This is presumably the same composition as that in the list above. The presence of a 3-part Sanctus by Lambe in a 15th-century MS. at the Roman Catholic College of St. Edmund's, Old Hall, Ware, Herts, shows either that there were two composers of this name, or that Lambe is of an earlier generation than any of the composers, except Dunstable, whose music is in the Eton MS. If there is only one Lambe, he is either a contemporary of Dunstable, Power and Bedyngham, or one of a small group of composers who link these names with the Fayrfax school. W. Barclay Squire¹ refers to a man of this name in a list of the clerks of St. George's, Windsor, from 1468-79.

George Lambert, organist of Beverley Minster, studied under his father until he was 16, then in London under Samuel Thomas Lyon, and finally became a pupil of Dr. Crotch. In 1818 he succeeded his father at Beverley. His compositions include overtures, instrumental chamber music, organ fugues, pianoforte pieces, etc. In 1874 ill-health and deafness compelled him to relinquish his post and retire from active life.

The two Lamberts successively held the office of organist of Beverley Minster for the long period of ninety-six years, the father for forty and the son for fifty-six years, and but for the latter's deafness would have held it for a century, a circumstance probably unparalleled.

W. H. H.

LAMBERT, LUCIEN (b. Paris, Jan. 1861), French pianist and composer, began his musical studies with his father, and had a successful career as a pianoforte virtuoso in America and on the Continent. On returning to Paris he worked with Massenet and Théodore Dubois, and produced 'Prométhée enchaîné,' a scène-lyrique which gained the Rossini prize of the Institut (Conservatoire, Apr. 19, 1895); 'Sire Olaf,' incidental music for a play by A. Alexandre, given at Lille in 1887 and in Paris 1889; 'Brocéliande,' a 4-act opera, Rouen, Feb. 25, 1893, the overture to which became widely popular; 'Le Spahi,' in 4 acts, Opéra-Comique, Paris, Oct. 18, 1897; 'La Flamenco,' in 4 acts, at the Théâtre de la Gaîté, Paris, Oct. 30, 1903; 'La Roussalka,' ballet, Opéra, Paris, Dec. 8, 1911; two more operas, 'Pentecosta' and 'La Sorcière,' have not yet been given. In the concert-room Lambert is represented by an 'Andante et Fantaisie tzigane,' for piano and orchestra; 'Tanger le soir,' a Moorish rhapsody for orchestra; and other things, most of which were heard for the first time at the Société Nationale de Musique. He has also published songs, piano pieces, etc. G. F.; rev. M. L. P.

LAMBERT, MICHEL (b. Vivonne, Poitou, c. 1610; d. Paris, 1696), famous singer and lutenist; master of the royal chamber music, and of the children of the Chapel Royal (from 1663). He composed several books of airs which attained great popularity. He was the father-in-law of Lully.

LAMBERTINI, GIOVANNI TOMMASO (b. Bologna, 16th-17th cent.), priest, and composer of a book of madrigals (1560), 7 penitential psalms (1569), violotte, etc., in collective volumes. From 1556-1628 he was a singer, and from 1545 treasurer at San Petronio, Bologna. E. v. d. s.

LAMBERTINI, LUIZ JOAQUIM (b. Bologna, Mar. 17, 1790; d. Lisbon, Nov. 13, 1864), founder of a great firm of Portuguese piano manufacturers.

He was related to the celebrated Cardinal Lambertini, Archbishop of Bologna, who became Pope Benedict XIV.; and is said to have been a fellow-student of Rossini, and an excellent pianist. In 1836 he left Italy for Portugal, and by 1838 had established his business in Lisbon, where it still exists.

A descendant of Luiz Joaquim, Michel Angelo Lambertini is known as a historian and writer on Portuguese music. J. B. T.

LAMBETH, HENRY ALBERT (b. Hardway, near Gosport, Jan. 16, 1822; d. Glasgow, June 27, 1895), studied for some time under Thomas Adams, went to Glasgow about 1853 as city organist, on the recommendation of Henry Smart, and in 1859 was appointed conductor of the Glasgow Choral Union. This post he held till 1880. In 1874 he formed a choir of from 20 to 30 selected voices, and in the department of Scotch music their concerts met with great success under the name of the Glasgow Select Choir. Lambeth left this society in 1878. Lambeth harmonised several of the best Scottish melodies in a most effective manner. He composed several songs and pianoforte pieces, also settings of Psalms 86 and 137, both of which were performed by the Glasgow Choral Union. He was organist and choirmaster successively at St. Mary's Episcopal Church, and at Park Church. He edited the Scottish Book of Praise with D. Bapcic in 1876. W. H.

LAMENT. In Scottish and Irish folk-music are melodies named 'Laments' or 'Lamentations.' In Scottish music these were mainly confined to the Highlands, and were generally purely bagpipe tunes, consisting of an air, sometimes set vocally, with a number of more or less irregular variations or additional passages. Each of the clans or important families had its particular 'lament,' as well as its 'gathering,' and the former was played on occasions of death or calamity. Many of the laments are of wild and pathetic beauty: 'McGregor a ruaro' and 'Mackrimmon's lament' are among those which have become more widely familiar.

The latter, Sir Walter Scott says,

'is but too well known from its being the strain with which the emigrants from the West Highlands and Isles usually take leave of their native shore.'

The burden of the original Gaelic words is 'we return no more.' Of the same class is 'Lochaber no more,' which is a true 'Lament' to the Highlander. The melody in one of its earlier forms is entitled 'Limerick's Lamentation' or 'Irish Lamentation,' and there seems to be but little doubt that the song has been written to an air then generally recognised as a 'Lamentation.' For examples of the Gaelic laments the reader is referred to Patrick McDonald's Highland Vocal Airs, 1783; Albyn's Anthology, 1816-18; and other collections of Highland airs.

Bunting supplies several current in Ireland, and in the Aria di camera, c. 1727, are some of the earliest in print, viz. 'Limerick's.'

LAMENTATIONS (Lat. Lamentationes Hieremiae). On the Thursday, Friday and Saturday in Holy Week the three First Lessons appointed in the Roman Breviary for the Office of Matins (commonly called Tenebrae) are taken from the Lamentations of Jeremiah; and the extraordinary beauty of the music to which they are sung, in the Sistine Chapel and other large churches, contributes not a little to the impressive character of the service. (See TENEBRAE.)

It is impossible to trace to its origin the plain-song melody to which the Lamentations were anciently adapted. The most celebrated version—though not, perhaps, the purest—is that printed by Guidetti, in his 'Directorium chori,' in 1582. The best modern editions are those of Solesmes, e.g. the Officium ultimi tridui majoris hebdomadis; in which the Lessons are given, at full length, in Gregorian notation, although the music is really no more than a simple chant in Mode vi., repeated, almost notatim, not only to each separate verse of the Sacred Text, but even to the prefatory 'Incipit Lamentatio Jeremiae Prophetae,' and the names of the Hebrew letters with which the several paragraphs are introduced.

Incipit Lamentatio Jeremiae prophetae. A. Ieph.

Early in the 16th century, the use of the plain-song Lamentations was discontinued, in the Pontifical Chapel, to make room for a polyphonic setting, by Elziario GENET (q.v.)—more commonly known by his Italian cognomen, Carpentrasso—who was attached to the papal court in 1508–18. These compositions remained in constant use till the year 1587, when Pope Sixtus V. ordained that the First Lamentation for each day should be adapted to some kind of polyphonic music better fitted to express the mournful character of the words than that of Carpentrasso; and, that the Second and Third Lessons should be sung, by a single soprano, to the old plain-song melody as revised by Guidetti. The disuse of Carpentrasso's time-honoured harmonies gave great offence to the choir: but, the Pope's command being absolute, Palestrina composed some music to the First Lamentation for Good Friday, in a manner so impressive, that all opposition was at once silenced; and the Pope himself, on leaving the Chapel, said that he hoped in the following year to hear the other two First Lessons sung in exactly the same style. Palestrina produced, in Jan. 1588, a volume containing a complete set of the nine Lamentations—three for each of the three days—which were printed the same year by Gardan, under the title of Lamentationum liber primus. The work was prefaced by a formal dedication to the Supreme Pontiff, who, though he still adhered to his resolution of having the Second and Third Lessons sung always in plain-song, expressed great pleasure in accepting it: and in 1589 it was reprinted at Venice, in 8vo by Girolamo Scoto.

More complex in construction than the great composer's 'Improperia,' though infinitely less so than his masses and motets, these Lamentations are written throughout in the devout and impressive style which produces so profound an effect in the first-named work, and always with marked attention to the mournful spirit of the words. They do not, like the plain-song rendering, embrace the entire text; but, after a certain number of verses, pause on the final chord of a prolonged cadence, and then pass on to the strophe, 'Jerusalem, Jerusalem' with which each of the nine Lessons concludes. In the single Lesson for Good Friday—which, though not included in the original printed copy, is undoubtedly the most beautiful of all—the opening verses are sung by two soprani, an alto and a tenor; a bass being added, in the concluding strophe, with wonderful effect. A similar arrangement is followed in the third Lamentation for the same day: but the others are for four voices only, and most of them with a tenor in the lowest place; while in all, without exception, the introductory sentences, 'Incipit Lamentatio,' or, 'De Lamentatione,' as well as the names of the Hebrew initial letters, are set to harmonies of infinite richness and beauty.

Since the death of Palestrina, the manner of singing the Lamentations in the Pontifical Chapel has undergone no very serious change. In accordance with the injunction of Pope Sixtus V., the Second and Third Lessons for each day have always been sung in plain-song: generally by a single soprano, but sometimes by two, the perfection of whose unisonous performance has constantly caused it to be mistaken for that of a single voice. Until the year 1640, the First Lesson for each day was sung from Palestrina's printed volume. In that year, the single unpublished Lesson for Good Friday, composed in 1587, was restored to its place, and the use of the published one discontinued; while a new composition, by Gregorio Allegri, was substituted for Palestrina's Lesson for Holy Saturday.

Benedict XIII. inaugurated a radical change, by decreeing that the First Lessons should no longer be sung in this shortened form, but, with the entire text set to music. To meet his desire, three Lamentations, by modern writers, were submitted for approval, but unanimously rejected by the College, who commissioned Giovanni Biondi to add to the compositions of Palestrina and Allegri whatever was necessary to complete the text. His work was unhesitatingly accepted, and retained in use till the year 1731, when Pope Clement XII. restored the Lamentations to their original shortened form. In this form they were suffered to remain, till 1815, when the indefatigable Baini restored Palestrina's printed Lamentation for the first day, retaining the MS. of 1587 for the second, and Allegri's really beautiful composition for the third; while the last-named composer's inferior work (of 1651) was suffered to fall into disuse.

Besides the printed volume already mentioned, Palestrina composed two other entire sets of Lamentations, which, though written in his best and purest style, remained, for two centuries and a half, unpublished. One of them was prepared, as early as the year 1560, for the use of the Lateran Basilica, where the original MS. is still preserved. The other reaches us only through the medium of a MS. in the Altaemps Otthoboni collection, now in the Vatican library. In the year 1842 Alieri printed the three sets entire, in the fourth volume of his Raccolta di musica sacra, together with the single Lamentation for Good Friday, to which he appended Biordi's additional verses, without, however, pointing out the place where Palestrina's work ends, and Biordi's begins. The three single Lamentations, sung in the Pontifical Chapel, are given, with Biordi's now useless additions, in a volume of the same editor's Excerpta, published in 1840; and, without Biordi's verses, in Choron's 'Collection des pièces de musique religieuse.' Both these editions are now out of print, and difficult to obtain; but a fine reprint of the nine pieces contained in the original 'Lamentationum liber primus' will be found in Proske's 'Musica divina,' vol. iv. Capes, in his Selection from the works of Palestrina (Novello), has given the first Lamentation in Coena Domini, and the first in Sabb. Sancto, from the 1st book (1588), and has introduced between them the single Lesson for Good Friday (1587) already mentioned. The Lamentations of Palestrina are contained in vol. xxv. of Haberl's Collected Edition. In 1919 CASIMIRI (q.v.) published 'Il Codice 59,' containing the corrected MS. of Palestrina's Lamentations in the composer's autograph.

Though the Lamentations of Carpentrasso, Palestrina and Allegri are the only ones that have ever been actually used in the Pontifical Chapel, many others have been produced by composers of no small reputation. Those of Okeghem date from 1474. As early as the year 1506, Ottaviano dei Petrucci published, at Venice, two volumes containing settings by Johannes Tinctoris, Ycaert, De Orto, Francesco (d' Ana) da Venezia, Johannes de Quadris, Agricola, Bartolomeo Tromboncino and Gaspar and Erasmus Lapidica. All these works were given to the world before that of Carpentrasso, which, with many more of his compositions, was first printed at Avignon, by Johannes Channay, in 1532. But the richest collection extant is that entitled 'Piissimae ac sacratissimae Lamentationes Jeremiae prophetae,' printed in Paris, by A. le Roy and Robert Ballard, in 1557, and containing, besides Carpentrasso's capo d' opera, some extremely fine examples by De la Rue, Févin, Arcadelt, Festa and Claudin le Jeune. W. S. R., rev.

Lamentations by English composers of the 16th century are now known to be more numerous than was formerly supposed. See TALLIS, BYRD and Robert WHYTE.

LAMOND, FREDERICK A. (b. Glasgow, Jan. 28, 1868), famous pianist, was at first a pupil of his brother, David Lamond, and in 1880 obtained the post of organist at Laurieston parish church. He studied the violin with H. C. Cooper, and in 1882 went to Frankfort to the Raff Conservatorium, where Heermann was his master for the violin, Max Schwarz for the piano, and Urspruch for composition. Here he laid the foundation of his wide musical culture, and his pianoforte studies were completed under Von Bülow and Liszt. His first important appearance as a mature pianist took place at Berlin, Nov. 17, 1885, when he made a great success, and appeared at Vienna soon afterwards. His first piano recital in Great Britain took place in Glasgow, Mar. 8, 1886, and soon afterwards he gave a set of recitals at Princes Hall, London. For the fourth of these, on Apr. 15, St. James's Hall was taken, and Liszt's presence set the seal on the young player's reputation. The recitals showed the depth of Lamond's interpretations of Beethoven, a master in whom he takes especial delight. During the next few years he played much in Germany, but appeared occasionally in London. On Apr. 5, 1890, he played Saint-Saëns's C minor concerto at the Crystal Palace, when his own symphony in A was given (it was first played at the Glasgow Choral Union, Dec. 23, 1889, and revived at Queen's Hall in 1912).

His first appearance at the Philharmonic Society took place on May 14, 1891, when he played Brahms's second concerto with great skill. The same society performed his overture, 'Aus dem schottischen Hochlande,' on Mar. 7, 1895. In 1896 Lamond played in Russia, and in 1897 gave a series of recitals in London, at one of which a couple of piano pieces of his own were played. From 1904, when he married the actress, Irene Triesch, he lived in Berlin, but he made an annual appearance in England up to 1914. His performances here were renewed in 1919. In 1917 he accepted a professorship in the Conservatoire at the Hague (Riemann). Among his other compositions may be mentioned a trio for piano and strings, and a sonata, op. 2, for piano and violoncello. (Brit. Mus. Biog.) M., with addns.

he played a violin concerto before the Emperor, who sent him to Italy for further studies, and on his return placed him in his private chapel. In 1769 he competed successfully with Jarnovick in Paris, and in 1776 appeared in London. Reichard praises his staccato in single and double notes, and his unfailing technique. He composed concertos, solos and sonatas for his instrument. He died while on a visit to the Netherlands. E. v. d. s.

LAMOUREUX, CHARLES (b. Bordeaux, Sept. 21, 1834; d. Paris, Dec. 21, 1899), a famous orchestral conductor, began his violin studies under Beaudoin, and was then sent to the Paris Conservatoire, where he was in Girard's class.

He obtained in 1852 a second accessit for the violin, the second prize in the following year, and the first in 1854. He also studied harmony under Tolbecque, and attended the counterpoint course of Leborne at the Conservatoire, where he finished his theoretical studies under the famous organist Alexis Chauvet. He was solo violinist in the Gymnase orchestra (1850), and afterwards joined that of the Opéra, where he played for many years. He was admitted a member of the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire, and, like all the members of these orchestras, gave private lessons. But these insignificant posts were not sufficient for the activity of Lamoureux, who dreamt of great undertakings in the musical art of France. Together with Colonne, Adam and A. Pilet he founded in 1860 a society for chamber music of a severe character, in which he showed a taste for new works by producing compositions hitherto unnoticed. He had also the honour of first performing in France Brahms's sextets. He was not content with this, for having travelled in Germany and England he was anxious to organise performances on a large scale, such as he had heard under Hiller and Costa, of the masterpieces of Handel, Bach and Mendelssohn.

After several preliminary trials at the Salle Pleyel, where he performed among other things the 'Streit zwischen Phöbus und Pan' of Bach, he succeeded by his own energy and resources in founding the Société de l'Harmonie Sacrée on the model of the Sacred Harmonic Society of London. The first festival was given at the Cirque des Champs-Élysées, Dec. 19, 1873. The success of an admirable performance of 'Messiah' was such that amateurs came in crowds to the following performances. Lamoureux then produced Bach's 'St. Matthew Passion,' Mar. 31, 1874, and 'Judas Maccabæus,' Nov. 19, 1874. Not content with confining himself to well-known masterpieces, he produced Massenet's 'Eve,' then unpublished, Mar. 18, 1875. These great performances showed that Lamoureux was a conductor of great merit, who succeeded in obtaining from his orchestra a matchless precision of attack and regard to expression. When Carvalho became director of the Opéra-Comique in 1876 he offered Lamoureux the post of conductor, but in less than a year the latter resigned, owing to some difficulties arising out of the rehearsal of Chaumet's 'Bathylé' in May 1877. In December of the same year Lamoureux was appointed conductor of the Opéra (1877-79; 1891) by Vaucorbeil, and gave up the sub-conductorship of the Concerts du Conservatoire, which he had held since 1872. In 1878 he was decorated with the Légion d'Honneur, and in the following year he resigned his post at the Opéra on account of a dispute with Vaucorbeil as to the tempo of one of the movements in 'Don Juan.'

From that time he determined to be self-dependent, and, after having carefully prepared the undertaking, he founded on Oct. 23, 1881, the Nouveaux Concerts, called the Concerts Lamoureux, which were held for some years in the theatre of the Château d'Eau, and afterwards at the Eden Théâtre (1885) and the Cirque des Champs-Élysées (1887), where their success constantly increased. In the year of their foundation he appeared as a conductor in London, giving two concerts in St. James's Hall, on Mar. 15 and 22, 1881. Not only did Lamoureux develop as a conductor a precision and firmness, a care for the perfection of the smallest details, without excluding passion and warmth of expression; he also gave a welcome to the works of contemporary musicians such as Reyer, Saint-Saëns, Lalo, d'Indy, Chabrier, Franck, Dukas, etc., and succeeded in placing himself at the head of the Wagnerian movement in France. He gave excellent performances of selections from Wagner's operas to a public that had been too long deprived of these compositions. The first Act of 'Lohengrin,' Acts I. and II. of 'Tristan' and Act I. of 'Die Walküre' were given in their entirety. Encouraged by the warmth of the applause and the moral support of his audience, Lamoureux decided to give a performance in a Paris theatre of 'Lohengrin,' then unknown in France. After a whole year of preparation a perfect performance was given at the Eden Théâtre (May 3, 1887), which was not repeated. Lamoureux lived, however, to see the ultimate triumph of Wagner in Paris.

In Apr. and Nov. 1896, in Mar. and Nov. 1897, and in the spring of 1898 he gave concerts with his orchestra in the Queen's Hall, London; and in May 1899 he and his band were the chief attraction of a 'London Musical Festival' in the Queen's Hall. He was succeeded as conductor by his son-in-law, Camille CHEVILLARD (q.v.). A. J.

LAMPE, (1) JOHN FREDERICK (b. Saxony, 1703; d. Edinburgh, July 25, 1751), came to England about 1725, and was engaged as a bassoon-player at the Opera.

He is heard of previously as playing in 'De colloquio Croesi et Solonis' at St. Catherine's School, Brunswick, Aug. 19, 1717.¹ In 1732 he composed the music for Carey's 'Amelia,' produced Mar. 13. In 1737 he published A Plain and Compendious Method of teaching Thorough-Bass, etc., and also furnished the music for Carey's burlesque opera 'The Dragon of Wantley,' which met with remarkable success. It is an admirable example of the true burlesque, and is said to have been an especial favourite of Handel's. In 1738 he composed music for the sequel, 'Margery; or, A Worse Plague than the Dragon.' In 1740 he published The Art of Musick, and in 1741 composed music for the masque of 'The Sham Conjuror.' In 1745 he composed 'Pyramus and Thisbe, a mock opera, the words taken from Shakespeare.' A composition to celebrate the repression of the Stuart rebellion of 1745 was performed in the Savoy Chapel, Oct. 9, 1746, and published. Lampe was the composer of many single songs, several of which appeared in collections, as 'Wit musically embellish'd, a Collection of Forty-two new English Ballads'; 'The Ladies' Amusement' and 'Lyra Britannica.' Many songs by him were included in 'The Vocal Musical Mark,' 'The Musical Miscellany,' etc. Lampe married Isabella, daughter of Charles Young, and sister of Mrs. Arne; she was a favourite singer, both on the stage and in the concert-room. In 1748 he went to Dublin, and in 1750 to Edinburgh, where he died, leaving behind him the reputation of an accomplished musician and excellent man. He was buried on July 28, 1751, in the Canongate Churchyard. Charles Wesley, whose hymns he set to music in 'Hymns on the Great Festivals,' etc. (1746), often mentions him with great affection, and wrote a hymn on his death—'Tis done! the Sovereign Will's obeyed!'

(2) CHARLES JOHN FREDERICK, his son, succeeded his grandfather, Charles YOUNG (q.v.), as organist of Allhallows, Barking, in 1758, and held the appointment until 1769. In 1763 (May) he was also organist at Covent Garden, and married Miss Smith, a singer at Marylebone Gardens, May 7.² A catch by him is in a 'Second Collection of Catches' (Welcker, 1766).

W. H. H.

LAMPERTI, FRANCESCO (b. Savona, Mar. 11, 1813; d. Como, May 1, 1892), teacher of singing.

His father was an advocate, and his mother a prima donna of considerable repute. As a child he showed great talent for music, and was placed under Pietro Rizzi of Lodi. In 1820 he entered the Conservatorio at Milan, and there studied the pianoforte and harmony under Sommaruga, d'Appiano and Pietro Ray. Devoting himself afterwards to the teaching of singing, he became associated with Masini in the direction of the Teatro Filodrammatico at Lodi. Selecting many of the members of his company from the natives of the surrounding country, he educated and brought out at his theatre many famous singers.

Attracted by their success pupils flocked to him from Bergamo, Milan and other parts of Europe, and he there trained many of the most distinguished operatic vocalists, amongst whom may be named Jeanne Sophie Löwe, Cruvelli, Grua, Brambilla, Hayes, Artôt, Tiberini, La Grange. Appointed in 1850 by the Austrian government professor of singing to the Conservatorio at Milan, he brought out amongst others Angelica Moro, Paganini, Galli, Risarelli, Angelori, Peralta; and as private pupils, Albani, Sembrich, Stoltz, Waldmann, Aldighieri, Campanini, Vialletti, Derevis, Mariani, Palermi, Everardi and Shakespeare. After twenty-five years' service he retired from the Conservatorio upon a pension in 1875, and henceforward devoted himself entirely to private pupils.

A friend of Rubini and Pasta, and associated with the great singers of the past, Lamperti followed the method of the old Italian school of singing, instituted by Farinelli and taught by Crescentini, Velluti, Marchesi and Romani. Basing his teaching upon the study of respiration, the taking and retention of the breath by means of the abdominal muscles alone, and the just emission of the voice, he thoroughly grounded his pupils in the production of pure tone. His memory and his intuition were alike remarkable, and enabled him to adapt to each of his pupils such readings of the music and cadenzas as are warranted by the traditions of the greatest singers and are best adapted to their powers.

He was Commendatore and Cavaliere of the order of the Crown of Italy, and a member of many academies and foreign orders. He wrote several series of vocal studies and a treatise on the art of singing (Ricordi & Co.), which has been translated into English by one of his pupils.

LAMPUGNANI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA (b. Milan, c. 1706), came to London in the autumn of 1743 as conductor and composer to the opera in the place of Galuppi. In November of that year his 'Roxana' was given, on Jan. 3, 1744, his 'Alfonso,' on Apr. 28 his 'Alceste,' and in 1755 his 'Siroe.' Burney, in the fourth volume of his History, refers to these successive operas, and to various pasticcios to which he contributed, in terms which imply that his music was considered of very light, flimsy quality. He was a clever craftsman in the concoction of the pasticcios that were in fashion at the time, and his recitative was unusually expressive. In many of his pasticcios Hasse collaborated; and after his return to Italy, where he lived at Milan and held the post of maestro al cembalo in the theatre from 1779–89, he seems to have written two more operas, 'Semiramide,' given at Milan in 1762 (the score printed by Walsh), and 'L' Amore contadino,' given at Lodi in 1766 (score in the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge). His name is not found after 1789. (Q.-L., etc.) M.

LANCERS' QUADRILLE, THE, a square dance, for eight or sixteen couples. It is said to have been the invention of a Dublin dancing-master, John Duval; but Joseph HART claimed to have invented it in 1819, according to the title-page of his original edition, published in 1820:

'Les Lancier', a second set of Quadrilles for the Piano Forte, with entirely new figures, as danced by the Nobility and Gentry at Tenby in the summer of 1819. Composed and most respectfully dedicated to Lady and the Misses Beechey by Joseph Hart. London, for the Author, Whittaker & Co., 75 St. Paul's Churchyard.

The dance consisted of five figures—La Rose, La Lodoiska, La Dorset, Les Lanciers, and L'Étoile, danced to airs by Spagnoletti, by Kreutzer, from the 'Beggars' Opera' ('If the heart of a man'), by Janiewicz, and by Storace ('Pretty Maiden,' from the 'Haunted Tower') respectively. In Duval's version¹ the names of the figures and music are substantially the same, though in the figures themselves there is considerable difference. Hart's figures, with a slight difference or two, are still danced, L'Étoile being now called Les Visites, and Les Lanciers danced last.

LAND, JAN PIETER NICOLAAS (b. Delft, 1834; d. Arnhem, Apr. 30, 1897), Oriental scholar and musician. Although of Scandinavian descent, he was a thorough Dutchman²; brought up at Leeuwarden in Friesland, educated at the well-known Moravian school at Neuwied, on the Rhine, and subsequently at the University of Leyden, where he devoted himself to Semitic philology and took his degree of Doctor of Theology. He next spent two years in England working among the Syriac manuscripts at the British Museum. On returning to Holland, he was made professor of classical and Oriental languages at the Academy (now the Municipal University) of Amsterdam; whence, in the 'seventies, he was speedily promoted to the chair of Logic and Metaphysics at Leyden.

This latter post he held for over twenty years, filling in due course the office of Rector of the University, and lecturing on Syriac when required, until 1895, when a paralytic seizure compelled his retirement to Arnhem—where he occupied himself with learned tasks until his death.

He was devoted to music, especially of the 17th century, and fond of transcribing, from the original Tablature, lute music for his friends. The following works concern music:

De Koorbok van de St. Pieterskerk te Leyden. (1880.)

LANDI, CAMILLA (b. Geneva, 1866), the daughter of Milanese parents, both of them singers, became one of the most distinguished concert singers of her day.

On Dec. 8, 1884, she made her début at a concert given by Servais at the Sala di Filarmonica, Florence, and she made a very favourable impression in songs of Tosti and Marchetti. From 1886-92 she lived in Paris, and made a great success at the Lamoureux Concerts, and at Rouen, Bordeaux, etc. On Oct. 1, 1888, she played for one night at the Opéra, Paris, as Amneris in 'Aïda'; and on June 5, 1890, at the Odéon as Ursula on the production in Paris of Berlioz's 'Béatrice et Bénédict' by the Société des Grandes Auditions. On that and subsequent evenings the success of the performance was her singing with Mlle. Levasseur (Hero) of the well-known Duo Nocturne, 'Vous soupirez, Madame.' On Nov. 10, 1892, she made her début in this country, under Hallé at Manchester, and became an immediate favourite there at subsequent concerts under him in that city and elsewhere. On Feb. 22, 1893, under Hallé, she made her début at an orchestral concert at St. James's Hall, when she sang 'La Captive' of Berlioz. On Mar. 25, at the Crystal Palace, she confirmed the favourable impression she had made, and later in the autumn she sang at the Bristol Festival. For the next few years she lived in London, where her mother had established herself as a teacher, and became a great favourite at the above concerts, the Philharmonic, Ballad Concerts, and elsewhere. In 1897 and 1898, announced as from London, Mlle. Landi sang in Germany and Austria-Hungary, with the greatest success, her singing of Handel's 'Ombra mai fu' from 'Serse' being particularly appreciated. Her German engagements were principally at Berlin, her mother having settled for the time at Leipzig, where she had made her German début. In 1899 she sang in Holland, Belgium, Russia and Poland, and in 1900 again in Germany, etc. She reappeared in London, giving vocal recitals 1904-07 at the Bechstein (now Wigmore) Hall. She has lived subsequently in Geneva. Mlle. Landi's voice had a large compass, from the low d to a', and a quality of infinite charm.

LANDI, STEFFANO (b. Rome, c. 1590; d. there, c. 1655), maestro di cappella at Padua

c. 1619; alto singer in the Papal Chapel c. 1629. He was one of the foremost composers of his time, and was responsible, with others, for the appearance of the cantata, and first representative of Roman opera. He composed 2 operas, masses, madrigals, 6 books of arias for a solo voice, 4-part psalms, etc. E. v. d. s.

LANDINO,¹ FRANCESCO (FRANCISCUS CAECUS, etc.²) (b. Florence, c. 1325; d. there, Sept. 2, 1397), son of a painter. He lost the sight of both eyes as a child through smallpox, and devoted himself to music, playing lute, guitar, flute and a clavier instrument—'Serena screnorum'—of his own invention and construction. But he shone particularly as an organist (S. Lorenzo, Florence) and composer. In the latter capacity he is one of the chief representatives of the ars nova of the 14th century (see MADRIGAL). Of his compositions, a large number are still in existence, viz. madrigals, ballads, canzonas and secular songs. (See Riemann and Q.-L.) E. v. d. s.

LANDOLFI, CARLO FERDINANDO (LANDULPHUS), a reputable violin-maker of Milan, where he lived in the Street of St. Margaret, 1750-60. The Landolfi violoncellos are especially striking in quality and appearance, and are in greater demand than the violins. F. J. P.

LANDOWSKA, WANDA (b. Warsaw, July 5, 1881), distinguished pianist and harpsichordist, has devoted her career to the interpretation of keyboard music written before the era of romanticism. Her tours in Europe and America have done much to recreate an understanding of the classical style of playing on keyboard instruments. She has combated the theory that the Wohltemperirtes Clavier was written for the clavichord and given practical evidence that J. S. Bach's technique is laid out for the double harpsichord (see Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, Jahrg 78, No. 10). Her books Bach et ses interprètes (1906) and La Musique ancienne (1908) show that her æsthetic principles are based on thorough scholarship. C.

LANDSBERG, LUDWIG (d. Rome, May 6, 1858), a German musician, native of Breslau, who went to Rome and remained there for twenty-four years, teaching the piano and amassing a wonderful collection of music, both printed and MS. On his death his library was taken, part to Berlin and part to Breslau, and a catalogue of the ancient portion was printed (Berlin, 1859, imprimé chez Ernest Kuhn)—whether the whole or a part, does not appear. It contains compositions by more than 150 musicians of the old Italian and Flemish schools, down to Casali. Fétis, however, who had received a MS. catalogue of the collection from Landsberg during his life, insists upon the fact that many of the most important works have disappeared. G.

¹ Wooldridge, Orf. Hist. Mus. II, p. 47, etc., gives the name as Landini; so also Ludwig, Adler's Handbuch, p. 240.

LANFRANCO, GIOVANNI MARIA (b. Terenzio, Parma, end of 15th or beginning of 16th cent.), was, according to Fétis, maestro di cappella, and canon at Brescia Cathedral. He wrote 'Scintille di Musica' (published 1533), important for its information about contemporary musical instruments. E. v. d. s.

LANG, BENJAMIN JOHNSON (b. Salem, Mass., U.S.A., Dec. 28, 1837; d. Boston, Mass., Apr. 3, 1909), an American pianist, conductor, organist and teacher. His father was a well-known teacher of the pianoforte in Salem, and he began his studies under him, continuing them under Francis G. Hill of Boston. By the time he was 15 years old he held a post as organist of a Boston church. In 1855 he went to Europe to study composition in Berlin and elsewhere in Germany, and pianoforte with Alfred Jaell; he also had some intercourse with Liszt. On his return to Boston he made his first public appearance as a pianist in 1858. His first appearance as a conductor was made in Boston in May 1862, when he gave the first performance in that city of Mendelssohn's 'Walpurgisnacht.' The next year he shared with Carl Zerrahn the direction of the music at the jubilee concert in honour of President Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation, and from that time forth he figured more and more extensively in Boston as a leader. He was appointed conductor of the Apollo Club, a men's singing society, at its formation in 1871, and remained as such until 1901. He was also conductor of the Cecilia, a mixed chorus, since its establishment in 1874, and was conductor of the Handel and Haydn Society for two seasons, 1895-97. He gave several complete performances of 'Parsifal' in concert form.

In the early sixties Lang became prominent as a concert pianist in Boston, playing frequently at the concerts of the Harvard Musical Association, at chamber concerts of his own, and with the Mendelssohn Quintette Club. His labours as a composer were less important than as an interpreter; yet he left an oratorio, 'David,' symphonies, overtures, chamber music, pieces for the pianoforte, church music and many songs, mostly in manuscript. In 1903 Yale University conferred on him the degree of Master of Arts. (See BOSTON.) R. A.

LANG, a family of German musicians originally from Mannheim, but settling at Munich, and mentioned here for the sake of (1) JOSEPHINE LANG (the second of that name) (b. Munich, Mar. 14, 1815; d. Tübingen, Dec. 2, 1880), a young lady of very remarkable musical gifts and personality, who attracted the notice of Mendelssohn when he passed through Munich in 1830 and 1831. There is an enthusiastic account of 'die kleine Lang' in his letter of Oct. 6, 1831; in writing to Bärmann (July 7 and Sept. 27, 1834), he inquires for her, and in a letter, seven years later (Dec. 15, 1841), to Professor C. R. Köstlin of Tübingen, to whom she was married in 1842, he shows how deeply her image had impressed itself on his susceptible heart. She published several books of songs (up to op. 38), which from the reviews in the A.M.Z., appear to be full of imagination, and well worthy of the warm praise bestowed on them by Mendelssohn in the letters just mentioned. Hiller tells the story of her life at length in his Tonleben (ii. 116), and selects her songs, opp. 12 and 14, as the best. Connected with the same family at an earlier date was (2) REGINA (b. Würzburg, 1786), a singer whose name was originally Hitzelberg, educated at Munich by Winter, Cannabich and Vogel, and appointed chamber singer at the Bavarian court. When Napoleon I. was at Munich in 1806 she sang before him in Winter's 'Interrupted Sacrifice' and Mozart's 'Don Giovanni,' and so pleased him that he is said to have urged her to come to Paris.¹ She, however, remained in Munich, and married Theobald Lang, a violinist in the court band. In 1812 or 1813 she was at Vienna, and Beethoven wrote in her album a song 'An die Geliebte,' to Stoll's words, 'O dass ich dir vom stillen Auge,' which was published about 1840 in a collection called 'Das singende Deutschland.' It is his second version of the song—the former one being dated by himself Dec. 1811, and having been published in 1814. See Nottebohm's Thematic Catalogue, p. 183. g.

LANGDON, RICHARD, Mus.B. (d. Exeter, Sept. 8, 1803), grandson of the Rev. Tobias Langdon, priest-vicar of Exeter Cathedral, graduated as Mus.Bac. at Oxford in 1761. In 1753 he received the appointments of organist and sub-chantor of Exeter Cathedral, but resigned them in 1777, when he became organist of Ely Cathedral. This post he held only for a few months, being appointed to Bristol Cathedral in 1778. He quitted Bristol in 1782 to become organist of Armagh Cathedral, a post he resigned in 1794. In 1774 he published 'Divine Harmony, a Collection, in score, of Psalms and Anthems.' His published compositions include 'Twelve Glees,' 1770, two books of songs, and some canzonets. Two glees and a catch by him are contained in Warren's 'Vocal Harmony.' w. h. h.

LANGE (LANGIUS), HIERONYMUS GREGOR (b. Havelberg, Brandenburg; d. Breslau, May 1, 1587), obtained in 1574 the post of school-cantor at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder, but becoming paralysed in his hands and feet he removed to Breslau in 1583, where he was received into a charitable institution, and in spite of his infirmity continued to devote himself to musical composition till his death. There are 2 books of 'Cantiones sacrae,' published 1580 and 1584 respectively, containing 35 Latin motets for 4, 5, 6, 8 and 10 voices; and 2 books of Deutsche Lieder, 1584, 1586, containing forty German secular songs for 3 voices. Besides these, there are only a few occasional compositions published separately, chiefly 'Epithalamia' or wedding-songs in the form of motets. The Deutsche Lieder for 3 voices were frequently reprinted, and in 1615 Christoph Demantius rearranged them for 5 voices. Although highly thought of in their time, Eitner says, these songs are less attractive than those of Regnard, being somewhat stiff and wanting in melody. The rearrangement by Demantius is of greater merit. But Lange's Latin motets stand upon a higher level. In 1899 Reinhold Starke edited for the Gesellschaft für Musikforschung a selection of 24 of these motets (Publikation, Jahrgang 29), among which are several very interesting numbers. 'Vae misero mihi,' with its second part, 'O vos omnes qui transitis,' is very remarkable, on account of its unusual chromatic modulations. A motet, 'Media vita,' composed on the occasion of the death of the General Superintendent, Musculus, one of Lange's chief Frankfort patrons, the editor considers as being quite in the mood of Sebastian Bach. These motets must have enjoyed considerable favour, as some of them were also transcribed for the lute. Besides the published works Starke enumerates a considerable number of works which have remained in MS., among which are 2 masses and 30 other Latin motets, and 20 German songs for 4 and 5 voices, partly sacred. See his monograph on Lange contributed to the M.f.M., 1899, pp. 101-23. J. R. M.

LANGE, DE, a Dutch family of musicians and organists; the father, (1) SAMUEL (b. June 9, 1811; d. Rotterdam, May 15, 1884), was organist of the church of St. Lawrence there, and an eminent teacher, as well as a composer of pieces for the organ. He was the teacher of his elder son, (2) SAMUEL (b. Rotterdam, Feb. 22, 1840; d. Stuttgart, July 7, 1911), who further studied with Verhulst, and in Vienna with A. Winterberger. After travelling as a virtuoso in Galicia in 1858-59, he settled at Lemberg for four years, and in 1863 was appointed organist at Rotterdam, and given a teaching appointment in the music school of the Maatschappij tot bevordering van Toonkunst, making occasional concert tours in Switzerland, Germany, France, etc. From 1874-76 he taught at the music school at Basle, and in 1877 was called to Cologne to teach in the Conservatorium. While there he directed the Kölner Männergesangverein and the choir of the Gürzenich concerts. In 1885 he went to the Hague as rector of the Oratorio society, and remained there until 1893, when he went to Stuttgart as substitute for Immanuel Faisst, on whose death in 1894 he became professor of the organ and counterpoint in the Conservatorium. In 1900 he was appointed director of the Conservatorium. His works include eight organ sonatas, a piano concerto, three quartets, a trio, a quintet, four sonatas for violin and two for violoncello, a concertstück for violoncello, and many partsongs for male voices, besides three symphonies, and an oratorio, 'Moses,' performed while he was at the Hague.

His brother, (3) DANIEL (b. Rotterdam, July 11, 1841; d. California, Jan. 31, 1918), was a pupil of Ganz and Servais for the violoncello, and of Verhulst for composition. He taught at the music school at Lemberg in 1860-63, and then went to Paris to perfect his pianoforte and organ playing. While there he was organist of the Protestant church at Montrouge, and remained there until the outbreak of the war, when he went back to Holland, taking up his abode at Amsterdam, as teacher in the music school, which afterwards became the Conservatorium. He was made secretary of the Maatschappij tot bevordering van Toonkunst. He conducted several choral societies with great distinction, and formed a party of eminent solo singers with which he performed old Netherlandish music. They gave concerts in the Albert Hall, London, during the Music and Inventions Exhibition of 1885, and created a great sensation by the exquisite finish of their performances. De Lange became director of the Amsterdam Conservatorium (1895-1913). His works include two symphonies, cantatas, an opera, 'De val van Kuilenburg'; an overture 'Willem van Holland'; music to 'Hernani'; a Mass, a Requiem; a setting of Ps. xxii., for soli, choir and piano; a violoncello concerto, etc. (Riemann.) M.

LANGE-MÜLLER, PETER ERASMUS (b. Frederiksberg, Denmark, Dec. 1, 1850; d. Feb. 25, 1926), composer, educated at the Royal Conservatorium in Copenhagen. He wrote incidental music to several Danish plays and several operas produced at Copenhagen and Stockholm, as well as symphonic music. His 200 songs and choral pieces are regarded as the work most characteristic of him and his country, which claims him as a representative Danish composer. C.

LANGHANS, FRIEDRICH WILHELM (b. Hamburg, Sept. 21, 1832; d. Berlin, June 9, 1892), author, composer and violinist. His early general education was received at the Johanneum in Berlin, and in 1849 he entered the Leipzig Conservatorium, where his violin-teacher was David and his composition-master Richter. On leaving Leipzig Langhans went to Paris to study the violin further under Alard. For five seasons, 1852-56, he played first violin in the Gewandhaus orchestra in Leipzig; from 1857-60 was Konzertmeister at Düsseldorf; and then settled temporarily, as teacher and violinist, in Hamburg, Paris and Heidelberg. From 1874-81 he was professor of the history of music at Kullak's Neue Akademie der Tonkunst, when he joined Scharwenka's newly founded Conservatorium, and ultimately acted as its director. In 1871 the University of Heidelberg conferred the degree of Doctor upon Langhans, who was an honorary member of the Liceo Filarmonico of Florence and of the St. Cecilia at Rome. He visited England in 1881, and subsequently, after hearing some open-air music in Glasgow, the Worcester Festival, and 'Patience' in London, wrote articles on music in England for the Musikalisches Centralblatt. Langhans's compositions, which include a string quartet that gained a prize offered by a Florentine gentleman in 1864, a violin sonata, and a symphony, are quite unimportant; but his literary work has been more prized. It includes Das musikalische Urtheil (1872); Die Musikgeschichte in 12 Vorträgen (1878); a Geschichte der Musik des 17., 18. und 19. Jahrhunderts in continuation of Ambros, and a history of the Berlin Hochschule. In 1858 he married the pianist Luise Japha, a pupil of Robert and Clara Schumann.

LANGLÉ-LANGLOIS, HONORÉ FRANÇOIS MARIE (b. Monaco, c. 1741; d. Paris, Sept. 20, 1807), studied at the Conservatorio de la Pietà at Naples. He was maestro di cappella at Genoa c. 1764; in 1768 he went to Paris as teacher of singing and composer, and became also the singing-master of Queen Marie Antoinette. In 1784 he became teacher at the École Royale de chant, which was merged into the Conservatoire in 1791, where he was professor of harmony and librarian. On the reconstruction of that institution he only retained the latter position, but retired in 1802 to his country house near Paris. He composed several operas, cantatas, etc., and wrote a number of important theoretical works (Riemann; Fétis; Q.-L.). E. v. d. s.

LANGSAM, i.e. slow, the German equivalent for Adagio.

LANGSHAW, (1) JOHN (d. 1798), was employed about 1761, under the direction of John Christopher Smith, in setting music upon the barrels of an organ, of much larger size than had been theretofore used for barrels, then being constructed for the Earl of Bute, which he did 'in so masterly a manner that the effect was equal to that produced by the most finished player.' In 1772 he became organist of the parish church of Lancaster.

His son, (2) JOHN (b. London, 1763), became in 1779 a pupil of Charles Wesley, and in 1798 succeeded his father as organist at Lancaster. He composed many hymns, chants, organ voluntaries, pianoforte concertos, songs and duets, and made numerous arrangements for the pianoforte. W. H. H.

LANIERE (LANIER, LANEIR, LANYER, LANEER, LANNEARE, LANEARE), the name of a family¹ of musicians at the English court in the 17th century. The head of the family, or rather of the English branch of the family, was (1) JOHN LANIER (d. 1579),² described as a native of Rouen, who had property in Crutched Friars. A player of the sackbut, named (2) JOHN LANYER, from 1565–1605, was probably identical with the John Lannyer who, on Oct. 12, 1585, married, at Holy Trinity, Minories, the daughter of Mark Antony Galliardello, another court musician. He had property at East Greenwich, and the registers of Greenwich mention several of the family. This John Lanier was the father of (3) NICHOLAS (see below), the most distinguished of the family, who must not be confused with two other bearers of the same name. One (4) NICHOLAS (d. 1612), owned property at East Greenwich, and seems to have been another son of John of Rouen; he was musician to Queen Elizabeth in 1581, and died leaving six sons and four daughters. The sons were all court musicians, and one of them, Jerome, had two sons, Jeremy and William, who were musicians in 1634–35. Another (5) NICHOLAS LANIER (d. 1646) published some etchings from drawings by Parmigiano, and in 1638 a set after Giulio Romano; he is presumed to be identical with the Nicholas Lanier who was buried in St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, Nov. 4, 1646, aged 78.³

Coming now to the most eminent of the family, (3) NICHOLAS LANIERE (as he was generally called) (b. 1588; bapt. Sept. 10; d. Feb. 1666). It is probable that he, rather than either of his namesakes, was the musician for the flutes in 1604; he was attached to the household of Henry, Prince of Wales, and it is assumed that he is the 'Laniere' alluded to by Herrick in a poem to Henry Lawes. In 1613 he joined Coprario (see COOPER, John) and others in the composition of Campian's masque for the marriage of Robert Carr, Earl of Somerset, and Lady Frances Howard, performed at Whitehall, St. Stephen's night, 1614. The first song, 'Bring away the sacred tree,' is reprinted in Stafford Smith's 'Musica antiqua.' He composed the music for Ben Jonson's masque 'Lovers made Men' at Lord Haye's house, Feb. 22, 1617, and is described as introducing the 'stylo recitativo' apparently for the first time in England. He sang in the piece and painted the scenery. He also wrote the music for the same poet's masque 'The Vision of Delight' in 1617. His skill in the art of painting was turned to account in 1625, when he was sent to Italy by Charles I. to buy pictures for the royal collection.⁴ He remained in Italy about three years, and stayed at Mantua with Daniel Nys, the agent through whom the King acquired Mantegna's 'Triumph of Caesar' now at Hampton Court. Correggio's 'Mercury instructing Cupid' in the National Gallery, was another of the pictures bought through Laniero (see D.N.B. for other details unconnected with music). The patent of his appointment as Master of the King's Musick at a salary of £200 a year is dated July 11, 1626. In 1630 he set Herrick's poem on the birth of Prince Charles. He was appointed keeper of the king's miniatures, and in 1636 the King granted to Laniero and others a charter, incorporating them as 'The Marshal, Wardons, and Cominalty of the Arte and Science of Musicke in Westminster,' and appointed Laniero the first Marshal. At the outbreak of the civil war, Laniero lost his appointments, and seems to have spent much of his time abroad. There are passes among the State Papers, for him to journey with pictures and musical instruments between Flanders and England. In Jonckbloet and Land's Musique et musiciens au XVII^e siècle, p. xxi., is a letter from Lanier (as he spells it), dated Mar. 1, 1645, and in 1646 he begs Huygens to get him a passport to go to Holland. In 1655 the Earl of Newcastle gave a ball at the Hague at which a song set to music by Laniero was sung. At the Restoration he was reinstated in his posts as master of the king's music and marshal of the corporation of music. He composed New Year's Songs in 1663 and 1665, and died in Feb. 1666. The entry in the Greenwich registers is dated Feb. 24, 1665–66, 'Mr. Nicholas Laniero buried away' (i.e. elsewhere). Songs and other pieces by him are contained in 'Select Muscicall Ayres and Dialogues,' 1653 and 1659; 'The Musical Companion,' 1667; 'The Treasury of Musick,' 1669; and 'Choice Ayres and Songs,' book iv., 1685. Several songs and dialogues by him are in the B.M. Add. MSS. 11,608, 29,396; Eg. MS. 2013. A cantata, 'Hero and Leander,' is in B.M. Add. MSS. 14,399, 33,236. Other music is in MS. in the Bodl. Mus. Sch. and Christ Church. Vandeyck painted Laniero's portrait for Charles I., and at the dispersal of the royal collection it was bought by Laniero himself. Another portrait is in the Bodl. Mus. Sch., both painted and presented by Laniero.⁵

LANNER, (1) JOSEPH FRANZ KARL (b. Oberdöbling, near Vienna, Apr. 11/12, 1801; d. Apr. 14, 1843), famous as composer of dance music contemporary with Johann Strauss, was the son of a glove-maker; he early showed a talent for music, taught himself the violin, and by means of theoretical books learned to compose.

Next came the desire to conduct an orchestra; and in the meantime he got together a quartet party, in which the viola was taken by Strauss, his subsequent rival. They played potpourris from favourite operas, marches, etc., arranged by Lanner. He next composed waltzes and Ländler, first for a small, then for a full orchestra, and performed them in public. His popularity increased rapidly, and important places of amusement eagerly competed for his services. He also appeared in most of the provincial capitals, but declined all invitations abroad. He conducted the dancé music in the large and small Redoutensaal, and also that at the court balls, alternately with Strauss. As a mark of distinction he was appointed Kapellmeister of the second Bürger regiment. When thus at the height of prosperity he died, and was buried in the churchyard of Döbling, near Vienna. A memorial tablet was placed on the house in which he was born, May 15, 1879.¹

Lanner may be considered the founder of Viennese dancé music. His galops, quadrilles, polkas and marches, but especially his waltzes and Ländler, bear traces of the frank, genial disposition which made him so beloved. All his works, from op. 1 ('Neue Wiener Ländler') to his swan-song ('Die Schönbrunner'), are penetrated with the warm national life of Vienna. The titles often contain allusions to contemporaneous events and customs, and thus have an historical interest. His printed works amount to 208, and he left others unpublished. The following numbers are dedicated to crowned heads, and distinguished persons—opp. 74, 81, 85, 91, 101, 110-12, 115-116, 120, 128, 131-32, 138 ('Victoria-Walzer' dedicated to Queen Victoria), 143, 146, 155, 161-62. The 'Troubadour-Walzer,' op. 197, are dedicated to Donizetti, and the 'Norwegische Arabesken,' op. 145, to Ole Bull. Diabelli published opp. 1-15; Haslinger 16-32 and 170-208; Mechetti 33-169.

Of Lanner's three children, (2) AUGUST (b. Vienna, 1834; d. Sept. 27, 1855), a young man of great promise, followed his father's profession. (3) KATHARINA (b. Vienna, 1831), was a well-known dancer, who made her début at the court opera in Vienna in 1845, and appeared at all the important theatres in Europe. In 1858 she formed a children's ballet in Hamburg, which gave forty-six performances in Paris with great success. At a later date she was engaged also at the Italian Opera in England, and under her admirable management a high standard of dancing was maintained at the Empire Theatre in London.

of his church compositions, sacred and secular songs in MS. are preserved in the libraries of Bologna, Oxford (Bod. Lib.), and Cod. Trident, Vienna. Some of these have been republished in Stainer's Dufay and 'Hausmusik,' etc., by Riemann, who considers them almost equal to Binchois.

LANZETTI, DOMENICO (18th-19th cent.), a violoncellist of whom the Berlin Library possesses 10 violoncello concertos and 2 sonatas with instruments and basso continuo, all in MS.

LANZETTI, SALVATORE (b. Naples, c. 1710; d. Turin, c. 1780), famous violoncellist who studied at Naples, came to London c. 1739, and is mentioned by Burney as one of those who brought the violoncello into favour in England, where he still was in 1754, after a visit to Germany, where he gave concerts at Frankfort-on-M. on May 29 and 31, 1751. From London he went to Turin as member of the royal chapel. He composed a number of sonatas for one and two violoncellos with bass, and a Tutor for his instrument. Several of his sonatas have been republished by Piatti and by Schröder (Q.-L.).

LAPARRA, RAOUL (b. Bordeaux, May 13, 1876), operatic composer, who attained international recognition with his opera 'La Habañera.'

His first work of the kind was 'Peau d'Ane' (1899); 'La Habañera,' produced (1908) at the Opéra-Comique, was brought to Covent Garden two years later, when its skilful use of Spanish dance rhythms and other evidences of local colour in the orchestration produced a favourable impression. It has since been given with success in America. Another opera, 'La Jota,' was produced at the Opéra-Comique in 1911. A suite, 'Un Dimanche basque,' for piano and orchestra, was heard at Queen's Hall (1923), the composer playing the piano part.

C.

LAPICIDA, ERASMUS, nearly contemporary with Josquin des Prés, is mentioned by Ornithoparcus as one of the approved composers of his time, and is also referred to as an authority in musical theory in certain correspondence between Spataro and Giovanni del Lago. Petrucci printed some Lamentations by him with the plain-song melody in the tenor, also three motets. In Forster's Liederbuch, 1539, seven German songs bear his name, which Ambros thought to be adaptations of other compositions of Lapidida to German words; but Eitner claims to have proved them to be original settings of the German texts since the cantus firmus is in each case the original melody to the text. None of Lapidida's compositions have been reprinted in modern times.

J. R. M.

LAPIS SANTO (early 18th cent.), Italian composer, singer and mandolinist, member of the Philharmonic Academy, Bologna. Two operas of his were performed at Venice in 1729 and 1730. About the middle of the century he was music master at The Hague, and c. 1758 in London. He wrote a third opera, which was in Breitkopf's library in 1754, and several works of sonatas for various instruments. (See Q.-L.)

LAPORTE, L'ABBÉ JOSEPH DE (b. Belfort, c. 1713; d. Paris, Dec. 19, 1779), entered the Jesuit Order, where he finished his studies. He settled in Paris and devoted himself chiefly to literature, including an Almanach des spectacles, a Dictionnaire dramatique (c. 1776), and Anecdotes dramatiques, which give much interesting information about the stage and musical life in Paris (Riemann).

LAPORTE (DE LAPORTE), PIERRE FRANÇOIS (b. 1799; d. near Paris, Sept. 24 or 27, 1841), a French comedian,¹ came to London as a member and joint manager of a company which, in Jan. 1824, began performing French plays at the theatre in Tottenham Street. On Nov. 18, 1826, he appeared on the English stage, as a member of the Drury Lane company, as Sosia in Dryden's 'Amphitryon,' and afterwards played a variety of parts, mostly original, and amongst them Wormwood in 'The Lottery Ticket.' He next joined the Haymarket company, in which he first appeared June 15, 1827.

In 1828 he became manager of the King's Theatre, and continued such until 1831. In 1832 he was lessee of Covent Garden Theatre, and actor as well as manager, but was compelled to retire, with heavy loss, before the end of the season. In 1833 he resumed the management of the King's Theatre, and retained it until his death, which occurred in his father's house at Soisy-sous-Etiolles, near Paris. A notable feature of his last season (1841) was the 'Tamburini Row,' a disturbance of the performance occasioned by the admirers of Tamburini, who resented his non-engagement for that season, and by their tumultuous proceedings for two or three evenings forced the manager to yield to their wishes. Another curious feature of this year was the reappearance of Laporte in his original capacity as an actor, with Rachel, on three nights of her first London season. Laporte first introduced to the English public, amongst other operas, Rossini's 'Comte Ory' and 'Assedio di Corinto'; Bellini's 'Pirata,' 'Sonnambula,' 'Norma' and 'Puritani'; Donizetti's 'Anna Bolena,' and Costa's 'Malek Adel'; and amongst singers, Sontag, Méric-Lalande, Persiani, Assandri, Albertazzi, Pisaroni, Donzelli, David, jun., Ivanoff, Mario; and, above all, the famous quartet who so long held supremacy on the opera stage. Grisi, Rubini, Tamburini and Lablache. Though his dilatory and unbusinesslike habits ruined his management, Laporte was not without good qualities. Amongst others, his tact and coolness were great, and many of his bons mots were current at the time. When Cerrito returned the ticket of a box on the upper tier with the remark that she was much too young to be exalted to the skies before her time, Laporte—having already given a box on the same tier to Taglioni—replied that he 'had done his best, but that perhaps he had been wrong in placing her on the same level with Mlle. Taglioni.'

LA POUPLINIÈRE, ALEXANDRE, J. J. LE RICHE DE, see POUPLINIÈRE.

LAPPI (LAPFUS), PIETRO (b. Florence, latter part of 16th cent.). From 1600 until after 1628 he was maestro di cappella at the church 'delle Grazie,' Brescia. He was a prolific composer of masses and other church music; also instrumental music (Q.-L.; Riemann).

LARA, ISIDORE DE (b. London, Aug. 9, 1858), opera composer. At the age of 15 he entered the Milan Conservatorio, obtaining the gold medal for composition, which he studied with Mazzucato. He also studied singing under Lamperti. He then went to Paris and continued to work at composition under Lalo. On his return to England De Lara was at first known as a singer and song-writer, but his attention was turned to the stage when, on the suggestion of Victor Maurel, he transformed his cantata 'The Light of Asia' into an opera and secured its production at Covent Garden in 1892. The following year his 'Amy Robsart' was given at the same theatre and two years later in French at Monte Carlo. He lived for a time at Monte Carlo, producing 'Moïna' in 1897, and 'Messaline' in 1899, the last-named being heard at Covent Garden in 1901. 'Solfa' was produced, in German, at the Cologne Opera House in 1907; 'Sanga' at the Opéra-Comique, Paris, in 1908, and 'Nail' at the Théâtre de la Gaîté, Paris, in 1911, and Covent Garden during the summer season of 1919. 'Les Trois Masques' was first given at Marseilles in French in 1912, and later in English at Glasgow, 'The Three Musketeers' at Cannes in 1921, and by the Carl Rosa Company at Newcastle, May 2, 1924, and subsequently in London.

During the war (1914-18) De Lara gave in London many orchestral and chamber concerts of British music, at which numerous works were heard for the first time. He has worked hard to promote the establishment of a permanent opera in London, and believes it can only be done with a theatre specially designed to hold a large number of low-priced seats. As a composer De Lara works on the French model as represented by Massenet, and has a sure instinct for comic and orchestral effect. He is a Chevalier of the Legion of Honour and a Commander of the Crown of Italy. N. C. G.

LARCHET, JOHN F., Mus.D., (b. Dublin, 1885), studied at the R.I.A.M., graduated

Mus.B. (1915) and Mus.D. (1917) of Dublin University. He was for some years organist of the Jesuit Church, Dublin, and conductor of the Abbey Theatre orchestra, and, in 1920, was appointed professor of music at the National University, in succession to Dr. Kitson. He has composed many song cycles, tone poems and songs, and arranged some Irish folk-tunes in an unconventional way, and is regarded as a promising Irish composer.

W. H. G. F.

LARGE (Lat. maxima), the note of greatest time-value in the early system of Measured Music. It could be triple or duple (i.e. equaling three or two Longs), according to the mood.

(The black form is the earlier. In some very early examples the tail is omitted, but this is rare.)

With the increasing articulation of polyphonic music the Large became a somewhat fossilised form, and was seldom called for except in the plain-song canti fermi when a note was prolonged through several measures as a pedal-point

The final note of a composition was usually written as a Large; here the Large was used without mensural significance, indicating an indefinite prolongation of tone, as does the fermata or pause mark. In such cases the Large often appears in this form :

The breaking-up of the note into two is merely a convention of ornament, it has no vocal import. (See NOTATION.) S. T. W.

LARGHETTO, partaking of the broad style of Largo, but about the same pace with Andante.

LARGO, i.e. broad, an Italian term meaning a slow, broad, dignified style.

The term Largamente has come into use to denote breadth of style without change of tempo. Largo implies a slow pace, but the very varying metronome marks applied to it show conclusively that style and not pace is its principal intention. G.

In the B.M. Add. MSS. 31,424, fol. 46, 53b are two gigues marked Largo, the others in the same set being marked vivace or allegro.

M.

LARIGOT, from an old French word, l'arigot, for a small flute or flageolet, now obsolete, hence among organ stops the old name for a rank of small open metal pipes, the longest of which is only 1½ ft. speaking-length. Its pitch is a fifth above that of the fifteenth. It is first met with, in English organs, by HARRIS (q.v.), who passed many years in France, and who placed one in his instrument in St. Sepulchre's, Snow Hill, erected in 1670. E. J. H.

LAROCHE, HERMAN AUGUSTOVICH (b. St. Petersburg, May 25, 1845; d. there, Oct. 18, 1904), musical critic. He received his musical education at the Conservatoire, where he was a contemporary of Tchaikovsky (1862-66). In 1837 he was appointed to a professorship at the Moscow Conservatoire. He returned to St. Petersburg in 1871, where most of his life was spent. Laroche was a voluminous contributor to many of the leading Russian newspapers and periodicals, and was regarded as the chief representative of conservative principles in music. His writing was distinguished for its excellency of style, erudition, and flashes of original thought; but his work as a whole lacks system, and shows more personal bias than reasoned conviction. Laroche translated Hanslick's Vom Musikalisch-Schönen into Russian. He was one of the first to appreciate the genius of Tchaikovsky, and devoted many articles to his personality and his works. R. N.

LAROCHE, JAMES (JEMMY LAROCHE, or LAROCHE) (b. circa 1680-82), was a popular singer in London, though probably French by origin or birth, at the end of the 17th and beginning of the 18th centuries. He played, as a boy, the part of Cupid in Motteux's 'Loves of Mars and Venus,' set to music by Eccles and Finger, in which the part of Venus was played by Mrs. Bracegirdle, in 1696. His portrait appears on a very rare print, called

'The Raree Show, Sung by Jemmy Laroch in the Musical Interlude for the Peace, with the Tune set to Music for the Violin. Engraved Printed (col'd and sold by Sutton Nicholls next door to the Jack etc. London.'

It was afterwards published by Samuel Lyne. There are thirty-three verses, beginning 'O Raree Show, O Brave Show' below the engraving, which represents Laroche with the show on a stool, exhibiting it to a group of children; and at foot is the music. The Peace of Utrecht was signed in Apr. 1713, and this interlude was played in celebration of it, at the Theatre in Little Lincoln's Inn Fields, the music being written by John Eccles. The portrait of Laroche was also engraved by Laroon in his Cries of London. J. M.

LA RUE, P. DE, see RUE.

LARUETTE, JEAN LOUIS (b. Toulouse, Mar. 27, 1731; d. there, Jan. 1792), singer and actor at the Opéra-Comique and Comédie Italienne, Paris, and composer of 10 operas and operettas.

LASERNA, BLAS (d. Madrid, after 1801), Spanish musician. In 1779 he was appointed official composer to several of the Madrid theatres; and in 1790 he succeeded ESTEVE (q.v.). His comic opera, 'La Gitanilla por amor.' (Teatro de la Cruz, 1791) was a notable success; he composed an immense number of 'Tonadillas' (see MISSON, Luis), of which the Bibl. Nacional, Madrid, contains 13 vols., the Bibl. Municipal many more in unbound MSS. He also wrote incidental music for several of the great Spanish plays of the 17th century, by Calderón, Lope de Vega, Moreto and others. In 1801 he was conducting at the Cruz and Principe theatres at Madrid.

J. B. T.

LASSALLE, JEAN (b. Lyons, Dec. 17, 1847; d. Paris, Sept. 7, 1909), singer, the son of a silk-merchant at Lyons, was intended for the same business, and studied industrial design at the Beaux-Arts, Lyons, and later in Paris.

He abandoned the idea of a mercantile career, and for a time studied painting in Paris. He studied singing for a time at the Conservatoire, but making little progress he left the school and studied privately under Novelli (Lavessière). He made his début at Liège as St. Bris in the 'Huguenots' (Nov. 19, 1868). He sang next at Lille, Toulouse, the Hague and Brussels, where on Sept. 5, 1871, he made his début, with great success, as De Nevers, and was heard during the season as Ashton in 'Lucia,' Nelusko, Telramund, etc. On June 7, 1872, he made a successful début at the Paris Opéra as Tell. With the exception of visits, on leave of absence, to London, Russia, Madrid, Milan, Vienna, Prague, Warsaw, the United States, etc., Lassalle remained at the Opéra for twenty-three years, and became principal baritone there (1872-92) on the retirement of Faure. His parts included Don Juan, played by him in 1887 at the centenary performance, and Rigoletto on production of Verdi's opera there. He created the parts of Scindia (Massenet's 'Roi de Lahore'), Apr. 27, 1877; Sévère (Gounod's 'Polyeucte'), Oct. 7, 1878; Ben Saïd (ib. 'Tribut de Zamora'), Apr. 1, 1881; Lanciotto Malatesta (Thomas's 'Françoise de Rimini'), Apr. 14, 1882; Henri VIII. (Saint-Saëns), Mar. 5, 1883; Gunther (Reyer's 'Sigurd'), June 12, 1885; De Rysoor (Paladilhe's 'Patrie'), Dec. 20, 1886; Benvenuto Cellini ('Ascanio'), Mar. 21, 1890; the High Priest ('Samson and Dalila'), Nov. 23, 1892; these last two both by Saint-Saëns. On May 5, 1876, on leave of absence, he played at the Théâtre Lyrique (May 5, 1876) as the Count de Lusace in Joncières's 'Dimitri.' On Dec. 11, 1890, he played Escamillo in 'Carmen' at the Opéra-Comique with Mesdames Galli-Marié and Melba, and J. do Reszke, in aid of the Bizet memorial.

On June 14, 1879, he made his début at Covent Garden Theatre, under Gye, as Nelusko, and played there for three seasons with great success; Scindia in Massenet's opera above-mentioned, and June 21, 1881, the Demon in Rubinstein's opera of that name, on the production of these works in England. From 1888-93 he played at the same theatre under Harris, with unvarying success, a great variety of parts, notably July 13, 1889, Hans Sachs on production of 'Meistersinger' in Italian, and in some operas new at that theatre, the most important being Claude Frolo (Goring Thomas's 'Esmeralda'), July 12, 1890. In 1896 and 1897 he played in Germany. After 1901, Lassalle devoted himself to teaching in Paris, and in Nov. 1903 was appointed a professor at the Conservatoire. Excellent alike, both as a singer and an actor, the possessor of a beautiful voice, an indefatigable worker, Lassalle was one of the finest artists of his time.

LASSEN, EDUARD (b. Copenhagen, Apr. 13, 1830; d. Weimar, Jan. 15, 1904), though a native of Copenhagen, was virtually a Belgian musician, since he was taken to Brussels when only 2, entered the Conservatoire there at 12, in 1844 took the first prize as PF. player, in 1847 the same for harmony, and soon afterwards the second prize for composition. His successes, which were many, were crowned by the Grand Prix de Rome in 1851, after which he started on a lengthened tour through Germany and Italy. Disappointed in his hopes of getting a five-act opera performed at Brussels, he betook himself to Weimar, where in 1857 it was produced, as 'Landgraf Ludwig's Brautfahrt,' under the care of Liszt, with great success. In the following year he was appointed court music-director, and on the retirement of Liszt in 1861, succeeded him as conductor of the opera. A second opera, 'Frauenlob,' was given in 1861, and a third, 'Le Captif,' was brought out in Brussels in 1868. At Weimar Lassen had the satisfaction to produce 'Tristan und Isolde' in 1874, at a time when no other theatre but Munich had dared to do so. He there published a Symphony in D, a 'Beethoven' overture and a Festival ditto, music to Sophocles' 'Oedipus,' to Hebbel's 'Nibelungen,' Goethe's 'Faust,' Parts 1 and 2, to Devrient's version of 'Alderon's 'Circe,' and to Goethe's 'Pandora' (1886). His works include a second symphony in C, op. 78, cantata, a Fest-Cantate, a Te Deum, a set of 'Biblische Bilder,' for voices and orchestra, a large number of songs and other pieces. In 1881 he was decorated with the order of Leopold. His 'Faust' music long kept the stage all over Germany.

LASSERRE, JULES BERNARD (b. Tarbes, July 29, 1838; d. there, Feb. 19, 1906), eminent violoncellist, entered the Paris Conservatoire in 1852, where he gained the second prize in 1853 and the first prize in 1855. When the popular concerts of Pasdeloup were first started, he was appointed solo violoncellist; he also played with great success in the principal towns of France. During 1859 he was solo violoncellist at the court of Madrid, and travelled through Spain. In 1869 he took up his residence in England, and played principal violoncello under Sir Michael Costa and at the Musical Union. Lasserre wrote various compositions both for his own instrument and for the violin:

Études, Fantasies, Romances, Tarantelles, Transcriptions, a violoncello Method, etc.

LASSUS, ORLANDE DE (b. Mons, Belgium, 1530 or 1532; d. Munich, June 14, 1594), is probably the original name of the great Netherland musician of the 16th century who more frequently subscribed himself as ORLANDO LASSO or ORLANDUS LASSUS, sometimes with the preposition di or de between the two names. In one exceptional case his name is latinised as LASSUSIUS.

EARLY LIFE.—There is no proper authority for the assertion that his original name was Roland de Lattre. He was born at Mons in Belgium, but the most recent investigation still leaves it uncertain whether in 1530 or 1532. Dr. Adolf Sandberger,¹ after reviewing all the available evidence, confesses himself unable absolutely to decide between the two dates, but is personally inclined to give the preference to 1530. The earlier date of 1520, which was adopted by H. Delmotte,² must be unhesitatingly rejected. Delmotte relied too exclusively on one writer, François Vinchant, who in his Annals of Hainault, written not long before 1635, stated that the composer was born 'in the year in which Charles V. was crowned Emperor at Aix-la-Chapelle.' Sandberger is able to show that Vinchant did not make this statement on any first-hand information, but merely copied it along with other mistaken dates from an earlier writer in 1615, who is as little to be relied on as a first-hand authority. As will appear below, the early date of birth is quite irreconcilable with the other known facts of Orlando's life, and with the evidence of the inscriptions on his various portraits. It seemed to be supported for a time by Baini's statement in his life of Palestrina that Orlando was choirmaster at St. John Lateran in Rome in 1541, and by the further statement that his First Book of Motets was published in 1545. But no trace of such a book has ever been found, and Baini's statement is proved to be erroneous by the discovery of the precise date of Orlando's presence at Rome as 1553.³

It is also Vinchant who has given currency to the story that Orlando's father was found guilty of being a coiner of false money, and that on this account the composer changed his name from Roland de Lattre to Orland de Lassus. This story has been proved to be false by the discovery that the name of the criminal was not de Lattre, but Jehan de Lassus, so that the reason alleged for change of name becomes meaningless. Nor is there any evidence to connect this Jehan with the family of the composer. As Ch. van den Borren assures us, the name de Lassus was quite a common name in Hainault, being simply a contraction of de là-dessus, and has nothing to do with de Lattre (= de l'âtre), and Roland is simply a variant of Orlande, but the latter was more commonly used in the 16th century.⁴ On the ground of local tradition, Sandberger allows that some credence may be given to Vinchant's further statement with regard to the situation of the house in which the composer was born, as also of his having been one of the boy-choristers of the Church of St. Nicolas in Mons. But for a fuller and more trustworthy account of Orlando's early life we must refer to that given by Samuel Quickelberg, a physician to the court of Munich personally acquainted with Orlando, in a biographical dictionary, H. Pantaleon's Prosopographiæ heroum atque illustrium vivorum, etc., published at Basle in 1565. Quickelberg begins his account with the definite statement that Orlando was born at Mons in 1530. This date is also attested by the inscriptions on various portraits of the composer up to the year 1580, but has against it the inscription on the last portrait of all, an engraving dedicated to Orlando himself by Johann Sadeler, the artist attached to the court of Munich. This inscription reads, 'Actat. suae LXXI. Anno Dñi 1593.' A copy of this engraving appears on the title-page of Orlando's last publication signed by him shortly before his death in 1594, and his epitaph also describes him as aged 62 at the time of his death. Dr. Sandberger would account for these discrepancies of date between the earlier and later portraits on the supposition that Orlando in the last years of his life had come to believe in the later date of birth. But there are also, as Sandberger points out, certain discrepancies in Quickelberg's enumeration of years which would leave the way open to the acceptance of the 1532 date.

Quickelberg relates that from his ninth year Orlando made great progress in his knowledge of music, and the beauty of his voice attracted so much attention that he was thrice abducted, but that on the third occasion his parents permitted him to be taken into the service of Ferdinand Gonzaga, Viceroy of Sicily, who was then commander of the emperor's forces at St. Dizier. This brings us to the year 1544, as it is otherwise known that the siege of St. Dizier took place in July and August of that year. Orlando accompanied Gonzaga first to Sicily, then for a longer period to Milan. After six years, Quickelberg says, Orlando's voice broke, and at the age of 18, Constantin Castriotto took him to Naples, where he lived for three years with the Marquis of Terza. Here Quickelberg's narrative is somewhat inconsistent, or he is loose in his reckoning of years. For if Orlando was six years with Gonzaga before his voice broke at the age of 18, then Orlando can only have been born in 1532. Quickelberg goes on to relate that from Naples Orlando came to Rome, where he was the guest of the Archbishop of Florence for six months, and was then appointed choirmaster to the celebrated Church of St. John Lateran. This latter statement was previously open to doubt, as apart from Baini's reference to it with the mistaken date of 1541, there was no further evidence, but all doubt may now be considered as set at rest by the discovery of some documents which indirectly appear to show that Orlando did actually occupy this post from at least Apr. 1553 to Dec. 1554.¹ According to Quickelberg he was two years altogether in Rome, and was then recalled to Flanders on hearing of the illness of his parents, but arriving too late and finding them dead he accepted the invitation to accompany Cesare Brancaccio, a Neapolitan nobleman and musical amateur, on a visit first to England and then to France, and afterwards settled for two years in Antwerp, where he enjoyed the society of men of rank and culture, rousing their interest in his music, and gaining their esteem and affection. Some doubt has been entertained about this alleged visit to England, as Quickelberg's own reckoning of years hardly leaves room for it, or it must have been of very short duration. Brancaccio indeed is known to have been in England before July 1554, and if Orlando was with him he must have left Rome early in 1554. We know from Orlando himself that he was settled in Antwerp some time before May 1555, and in the preface to his first publication at Antwerp in 1555 he makes no mention of any visit to England, but speaks of having come straight from Rome to Antwerp, and in the dedication of his Cantiones of 1562 he mentions only Italy, France and Flanders as countries known to him. Apart from this last point, and making allowance for discrepancies of dates, we may accept Quickelberg's account of the successive phases of Orlando's youthful career as true in the main, whether 1530 or 1532 be taken as the year of birth.

By his 22nd or 23rd year he had already obtained a very extensive and varied experience of life in the society of distinguished patrons, and besides his musical talents he must have had remarkably engaging social qualities to have secured the favour of so many in high positions. It also says much for his strength of character in his youthful years that in spite of the dissipations of court life he found time for the serious study of musical composition. Who were his actual masters we have no means of knowing, but both at Milan and Naples, the two places where he made the longest stay of his adolescent years, there were musicians of distinction from whom he may have learned to pay less attention to the scholastic formalities of canon and cantus firmus than was customary at Rome, and rather to concentrate his efforts on the art of expression by a freer system of counterpoint and chordal harmony.

ANTWERP PUBLICATIONS.—With his settlement in Antwerp at the end of 1554 or the beginning of 1555, there is no longer any uncertainty with regard to the details of Orlando's career. He emerges to the light of day as the fully-equipped musician with an already strongly marked individuality of style. His two first publications appeared in 1555, one indeed printed at Venice, which may have been left or sent there shortly before his arrival in Antwerp. This was his First Book of Italian Madrigals a 5, containing 22, not reckoning second parts separately, mostly on verses by Petrarch. The madrigal was then the highest and most refined form of secular music, and its cultivation exercised a beneficial influence on the composition of the Latin motet and Mass by calling for greater attention to the proper expression of words and sentiments. It was in 1555 that Palestrina also published his First Book of Madrigals, and it is interesting to notice from the first the difference of style of the two great masters, in that while Palestrina endeavours to express the general sentiment of the words by smooth flowing melodic phrases, Orlando aims at emphasising the significance of particular words by abrupt turns of melody and harmony, and also by unusual chromatic modulations. Orlando's other publication of 1555 is even more interesting, as showing from the first the remarkably versatile and cosmopolitan character of his musical activity. It is a miscellaneous collection of Italian madrigals and villanellas, French chansons and Latin motets, all a 4. This was published by Tylman Susato of Antwerp in two editions, one with an Italian title and dedication by Orlando, the other with a longer French title and without dedication, and then again in the same year there was another edition printed by Waelrant and Laet, rivals of Susato in the Antwerp publishing trade, all which seems to show that Orlando's works were already being much sought after. His dedication is addressed to a Signor Stefano, an Antwerp musical dilettante, who expected from the composer music easily understood and generally pleasing. The book may be said to satisfy these requirements. The 7 madrigals, one of which is a sestina, are written in a more spontaneous and less artificial style than those of the First Book a 5. These are followed by 6 villanellas, the fruits no doubt of his earlier stay at Naples, which differ from the madrigals in being of a humorous character and written in a lighter and more popular style with the simplest homophonic harmony and repetition in several verses. The villanella was originally a simple popular song current in the territory of Naples, which was often sung with an improvised three-part harmony consisting of a free use of consecutive fifths and thirds. When first adopted as an art-form about 1545, it continued to be written in this rustic style of harmony with the tune at the top, and such compositions were styled 'Canzoni villanesche alla Napolitana,' and afterwards 'Napolitano' simply. There is one example by Orlando of this rustic style of three-part harmony with consecutive fifths in a composition entitled Moresca contained in a collection 'Il terzo libro delle villotte alla Napolitana de diversi con due moresche,' which first appeared in 1560. But by his use of four-part harmony in the book of 1555 he gave greater refinement to this class of work, though it also appears that in some of these pieces his tenor part is simply adopted from an earlier composer of such trifles. The 6 French chansons¹ which come next are of a sentimental cast, exquisite miniatures in the madrigal style with perhaps some influence from the villanella, though this latter influence is more apparent afterwards in the chansons of a comic or satirical character. Then come 4 Latin motets, which are remarkable as showing from the first Orlando's marked predilection in church music for the composition of texts of a deeply penitential or meditative prayerful character, in which generally speaking he was more successful than in the composition of texts of a joyous festival character. As Ch. van den Borren says, the sentiment of penitence is expressed with a singular intensity in the two motets on texts from the Office of the Dead, 'Peccantem me quotidie' and 'Domine quando veneris.' The appearance of such works so early in his career seems to show that in spite of the dissipations of the brilliant court life to which he had been accustomed, and with the keen appreciation of the humorous aspects of life which find expression in so much of his secular work, there was still a vein of deep religion in his nature which found sincere expression in his church music. With all his keen interest in the ordinary social life of the world, he was not too much a man of the world to ignore the higher interests and aspects of human life. At the end of this miscellaneous work of 1555 there are two secular pieces with Latin words, one 'Alma Nemes,' by Orlando, the other 'Calamisonum ferentes,' by Cyprian de Rore, which are remarkable as being very bold experiments for the time in chromatic writing, showing the desire to illustrate particular words and phrases by unusual chromatic progressions and harmonies, as for instance in 'Alma Nemes,' specially on the words 'Simul dulce novumque melos.' Orlando seems to have been influenced in this direction by Cyprian, whose acquaintance he may have made in Italy, and therefore included in his own publication an example by Cyprian, as if to justify his own attempt. This indeed is implied by the words in the title of the French edition, 'à la nouvelle composition d'aucuns d'Italie.' In the Magnum Opus of 1604 'Alma Nemes' was provided with sacred words beginning 'Alme Deus,' retaining wherever possible the original words, and in this edition we might even see a punning reference to Cyprian in the chromatic treatment of the words 'rore tegens.'

In 1556 Orlando published another important work at Antwerp, his First Book of Motets, 12 a 5 and 6 a 6. This book is dedicated to Antoine Perrenot, Bishop of Arras, afterwards more generally known as the statesman Cardinal Granvelle, who had just recently in 1555 become chief minister to Philip II. of Spain for the government of the Netherlands. In the dedication Orlando expresses his gratitude for benefits already received, describing Perrenot as being at that time his only patron and benefactor, and calls his special attention to the first motet of the book, 'Delitiae Phoebi,' on verses written in his praise, in which the composer also makes a strong appeal for his further patronage by the words 'Musarum famulum ne despice, sustine Lassum,' duly emphasised in their musical setting. Evidently Orlando was just then anxious to obtain some permanent church position in the Netherlands through the patronage of this powerful statesman bishop. Another motet, a 5, 'Te spectant, Reginalde, poli,' is addressed to Cardinal Pole, with a flattering pun upon his name. Orlando may have come in contact with Pole through Bishop Perrenot on some occasion of Pole's passage through Antwerp. The verses were also probably written by Orlando himself, and suggest that his political and religious sympathies were all on the Roman side in the great controversies of the day. Two motets a 6, 'Heroum Soboles' and 'Si qua tibi obtulerint,' are addressed to the Emperor Charles V., indirectly soliciting his patronage by lauding his merits as a musical connoisseur and a generous patron of musicians. 'Heroum Soboles' is written in a very jubilant style with mostly homophonic harmony. 'Si qua tibi obtulerint' is mistakenly described in the Breitkopf & Härtel edition of Orlando's *Magnum Opus*² as addressed to Bishop Perrenot, but the last line plainly shows that the reference is to the Emperor, 'maxima (merces) laudari principis ore boni,' and in the original edition it is an immediate sequel to the 'Heroum Soboles.' It is also noticeable for its combination of texts, the second also having only the words, 'aequabit laudes nulla camena tuas,' with its musical phrase as cantus firmus throughout. Of the church motets in this publication the penitential pieces are again remarkable for a peculiar intensity of expression. 'Gustate et videte,' a 5, has a story attached to it which will be referred to later on. 'Fremuit spiritu Jesus', a 6, the story of the resurrection of Lazarus, is written in a very dramatic style, the second soprano having only in long sustained notes the words, 'Lazare veni foras,' which the other voices take up after the word 'exclamavit,' and repeat with greater emphasis. Orlando does not often use the strict canon form, but we may just note his impressive setting of 'Creator omnium Deus,' with its canon in subdiapente post unum tempus between second soprano and second tenor. This piece concludes with the words, 'Da pacem in diebus nostris,' and the two pieces which follow are two quite different, but both considered to be fine, settings of the whole of this antiphon, 'Da pacem,' the second piece using the plain-song melody in the tenor. The circumstances of the time may have induced Orlando to conclude his work with these three earnest prayers for peace.

RESIDENCE AT MUNICH.—It was probably through his patron, the Bishop of Arras, who had relations with the Bavarian court, that Orlando was recommended to the notice of Albert V., Duke of Bavaria, who was just then anxious to increase and reorganise the musical resources of his chapel at Munich by recruiting new members from the Netherlands. Quickelberg dates Orlando's engagement in 1557, but Sandberger is able to show that Orlando must have been already at Munich before the end of 1556. A MS. mass by him in Munich already bears the date 1556, and his first quarter's salary is paid from some time in December. Ludwig Daser still remained Kapellmeister, and Orlando was at first engaged simply as one of the singers or chamber musicians, but occupied an exceptional position, having a higher salary than the others, and even than Daser himself, apart from what Daser received for the maintenance and instruction of the choir-boys. From December 1557 he received 200 florins per annum. In 1558 he married Regina Weckinger, daughter of a lady of the Munich court. A very expressive motet a 5, 'Sponsa, quid agis, mea lux,' first published in the Magnum Opus of 1604, is thought to have been written and composed by Orlando to celebrate the occasion of his own marriage. In the Secondo libro delle Muse, a 4, published at Rome by A. Barré in 1558, appeared a madrigal by Orlando, 'Deh or foss' io,' which Ch. van den Borren considers a real pearl of madrigal composition, and which it is interesting to compare with Palestrina's setting of the same words as the first number of his First Book of Madrigals a 4, 1555. We may specially notice the simple way in which Orlando endeavours to illustrate the single word 'addormentato.' In 1559 appeared his Second Book of Madrigals a 5, containing 10 numbers, beginning with a sestina, but also including 3 contributions by other composers. But most of these pieces had previously appeared in 'Secondo Libro delle Muse a 5,' published at Rome in 1557, with a dedicatory preface by a Roman admirer of Orlando's works, which he describes as 'full of sweetness and art.' He was unwilling that these 'fruits of a most rare genius,' which he had already obtained from the composer himself in Rome, should be withheld from the public. The madrigals of the second book of 1559 might thus appear to be earlier than those which Orlando had selected for his first book of 1555, and they are less chromatic with more use of homophonic harmony after the manner of the Villanellas. In 1560 two different editions of what is described as the First Book of Madrigals a 4, appeared, one at Rome, the other at Venice, containing the seven madrigals of the miscellaneous collection of 1555, with two new ones different in each case. Publishers seem to have had a free hand in these matters. These parallel publications were afterwards combined in 1569 as together constituting Orlando's First Book of Madrigals a 4, containing 11 numbers which was then frequently reprinted. 1560 was also the year of publication of a large number of chansons in the collections of Le Roy and Ballard in Paris, and of Peter Phalèse in Louvain. Among them may be specially mentioned 'Mon cœur se recommande à vous,' a 5; 'Le Rossignol' and 'Susanne un jour,' both a 5, which reappear in Yonge's Musica Transalpina of 1588, where also are independent settings of the same texts by Alfonso Ferrabosco. In Ferrabosco's setting of 'Susanne un jour,' we may just notice a slight resemblance in the soprano part to some of Orlando's phrases. As Ferrabosco is known to have been intimate with Byrd, it may have been he who called Byrd's attention to Orlando's settings, and incited him to provide his independent settings of the English words, 'Susanna fair,' a 5, in his 'Psalms and Sonnets' of 1588, and in 1589, 'Susanna fair' and 'The Nightingale,' a 3.² But what is also worth mentioning and apparently has not been noticed before, is that Giles Farnaby in his setting of 'Susanna fair,'³ a 4 in his book of 1598, has simply taken over Orlando's soprano part into his own soprano as a cantus firmus in longer notes for his independent counterpoint in shorter notes in the other voices. Included with the chansons of 1560 there is an interesting setting a 6 of the first ten lines of dialogue from Virgil's First Eclogue, 'Tityre tu patulae,' almost entirely with homophonic harmony and with a fairly close observance of Latin quantities. In 1561 Orlando's only publications are three madrigals of an elegiac character contributed to the 'Terzo Libro delle Muse a 5,' published by Gardano at Venice, one of which, 'Oh d'amarissime onde,' is reprinted in Hawkins's History. It is also perhaps of some interest to note that in this collection Orlando appears in company with Palestrina, who contributes 8 numbers, one of which, very popular, 'Io son ferito,' Orlando afterwards takes as the title and basis of one of his masses. In the 'Terzo Libro delle Muse a 4,' published by Anton Barré at Rome in 1562, are three more madrigals by Orlando, simpler and more homophonic, but graceful and expressive.

In June 1562 a more important work saw the light. Orlando published at Nuremberg his 'Sacrae cantiones 5 vocum,' dedicated to Duke Albert, containing 25 numbers. This work shows the master in the full possession of all the resources of his art for the devout expression of the various phases of personal religious feeling from penitential sorrow and prayerful meditation to joyous praise and thanksgiving. Without specifying particular masterpieces, we may just note as characteristic of his style his fondness for the picturesque illustration of prominent words and phrases, as in 'Videntes stellam Magi' and 'Jerusalem plantabis'; in 'O Domine salvum fac,' on the words 'non moriar, sed vivam,' and in the very expressive 'Quam benignus' the words 'in silentio.' The strangest instance is perhaps on the word 'laborem' in 'Deus qui sedes.' 'Clare sanctorum,' an old sequence of the 9th century for the Feasts of Apostles, may be referred to as showing how Orlando got over the difficulty of setting a list of names, by using the old melody of Nokter Balbulus as a cantus firmus in one or other of the voices. Proske esteemed this work very highly, describing it as 'eine höchst werthvolle Komposition.'

From 1563, if not somewhat earlier, Orlando became full Kapellmeister at Munich, Ludwig Daser retiring on a handsome pension. The circumstances of Daser's retirement are somewhat obscure. He was not so much older than Orlando, and was a composer of talent. It has been thought that through prolonged ill-health he may have been no longer equal to the duties of his position, specially in view of the increase of the staff of musicians, but religion also may have had something to do with the matter. Daser would appear to have had Lutheran sympathies, and though in 1556 and before the final sessions of the Council of Trent, Albert V., like Ferdinand of Austria, had been obliged to make concessions to Protestant feeling by allowing the communion of the cup to the laity in the mass, and by a relaxation of strict rules of fasting, from 1563 onwards these privileges were being gradually withdrawn, under the influence of the Jesuit mission in Bavaria, until in 1569 they were absolutely revoked, and the old form of religion was definitely re-established. Daser continued to live in Munich for some years afterwards, until he accepted another post at the Lutheran court of Würtemberg, but his pension was not withdrawn, and in 1578 he published at Munich a setting of the Fassion a 4, which he dedicated to Duke Albert in gratitude, as he says, for the singular clemency of the Duke towards him and for many exceptional kindnesses.¹ All this speaks well for the Duke as for Daser, and a pension was still allowed by the Bavarian court to Daser's widow as late as 1601.

THE PENITENTIAL PSALMS.—To Orlando and his compositions special honour was now shown by Duke Albert. At his instance Orlando had undertaken the composition of the Seven Penitential Psalms, and the task was evidently very congenial to the mind of the composer. The Duke admired these works so highly that he had them beautifully transcribed on parchment and adorned with miniatures by his court painter, Hans Mülch, and then handsomely bound in two folio volumes in red morocco with silver clasps. The carrying out of the Duke's wishes occupied several years, from 1563–70. In the first volume, completed in 1565, is a portrait² of the composer without any indication of age, but with this inscription round the outside of the oval, 'In corde prudentis requiescit sapientia et indoctos quosque erudiet. Prov. xiii.' In the second volume, which was not completed till 1570, is another portrait full-length with the inscription, 'Imago excellentissimi musici Orlandi de Lassus suae aetatis 40 anno.' With these volumes are associated two others, smaller, one containing Quickelberg's commendatory notice of Orlando's music, and an explanation of the first set of miniatures; the other has a continuation of this explanation written by some one else after Quickelberg's death in 1567.

Quickelberg describes Orlando's music as being of the style known as 'musica reservata,' which he explains as that which aims at the dramatic expression of the words. These four volumes are some of the chief treasures of the State Library at Munich. Ambros observes that 'if any music ever merited a splendid outward adornment as a symbol of its intrinsic value, it is that of these Psalms. Besides their masterly construction they have a quite peculiar colouring of spiritual nobility, and a magical fragrance of beauty hovers over them.' So, too, Van den Borren writes:

'The celebrity of this work is justified by its exceptional merit. It is marvellous that, having to treat a subject relatively monotonous, Orlando has remained throughout equal to his task. Without any failure of inspiration he makes to pass before us all the states of soul which the Psalmist describes, ranging from the profoundest grief to the brightest hope. . . . All this he has depicted in a musical language ideally concise, in which the madrigalesque element intervenes largely, but with the utmost discretion and with a most exquisite sense of proportion.'

These Psalms are written mainly a 5, but always with several verses interspersed as duos, trios, and quartets, and the last verse 'Sicut erat' always more elaborately set a 6. The duos and trios are specially masterly in construction. The 'De profundis' has in one or other of the voices the 6th Psalm tone as cantus firmus, which in two of the verses is treated in canon form. To the Psalms of Penitence¹ there is appended the two Laudate Psalms 148 and 150, treated as one Psalm in four divisions.

VARIOUS PUBLICATIONS.—The only publication of Orlando in 1563 was the Third Book of Madrigals a 5, not, however, issued by Orlando himself, but consisting of 13 older and newer pieces collected and edited by the publisher Antonio Barré in Rome. In 1564 appeared two books of chansons, one published by Jacob Susato at Antwerp containing 27 numbers a 4, short pieces mostly of a humorous or satirical character, the other published by Phalèse at Louvain, with similar pieces a 4 and 5, including three with Latin words. Some numbers a 4 are common to both publications.² It is interesting to notice in so many of Orlando's publications the strange mixture of sacred and secular work. So in Susato's publication we find 'Du fond de ma pensée,' Marot's translation of Psalm 130, with the Huguenot Psalm tune in the tenor. In Phalèse there appears for the first time the mediæval drinking-song, 'Fertur in conviviis,' set a 4 in a striking fashion, which in the Magnum Opus of 1604 has the words slightly altered to express quite opposite sentiments. It had been previously adapted in 1576 to new words, 'Tristis ut Eurydicen,' as an elegy on the death of the older master Clemens non Papa. This transformation may have been suggested by the use which Orlando makes of the plain-song 'Requiem' at the conclusion. Whether Orlando had anything to do with these alterations of text must remain uncertain. In Phalèse we have again the curious mixture of the sacred with the outrageously secular. With 'Fertur in conviviis' there are two motets a 5, 'Pater peccavi,' and 'Quid prodest stulto,' the latter noticeable for its peculiar cantus firmus in the tenor with the words 'Vanitas vanitatum, omnia est vanitas.' To the great collection in 5 volumes entitled 'Thesaurus musicus,' published at Nuremberg in 1564 by Montanus and Neuber and dedicated by them to Duke Albert of Bavaria, Orlando contributes a considerable number of new motets. In the first volume a 8 we find the splendid piece 'Confitebor tibi' written in the Venetian style for two responsive choirs, immediately followed by the satirical parody of a church hymn 'Jam lucis orto sidere,' in the form of a drinking-song; very cleverly written for two choirs in homophonic harmony, but rather out of place in this collection, into which one might think it had only gained admission in virtue of its title. The second volume a 7 has two very fine motets by Orlando, 'Estote misericordes' and 'Decantabat Israel.' The third volume a 6 has 5 new motets among them 'Timor et tremor,' remarkable for its depth of expression by the appropriate use of chromatic semitones. The fourth volume a 5 has four new motets, including 'Confisus Domino,' with its interestingly varied cantus firmus with the words 'Confide et ama.' In the fifth volume a 4 is a fine complete setting of Psalm 64, 'Te Deum,' in short sections verse by verse with purely syllabic declamation. One might wish to have had more psalms set in this simple style. In 1565 Orlando published, with a dedication to Duke Albert, 'Sacrae lectiones novem ex propheta Job' a 4, the lessons from the Vigil Office of the Dead. This is one of the more important works of the master, but no modern complete edition of it is yet available for study. It furnishes one of many indications from his works generally how, with all his capacity for the humorous enjoyment of ordinary life in the world, and apart from the urgency of any special occasion, his mind, like that of Sebastian Bach and Johannes Brahms, was apt to brood deeply over the mystery of death. A second book of 'Sacrae cantiones' a 5 and 6 was published at Venice in 1565, consisting of motets which had come into the hands of Guelio Bonagiunta of St. Mark's, Venice, an industrious collector of good compositions, who had received Orlando's permission to publish them. This was followed in 1566 by a third book published by Gardano, containing the motets of 1566 with some additions, and a fourth book containing new motets a 6 and 8, but these editions were superseded by more comprehensive collections afterwards which we shall have occasion to mention later on. To Bonagiunta's collection of madrigals by various composers, entitled 'Il Desiderio,' Orlando contributed a sestina, which is interesting for some strange experiments in chromatic harmony with a view to greater expressiveness.

THE MUNICH CHAPEL.—In 1567 Orlando

travelled to Venice to engage new singers and instrumentalists for the Bavarian court. Here, anticipating a little, we may mention that among those engaged about this time whose names appear on the pay-rolls of the Munich court from 1568 onwards, were some distinguished musicians who were also composers of merit, as Antonio Morari, who became leader of the instrumentalists (capo della musica instrumentale), Gioseffo Guami and Ivo de Vento, who were appointed organists, Francesco Guami, Simone Gatti and Fileno Cornazzano, trumpet or trombone players; Anton Gosswin, a pupil of Orlando, who was one of the alto singers, and had charge of some of the choir-boys, and Massimo Trojano, an alto singer and comedian, who has left us some interesting accounts of the Munich court and its affairs. With them may be mentioned Johann von Lockenburg, a musician of older date in the ducal service, one of whose MS. masses, 'Orsus à coup' a 4, has been mistakenly attributed to Orlando. At its maximum, the musical staff of the Bavarian court, employed in church and chamber service, consisted of about 90 members—60 vocalists (including the boys) and 30 instrumentalists. The instrumental music of the time was elementary. It consisted mainly in doubling the voice parts with the voices, or in playing the voice-parts without the voices. The motet collections of the time, like the Thesaurus Musicus of 1564, describe their contents as 'ad omnis generis instrumenta musica accomodatas.' (Q.-L.) In compositions a 8 for two choirs, instruments would frequently take the place of one of the two choirs. In chamber music there was also the frequent practice of one part being sung by a single voice while the lute alone or lute and viols played the other voice parts. But already in 1547 and 1559 Jacques Buus and Adrian Willaert had published pieces entitled Ricercari or Fantasia, meant to be played by instruments alone, although written very much in the vocal style. A step further was taken by the Spanish musician Diego Ortiz, engaged as choir-master to the Vice-regal Chapel at Naples, whom it is possible Orlando may there have met, and who published at Rome in 1553, just when Orlando was also there, a treatise¹ showing in much detail how madrigals might be converted into instrumental pieces by one or other instrument playing one of the vocal parts in a style of florid variation, while the other parts were played simply as originally written. We may add that an instrumental 'Symphonie a 6,' alleged to be written by Orlando, is given in Wasielewski's Geschichte der Instrumental Musik im 16ten Jahrhundert (Berlin, 1878), which, however, is written in a purely vocal style.

Returning from this digression, we may follow Orlando on his journey from Venice to Ferrara to present in person his Fourth Book of Madrigals a 5, just recently printed at Venice, to Alfonso II., Duke of Ferrara. Orlando had previously come into contact with Duke Alfonso, on occasion of a visit paid by the Duke to Munich to his relative Duke Albert. Alfonso had then expressed himself greatly pleased with a sestina of Orlando's sung in his presence, and had handsomely rewarded the composer. In his dedication Orlando tactfully recalls this incident, and expresses the hope that his Book of Madrigals would be equally pleasing to the Duke. But on this occasion he was coldly received and would have been dismissed without reward, had not the Florentine ambassador at Ferrara intervened on Orlando's behalf to avoid diplomatic difficulties, and save the credit of the Duke. The book itself, containing 12 numbers including two lengthy pieces, sestinas, deserved a better reception, as it shows a great advance on the composer's previous work of the kind, a greater refinement of workmanship and expression, with a more restrained use of chromatic modulation. Another publication of 1567 is a Book of Magnificats on the eight tones, printed at Nuremberg, with 24 numbers, 8 a 4, 8 a 5, 8 a 6, the alternate verses only being composed, the others being sung in unison to the proper tone in each case. The 8 numbers a 4,² are very simple and concise, mostly with homophonic harmony, the others a 5 and 6 are more elaborate, some verses being set as duos or trios, etc. A third publication of the year, printed at Munich, is even more important as testimony to the versatility of Orlando's genius, his first book of compositions to German words. Its full title is 'Neue teutsche Liedlein mit fünff Stimmen welche ganz lieblich zu singen und auf allerley Instrumenten zu gebrauchen.' It was dedicated to Duke William, the eldest son of Duke Albert, and has 15 numbers, including three religious pieces, two being settings of Lutheran hymns, 'Vater Unser' and 'Ich ruf zu dir, Herr Jesu Christ,' with their proper tunes used as a free cantus firmus; the other, 'Wie lang, O Gott, in meiner Noth,' is throughout Orlando's own composition. The other numbers are German songs of a popular humorous character. With Duke William, Orlando stood on a more confidential footing than with his father, on terms, indeed, of an intimate personal friendship, as a large number of letters which have been preserved, shows. Through the intervention of Duke William he was enabled to obtain a grant from the ducal treasury of 1000 florins, for the purchase of a convenient house near the court. His salary in 1567 was raised to

280 florins. In 1568 took place the marriage of Duke William to Renata or Renée, daughter of Duke Francis of Lorraine. Massimo Trojano in his books entitled Discorsi and Dialogi, published 1568 and 1569, has left a detailed account of the musical and dramatic festivities on this occasion, in which Orlando took a prominent part, not only as director of the music, but to the great delight of the illustrious guests, as a comic actor in an improvised Italian commedia dell' arte. A Te Deum a 6 and some masses were specially composed by him for the occasion, also two motets, 'Quid trepidas' a 6, and 'Gratia sola Dei' a 5-6. The Te Deum is composed very elaborately, only, however, the even verses and the Sanctus, the other odd verses being sung antiphonally in unison plain-song. Some verses are set as duos, trios, quatuors, sung no doubt by select solo-voices. The motet 'Gratia sola Dei' is a setting of 14 hexameter lines, the first letters of which form the acrostic 'Guilhelmus-Renea.' Massimo¹ Trojano tells us that this was sung at table, and during the singing of the second part a 4 by four select voices, all present were so spell-bound by the singing as to stop in the middle of their feasting to listen intently to the sweet harmonies, and at the end of the third part a 6, Orlando was greatly applauded.

MOTETS AND CHANSONS.—In 1568 two comprehensive collections of Orlando's motets were published at Nuremberg, in which these works were included, one 'Selectissimae cantiones' a 6 to 10, including, with considerable additions, all that had previously appeared a 6 to 8 in the Venetian publications of 1565, 1566, making altogether 38 numbers a 6, 3 a 7, 4 a 8, 1 a 10; the other, similarly including what had appeared, a 5 and 4, making 39 numbers a 5, and 11 a 4. These new collections would seem to have been intended to oust the Italian editions from the German market. There may have been a certain amount of jealousy between German and Italian publishers. Among the motets a 6 we may notice the effective epic-dramatic settings of the liturgical Gospels for Christmas and Epiphany-tide: 'In principio erat verbum,' 'Cum natus esset Jesus,' 'Nuptiae factae sunt,' also some splendid settings of Church hymns, 'Jesu nostra redemptio,' 'Vexilla regis,' etc., without any reference to their plain-song tunes, but with beautiful duos and trios for solo voices interspersed. Among shorter pieces a 6, the best known is the quiet but very expressive 'In Monte Oliveti.' A beautiful Passion piece is also 'Huc me sidereo,' with a fine trio in the middle. Nor can we altogether pass by those pieces in which Orlando gives us his solemn meditations on the mystery of death, such as 'O mors, quam amara' (Eccles. xli.

vv. 1-3),² the same verses which Brahms has set in his 'Ernste Gesänge,' in connection with which we may notice the strange coincidence that in the Magnum Opus of 1604 this motet is immediately followed by a splendid setting of the Pauline verses in praise of charity (1 Cor. xiii.) just as in Brahms. Other motets of the same kind are 'Audi Tellus,' 'Agni nostri,' and specially 'Libera me Domine,' with its cantus firmus of five descending notes of the diatonic scale to the words 'Respice finem.' There are also some fine compositions of complete psalms, 'Beatus vir qui non abiit,' 'Lauda Jerusalem,' with verses set as trios and quartets. It is exceptional that the Psalm Jubilate should be set with a cantus firmus, 'Si Deus nobiscum, quis contra nos.' There is one striking motet set 'chromatic more,' 'Concupiscendo concupiscat.' The last piece a 10, 'Quo properas, facunde nepos Atlantis,' as also 'Edite Cesareo' a 8, are brilliantly composed panegyrics of Duke Albert. In the companion publication a 5 we may just notice some secular pieces, which by slight changes of the words were afterwards, much to their advantage, transformed into sacred motets, 'Ave color vini clari,' changed to 'Ave decus coeli clari,' and 'Quis mihi . . . dulcissima Phylli,' a disappointed lover's farewell to life transformed into the prayer of a penitent sinner, 'Quid tibi . . . dulcissime Jesu.' Even in the edition of 1567 itself two pieces with somewhat objectionable secular words in earlier books of chansons, 'Alma Venus' (1560) and 'Veux-tu ton mal' (1564), were provided with new sacred words, 'Christe Patris Verbum' and 'Alleluia vox laeta.' In all these cases the music seems even more appropriate to the sacred than to the original secular words. The comic spelling piece on the words 'Super flumina Babylonis,' though it serves to show Orlando's love of fun and persiflage, might well have been dispensed with. His fondness for combination of appropriate texts is once more exhibited in 'Tu Domine benignus es,' with its cantus firmus, 'clamantem ad te, exaudi me Domine.'

In 1569 appeared another book of motets, 'Cantiones aliquot,' 13 numbers a 5, 1 a 6, published at Munich and dedicated to the Custos of Augsburg Cathedral, in which the most interesting numbers are three³ Christmas pieces, 'Quem vidistis pastores,' 'Resonet in laudibus' (which makes use of the old German tune to these words), and 'Sidus ex claro,' also the concluding number of the book, 'Quemadmodum desiderat cervus,'⁴ a 6, with its canon ad septimam. One madrigal a 7 appeared in a Venetian collection of this year.

⁴ Also edited with English words by Bridge.

It is a sonnet of Petrarch, 'Che fai, alma,' a dialogue of the poet with his own soul, which is also treated dialogue-wise in the music by the alternation of the three higher voices with the four lower, all uniting on the last line of the poem. In this year, too, Massimo Trojano brought out at Venice a collection of madrigals a 5 by all the composer-musicians of the Bavarian court, including Orlando and himself, but unfortunately this book has not been preserved complete, the tenor part being missing. Trojano intended to have followed this up with a second book, but, although in his Dialogi he had been so loud in his praises of the pleasant and peaceful life at Munich of all the musicians of the court, it was he himself who was the first to break up this beautiful harmony, by being concerned with another in the following year, 1570, in a murderous attack on one of his fellow-musicians, which obliged him to flee the country, and we hear no more of him.

In January 1570 Orlando published at Munich and dedicated as a new-year gift to the Abbot of Weingarten in Württemberg another book of 'Cantiones sacrae,' containing 10 numbers a 6 (not reckoning separate parts) and 3 dialogues a 8. The abbot had expressed the wish to have some original compositions of Orlando. One of Orlando's pupils, Jacob Reiner, had come from the abbey school of Weingarten, and was afterwards choirmaster there. In this book there are three complete psalms in several divisions with verses a 3 and 4, of all of which Proske in his Annotations speaks in terms of highest praise, and we may just note the greater liveliness of manner in the setting of the psalm 'Cum invocarem,' which shows the extraordinary variety in Orlando's style of composition. Van den Borren considers the Easter motet 'Ego sum qui sum' the pearl of this set. Of greater importance for Orlando's growing reputation in France was the publication in Paris in this year by Le Roy and Ballard of a book of 'Mellanges cont. plusieurs chansons tant en vers latin qu'en ryme françoise a 4, 5, 6, 8, 10 parties.' This publication was ushered into the world with a portrait of the composer, 'Aet. suae 39,' accompanied with a series of lengthy laudatory verses by Gohory and Jodelle, concluding with a sonnet by Jodelle to a female singer of the day, which shows that Orlando's works were often sung by a single voice, while instruments played the other vocal parts. The Latin pieces in this book are all secular, and taken from earlier publications, with the exception of two which appear for the first time, 'Deus qui bonum vinum,' a 4, a somewhat profane piece, which in the Magnum Opus of 1604 was transformed into a sacred penitential piece by a clever slight alteration of words¹; and 'Dulces exuviae,' Dido's lament in Virgil's Aeneid, Book iv., set a 5 and 6, in a severely homophonic style of solemn grandeur, more epically descriptive than properly dramatic, as Van den Borren observes. Of the chansons along with some of earlier date, 13 appear for the first time, among them the nonsense verses 'un jour vis un foulon,' which, as afterwards provided with English words beginning 'Monsieur Mingo,' J. F. R. Stainer has shown to be the song partly quoted as sung by Silence in Shakespeare's Henry IV. pt. 2, act v. sc. 3, and in the usual editions with the unintelligible word 'Samingo,' which he rightly suggests should be read 'Sir Mingo.'² The other songs a 4 are also of a humorous cast; a few a 5 written more on the madrigal style are of a sentimental character, one 'Vive sera,' on verses by Orlando himself in praise of friendship, in which he introduces his name Lassus. In 1570 Phalèse of Louvain published a collective work comprising four books of chansons by Orlando, Cyprian Rore and Philip de Monte, which, so far as Orlando is concerned, mostly includes work which had appeared elsewhere, but also a set of six new madrigals a 4 and one a 5, two of which, 'Vien' dole' Imeneo' and 'Quando fia mia,' were written to celebrate the marriage in 1565 of Alessandro Farnese, son of Margaret of Parma, with Maria of Portugal.

A further honour was done to Orlando at this time on Dec. 7, 1570, at the Diet of Spire. Emperor Maximilian conferred on him and his posterity a patent of nobility with the grant of a coat of arms,³ on the shield of which, in recognition of his musical genius, the musical signs of the Diesis, the Bécarré and Bémol, were displayed with other heraldic emblems. This honour might also be regarded as a return compliment for Orlando's greeting to Maximilian in an excellent motet, 'Pacis amans' a 6, on the occasion of his first coronation at Frankfurt in 1562 as King of Bohemia and King of the Romans.

VISIT TO THE FRENCH COURT.—Encouraged by the success of his works in Paris, Orlando in 1571 was induced to pay a visit there, provided with recommendations to the French court from the Bavarian Dukes, and his travelling expenses paid from the Bavarian treasury. He was entertained in the house of Adrian Le Roy, his Parisian publisher, and was well received and rewarded by King Charles IX., who had himself some knowledge and skill in music. He had not come empty-handed. In anticipation of his visit he had ready for presentation to the King a new book of chansons a 5, with a flattering dedication in verses of his own. The first two pieces in this book are on poems by Ronsard, the first originally addressed to King Henry II. of France, but by Orlando transferred to Charles IX.; the other, a longer poem in praise of the Queen-mother, Catherine de Medicis, set in a more brilliant and varied style, as if indeed it were more important to secure her favour than that of the weak Charles. No. 10, 'Paisible demain,' is a fine short setting of a eulogy on Paris as the city of peace and justice, the Paris which was to witness in the following year the massacre of St. Bartholomew, which, however, Orlando could not foresee, or might even with other partisans of Rome have approved. The other pieces are as usual partly humorous, partly moralising or sentimental, but what is particularly noticeable about them musically is the adoption into the chanson of the higher refinements of the madrigal style. There are 16 numbers a 5 and 2 a 8 in dialogue form, one of the latter, 'Hola Caron,' of a semi-dramatic character between a disappointed lover wishful for death and Charon, the ferryman of Hades, who refuses him a passage in his boat. The other dialogue, 'O doux parler,' on verses by Ronsard, consists more of an interchange of beautiful phrases between two choirs. Orlando's visit was taken by Le Roy as a good opportunity for the publication and dedication to King Charles of two books of motets, consisting of works which had already appeared elsewhere, but Orlando himself had also ready for publication by Le Roy a new book of motets a 5, which from Paris he dedicated to Duke William at Munich. Accompanying the dedication are some French verses of his own addressed to the Duke and Duchess, testifying his devotion, at the same time showing that in spite of the attractions of the French court he had then no idea of leaving the Bavarian service. In this book of motets Van den Borren notes the increased refinement of style by a greater utilisation of all the expressive methods of the madrigal. One very striking piece for its wonderful depth of expression is 'Pater Abraham,' a musical transcription of part of the dialogue from the Gospel parable of Dives and Lazarus. 'Eminemus in melius' is remarkable for the peculiar distribution of the words to the different voices, and here as in similar pieces we may also note how carefully he underlines the word 'miserere' wherever it occurs. Of another kind is the fine Christmas motet with a very melodious cantus firmus on an ascending and descending hexachord to the words 'Quis audivit talia, dic mirabilia.' In the last piece, 'Nuntium vobis fero,' the musical rhythm is adapted to the poetical metre as in an earlier piece of the same kind, 'Sidus ex claro.'

FURTHER PUBLICATIONS FROM MUNICH.—On his return to Munich, Orlando soon had ready for publication in 1572 by Adam Berg, a second book of 'Teutsche Liedlein,' 15 numbers a 5, which he dedicated to Duke Ferdinand, Count Palatine of the Rhine, the second son of Duke Albert. In this book there are 5 settings of Lutheran hymns with their proper tunes as cantus firmus in the tenor, among them 'Es sind doch selig alle die,' with Matthäus Greiter's Strassburg tune, better known afterwards as adapted to the later hymn, 'O mensch bewein dein Sünde gross.' Another piece, 'Der Meye,' is the spiritual version of a popular song, also with its tune in the tenor. The other pieces are free settings of humorous and sentimental Volkslieder, in this respect differing from the French chansons, the verses of which are usually by witty court poets like Marot, De Magny and others.

From 1572-79 we have a series of intimate confidential letters¹ of Orlando addressed to Duke William in a curious medley of languages, French, Italian, bad Latin, with occasional German, showing Orlando's exuberant love of fun and merriment of all sorts, with an occasional tendency to melancholy, especially when temporarily in disfavour with Duke Albert. The year 1573 is distinguished by two important publications. One is a composite work dedicated to four members of the Fugger family of Augsburg, then greatly esteemed as munificent patrons of music, containing 28 numbers, 6 Latin motets, 6 Italian madrigals, 6 French chansons, 6 Teutsche Lieder, all a 4, but with a dialogue a 8 to each set of 6. The other publication of 1573 is the first volume of a series entitled 'Patrocinium musicæ,' undertaken on the responsibility of Duke William, for which Adam Berg, the music-printer of Munich, had provided specially large and entirely new type. A portrait of Duke William appears as a frontispiece to the first volume, and the music is not in separate partbooks as usual, but the separate parts are together on opposite pages. In the dedication Orlando enlarges on the nature and mission of music in its connexion with religion, and eulogises the princely house of Bavaria for the energy and constancy with which in troublous times it had upheld the interests both of church music and Catholic piety. The first volume has 21 motets, 7 a 4, 7 a 5, and 7 a 6, works all remarkably interesting from the great variety both of technique and expression displayed in them. Here in passing we might just notice, as indeed we might have done before, the great range of Orlando in the choice of texts for musical setting. He does not confine himself, as most musicians of the time did, to the liturgical texts of the Breviary and Missal, but ranges freely over the books of Scripture to find texts which make some sort of personal appeal to him as the expression of his own sentiments. He thus often chooses texts of a sententious moralising nature which might seem quite intractable to musical setting, which, however, by his great mastery as a sculptor of musical motives he is able to endow with appropriately picturesque or otherwise solemnly expressive musical phrases. In the course of this year 1573 he received a commission from the court of France to compose some music in connexion with a mythological ballet and other festivities got up by Catherine de Medicis to celebrate the election of her younger son Henry as King of Poland. For this purpose he composed the introductory piece, consisting of a Latin dialogue sung between one character representing the kingdom of France, and other two the allegorical figures of Peace and Prosperity. Brantome speaks of Orlando's music as the most melodious that one had ever heard. Sandberger and Van den Borren suppose this music to have been lost, but a comparison of the text as given by Sandberger,¹ with the text of the Latin dialogue a 8 in the publication of 1573 dedicated to the brothers Fugger, shows that the music has not been lost, but is preserved in the latter piece, only that the text which was originally intended for the glorification of the French court has been ingeniously transformed into a glorification of Duke Albert and the Bavarian house. The very first line indicates the resemblance and yet a significant difference between the two texts. 'Unde recens reditus Pax Prosperitasque sorores' is altered to 'Unde revertimini pax religioque sorores.' The piece would be sung originally by three solo voices in dialogue, with instruments playing the other parts.

A letter of Adrian Le Roy informs us that Charles IX. was so delighted with various pieces of Orlando performed before him, that he offered to engage him as chamber musician with an annual salary of 1200 livres, beginning Jan. 1, 1574, even paying at once half of this sum for the previous half year. This proposal may have been a very tempting one to Orlando, and one account says that he had already set out with his family on the journey to Paris, and had come as far as Frankfort, when he was met with tidings of the French king's death on May 20, 1574, and at once returned to Munich. This account, however, is difficult to reconcile with what we learn from his letters, that he had gone to Italy in Feb. 1574 to engage new musicians for Munich, and was back again in Munich for some time in May. Sandberger concludes that already in January or February Orlando had definitely decided to remain in Munich. His good relations with Le Roy and the French court continued unimpaired. Henry III. allowed him a pension and a special privilege for the publication of his works.

THE 'PATROCINIUM MUSICES.'—In 1574 appeared the second and third volumes of the 'Patrocinium musices.' The second volume contains five of his masses a 5, bearing the titles, 'Ite rime dolenti,' 'Scarco di doglia,' 'Sidus ex claro,' 'Credidi propter,' and 'Le Berger et la bergère.' This volume was dedicated to Pope Gregory XIII., and Orlando travelled to Rome to present it in person to the Pope, the expenses of his journey and stay in Rome being met by Duke Albert. He was well received at Rome, and solemnly invested as Knight of the Golden Spur in the Papal Chapel. The first two masses in this volume would seem to take their themes from two madrigals of Cyprian de Rore. 'Sidus ex claro,' based on his own motet, is the only one of the five which has yet appeared in a modern edition. The rhythmical themes of the motet might not seem suited to the words of the mass. These are not indeed the first published masses of Orlando. Already in 1566 Gardano of Venice had published in a collection one, 'In te Domine speravi' a 6, and Phalèse of Louvain in 1570 had similarly published 3 a 5. The third volume of the 'Patrocinium,' dedicated to the Bishop of Augsburg, contains Orlando's settings of the Vidi Aquam and Asperges with the offices for Christmas, Easter, Pentecost and Corpus Christi. By the 'offices' are meant the introits and other variable parts of the mass, based on the plain-song. These are not reckoned amongst his best compositions, the plain-song in this case being somewhat of a drag on the inspiration of the composer. The fourth volume of the 'Patrocinium' appeared in 1575, and contains an interesting setting of the 'Passion according to St. Matthew,' the 9 lessons from the Book of Job a 4, which had already appeared in 1565, and the 3 lessons of Christmas Matins a 4. In the 'Passion' the parts of an Evangelist and of Christ are understood to be recited in plain-song, while the other utterances are set a 3 to 5. There are 3 other settings of the 'Passion' from the other Gospels, a 5 and 4 by Orlando still preserved in MS. in the Munich Archives, for an account of which see Kade 'Die ältere Passionskomposition' (Gütersloh, 1893), pp. 134-40. In 1575 Cosimo Bottegari, a Florentine lutenist, very much in favour with Duke Albert, published a second Book of Madrigals a 5, in continuation of Trojano's book of 1569, with contributions by the various Bavarian musicians, including two by Orlando, one a 10 or for two choirs each a 5, being a very delightful spring song. Bottegari, however, shortly afterwards used his great influence with Duke Albert to injure Orlando in the Duke's opinion, and it was with some difficulty that a reconciliation was brought about through the mediation of Duke William.

publication. There was first, the fifth volume of the 'Patrocinium,' containing five Magnificats—2 a 4, 1 a 5, and 2 a 8. In the 1 a 5 Orlando departs from the usual way of setting according to the church tone, and takes his themes from a madrigal of Cyprian de Rore. In the 2 a 8, all the verses are set by means of answering chorus a 4. A third book of 'Teutsche Lieder,' 11 nos. a 5, was dedicated to Duke Ernst, third son of Duke Albert. It opens with a fine setting of 'Susannen frumm,' the German version of 'Susanne un jour,' with what seems to be its proper popular tune in the tenor. Some numbers are moralising pieces, others drastically humorous. Under the title of 'Meslanges d'Orlande de Lassus,' Le Roy republished nearly all his previous chansons, with the exception of the book dedicated to Charles IX. in 1571. It contains 93 chansons, with 26 Latin secular pieces and 6 Italian madrigals, only a very few of which were really new. About the same time two other editions of the chansons appeared with the texts altered in a religious sense, to make several of them less offensive to Christian ears, and also to satisfy the growing taste for psalm-singing in the Huguenot circles of France. One was published at La Rochelle, the headquarters of French Protestantism, another more complete, and more thorough-going in its alterations was entitled 'Thresor de musique,' etc., and appears to have been published at Lyons. 1577 brings a small work of interest, a set of 24 cantiones a 2, twelve being vocal duets, and the other twelve for instruments, or it may be also for vocal practice. In later editions these latter are described as 'Fantasiae' or 'Ricercari.' The first twelve show Orlando's wonderful skill in the picturesque setting of meditative texts. This work was dedicated to Duke William alone, but was followed by a book of motets a 3, introduced with an exquisite musical dedication to all three brothers, Dukes William, Ferdinand and Ernest. There are 18 numbers, mostly on verses of the Psalms, and written in the older imitative style with many beautiful melismatic passages. To these there are appended in the Magnum Opus six other numbers, including two very expressive settings of 'Adoramus te Christe' which have been described as 'marvels of angelic grace.' In this year, too, Le Roy brought out at Paris a splendid edition of 18 masses by Orlando, including with several additions all those previously published. Of these the finest is one entitled 'Puisque j'ay perdu' a 4, written in a very noble style.

Generally speaking, his masses, with some exceptions, are not on the same high level as his motets. Some are very short, and especially in the Gloria and Credo, written in a rapid homophonic syllabic style, which leaves no room for much expression. But not all have yet been published in modern form, to enable a proper judgment, and besides those published in the old editions, there are a considerable number in MS. in the Munich Archives. 'Puisque j'ay perdu,' with others, have been edited by Proske in his 'Musica Divina.' No new publications of Orlando appeared in 1578. In 1579 Leonard Lechner, who had been a choir-boy under Orlando in the Bavarian chapel, brought out at Nuremberg new enlarged editions of the two sets of Selectissimae Cantiones of 1568, in a few cases altering the original words. The additional pieces are not for the most part really new, but only taken over from other publications. 'Si bene perpendi,' the drinking-song ascribed to Walter Mapes, might, along with other plesantries, have better found their place among the chansons than among serious motets.

WORKS IN MANY STYLES.—On Oct. 24, 1579, Duke Albert died. He had done a last act of kindness to Orlando in the previous April by guaranteeing his yearly salary of 400 florins for life. From 1575 Orlando had been receiving this amount as salary, with 150 florins extra described in the Munich accounts as 'Gnadengeld.' This addition to his regular salary was also continued by Duke William. Early in 1580 he was offered, but declined, the post of Kapellmeister to the court of Dresden, then vacant by the death of Antonio Scandelli. But with the death of Duke Albert the more splendid days of the Bavarian chapel came to an end. The finances of the court were in an embarrassed condition, and Duke William was obliged to reduce the number of his musicians from 44 to 17, although in the course of the years following it was gradually raised again to a maximum of 38 in 1591. These circumstances may have induced Orlando to entertain some scruples of conscience about receiving the interest of his capital invested in the State Funds. But the Duke magnanimously reimbursed to him as a personal gift what he offered to renounce. Early in 1581 there appeared at Nuremberg a book of five masses a 4-5 by Orlando which, however, was not published by himself but by Leonard Lechner, and consists of early work of the master. Of these Commer has reprinted one on the tune 'La, la, maître Pierre,' but not, as Commer says, on the tune set by Clemens non Papa, which is quite different.¹ This is one of Orlando's shorter masses, but we may notice that while in these masses he seems to treat the Kyrie, Gloria and Credo, somewhat perfunctorily, he bestows much greater care on the setting of the Sanctus, Benedictus and Agnus, which are often very beautiful. On another of these masses, 'Entre vous filles de quinze ans,' which is really based on a chanson of Clemens,¹ Peter Wagner comments at some length in his Geschichte der Messe, pp. 359-368. Much earlier work of quite a different complexion, Orlando himself in this year reproduced in his 'Libro de villanelle, moresche et altre canzoni a 4, 5, 6 et 8 voci,' published at Paris by Le Roy and Ballard. In the Italian dedication of this work to Duke William, he acknowledges that it would have been more suitable if he had published these works in his earlier years when he composed them, but that in publishing them now in his graver years he had rather acceded to the wishes of friends than followed his own judgment. There are 23 numbers, written in the rhythmical homophonic villanella style, all of a comic character, some drastically representing scenes of low life in Naples and Venice, and probably sung dramatically in character with accompanying instruments and the voices imitating them. They serve to show the comic dramatic verve embedded in Orlando's musical nature, and at the same time the beginning of that peculiar style of Italian music which was afterwards to be developed into the opera buffa. From the account of Massimo Trojano it would appear that the morescas a 6 were performed both vocally and instrumentally on the occasion of Duke William's marriage in 1568. Of all these pieces the best known in modern times is the comic serenade 'Matona mia cara' a 4. The last number in the book, 'O la, o che bon ecoho' a 8, is thought to be of later origin than the others; it is an 'echo' piece in the Venetian style, one choir a 4 echoing another.

With 1582 we come back to more serious work. With the accession of Duke William, indeed, a more serious religious spirit had begun to pervade the court of Munich. Through the influence of his Jesuit advisers Duke William became more attentive to religious duties, earning for himself afterwards the surname of William the Pious. Lassus followed suit with his master, and also entered into relations with the Jesuit seminary at Munich, where there still exists a portrait of him in oil supposed to have been painted by his son-in-law Hans von Aeh, representing him as he was in 1580 (see PLATE XLI). Yet, too, Orlando had shown himself somewhat recalcitrant to the enforced introduction of the Roman rite into the Bavarian chapel in place of the old Germanic usages, as a good deal of laxity had previously been tolerated in Munich, but conformity with Rome had become the watchword of the counter-Reformation movement under the auspices of the Jesuit order. In 1582 Orlando published three important books of church music. One dedicated to the Bishop of Wurzburg contains a new setting of the Nine Lessons from the Book of Job, along with 11 new motets a 4. The new set of lessons are composed quite differently from the earlier set of 1565. The text is simply declaimed syllable by syllable in homophonic harmony, the melody being chiefly in the upper part, but with abrupt chromatic changes. This set is equally beautiful with the first set, some would say, even more beautiful, because simpler. It is only to be regretted that it has not yet appeared in any modern edition. Among the 11 new motets are some very fine numbers which we must pass over, only mentioning that at the end of the book, and without connexion with its other contents, there is a short tuneful setting of the curious words:

'Quid facies, facies Veneris cum veneris ante
Ne sedcas sed eas, ne percas per eas.'

It is as if after more serious work Orlando liked to unbend himself and vent his humorous delight in verbal witticisms. The next important publication of this year is 'Sacrae cantiones 5 voc.' dedicated to the Senators of Nuremberg, 21 numbers, almost all of the highest value. Among them are the two which gained first prize at the Puy de Musique of Evreux in 1575 and 1583, 'Domine qui cognoscis,' a deeply penitential piece, and 'Cantantibus organis' for St. Cecilia's Day, also 'Justorum animae,' which has always been greatly admired, and which it is interesting to compare with Byrd's setting of the same words, and 'Christus resurgens,' a very brilliant Easter motet. At the end of the book Orlando indulges in a musical witticism on the verse of the old hymn for St. John Baptist's day, 'Ut queant laxis' (see SOLMISATION). He makes the tenor alone sing the hexachordal syllables to their proper note without any regard to the sense, while it joins with the other voices only on the last line 'Sancte Joannes.'

The third publication of 1582 is 'Motetta sex vocum,' dedicated to Jacob Fugger, Baron of Kirchberg, and described as only recently composed, 'singulari authoris industria.' There are 20 numbers, among them fine settings of the Marian Antiphons and the 'Ave Verum,' and other distinguished pieces are, 'O altitudo divitiarum' and 'Benedictio et claritas.' It may be said generally that in the decade 1580 to 1590, Orlando's genius had reached its full maturity in his masterly freedom and boldness of technique combined with a rare subtlety and depth of expression. All these works are described as equally available for instruments as for voices.

In 1583 appeared a new book of 'Teutsche Lieder' a 4, dedicated, strangely enough, to Maximilian, the ten-year-old son of Duke William. There are 11 numbers, but as some of them are lengthy pieces broken up into several divisions, they are often reckoned as making up 33 separate pieces. They are written in simple four-part counterpoint, but are beautiful and expressive in Orlando's most refined style. Five are of a definitely religious character, among them the old Easter hymn of the 12th century, 'Christ ist erstanden,' with its proper melody in the bass, and 'Aus meiner Sünden tiefe' in four divisions, a metrical paraphrase of the Psalm De profundis. But perhaps the more generally interesting may be two short amusing secular pieces, 'Ich weiss mir ein Meidlein hübsch'¹ and 'Baur was trägt im Sacke.' There was also a reprint about the same time of the three earlier sets of 'Teutsche Lieder' a 5 in one complete edition. Mention may here be made of a collection entitled 'Harmoniae miscellae'² a 5 and 6, edited by Leonard Lechner and published at Nuremberg in 1583, containing three excellent motets of Orlando, never published by himself. The collection is otherwise interesting as including works mostly by Orlando's pupils and associates in the Bavarian chapel.

LAST DECADE OF COMPOSITION.—The year 1584 is distinguished by the first appearance in print of the Seven Penitential Psalms, originally composed for Duke Albert, but now in their printed form dedicated to Pfalzgraf Philip, Bishop of Ratisbon. The only other publication of 1584 is the 'Continuation de Mellange' (Paris, Le Roy and Ballard). This contains 19 chansons a 3 to 6, along with four new Italian madrigals a 5 to 10. Some of the chansons appear to be older work written in the villanella style of homophonic harmony, others are composed on popular tunes, as especially the last a 6, 'Dessus le marché d'Arras.' There are two sacred pieces a 5, 'Père qui habitez dans les cieux,' and 'A toi je crie, ô Jesu Christ,' which are French translations of the Lutheran hymns, 'Vater unser' and 'Ich ruf zu dir.' Sandberger considers them as in their expressive character among the finest examples of Orlando's fully mature style, but has strangely omitted to observe that these French settings are practically identical with the settings to the German words of the first set of 'Teutsche Lieder,' 1567. Of the four Italian madrigals in this book the last, 'Passan vostri trionfi' a 10 on a text from Petrarch, is especially noticeable as a magnificent example of contrapuntal art, written partly in alternating choirs, but with powerful outbursts of ten-part harmony, somewhat resembling in this respect the effect of a modern orchestra, as Sandberger observes. Two other madrigals a 7 and 10, in the Dialogue and Echo form appeared in a miscellaneous collection.

On the Feast of Corpus Christi in 1584 preparations were made for the customary procession with the Sacrament through the streets of Munich, but a severe thunderstorm with heavy downpour of rain intervened, and it seemed that the procession would have to be confined to the interior of St. Peter's Church. But no sooner had the Sacrament been borne to the porch of the church, and the choir under Orlando's direction had begun to sing his motet, 'Gustate et videte,' 'O taste and see how gracious the Lord is,' than there was a sudden lull in the storm. The rain ceased, the sun shone out brilliantly, and the procession was able to continue as usual. This was regarded as a special instance of Divine favour accorded on account of Orlando's music, and on future occasions of outdoor church procession this motet continued to be sung as if a sure talisman for the securing of fair weather.

The year 1585 was a great one for new and important publications by Orlando. The increasingly religious and moralising bent of his mind is manifested in his Fifth Book of Madrigals a 5, which though not so named, are in reality 'Madrigali spirituali.' Of the 12 numbers, 7 are on texts from the 'Rime spirituali' of Gabriel Fiamma, Bishop of Chioggia, the others are from verses of Petrarch which specially dwell on the transitoriness of earthly things, and the need of penitence for the errors of youth. But the music is on a higher level than in any of the preceding books. The intense seriousness of the poetry is even more powerfully reflected in the music. All chromaticism foreign to the diatonic system is carefully avoided, except for very occasional use on words to which, as Van den Borren observes, some idea of blame attaches. He seems to pass censure on his own excessive indulgence in chromaticism in his earlier days as a musical fault. In the last number of the book, 'Come la cera al fuoco' a 6, a mystic symbolism may be thought to be implied in his use of a canon all 'unisono' as expressing the idea of wax melting in the fire, the wax of earthliness melting in the fire of Divine love. This book of madrigals was dedicated to Count Mario Bevilacqua of Verona, a distinguished musical amateur of the time and a munificent patron of musicians. He maintained in his palace at Verona a regular concert called a 'ridotto,' and the best musicians of the day, as Luca Marenzio, Philip de Monte, Orazio Vecchi and others dedicated their compositions to him. Orlando was about to make a journey to Italy at this time, and it is probable that he passed by Verona to present his book personally to Bevilacqua. Of this journey we shall speak presently, but first have to mention the other publications of the year. On the 1st of March 1585 he dedicates to the Abbot of Benedictbenen a book of Lamentations with 11 new motets a 5. Of the Lamentations it is sufficient to say that for expressiveness they are worthy to rank with the Lessons from the Book of Job and the Penitential Psalms. The Hebrew letters are composed in beautiful arabesques, and Orlando sets three of the verses of each Lesson, but treats the 'Jerusalem, convertere,' more concisely than Palestrina. The motets which follow show the direction of Orlando's mind at this time. The long piece, 'Dixi in cordo meo' (Eccl. ii. 1-11) is set in a very rhythmical fashion, largely homophonic, as if to express the vanity of earthly delights suggested by the text. In the next piece there is the same dwelling on the ideas, 'Quid valet hic mundus,' 'Pulvis et umbra sumus,' but by way of contrast we have in 'Quocumque loco fuero,' a beautiful setting of three stanzas of the hymn, 'Jesu dulcis memoria,' from which Orlando seems to derive comfort for himself. A book of motets, 17 nos. a 6 and 8, is dedicated to Count Eytel Fritz of Hohenzollern, at whose court at Hechingen his son Ferdinand was now engaged as Kapellmeister. It may seem a little strange that in this book should be included a brilliant congratulatory ode to Duke Ernest, Duke William's brother, on his appointment in 1583 to the Archbishopric of Cologne. Another book of motets, 31 numbers a 4, with a Stabat Mater a 8, was dedicated to Alexander Fugger, Provost of Freysing Cathedral. This book has a character of its own, as not being so miscellaneous in its contents as so many of the other books. It is considered to contain the very best of Orlando's sacred pieces a 4, and consists almost entirely of short offertory texts from the Missal, mostly of a prayerful or meditative character. The Stabat Mater alone is thought to come short of the high level of the other pieces.

In the autumn of this year Orlando set out on his journey to Italy, its first object being to make a pilgrimage to the Holy House of Loreto. He afterwards proceeded to Ferrara, where he was better received by Duke Alfonso d'Este than on the occasion of his first visit eighteen years before. Before we leave this busy year 1585, we cannot altogether pass over without mention two fine settings by Orlando of some lines of Tasso, 'Ardo si ma non t'amo,' contributed to a collection entitled 'Sdegnosi ardori,' which consists of nothing else but settings of the same lines by about 30 other composers, many of them in the Bavarian service, but also including Philip de Monte, Costanzo Porta and others. The lines are meant to express the disdain of a disappointed and deceived lover, and Orlando has set them in a very dramatic fashion.

The numerous publications from 1580, which we have had occasion to mention, bear testimony to the wonderful industry of the composer during this period. 1586 brings the first warning of declining strength. It is a blank so far as publications are concerned, and the opening of 1587 brings with it the gift from Duke William of a country house at Geising on the Ammer, probably as a place of occasional retirement. Then he came back to work, and in gratitude, no doubt, for better health, on April 15 dedicated a new book of Italian madrigals to the court physician, Dr. Thomas Mermann, a man of great culture, and a lover of music, who became one of his best friends. This book has 23 numbers, 7 a 4, 7 a 5 and 9 a 6, and is regarded as the crown of Orlando's achievements in madrigal writing. The pieces are almost entirely of a religious character, nine taken from the 'Rime spirituali' of Gabriel Piamma, one an Italian verse translation of Psalm vi., others from various sources known and unknown. The mood of love complaint characteristic of the ordinary madrigal is here spiritualised into that of penitential lament and heavenly aspiration, and the music gains thereby in artistic elevation and expressive power. In August a new volume of the 'Patrocinium musices' appears, containing 13 magnificats a 4 to 6. Here Orlando manifests an opposite tendency to that of his later madrigal writing. Into the madrigal he had infused greater seriousness and solemnity, but in the Magnificat he shows his desire to impart to his spiritual work something of the lightness and grace of his earlier secular work. This may have been by way of relief to his heavily oppressed mind. So he borrows the themes on which these magnificats are composed largely from secular songs, his own or those of other composers, in a few cases from motets. We have magnificats, like Masses, named from such secular songs as 'Si par souhait,' 'Dessus le marché,' 'Susanne un jour,' etc., and the result of the alliance does not appear to be any more unsatisfactory in the one case than in the other. Two masses a 6 based on his own motets, 'Locutus sum' and 'Beatus qui intelligat,' were also published separately this year by Le Roy and Ballard.

In consequence of his failing health Orlando's mind began to be much occupied with concern for the future of his wife and family, and on Nov. 6, 1587, he obtained the assurance of an annuity of 100 florins for his wife in case she should survive him. A month later Duke William grants him at his own request a dispensation from further service in the chapel, but with a reduction of 200 florins from his salary, and on the other hand offers his son Ferdinand a salary of 200 florins to take part of his father's duties, and also appoints his second son Rudolf as organist with a salary of 200 florins, and the further obligation of giving musical instruction to the younger members of the choir. The composer does not seem to have been satisfied with this arrangement, and remained at his post with his full salary, but probably with some alleviation of his duties and help from his son Rudolf. Ferdinand does not appear to have left the service of Count Eytel Fritz of Hohenzollern or to have entered again the Bavarian service until 1589 or 1590.

In 1588 Orlando brought out, in conjunction with his son Rudolf, a book of 'Teutsche gristliche Psalmen' a 3. The book contains 50 numbers, the texts and melodie taken from Caspar Ulenberg's metrical version of the Psalter of 1582, the best that had then been produced on the Catholic side. Orlando composed the 25 psalms with the odd numbers up to the fiftieth, Rudolf, the alternate 25 with the even numbers. The book was dedicated to Abbot Gallus of Ottebeuern, and seems to show that in German Catholic circles and even in monastic houses some interest was taken in German Psalm-singing. Orlando's settings are very beautiful and interesting; he treats Ulenberg's tunes with great freedom, and not as a cantus firmus in any one part. We have no means of judging the merit of Rudolf's settings, as only Orlando's are reproduced in modern editions.

In 1589 a new volume of the 'Patrocinium musicus' appears, the last to which Orlando contributes, containing 6 masses a 5, with the titles 'Dites maitresse,' 'Amar donne,' 'Qual donna attendo,' 'In die tribulationis,' 'Io son ferito,' 'Pro defunctis.' Their composition, however, is of older date, as they are found in MSS. of 1578-80. 'Io son ferito' takes its themes from a then well-known madrigal of Palestrina, and is thought to have something of the grace of the Palestrina style. 'Qual donna attendo' and 'In die tribulationis' would seem to take their themes from a madrigal and motet of Cyprian de Rore. We know that Cyprian's works were highly esteemed at Munich, and that Orlando was personally acquainted with him in earlier days, and influenced by him in certain directions. Proske has edited these two masses in the second series of his 'Musica divina,' and considers that for pure Church expression and style they take a very high place among the works of the master. The 'Pro defunctis' is composed with the plain-song intonations sung unisono at the beginning of each movement, and with the cantus firmus mostly in the tenor, but sometimes also in the bass, and used with considerable freedom, as when in the third Kyrie it appears first in minims, then in breves and afterwards in semibreves. The Tractus 'Absolve' is set, but not the Dies Irae, as this was not then even generally used. In this mass, with the fetters of cantus firmus, the genius of the master is not thought to burn so brightly as in other works.

In 1590 Orlando dedicated to the Bishop of Bamberg his 'Neue teutsche und otliche frantzösische Gesäng' a 6. The dedication is dated on the Feast of St. Henry, July 15, this date being appropriately chosen as recalling both to Orlando himself and the Bishop the fact that it was Henry II., Duke of Bavaria and Holy Roman Emperor, who at the beginning of the 11th century founded and endowed the Bishopric of Bamberg, and who was afterwards with Cunigunde his wife canonised for his fervent piety and benefactions to the Church. The book contains 12 numbers, 9 German and 3 French. The French pieces, however, are merely corrected editions of some which had appeared in 1584. With one exception the German pieces are all of a religious character, showing the increasing preoccupation of Orlando's mind with religious subjects. 'Ich ruf zu dir' is yet another version of the 'De profundis,' with the tune from Ulenberg's Psalm as cantus firmus unchanged in all 5 divisions. 'Aus hartem Weh' is a German Catholic Advent hymn with its tune in the tenor, resembling the Lutheran 'Erbarm dich mein.' Other pieces are free compositions in which Orlando seems to assume the rôle of a Christian preacher exhorting mankind to penitence, patience and humility. To these he adds one amusing secular piece from Hans Sachs, 'Der Körbelmacher,' describing a dispute between a basket-maker and his wife.

On Nov. 6 of this year Orlando's third son, Ernest, was admitted as a singer of the chapel with a salary of 60 florins. Meantime the master's mental faculties become more and more disturbed; it seems as if the fresh effort to work had completely prostrated him. His wife Regina, on one occasion returning from Geising, finds him gloomy and morose, failing to recognise her and unwilling to speak to any one. At her request the Princess Maximiliana at once sends Dr. Mermann, and there is a temporary recovery, but the mind is still at fault. A spirit of melancholy settled on him. 'Cheerful and happy no longer,' says Regina, 'he has become gloomy and speaks only of death.' In an access of melancholy he wrote to the Duke complaining that he had never carried out his father Albert's intentions towards him, and it needed all that Regina and the Princess Maximiliana could do to soften the effect of this act. In 1592 his material position was improved by the Duke increasing his salary to 800 florins. Ferdinand and Rudolf were also benefited by increase of salary. In 1593, under the sympathetic care of Dr. Mermann, there came about a great improvement in his state of health, so that he was able to return to work and fulfil his duties as choir-master on the Festival of Corpus Christi. He also resumes the labours of composition, and on Michaelmas Day (Sept. 29) dedicates to Johann Otto, Bishop of Augsburg, his book of 'Cantiones sacrae' a 6. In the very interesting and touching dedication he alludes to this work as being probably his swan-song ('cygneum forte melos'), and expresses the hope that as the light of the setting sun is more pleasing to the eye, so these graver songs of his closing days may perhaps delight the mind and ear better than the gayer and more festive songs of his youth. The book contains 30 numbers a 6 and 2 a 12, which show no diminution of the composer's technical skill or power of expression. It includes pieces of the highest quality, some of his best work in a great variety of form, and which show his increased earnestness of religious feeling. We may notice that 'Prolongati sunt dies mei' is a pathetic farewell Nunc Dimittis, which the composer, with a presentment of his approaching end, addresses to Duke William. It is matter for surprise that the modern editor of the Magnum Opus has overlooked the extremely personal nature of the references in this motet, and has mistakenly represented the text as only the usual combination of Scripture texts. Orlando has himself compiled the text out of a tissue of Scripture phrases, only to apply them to himself and his relation to Duke William. Very touching is the reference he makes to the account he must give of his stewardship. 'Heu quis armorum' is a powerful setting in homophonic harmony of a Sapphic poem describing the struggle between good and evil in the world. Another part of the same poem is in the posthumous Magnum Opus. With other similar pieces in the Magnum Opus it seems to show how much Orlando's mind was exercised in the last years of his life with the thought of the Divine Judgment. They serve also to point to that kinship of his mind generally with Dante and Michael Angelo, which has often been dwelt upon. One of the last pieces in the book is a touching setting of the verse from the Dies Irae 'Recordare Jesu pie.' But even in this very serious book Orlando must find some outlet for his vein of jovial or saturnine humour in his clever setting of a drinking song in leonine verses, 'Ad primum morsum,' which Van den Borren considers to bear the impress of his genius.

In 1593 Orlando was able to accompany Duke William to the Diet of Ratisbon, where he came into contact with Philip de Monte and other musicians of note. The earlier part of 1594 must have been occupied with the preparation for publication of his last work, 'Lagrima di San Pietro,' which, on May 24, he dedicated to Pope Clement VIII. This work consists of 20 spiritual madrigals on verses by the Italian religious poet, Tansillo, and one Latin motet a 7, 'Vide quae pro te patior.' Haberl describes it as a 'truly magnificent work,' and intended to have published it in a modern edition, but this unfortunately has never appeared, and we only know the beautiful Latin piece by its inclusion in the Magnum Opus. Before his last work appeared in print, Orlando died on June 14, 1594. By his last will, besides bequeathing alms to the poor and to a Munich hospital, he provided that two low masses and a sung Requiem should be celebrated for him annually on St. John Baptist's Day in the Church of Geising. He was buried in the cemetery of the Franciscans at Munich. When the Franciscan property was secularised, the monument which had been erected over his grave was removed, and remained for some time in the possession of a private family, but has now been set up in the gardens of the National Museum at Munich. It is of reddish marble, 3½ ft. high and 7 ft. wide, with a carving of the burial of Christ in the upper part, and below this, his arms, on one side of which are ten kneeling male figures, Orlando himself, his sons and grandsons, and on the other side eight kneeling female figures, Regina with her daughters and granddaughters. The epitaph consists of twelve lines of elegiac verse, of which we may quote the first two and last two lines:

'Orlando cineses cheu ! modo dulce loquentes
Nunc mutos cheu ! flebilis urna premit

Nunc quia complevit totum concentibus orbem,
Victor cum superis certat apud superos.'

The epitaph states that he died at the age of 62, and with this agrees the inscription on the portrait prefixed to the 'Lagrima,' but, as was mentioned before, the inscriptions on the various portraits are not in agreement with each other, so that the question of his exact age must be left doubtful. Regina survived her husband to June 5, 1600. Of the marriage there were four sons, Ferdinand, Rudolf, Johann and Ernst, and two daughters, Anna and Regina, the latter married to the court artist, Hans von Ach. Of the sons, Johann appears to have died early; we hear no more of Ernst after 1594. Ferdinand had returned to the Bavarian chapel in 1590, and succeeded Fossa as Kapellmeister in 1602, dying in 1609. Rudolf also remained in the Bavarian service as composer and organist till his death in 1625. Both, besides being composers themselves, were active in the further publication of their father's works.

POSTHUMOUS PUBLICATIONS.—In 1596 Georgius Victorinus, choirmaster of the Jesuit Church in Munich, edited a collection entitled 'Thesaurus litaniarum,' in which appear 12 litanies a 4—9 by Orlando, 3 of which a 4, 5, very simple works, appear again in Proske, 'Musica divina.' In 1597 Ferdinand published 11 motets a 5 of his father interspersed with 12 of his own. One of them, 'Memento peccati tui,' may be noticed as a characteristic penitential piece by Orlando with its strange emphasis at the end on the words 'ne desperes.' In 1600 Rudolf published his father's 'Prophetiae Sibyllinae chromatico more,' 12 numbers a 4. The first mention of this work occurs in a letter of the French publisher, Le Roy, to Orlando in 1574, telling him of the performance of some numbers from it before Charles IX., to the King's great delight and astonishment. It has not yet been published in any modern edition. We know that Orlando in his later years was rather opposed to the chromaticism in which he indulged earlier. In 1602 Ferdinand published 5 Magnificats of Orlando with some of his own.

In 1604 both brothers joined together to issue a more important work entitled, 'Magnum Opus musicum O. de Lasso,' preserving in six volumes of a moderate size, most clearly and beautifully printed, no less than 516 sacred and secular motets, including all those previously published, with nearly 100 previously unpublished. The work was dedicated to Duke Maximilian, and from the dedication it would appear to have been undertaken partly at the instigation of Dr. Thomas Mermann, the friend and physician of Orlando's later years. There are 24 numbers a 2 (including the 12 Ricercari of 1577), 24 a 3, 100 a 4, 167 a 5, 159 a 6, 11 a 7, 24 a 8, 2 a 9, 3 a 10 and 2 a 12. The modern edition of Breitkopf & Härtel has remained incomplete, lacking the last 24 numbers, owing to the death of its editor, Dr. Haberl, in 1910.

After his brother's death, Rudolf issued '6 Missae posthumae' in 1610, 4 a 6, 'Amor Colei,' 'Certa fortiter,' 'Deus in adiutorium,' 'Ecce nunc benedicite,' and 2 a 8, 'Bell' Amftritt' and 'Vinum bonum.' These have all appeared in a modern reprint by Commer. Under the title 'Jubilus B.V.M.' Rudolf issued in 1619 a complete collection of Orlando's magnificats, 100 numbers a 4-10, by far the greater number of which were previously unpublished. Of these about 30 have appeared in modern editions.

Reckoning up, then, the number of Orlando's separate compositions published up to 1620, but without including their various divisions as separate numbers, we find that even then the total amounts to 1183, made up as follows: the 516 numbers of the Magnum Opus, 41 masses, 100 magnificats, 57 other church pieces, 230 madrigals including the 'Lagrimae' and 'Sibyllinae,' 146 chansons, and 93 Deutsche Lieder. Of these, 20 madrigals and 11 chansons have not been perfectly preserved. Besides these there exist in MSS. in the Munich Archives, 10 or more masses, a book of Lamentations a 4, 3 Passions, 32 Latin hymns, 10 settings of Nunc Dimittis, and some other works, which bring up the number of separate compositions to the amazing total of over 1250.

In 1625 a certain Caspar Vincentius, organist at Würzburg, brought out there a new edition of the Magnum Opus, but with a figured bass part, which, as Haberl says, disfigures and misrepresents the original. The modern edition of Orlando's works published by Breitkopf & Härtel, which was intended to be complete, but has been broken off for the present, contains in 10 volumes 492 nos. of the Magnum Opus edited by Dr. Haberl, and in 10 other volumes 173 madrigals, 135 chansons and 93 Deutsche Lieder, edited with valuable introductions by Dr. Adolf Sandberger of Munich.¹

DESCENDANTS.—It would seem from the Munich accounts that Ferdinand and Rudolf continued to use only Orlando's adopted name, De Lasso, in place of the original De Lassus. From the list of his works in Q.-L., Rudolf would appear to have been a fairly prolific composer, and in later years to have also adopted the new style of composition with Bassus ad Organum. Two of his motets are given by Proske in 'Musica divina,' tom. II., one showing something of an inclination to the new monodic style of Italy. A son of Ferdinand, also called Ferdinand, was sent by Duke Maximilian to study music at Rome under Crivelli, and afterwards became Kapellmeister at Munich, but later on, at the instance of the Duke himself, gave up his musical calling to accept some office in the civil service. Descendants of Orlando would appear to have been still living in 1895.

LASSUS AND PALESTRINA

Lassus and Palestrina, both dying in 1594, have long been recognised as twin summits in musical history, representing the highest achievements of the 16th century in the department of pure vocal and choral music. This was the only really artistic music of the time. The music of both was often indeed performed by instruments as well as sung by voices, but the instruments only played the vocal parts, and the style is vocal and not instrumental. Lassus, however, was more familiar with the use of instruments, and often imitates them in his vocal writing, as in his villanellas, and even occasionally in his masses, and in his motets when in the words there was any suggestion of instruments. The choral art of the 16th century is often designated as the a cappella style in music, and regarded as betokening the original ecclesiastical domination of music. But the designation a cappella is somewhat of a misnomer, when we find the same style in secular as in sacred music, and when we also find on further examination that the so-called a cappella style in such masters as Palestrina and Lassus is really secular in origin, and only the successful adaptation of the style of the secular Italian madrigal to sacred purposes. The Renaissance in music is often supposed to have only begun with the rise of monody and instrumental music leading to the opera. But there is the spirit of the Renaissance already in the music of both Palestrina and Lassus, perhaps more manifest in the latter than the former. Both start from the same ground of the secular madrigal, but their paths and their aims diverge, and while Palestrina is distinguished for the exquisite grace and beauty of his music with its smooth flow of melody and the crystalline clearness of its harmony, Lassus excels in greater variety and depth of expression, with a greater command of all means of expression, though his style thus became more abrupt and less melodious. Both are equally great in their special excellences, and there is no need to exalt one to depreciate the other, though it may be admitted that Palestrina is more open to immediate appreciation than Lassus. Schweitzer has familiarised us with the distinction between those musicians who are mainly tone-poets, and those who are specially tone-painters, and we may apply this distinction to the present case by saying that Palestrina is more the lyrical tone-poet who aims at expressing the general sentiment underlying the words, while Lassus is more the epic-dramatic tone-painter who endeavours to depict in tones the words themselves in all the significance they have to him personally. While Palestrina for general grace and beauty of style has been compared to Raphael and Mozart, Lassus in his depth of thought has been considered to belong to the lineage of Michael Angelo and Sebastian Bach.

LAST JUDGMENT, THE, the English version, by Prof. Taylor, of Spohr's 'Die letzten Dinge,' an oratorio in 2 parts; text by Rochlitz, music by Spohr. Composed in the autumn of 1825, and produced in the Lutheran church, Cassel, on Good Friday, Mar. 25, 1826 (see Spohr's Selbstbiographie, ii. 171); Norwich Festival, Sept. 24, 1830; Sacred Harmonic Society, July 11, 1838, Spohr conducting. This oratorio must not be confounded with 'Das jüngste Gericht,' produced Erfurt Festival, Aug. 15, 1812 (Selbstbiographie, i. 169). G.

LATES, (1) JOHN JAMES (d. in or near Oxford, 1777), an English violinist and composer of the early 18th century. He studied under the best Italian masters of that day, and became leader of the concerts at Oxford. His patron, the Duke of Marlborough, gave him a professional position at Blenheim. His published works include violin solos, duets and trios.

CHARLES (2) (d. circa 1810), his son, studied church music under Philip Hayes of Oxford, in which city both father and son resided, and had some degree of fame as a performer on the organ and the pianoforte. He published some sonatas for the pianoforte and other works. F. K.

LATILLA, GAETANO (b. Bari, c. 1713; d. Naples, 1789), was a choir-boy in the cathedral at Bari, and was later educated at the Conservatorio di San Onofrio in Naples, where he was a pupil of Domenico Gizzi. In 1732 his first opera, 'Li mariti a forza' had a great success, and was followed by many others, among which the most popular was 'Orazio,' brought out in Rome, 1738. On the last day of that year he was appointed vice-maestro di cappella at Santa Maria Maggiore. Incapacitated by illness, he returned to Naples in 1741, and in 1756 he went to Venice as choir director at the Conservatorio della Pietà, and in 1762 was made second conductor at St. Mark's. In 1772 he once more returned to Naples, where his 'Antigono' was performed at the San Carlo in 1775; he died there, having written some thirty-six operas, much church music (preserved at the Conservatorio della Pietà and elsewhere), six string quartets published in London, and many arias and duets. Seven operas and two intermezzi are all that are now known to exist of his dramatic compositions (see Q.-L.).

LATROBE, (1) REV. CHRISTIAN IGNATIUS (b. Fulneck, Leeds, Feb. 12, 1757; d. Fairfield, near Manchester, May 6, 1836), eldest son of Rev. Benjamin Latrobe, superintendent of the congregations of the United (Moravian) Brethren in England. In 1771 he went to the college of the United Brethren at Niesky, Upper Lusatia, returned to England in 1784, took orders in the same church, became in 1787 secretary to the Society for the Furtherance of the Gospel, and in 1795 was appointed secretary to the Unity of the Brethren in England.

Although Latrobe never followed music as a profession he cultivated it assiduously from an early age. His earlier compositions were chiefly instrumental; three of his sonatas, having met with the approval of Haydn, were published and dedicated to him. His other published compositions include Lord Roscommon's translation of the Dies Irae, 1799; 'The Dawn of Glory,' 1803; Anthem for the Jubilee of George III., 1809; Anthems, by various composers, 1811; Original Anthems, 1823; 'Te Deum, performed in York Cathedral'; 'Miserere, Ps. 51'; and 'Six Airs on serious subjects, words by Cowper and Hannah More.' He edited the first English edition of the Moravian Hymn Tunes. But his most important publication was his *Selection*² of Sacred Music from the works of the most eminent composers of

Germany and Italy, six vols. 1806–25, through the medium of which many fine compositions, including much of Graun, Haase, Haydn and Mozart, were first introduced to the notice of the British public.

(2) Rev. JOHN ANTES LATROBE, M.A., his son (b. London, 1799; d. Gloucester, Nov. 19, 1878), was composer of several anthems. He was educated at St. Edmund Hall, Oxford, was B.D. in 1826 and M.A. in 1829, took holy orders in the Church of England, and was incumbent of St. Thomas's, Kendal, from 1840–1865, and honorary canon of Carlisle Cathedral from 1858. He was author of The Music of the Church considered in its various branches, Congregational and Choral, London, 1831, and Instructions of Chenaniah, a book of directions for accompanying chants and psalm tunes (1832).

LATVIAN MUSIC. The history of Latvian music consists of two epochs: (1) popular music as a naïve and direct expression of the people's common emotion, and (2) artistic music, as a conscious and elaborated expression of the individual's action of the mind or soul.

(1) POPULAR MUSIC.—The popular songs existed long before the establishment of Christianity by Germans, who invaded and conquered Latvia in the 12th century (about 1158). We find the texts of popular songs celebrating pagan idols. But the greatest part of the popular songs collected until now have their origin in the age of Catholicism, i.e. from the 13th–16th century. After the introduction of Lutheranism (1530) the German barons tightened their hold, and Protestant pastors tried by all means to abolish the Latvian popular songs. Forcefully introducing not only German hymn tunes for singing in church, but also German secular songs (translated into Latvian) for singing in the schools and in the home, they nearly succeeded in banishing all Latvian characteristics.

The first full account of Latvian songs and singing, dating from 1632 (Synlagma de origine Livonarum di Fridericus Menius), shows that the popular songs written down about the end of the 16th century are like those of the 17th. A great many songs perished, because they were handed down from mouth to mouth; some which survived were put on paper only in the 19th century. The most zealous and conscientious collector of the popular songs, Andrejs Jurjans (1856–1922), only began to gather them about the year 1890. The musical material now gathered surpasses 2000 numbers, consisting of songs, dance tunes and fragments of instrumental music. The tunes of the prehistoric epoch moved in the limits of a fourth and were performed more in a declamatory than in a singing manner. The tunes of the next epoch were more melodious, and moved in the limits of an octave. These tunes were sung in solo as well as in chorus, in unison or in octaves. Besides common measures we find an abundance of measures of five, seven and other mixed times.

The principal musical instruments of the ancient Latvians were (1) the Kokles, a species of harp with broad and long sounding-board, furnished with five to seven strings; (2) Aza Rags, a goat's or bull's horn with a mouth-piece like that of our modern brass wind instruments, and with three or five holes for fingering; (3) Bungas, primitive drums; and (4) various wooden trumpets and fifes made in a simple manner. Particularly beloved was the Kokles as an instrument for accompaniment to singing.

(2) ARTISTIC MUSIC.—This branch of Latvian music could arise and unfold itself only after the emancipation of the serfs in Livonia and Courland (1819); the Latvian's affection for music showed itself in the four-part vocal music, and displayed itself particularly about the end of the last century, when choral societies existed not only in towns, but also in the country. In the beginning the choral societies sang separately, then the neighbouring societies jointly, and finally from all Latvia together; in 1873 the first general singing festival in Riga had 1000 singers; in 1880, the 2nd, 1627; in 1888, the 3rd, 2618; in 1895, the 4th, 4000; and in 1910, the 5th festival had 6000 singers (from about 250 singing societies). That was a considerable success for an agricultural nation of only two million, oppressed during seven centuries. In the war (1914–18) Latvians suffered greatly from German and Russian armies; but now Latvia is independent and can develop her musical as well as other faculties without hindrance.

The first-fruits of artistic music were popular tunes harmonised for four-part singing. The first harmoniser of Latvian songs, Janis Cimze (1814–81), altered the characteristic qualities of popular tunes by putting them into the modern major and minor keys. More national are the songs harmonised by E. Vigners (b. 1850), A. Jurjans and E. Melngailis (b. 1871). The first original compositions were written by K. Baumanis (1835–1905), author of the national hymn, 'God Bless our Latvia'; but the most important composers are J. Vītols and A. Kalnins. For foreigners the most interesting are the works of Kalnins (b. 1879), as having true national colouring. The compositions of J. Vītols (b. 1863) are refined, but not specially characteristic of the country. J. Vītols excels in nearly all branches of music; his orchestral works are brilliant; e.g. his overture 'Spriditis,' his suite of popular songs, etc. In piano music Vītols until now was the only composer whose works require virtuosity from the performer. A. Kalnins has written for the piano and organ, but much more for voice and for orchestra, and the first more important national opera 'Banuta.' His orchestral works have true national content and expression; for instance, 'Latvia,' 'Pie Staburaga,' 'The Song of the Native Country,' etc. Among A. Jurjans's works are interesting popular dances for orchestra: 'Ackups,' 'Jandalins,' and 'Beggars' Dance.' Among the younger composers the most remarkable is Janis Medins (b. 1890), author of two operas and many other works. The other Latvian composers, who have written mostly vocal music, are N. Alunans, E. Darzins, D. Milits, L. Botins (pianist), J. Straume, P. Jurjans, J. Jurjans, A. Ore, H. Ore, J. Zalits, A. Abels, P. Suberts, B. Valle, J. Reinholds, J. Graubins, M. Gubene, J. Kade, O. Kaulins, J. Ozols, O. Sepskis, K. Zigmunds, J. Sprogis, etc.

The most important stimulants to the development of Latvian music are now the Latvian National Opera (director, T. Reiters), the Latvian Conservatory (Riga), and several Popular Conservatoires in the other towns. The Latvian Opera Company was founded in 1912 by P. Jurjans as a private enterprise; its further development was checked by the war. Only after the proclamation of independent Latvia (1918) could the opera renew its activity as the Latvian National Opera, with a government subsidy. As the highest music school there is now the Latvian (State) Conservatoire, and first violin at the Musical Society, with great liberty of action. But Russia did not agree with him, and the state of his health compelled him in 1874 to take the baths at Carlsbad.

Laub was certainly one of the greatest violin-virtuosi of his time. He had a fine and very powerful tone and a brilliant technique, and played with much feeling and passion. His repertory was very large, comprising all the important classical works and a great many modern compositions. His frequent performances of Joachim's Hungarian concerto deserve special mention. He had also much success as a quartet player, but his style, especially in latter years, was not unjustly reproached with mannerism and a tendency to exaggeration. P. D.

LAUD, a kind of citterne, see BANDURRIA.

LAUDA SION, the name of a Sequence, sung at Mass on the Feast of Corpus Christi. (See SEQUENTIA.)

The text of the Lauda Sion, written about the year 1264 by S. Thomas Aquinas, has always been regarded as a masterpiece of medieval scholarship. The plain-song to which the sequence is adopted belongs originally to the Sequence 'Laudes Crucis attolamus'; it is written in Modes VII. and VIII. combined. The following is the opening:

Lauda Si-on sal-va-to-rem, Lau-da du-com et pas-to-rem, In hym-nis et can-ti-cis;
 Quan-tum potes lau-tum au-de, Qui-a ma-jor om-ni lau-de, Nec lau-da-re aut-ā-cis.

Lau-dis the-ma spe-ci-a-lis, Pa-nis vi-vus et vi-ta-lis, Ho-di-e pro-po-ni-tur; Quem in sae-cra men-sa coe-o-de-nas, Tur-bae fra-tum du-o-de-nas, Da-tum non am-bi-gi-tur.

founded in 1919 under the direction of Prof. J. Vitols, formerly a professor at St. Petersburg Conservatoire for over thirty years. K. P.

LAUB, FERDINAND (b. Prague, Jan. 19, 1832; d. Gries, near Botzen, Tyrol, Mar. 17, 1875), one of the most remarkable violin-players of his day. His father was a musician at Prague.

At 6 he mastered Variations by De Bériot, and at 9 performed regularly in public. He was a pupil of the Prague Conservatoire under Mildner, and at 11 years old he attracted the notice of Berlioz and Ernst, and shortly after was taken up by the Grand Duke Stephen, and by him sent to Vienna in 1847. After this he visited Paris, and, in 1851, London, where he played at the Musical Union, and in 1853 succeeded Joachim at Weimar. Two years later we find him at Berlin as Kammervirtuos and leader of the court band, teacher in the Stern Conservatorium, and leader of quartet-concerts of his own. At length, after considerable wandering, he settled at Moscow in 1866 as head professor of the violin in the Conserva-

The Sequence has been many times subjected to polyphonic treatment of a very high order. Palestrina has left us two settings of it for eight voices, arranged in a double choir, and a shorter one for four. The first, and best known, was printed, in 1575, by Alex. Gardanus, in the Third Book of Motets for five, six and eight voices, and is one of the earliest examples of that peculiar combination of two choirs, consisting of unequally balanced voices, which Palestrina has made so justly famous—the voices selected being, in this case, cantus I. and II., altus and bassus, in the first choir, and altus, tenor I. and II. and bassus, in the second.

A reprint of this beautiful composition will be found in vol. iii. of the complete edition of Palestrina's works published by Breitkopf & Härtel. The other eight-part setting, in triple measure throughout, formerly known only through the medium of a MS. in the Library of the Collegio Romano at Rome, has been published in vol. vii. of the same series.

LAUDI SPIRITUALI, a name given to certain collections of devotional music, compiled for the use of the 'Laudisti'—a Religious Confraternity, instituted, at Florence, in the year 1310, and afterwards held in great estimation by S. Charles Borromeo, and S. Philip Neri.

The poetry of the 'Laudi'—some ancient specimens of which are attributed, by Crescen-tini, to S. Francis of Assisi (d. 1226), was originally written entirely in Italian, and bears no trace of classical derivation. The music to which it is adapted—inclining rather to the character of the sacred canzonet, than to that of the regular hymn—was, at first, unisonous, and extremely simple; though, after a time, the 'Laudisti' cultivated part-singing with extraordinary success.¹

A highly interesting MS. volume, once belonging to a company of 'Laudisti' enrolled in the year 1336 at the Chiesa d' Ogni Santi at Florence, is now preserved in the Magliabecchi Library: and, from this, Burney (Hist. ii. 328) quotes a very beautiful example—'Alta Trinità beata.' The earliest printed collection is dated 1485. This, however, would seem to have been either unknown to, or unrecognised by, the disciples of S. Philip Neri; for, in 1565, Giovanni Animuccia, who acted as his maestro di cappella, published a volume entitled 'Il primo libro delle Laudi,' followed by a 'Secondo libro,' of more advanced character, in 1570. These sacred songs, which formed the germ of the performances afterwards called oratorio, became so popular among the youths who flocked to S. Philip for instruction, that, in 1588—seventeen years after the death of the saintly Animuccia—P. Soto thought it desirable to edit a third volume, containing unacknowledged works, for three and four voices, by some of the greatest composers of the age. In 1589 the same zealous editor published an amended reprint of the three volumes, consolidated into one; succeeded, in 1591, by a fourth volume, dedicated to the Duchessa d'Aquasparta. Serafino Razzi published a large collection, in 1563, and many others followed—for, at this period, almost every large town, and even many an important parish, had its own company of 'Laudisti,' who sang the poetry of Lorenzo de' Medici, Poliziano, Pulci, Bembo, Ludovico Martelli, Giambellari, Filicaia and other celebrated writers, with undiminished interest, though, as time progressed, the character of the music sensibly deteriorated.

In the year 1770, Burney heard the company of Laudisti attached to the Church of S. Maria Maddalena de' Pazzi, in Florence, sing, with excellent effect, in some street processions, as well as in some of the churches, from a book then just published for their use. W. S. R.

LAUDS (Lat. Laudes), the name given to that division of the Canonical Hours which immediately follows Matins.

The Office of Lauds opens, according to the Ritual of the Western Church, with the series of Versicles and Responses beginning 'Dous in adjutorium meum intende,' followed by select Psalms with Antiphons. These are succeeded by the 'Capitulum' (or 'Little Chapter'); the Hymn for the Day, with its proper Versicle and Response; and the 'Benedictus.' The Service then concludes with the Collect for the Day and the Commemorations (as at Vespers).

The plain-song music proper to it will be found in the Antiphonal. (See MATINS; ANTIPHON.) W. S. R.; rev. by W. H. F.

LAUFENBERG (LOUFENBERG), HEINRICH VON (d. Mar. 31, 1460),² mediæval ecclesiastic and poet, was, in 1434, dean at Zofingen, between Basle and Lucerne, later at Freiburg-im-Breisgau, and in 1445 entered the Johanniterkloster at Strassburg. He deserves mention as being one of the first to adapt German sacred words to old secular tunes, so as to save the beautiful tunes while rejecting the objectionable words with which they were at first associated, a practice which was afterwards so much in vogue at the time of the Reformation. His poems may be found in Wackernagel, Das deutsche Kirchenlied, Bd. II. Nos. 701-798. Ambros³ quotes his German paraphrase of the Salve Regina, words and music, but mistakenly attributes the melody to Laufenberg, though he afterwards so far corrects himself as to describe it as 'eine volksthümliche Umbildung der kirchlichen Melodie.' R. von Liliencron⁴ has shown that the melody is nothing else but that of the plain-song Salve Regina, the text of which Laufenberg has so paraphrased in German verses that every note of the plain-song melisma is sung to a separate syllable. The whole piece is an interesting example of the practice by which the originally textless melismata on the final syllable of the Gradual Alleluias were developed into the Proses and Hymns called Sequences. For the use of his choir at Leipzig, Carl Riedel edited several 'Altdeutsche geistliche Lieder' by Laufenberg, arranged for four voices, and published by E. W. Fritzsch. J. R. M.

LAUKO, DESIDERIUS (b. Sarvaš, in the district of Békeš, Nov. 8, 1872), Slovak composer, LL.D. and financial secretary at Bratislava. His father a Slovak schoolmaster, early awakened the sense of music in his son. After passing through the secondary school and the gymnasium at Sarvaš, he proceeded to study law at the University of Budapest. His musical education was carried on at the Academy in the Hungarian capital, under Professor Szendy. His early musical training was Magyar rather than Slavonic; later on, however, his enthusiasm for Slovak scenery and folk-music awakened a desire to treat some of the popular tunes in art forms—rhapsodies, humoresques, berceuses, etc. His best work of the kind is the arrangement of the Slovak dances (7 books, still in MS.). LAURENCE, FREDERICK (b. London, May 25, 1884), composer, at first followed a commercial career, but studied music privately under Josef Holbrooke. Afterwards he travelled in Germany, France and Austria, gaining musical experience in various ways. On his return to England he became librarian to one or two of the most important orchestral organisations in London, doing much useful work in the way of arranging and scoring. He was also for a time a partner in a London firm of music librarians and publishers. In 1924 he transferred some of his activities to other fields.

Between 1910–12 he composed an opera, 'The Pariah,' which he afterwards destroyed, a fate shared by several early and immature works. An orchestral Legend, 'The Spirit's Wayfaring,' was produced by Sir Henry J. Wood at the Queen's Hall Promenade Concerts on Oct. 2, 1918, and another work for orchestra, 'The Dance of the Witch Girl,' on Oct. 12, 1920. A lighter piece for string orchestra, 'Tristis,' has a certain vogue. In 1922 and 1923 Laurence visited Vienna, where he conducted some of his works.

The music of Frederick Laurence is daring as regards harmony, exceedingly complex in texture, and richly scored. In spite of its non-conformity with established usages, it does not reveal indiscriminate sympathy with all the new tendencies. It is absolute music in so far as it seeks to express only such conceptions as lie outside the scope of any other art. Most frequently it deals with occult matters and aims at arousing a mystical emotion rather than at making its appeal to the senses or the intellect.

Other works by Laurence are:

'A Miracle,' 'Enchantment,' 'Fire Earth,' 'Milander,' 'Night,' 'The Dream Harlequin,' 'The Passionate Quest,' all for orchestra; Sextet for strings; Trio for vln., vcl. and PF.; Sonata for vln. and PF.; various pieces for PF.

LAURENCIE, LIONEL DE LA (b. Nantes, July 24, 1861). While following the study of law and of science, he early initiated himself into musical technique with Leon Reynier for violin, Alph. Weingartner and Bourgault-Ducoudray (at the Paris Conservatoire, 1891–92) for harmony. At the end of 1898 he devoted himself entirely to the study of music, gave some very popular courses at the École des Hautes-Études Sociales, on such subjects as: 'Quelques maîtres de l'ancienne école de violon' (1906), 'Les Origines de l'Opéra-Comique' (1907), 'Le Ballet de cour avant Lully' (1910), 'Les Pastorales en musique au XVIIIème siècle' (1911), 'Les Formes instrumentales' (1913). He has also given numerous lectures both in France and abroad.

De La Laurencie has contributed a number of articles to the Mercur musical (1905–06), the review S.I.M., the Revue musicale, to the quarterly publications of the I.M.G., to the R.M.I.; he has also written books, of which the best known are Le Godt musical en France (1905), the Académie de musique et le concert de Nantes (1906), Quelques documents sur Jean Philippe Rameau et sa famille (1907), Rameau (1908), the École française de violon de Lully à Viotti (3 vols., Paris, 1922–24). A work on the lutenists is in preparation (1926).

He has been president at different times of the Société Française de Musicologie, of which he was one of the founders, and has succeeded Lavignac as editor of the Encyclopédie de la Musique et Dictionnaire du Conservatoire, published by Delagrave. M. P.

LAURENTI, (1) BARTOLOMEO GIROLAMO (b. Bologna, c. 1644; d. there, Jan. 18, 1726), violinist-composer, violinist at S. Petronio and member of the Accademia Filarmonica, Bologna. He composed 'Sonate da camera a vn^o. e vcl^o.' op. 3; 'Sei concerti a . . . vn^o., vcl^o. ed org.'; 1 sonata violin and basso continuo in collective volumes published by Buffagnotti, 1700.

(2) GIROLAMO NICOLÒ (b. Bologna; d. there, Dec. 26, 1752), son of Bartolomeo, pupil of Torelli and Vitali; violinist at San Petronio. He composed 6 concertos for 3 violins, viola, violoncello and organ. By 'Laurenti' without Christian name, are 6 concertos and 1 solo piece. (See Q.-L.)

LAURENTIUS VON SCHNÜFFIS (real name JOHANN MARTIN) (b. Schniffs, Vorarlberg, Aug. 24, 1633; d. Constance, Jan. 7, 1702). As an itinerant scholar he earned his subsistence by singing and rhyming until he received an engagement at the Innsbruck court theatre in 1660. In 1665 he entered a religious order, and sometime after was made a poet laureate by the Emperor Leopold I. He is one of the few monodic song-writers of the 17th century, but of the nine books of his songs (list in Q.-L.) the melodies are at least partly by Father Romanus Vötter. E. v. d. s.

LAURO, DOMENICO (b. Padua, c. 1540), went to Mantua c. 1598 and became maestro di cappella at the cathedral. He composed masses, madrigals, etc. (Q.-L.).

LAUTENCLAVICYMBEL, 'lute-harpsichord,' invented by J. S. Bach in 1740, strung with gut strings for the two 'unison' stops, and with an octave stop of wire. Its tone, when checked by a damper of cloth, was so like a lute as to deceive a lute-player by profession. (See HARPSTICHORD, and Adlung's Mus. Mech. ii. 139; Spitta's J. S. Bach, Engl. transl. ii. 47.)

LAUTERBACH, JOHANN CHRISTOPH (b. Culmbach, Bavaria, July 24, 1832; d. Dresden, Apr. 1918), distinguished violinist.

His education he received at the school and gymnasium of Würzburg, where he also learnt music from Bratsch and Fröhlich. In 1850 he entered the Conservatoire at Brussels as pupil of De Bériot and Fétis; in 1851 received the gold medal, and during Léonard's absence took his place as professor of the violin. In 1853 he became Konzertmeister and professor of the violin at the Conservatorium of Munich; in 1861, on the death of Lipinski, was appointed second Konzertmeister of the royal band at Dresden, and in 1873 succeeded to the first place. From 1861-77 he also held the post of principal teacher of the violin in the Conservatorium of Dresden, with great and increasing renown. He travelled much, and always with success. He spent the seasons of 1864 and 1865 in England, appearing at the Philharmonic on May 2 of the former and May 15 of the latter year, and playing also at the Musical Union. In Paris he played at the last concert at the Tuileries before the war; and received from the Emperor Napoleon a gold snuff-box set with diamonds. He was decorated with many orders, both of North and South Germany. In the summer of 1876 he met with a serious mountain accident in Switzerland, by which several of his companions were killed and he himself severely injured. He, however, completely recovered. Lauterbach's style united the best peculiarities of the Belgian school, great polish and elegance, with the breadth of the German. P. D.

LAVENU, (1) LEWIS, an important London music-publisher, who was in business in 1796 at 23 Duke Street, St. James's. About 1800 he had removed to 29 New Bond Street, and in 1803 he entered into partnership with Mitchell. In 1809 Mitchell dropped out of the firm, and L. Lavenu was sole proprietor.

(2) ELIZABETH, probably a relative, was in business on her own account about 1820 at 24 Edwards Street, Manchester Square, but she appears shortly before 1822 to have succeeded to the business at 28 Bond Street, where in 1838 Louis Henry Lavenu was in partnership with Nicholas Mori the violinist.

The Lavenu family issued great quantities of sheet music, vocal and instrumental, almost always printed on coarse, blue-tinged paper.

(3) LOUIS HENRY (b. London, 1818; d. Sydney, Australia, Aug. 1, 1859), son of a flautist and music-seller. He was a pupil of the R.A.M., where he studied composition under Bochsa and Potter. Before leaving the Academy he was engaged as a violoncellist at the Opera and the Westminster Abbey Festival of 1834. He was also in business as a music-seller in partnership with his stepfather, Nicholas Mori, the eminent violinist, after whose death in 1839 he continued the business alone for a few years. During this time he published a few songs and short pianoforte pieces composed by himself. His opera, 'Loretta, a Tale of Seville,' words by Bunn, was produced at Drury Lane, Nov. 9, 1846, with success. Dissatisfied with his position, Lavenu emigrated to Australia, and obtained the post of director of the music at the Sydney Theatre. W. H. H.

LAVIGNAC, ALEXANDRE JEAN ALBERT (b. Paris, Jan. 22, 1846; d. thoro, May 28, 1916), was a pupil of the Conservatoire, carrying off the first prize for solfège in 1857, the first prize for piano in 1861, the first for harmony and accompaniment in 1863, the first for counterpoint and fugue in 1864 and the second for organ in 1865. He was appointed assistant professor of solfège in 1871; professor in 1875; and professor of harmony in 1891. In 1915 he became honorary professor. His Cours complet théorique et pratique de dictée musicale (1881), suggested to most French conservatoires and schools the practical value of musical dictation. G. F.; rev. M. L. P.

In 1902 Lavignac formed the scheme for the great publication, Encyclopédie de la musique et Dictionnaire du Conservatoire, which started publication on May 30, 1913 (see HISTORIES OF MUSIC), and which he edited until his death. Its present editor is L. de LA LAURENCIE (q.v.).

LAVIGNE, ANTOINE JOSEPH (b. Besançon, May¹ 23, 1816; d. Manchester, Aug. 1, 1886), oboe-player, received his early musical education from his father, a musician in an infantry regiment. On Jan. 24, 1830, he was admitted a pupil of the Conservatoire at Paris, where he studied the oboe under Vogt, but was obliged to leave on May 3, 1835, on account of his father's regiment being ordered from Paris. He resumed his position on Oct. 17, 1836, and obtained the first prize in 1837. He was for several years principal oboe at the Théâtre Italien at Paris. In 1841 he came to England, and appeared as oboe soloist at the Promenade Concerts at Drury Lane, and was for many years a member of Hallé's orchestra at Manchester. He fell into great poverty and distress, and was admitted into the infirmary of St. Saviour's, Southwark, in 1885, and removed thence to the Royal Infirmary, Manchester, where he died.

ness to applying to the oboe the system of keys which Boehm (or Gordon) had contrived for the flute, and devoted several years to perfecting the instrument. This admirable player had great execution and feeling; but what was most remarkable was his power and length of breath, which, by some secret known to himself, enabled him to give the longest phrases without breaking them. LAVOIX, HENRI MARIE FRANÇOIS (b. Paris, Apr. 26, 1846; d. there, Dec. 27, 1897) (known as Lavoix fils, to distinguish him from his father, the conservateur of the collection of coins in the Bibliothèque Nationale), eminent writer on music, was educated at the university of the Sorbonne, where he took the degree of bachelier, while studying harmony and counterpoint with H. Cohen. His writings on musical history are as follows: Les Traducteurs de Shakespeare en musique (1869); La Musique dans l'imagerie du moyen âge (1875); La Musique dans la Nature (1877); Histoire de l'instrumentation (1878, crowned by the Institut); Le Chant, ses principes et son histoire (with Th. Lemaire); La Musique du siècle de Saint-Louis; Histoire de la musique; Histoire de la musique française; and many articles in magazines, etc. He was appointed librarian of the Bibliothèque Nationale in 1865. LAWES. The name of an English family of musicians in the 17th century, of whom

(1) THOMAS was the founder. The identification of Thomas Lawes of Dinder,¹ near Wells, Somerset, with the vicar-choral of Salisbury of the same name has not been ascertained with certainty. The latter died Nov. 7, 1640, and was buried in the north transept of Salisbury Cathedral. He is presumed to have been twice married and the father of three sons, two of whom, William (4) and Henry (2), are of historical importance.

In the registers of Dinton in Wiltshire there are two entries which establish Thomas of Dinder as the father of Henry; the marriage (1593-94) on Feb. 3 of 'Thomas Lawes of Dinder in the countie of Somerset and Lucris Sypherde, the daughter of Junno Shepherde of Dinton,' and (1595-96), 'In this yeare ye fift day of January Thomas Lawes had a sonne christened named Henry.'²

(2) HENRY (b. Dinton, Wilts, c. Dec. 1595; d. Oct. 21, 1662), received his musical education from John COOPER (Coprario). On Jan. 1, 1625-26, he was sworn in as epistler of the Chapel Royal, and on Nov. 3 following, one of the gentlemen, and afterwards became clerk of the cheque. In 1633 he furnished music for Thomas Carew's masque, 'Coelum Britannicum,' performed at court, Feb. 18, 1633-34. In this masque the Earl of Bridgewater's two sons took part, and this circumstance very probably led to his being employed as music-teacher in the family, and so to the production of Milton's masque, 'Comus,'³ written at his request and produced at Ludlow Castle on Michaelmas night, Lawes performing the part of the Attendant Spirit. Both Hawkins and Burney have printed 'Sweet Echo,' one of the songs in 'Comus.' The whole of the songs are in the B.M. Add. MSS. 11,518, and the music was published entire by the Mermaid Society in 1904. In 1637 appeared

'A Paraphrase vpon the Psalmes of David. By [George] Slandys]. Set to new Tunes for private Devotion. And a thorow Base, for Voice or Instrument. By Henry Lawes'; and in 1648

'Choice Psalmes put into Musick for Three Voices. . . . (composed by Henry and William Lawes, Brothers and Servants to His Majesty. With divers Elegies set in Musick by several friends, upon the death of William Lawes. And at the end of the Thorough Base⁴ are added nine⁵ Canons of Three and Four Voices made by William Lawes.'

A copper-plate portrait of Charles I., believed to be the last published in his lifetime, accompanies each part, and amongst the commendatory verses prefixed to the work is the sonnet, addressed by Milton to Henry Lawes in Feb. 1645-46,⁶ beginning 'Harry, whose tuneful and well-measured song,' Lawes composed the Christmas songs in Herrick's 'Hesperides,' and the songs in the plays and poems of William Cartwright, Comedies, and tragi-Comedies, with other poems by Mr. William Cartwright. . . . The Ayres and Songs set by Mr. Henry Lawes . . . London, 1651.

It contains no music, however. In 1652 some of his songs appeared in Playford's 'Select Musical Ayres,' and in 1653 Lawes published 'Ayres and Dialogues for One, Two and Three Voyces,' with his portrait⁷ finely engraved by Faithorne on the title. This was received with such favour as to induce him to issue two other books with the same title in 1655 and 1658. In 1656 he was engaged with Capt. Henry Cooke, Dr. Charles Colman and George Hudson in providing the music for Davenant's 'First Day's Entertainment of Musick at Rutland House.' On the Restoration in 1660, Lawes was reinstated in his court appointments. He composed the anthem 'Zadok the Priest,' for the coronation of Charles II. He died Oct. 21, 1662, and was buried (Oct. 25) in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey. Many of his songs are to be found in 'Select Musical Ayres and Dialogues,' 1652, 1653 and 1659, and 'The Treasury of Musick,' 1669.

Henry Lawes was highly esteemed by his contemporaries, both as a composer and performer. Milton praises him in both capacities, and Herrick in an epigram places him on a level with some of the most renowned singers and players of his time; but later writers have formed a lower estimate of his abilities as a composer. Burney declares his productions to be 'languid and insipid, and equally devoid of learning and genius'; and Hawkins speaks of his music as deficient in melody and 'neither recitative nor air, but in so precise a medium between both that a name is wanting for it.' But both appear to judge from a false point of view. It was not Lawes's object to produce melody in the popular sense of the word, but to set 'words with just note and accent,' to make the prosody of his text his principal care; and it was doubtless that quality which induced all the best poetical writers of his day, from Milton and Waller downwards, to desire that their verses should be set by him. To effect his object he employed a kind of 'aria parlante,' a style of composition which, if expressively sung, would cause as much gratification to the cultivated hearer as the most ear-catching melody would to the untrained listener. His work of this kind is historically important apart from its intrinsic merits, since it marks a stage in the setting of the English language to music in a way which reached its consummation in Purcell (see under PURCELL, CHARACTERISTICS OF PURCELL'S ART; also SONG, section ENGLAND). Lawes was careful in the choice of words, and the words of his songs would form a very pleasing volume of lyric poetry. Hawkins says that notwithstanding Lawes 'was a servant of the church, he contributed nothing to the increase of its stores'; but, besides the coronation anthem before mentioned, there are (or were) in an old choir book of the Chapel Royal fragments of eight or ten anthems by him, and the words of several of his anthems are given in Clifford's 'Divine Services and Anthems,' 1664. In 1901 Dr. Cooper Smith, Rector of Basingstoke, owned a MS. volume (formerly belonging to Gostling, R. Smith and Dr. Hayes), dated in the binding 1634, containing many compositions by H. Lawes. These include 'Dispairs Banquet, sung in The Pasions written by Mr. Wm. Strood, presented by ye scollers of Ch. Ch. before both their Majestys, 1636,' 'Come from the Dungeon, sung in . . . ye Royal Slave—written by Mr. Wm. Cartwright presented by the scollers of Ch. Ch. in Oxford before their Majestys 1636,' 'The five songs in Comus . . . presented . . . Oct. 1634,' etc., and 'Cupid to ye Knights Templars in a Maske at ye Middle Temple.' A portrait of Henry Lawes is in the Music School, Oxford (reproduced on PLATE XLII.). Another painted in 1622, is in the bishop's palace at Salisbury.¹

(3) JOHN, a brother of Henry, was a lay-vicar of Westminster Abbey. He died in Jan. 1654–55, and was buried in the Abbey cloisters.

(4) WILLIAM² (d. Chester, 1645), elder half-brother of Henry, received musical instruction from Coprario at the expense of the Earl of Hertford. He became a member of the choir of Chichester Cathedral, which he quitted in 1602, on being appointed a gentleman of the Chapel Royal. He was sworn in Jan. 1, 1602–1603. On May 5, 1611, he resigned his place in favour of Ezekiel Waad, a lay-vicar of Westminster Abbey, but on Oct. 1, following, was readmitted 'without paie.' He was also one of the musicians in ordinary to Charles I. In 1633 he joined Simon Ives in the composition of the music for Shirley's 'Triumph of Peace.' In 1635 he wrote the music for Davenant's masque, 'The triumph of the Prince d'Amour,' preserved in the Bodleian (Music Sch. MSS. B, 2, 3, and D, 229). An anthem by him is printed in Boyce's 'Cathedral Music'; songs and other vocal compositions in 'Select Musickall Ayres and Dialogues,' 1653 and 1659; 'Catch that catch can,' 1652; 'The Treasury of Musick,' 1669; and 'Choice Psalms,' 1648; and some of his instrumental music in 'Courtly Masquing Ayres,' 1662. His portrait is in the Music School, Oxford. 'The Royal Consort' for viols, consisting of sixty-six short pieces, and some 'Airs' for violin and bass are in the B.M. Add. MSS. 10,445, 31,431-2; the latter MS. contains also a canon, 'Tis joy to hear,' and fifty-five vocal compositions. B.M. Add. MSS. 29,410-4, and 17,798 contain more of his pieces, and in the Christ Church Library are his 'Great Consorte' (I. 5, 1-6) and other works (I. 4, 79-82, 91-3, K. 3, 32, and H. I. 12 and 18). Canons and MS. songs are contained in B.M. Fg MS. 2013, Add. MSS. 20,396-7, 30,273, 31,423, 31,433, 31,462. His best-known work is the partsong 'Gather ye rosebuds while ye may.' On the breaking out of the Civil War he joined the Royalist army, and was made a commissary by Lord Gerrard, to exempt him from danger, but his active spirit disdaining that security, he was killed by a stray shot during the siege of Chester, 1645.

LAWROWSKA, ELIZABETH ANDREJEWNA LAWROWSKAJA, known as Mme. Lawrowska (b. Kaschin, Twer, Russia, Oct. 12, 1845), mezzo-soprano singer. She was taught singing by Fenzi at the Elizabeth Institute, and by Mme. Nissen-Saloman at the Conservatoire of St. Petersburg.

In 1867 she made her début as Orpheus at three performances of Gluck's opera, given by the students of the Conservatoire under Rubinstein, at the Palace of the Grand Duchess Helena, thanks to whose kindness she was enabled to study abroad. From 1868-72 she was engaged at the Russian Opera-Theatre Marie, and on July 31, 1871, she married the Prince Zeretieff at Odessa. In 1868 she was announced to sing at the Italian Opera, Covent Garden, but did not appear. She left the opera for a time and sang in concerts all over Europe, having received further instruction from Mme. Viardot-Garcia. She visited this country in 1873, and made her first appearance, Feb. 24, at the Monday Popular Concerts, and Mar. 1 at the Crystal Palace. During her stay she made a great impression by her grand mezzo-soprano voice and fine declamatory powers of singing in operatic airs of Handel and Glinka, and in the Lieder of Schubert, Schumann, etc. In 1881 she reappeared in England in concerts, but for a very short period. In 1878 she returned to the St. Petersburg Opera. The principal Russian operas in which she performed were 'La Vie pour le Czar' and 'Russian and Ludmila' of Glinka, 'Russalka' of Dargomijsky, and 'Wrazzia Silow' of Serov.

A. C.

LAY, a Provençal word, originally probably Celtic, meaning at first a sound or noise, and then a song, especially the tune, as the quotations from Spenser, Milton and Dryden in Johnson's Dictionary prove. Beyond this general sense the term has no application to music. The German 'Lied' is another form of the word.

G.

LAYOLLE, FRANCISCU DE, or FRANCESCO DELL' AIOLLE, a French composer of the earlier part of the 13th century, who settled as organist at Florence about 1540, and was Benvenuto Cellini's teacher in music. He edited, for the Lyons music-printer Jacques Moderne or Modernus, a book of ten masses ('Liber decem Missarum,' 1532-40), among which are three masses and three motets by himself. His Mass 'Adieu, mes amours,' Ambros describes as a remarkable work. His other works are canzoni a 5 and a 4, published by Modernus, 1540 and later, and other madrigals and motets in various collections. From a rare work entitled Contrapunctus seu figurata musica super plano cantu, etc., Lyons, 1528, Kade in his Beilagen zu Ambros has reprinted two motets by Layolle, 'Salve Virgo singularis' and 'Media vita,' both a 4, which, as the title of the work indicates, are contrapuntal studies on a plain-song tenor. From this connexion of Layolle with works printed in Lyons, it would seem as if Lyons had been his birthplace, and it appears that Aleman Layolle, his son, was for a while organist at Lyons, but afterwards returned to Florence, and was music-teacher to a daughter of Benvenuto Cellini.

J. R. M.

LAYS, FRANÇOIS (b. La Barthe de Nesthes, Old Gascony, Feb. 14, 1758; d. Ingrande, near Angers, Mar. 30, 1831), a famous French singer, whose real name was LAY or LAÏ. He learned music in the monastery of Guaraison, but before he was 20 his fame as a singer had spread, and in Apr. 1779 he found himself at Paris to be tried for the Opéra. His name first appears in Lajarte's catalogue of first representations, as Pétrarque, in a 'pastoral héroïque' by Candeille, called 'Laure et Pétrarque,' July 2, 1780, and is spelt Laïs. His next mention is in the 'Iphigénie en Tauride' of Piccini, Jan. 23, 1781, where he has the rôle of a coryphée.¹ After that he appears frequently in company with Mlle. Saint-Huberti, a famous soprano of that day. He was also attached to the concerts of Marie Antoinette, and to the Concert Spirituel. He was a poor actor, unless in parts specially written for him; but the splendour of his voice made up for everything, and he preserved it so well as to remain in the company of the Opéra till Oct. 1823.

Lays was a violent politician on the popular side, which did not please his colleagues, and some quarrels arose in consequence, but with no further result than to cause him to write a pamphlet, and to force him, after the 9th Thermidor, to appear in parts distasteful to him, and to sing before the Bourbons after the Restoration. He was professor of singing at the Conservatoire from 1795-99, when he retired from the post; and from 1819-26 held the same office in the 'École royale de chant et de déclamation.' He had been principal singer in the chapel of Napoleon from 1801 till the fall of the Emperor, but was cashiered by Louis XVIII. After leaving the École he retired to Ingrande, where he died. We have said that he was not a good actor, but Fétis pronounces him not even a good singer, saying that his taste was poor and that he had several bad tricks; but he had warmth and animation, and the beauty of his voice so far atoned for all that for a long time no opera could be successful in which he had not a part.

G.

LAY-VICAR or LAY-CLERK, a singer in English Cathedral Choirs. (See VICARS-CHORAL.)

LAZARI, FRATE ALBERTO, a carmelite monk, maestro di cappella and organist at the parochial college of Massa Lombarda in 1635; academician at Cesena, 1637; afterwards at Perugia. He composed 2 books of church music (Q.-L.).

LAZARINI, FRA SCIPIONE (17th cent.), Augustinian monk and composer at Ancona. His earliest known composition is a 3-part song in a collective volume, 1646, followed by 2 books of motets, opp. 1 and 2 (1674), and a book of psalms (1675). In MS. in the Bologna Library are 3 masses and 4 motets, 4-8 v.

E. v. d. s.

LAZARO, VALVASENSI (b. Valvasone, Udine, late 16th cent.), organist at Murano, 1622; maestro di cappella and organist at Tolmezo, Friuli, 1626; organist at Valvasone, 1630. He composed church music, 2-5 v., a book of sacred songs, and two books of secular monodic songs between 1620-34 (Q.-L.).

LAZARUS, HENRY (b. London, Jan. 1, 1815; d. London, Mar. 6, 1895), clarinettist, began the study of the clarinet when a boy under Blizard, bandmaster of the Royal Military Asylum, Chelsea, and continued it under Charles Godfrey, sen., bandmaster of the Coldstream Guards. After fulfilling engagements in various theatrical and other orchestras he was, in 1838, appointed as second to Willman at the Sacred Harmonic Society. On the death of Willman in 1840 Lazarus succeeded him as principal clarinet at the Opera and all the principal concerts, festivals, etc., in London and the provinces, a position he retained for many years with great and ever-increasing reputation. He was a professor of his instrument at the R.A.M. from 1854, and at Kneller Hall from 1858. He gave a farewell concert in St. James's Hall, May 31, 1892. W. H. H.

LAZZARI, SYLVIO (b. Botzen, Tyrol, Jan. 1, 1860), a composer who after studying law at Innsbruck and Munich, entered the Paris Conservatoire in 1883-84, but his chief studies were carried on under César Franck. The following works have been publicly performed: The pantomime, 'Lulu,' brought out in 1887; the musical drama, 'Armor,' at the Landestheater in Prague in 1898, and 'L'Ensorcelé,' in Paris in 1903; 'La Lépreuse' (Ger. 'Die Angeschlossene,' translated by Emma Klagenfeld and Sylvio Lazzari), performed Paris, Opéra-Comique, Feb. 7, 1912; 'Melaenis' (Paris, 1915); 'Le Sauteriot,' performed Paris, Opéra-Comique Apr. 8, 1920. For orchestra he has written a 'Rhapsodie espagnole,' 'Ophélie,' a symphonic poem; 'Impressions d'Adriatique'; 'Effet de nuit' (1904), 'Marche de fête,' a fantasia for violin and orchestra, and a Concertstück for piano and orchestra. His chamber compositions include a sonata for piano and violin (1894), a trio, a string quartet (1911), an octet for wind instruments, Concertstück for violin and orchestra, 'Trois pièces pour piano' (1912), Barcarolle for violoncello and piano (1914), 'Suite d'orchestre,' F major, symphony in E flat major, 'Rhapsodie' for violin and piano (1922), 'Romanzetta' for PF. (1923), second 'Rhapsodie hongroise' for PF. (1924), songs to poems by Verlaine, Bataille, Rollinat, Maeterlinck, Tristan Klingsor, etc.

LAZZARINI, GUSTAVO (b. Padua, or Verona,¹ c. 1765), a tenor singer, whose début was made at Lucca in 1789, in Zingarelli's 'Ifigenia in Aulide,' with great éclat.

In the two following years he appeared in London, singing both in serious and comic operas, such as Berton's 'Quinto Fabio' and the 'Locanda' of Paisiello, in the former with Pacchierotti, but taking the principal rôle in the latter. Lord Mount-Edgumbe thought him 'a very pleasing singer with a sweet tenor voice.' During the Carnival of 1794 he sang at Milan, with Grassini and Marchesi, in Zingarelli's 'Artaserse' and the 'Demofonte' of Portogallo, and bore the comparison inevitably made between him and those great singers. He sang there again in 1795, and once more in 1798, appearing on the latter occasion in Cimarosa's 'Orazzi' and Zingarelli's 'Meleagro,' with Riccardi and Crescentini. In 1801 he was one of the Opera Buffa troupe at Paris, where he was again heard to advantage by Lord Mount-Edgumbe (1802), singing in company with La Strinasacchi and Georgi Belloc. But his voice had now lost much of its freshness, though the great style remained. Lazzarini published two volumes of Italian airs, and a Pastoral, both at Paris (Carli). His portrait was engraved there by Nitot Dufrêne, an operatic singer. J. M.

LEACH, JAMES (b. Wardle, near Rochdale, Lancashire, 1762; d. near Manchester, Feb. 8, 1798), was at first a handloom weaver. From 1789 he was a tenor singer and teacher in Rochdale, and at Salford a few years later. He published a 'New Set of Hymn and Psalm Tunes, etc.' (Preston, London, 1789); and a 'Second Set' of the same, probably about 1794. His tunes are found in several of the American collections, as the Easy Instructor (Albany, New York, 1798), and the Bridgewater Collection (Boston, 1802). The David Companion or Methodist Standard (Baltimore, 1810) contains forty-eight of his pieces.² In the Rev. H. Parr's 'Church of England Psalmody' will be found Mount Pleasant, Oldham and Smyrna, by him, which used to be favourites in certain congregations. His 'Psalmody' was brought out in 1886, with a biographical sketch by Thomas Newbigging. Leach died from a stage-coach accident, near Manchester, and is buried at Rochdale. G.

LEADER. (1) The chief of the first violins is in England called the leader of the orchestra, the Konzertmeister of the Germans, and chef d'attaque of the French. He is close to the conductor's left hand. The position is a most important one, as the animation and 'attack' of the band depend in great measure on the leader. The great precision and force of the Gewandhaus orchestra, for instance, is said to have been mainly due to David being for so long at the head of them. It is the leader's duty to play any passages for solo violin that may occur in works other than violin concertos; and in orchestras that are not organised institutions the leader often makes the engagement with the individual members. G.

(2) In America the conductor (Fr. chef d'orchestre, Ger. Dirigent) is generally spoken of as the 'Leader.' C.

LEADING NOTE (Fr. note sensible, Ger. Leiton) is the seventh note of the scale, and 'leads' to the principal note, the tonic, by a semitone. In three principal Ecclesiastical modes, those on D, G and A, the note below the tonic (and also above) was at the distance of a tone. The advent of harmony gradually changed that by insisting on a major chord on the dominant. The arrival of the leading note, being due to harmonic considerations, was strongly protested against (for instance, in John XXII's Bull of 1322) by a Church which felt strongly the melodic associations of the modes. It has established itself in the classical period so firmly as a harmonic element that recent experiments with folk-song and the tonal scale have done little, if anything, to shake it.

But, even so, it is not unaffected by melody, for, as the French name for it reminds us, its intonation is variable. The experiments of Cornu and Mercadier (see Helmholtz, Sensations of Tone, 1st edn. pp. 787-91) showed that in ordinary playing on strings the major third as such was sharpened, in melody not in harmony, by a comma, but the major third on the dominant, i.e. the leading-note, by $1\frac{1}{2}$ commas—obviously because of the attraction of the tonic. LEBERT, SIGMUND (real name LEVY) (b. Ludwigsburg, Württemberg, Dec. 12, 1822; d. Stuttgart, Dec. 8, 1884), the virtual founder of the Stuttgart Conservatorium, received his musical education from Tomaschek and D. Weber at Prague. He settled in Munich as a pianoforte teacher for some years before 1856, where, with Faisst, Stark and others, he started the music school. He was a very accomplished and successful teacher. G.

The Grosse Pianoforte Schule, which he edited with Stark, was published by the house of Cotta, and afterwards revised by Max Pauer (1904); the famous edition of Beethoven's pianoforte sonatas, issued by the same firm, was begun by these editors and continued by Hans von Bülow. M.

LEBHAF, i.e. 'lively,' the German equivalent for Vivace.

LE BORNE, AIMÉ AMBROISE SIMON (b. Brussels, Dec. 29, 1797; d. Paris, Apr. 1 or 2, 1866), obtained the Grand Prix de Rome in 1820, as composition pupil of Cherubini, and successively taught 'solfège' counterpoint, fugue and composition at the Paris Conservatoire, the latter branch 1836-66, replacing Reicha. He became librarian at the Opéra and of the Imperial Chapel under Napoleon III. He composed 'Les Deux Figaro' performed at the Odéon (1827), wrote treatises of harmony and counterpoint and gave out a new edition of Cotel's harmony treatise. M. L. P.

LE BORNE, FERNAND, see BORNE.

LEBRUN, JEAN (b. Lyons, Apr. 6, 1759; d. Paris c. 1809), famous horn-player; studied in Paris under Punto. He possessed great technical ability, and produced the highest notes with perfect ease. From 1786-92 he was at the Paris Opéra when the Revolution drove him to London, whence he went to Berlin as member of the royal chapel. In 1802 he toured on the Rhine and in the Netherlands, and returned to Paris in 1806, where he failed to find an appointment and died in poverty. He is credited with the invention of the muto for the horn. Some horn concertos of his remained in MS. (Mendel; Q.-L.).

LEBRUN, (1) LUDWIG AUGUST (b. Mannheim, c. 1746; d. Berlin, Dec. 15, 1790), one of the greatest of oboe virtuosi of the 18th century. In 1764 he became a member of the Mannheim court orchestra, and followed it, on its transference to Munich in 1778. With his wife, the famous singer (see below), he toured all over Europe and met with triumphant success, especially in London and Paris. He composed 7 oboe concertos; 12 trios for oboe, violin and bass; a flute concerto and duets for flutes. (Mendel; Riemann; Q.-L.)

(2) FRANCESCA (b. Mannheim, 1756; d. Berlin, May 14, 1791), famous soprano singer, married Ludwig Lebrun.

She was the daughter of DANZI (q.v.), the violoncellist, made her first appearance (1771) when scarcely 16 years old, and charmed the court; in the next year she was engaged at the Mannheim Opera. Fétis says that in 1775 she became the wife of Lebrun, the oboist, whom she accompanied to Italy, singing first at Milan (1778) in Salieri's 'Europa riconosciuta.' The Milanese were delighted with her clear and beautiful voice and easy vocalisation, in spite of the intrigues of La Balducci, the prima donna of La Scala, who endeavoured to set them against her young rival. This account must, however, be corrected; for, whereas Fétis says that she only came to England in 1781, there is no doubt that she was here five years earlier, then unmarried, arriving with Roncaglia, with whom she sang in Sacchini's 'Creso.' It is clear that she did not marry Lebrun until after 1777. She reappeared in London as Mme. Lebrun in 1779, being again the prima donna for serious opera, and continued with Pacchierotti to sing in London for two or three seasons.

She sang in 1785 at Munich, after which she returned to Italy, achieving the same brilliant success at Venice and Naples as elsewhere. In 1788 and 1789 she appeared at Munich in Mozart's 'Idomeneo,' Prati's 'Armida,' and the 'Castor and Pollux' of Vogler. She started for Berlin in Dec. 1790 to fulfil an engagement, but on her arrival lost her husband, and herself died May 14, 1791. Mme. Lebrun, besides being a great singer, was an accomplished pianist, and published at Offenbach (1783) some sonatas with violin accompaniment, and some trios for piano, violin and violoncello.

Of her two daughters, the elder (3) SOPHIE, better known as Mme. Dulcken¹ (b. London, June 20, 1781), became celebrated as a pianist. She made successful concert-tours through France, Italy and Germany. On Apr. 18, 1799, she married Dulcken, a famous maker of pianos at Munich. She composed, but never published, some sonatas and other pieces for the piano.

(4) ROSINE, her younger sister (b. Munich, Apr. 13, 1785), was at first taught by Streicher for the piano, but afterwards studied singing under her uncle, Danzi, the Kapellmeister. She made a successful début; but, having married Stenzsch, an actor of the Court Theatre, Nov. 30, 1801, gave up the opera to play in comedy, in which she displayed a fair amount of talent.

LEBRUNO, LOUIS SÉBASTIAN (b. Paris, Dec. 10, 1764; d. there, June 27, 1829), a tenor at the Paris Opéra and Opéra-Comique; maître de chapelle of Napoleon's private music; and composer of operas and a Te Deum (Fétis; Q.-L.).

LECHNER, LEONHARD (b. before 1550 in the Etschthal, Austrian Tyrol; d. Würtemberg, 1604), composer of the school of Lassus.

From his birthplace comes the designation Athesinus, which he usually appended to his name. He was brought up as a chorister in the Bavarian court chapel at Munich under Orlando Lassus, of whose works he always remained an ardent admirer. In 1570 he held some post as schoolmaster in Nuremberg, and while still there began to be known as a diligent composer of motets and German songs in the madrigal or villanella style, also as editor of various collections of music. Thus in 1579 he introduced some degree of order into the chaos of the frequent republications of earlier works of Lassus, by bringing out, evidently in concert with the composer himself, a revised and enlarged edition of his two books of motets of 1568, one a 4 and 5, the other a 6-10, incorporating more of Lassus' earlier work of the same kind. In 1581 he brought out a book of five previously unpublished masses by Lassus; and in 1583 a collection entitled Harmoniae miscellae, containing motets a 5 and 6, mostly by composers connected at one time or another with the Bavarian chapel. Dehn in his Sammlung älterer Musik, published a selection from this latter work, including a good motet by Lechner himself, 'Ne intres in judicium.' In 1584, probably on the recommendation of Lassus, he was appointed Kapellmeister at Hechingen to Count Eitel Friedrich of Hohenzollern, but suddenly gave up his post in 1585, without any ostensible reason. Religion may have been the determining motive, as we know that he was succeeded at Hechingen by Ferdinand Lassus, the son of Orlando; and it was also in 1585 that Orlando dedicated to Count Eitel Friedrich a book of motets, and meanwhile Lechner, after an unsuccessful application for the post of Kapellmeister at Dresden to the then Lutheran court of Saxony, in 1587 became Kapellmeister at Stuttgart to the court of Würtemberg, where he remained till his death. It would almost appear as if he continued to cherish a hankering after the Saxon court, and endeavoured to keep up some relation with it, since his last work was the composition of a wedding-motet ('Laudate Dominum,' for fifteen voices) for the marriage of the Elector Johann Georg I. of Saxony. Besides his editorial work already referred to, Lechner's own works may be summarised as follows:

1. Two books of Motetta. or Sacrae cantiones a 4-6, containing eighty-six numbers, 1575, 1581.
2. Liber Misarum 6 et 5 voc. 1584, containing three masses and ten introlita.
3. Magnificat sec. octo tonos, 1578, eight numbers.
4. Septem Psalmi Pœnitentiales, etc., 6 v., 1587.
5. Various collections of Teutsche Lieder, geistliche und weltliche a 3, 4 and 5, 1576-89.

F. Commer, in his volume of 'Geistliche und weltliche Lieder,' republished four good specimens of Lechner's work: two geistliche Lieder, 'Christ ist erstanden,' a 4, and 'Herr Jesu Christ dir lebe ich,' a 5; two weltliche, 'Wol komt der Mey,' a 4, and 'Will uns das Meidlein nimmer han,' a 5. Also in the Publikation der Gesellschaft für Musikforschung, Bd. xix., 1895, Eitner has republished Lechner's lieder, 1579, containing his rearrangement, a 5, of twenty-one Lieder a 3, from Regnart's Tricinia, and three Italian madrigals of Lechner's own. LECLAIR, (1) JEAN-MARIE (b. Lyons, May 10, 1697; d. Oct. 22, 1764), l'aîné (so called to distinguish him from his brother Antoine-Remi), an eminent violin-player, and composer for his instrument.

It has been stated that he began his public life as a dancer at the Rouen Theatre; but this is doubtful.² In 1722 he went to Turin as ballet-master, where he composed some interludes for the 'Semiramide' of Orlandini, and where SOMIS (q.v.) was so much pleased with some ballet music of his that he induced him to take up the violin, which up to this time he had cultivated as a secondary pursuit only, and to place himself under his tuition. His first stay in Turin, near Somis, was only until 1723, but he returned in 1726. Leclair appears to have continued his studies for a considerable time before going to Paris in 1728. From 1728-36 he won a brilliant success in Paris at the Concert Spirituel and at the court. During this period he studied composition under Chéron. In 1734 he became a member of the royal band, but owing to a dispute with Guignon as to the leadership of the second violins, gave up his post again, and about 1735 retired from the Opéra. His name ceases to appear in the programmes of the Concert Spirituel about 1736. For the rest of his life he appears to have been exclusively occupied with the composition and publication of his works, and with teaching. He was already an old man when he made a journey to Holland at the invitation of the Princess of Orange, for the purpose of hearing and meeting Locatelli, of whose powers as a violinist he, led by the extraordinary and novel difficulties presented in the caprices of that artist, had probably formed a great idea. On his return he visited the court of Don Philip of Spain at Chambéry, in 1743-44. His opera, 'Scylla et Glaucus,' was performed in 1746, and in 1748 the Duc de Gramont appointed Leclair first violin in his private orchestra at Puteaux. Here he wrote various ballets and divertissements. Soon after his return from Holland, he was assassinated, late at night, close to the door of his own house. Neither motive nor author of the crime has ever been discovered.

Owing to the merit of his compositions for the violin, Leclair occupies a prominent place among the great classical masters of that instrument. As to his powers as a performer we have but the indirect evidence of the difficulties presented in his compositions. These are very considerable; and, barring Locatelli's eccentricities, greater than any that we find in the works of his predecessors or contemporaries. He very freely employs—in fact not seldom writes whole movements in—double-stops; and altogether, even according to the modern standard of technique, his music is exacting both for the left hand and the bow. In one instance he directs a note to be stopped with the left thumb. As a composer, judging him after his best works, Leclair must be accorded the first place among French writers for the violin. It has been justly remarked that a great deal of what he wrote is antiquated; but much remains that is truly charming. He is no mere imitator of the Italians, but there is a distinct individuality in many of his movements; and also a definite national French element. On the whole, gracefulness and vivacity are more prominent than depth of feeling; his frequent employment of double-stops, already mentioned, giving much richness and brilliancy of sound.

The two sonatas of his, edited by Ferd. David ('Hohe Schule des Violinspiels'), are good examples of his higher powers, especially the pathetic one, surnamed 'Le Tombeau.' On the other hand, a Saraband and Tambourin, often played with great success by Joachim and others, are good specimens of his lively style. This is a list of his works, as appended to his op. 12:

Op.

1. Sonatas for vln. alone with a bass. (1st book.) (1723.)
2. Sonatas. (2nd book.) (c. 1728.) Another set is called 'opus 1' and published by Walsh.
3. Sonatas for two viols. without bass. (1730.) (c. 1732.)
4. Sonatas en trio for two viols. and basso continuo. (c. 1730.)
5. Sonatas for vln. alone (3rd book.) (1734.)
6. 'Première Récréation de musique . . . pour deux violons et B.C.' (1737.)
7. Six concertos. (c. 1737.)
8. 'Deuxième Récréation de musique . . . pour deux flûtes ou deux violons et B.C.' (c. 1737.)
9. Sonatas. (4th book.) (1738.)
10. Six concertos (2nd book.) (c. 1743 or 1744.)
11. Scylla et Glaucus (musical tragedy). (1746.)
12. Sonatas for two viols. without bass. (c. 1747.) (2nd book.)
13. Ouvertures et sonates en trio, two viols. and basso continuo. (1753.)
14. Trio for two viols. and bass. (1766.) Posthumous.
15. Sonatas for vln. and bass. (1767.) Posthumous.

MODERN REPRINTS.—Sonatas for vln. alone and bass, fragmentary reprints by Alfred, F. David, Deldevez, d'Indy, Jensen, Kreisler, Moffat, etc.; the entire two first books, by Debroux and Guilmain (Demets-Eschig); Concertos, by Herwegh (Peters) and Borrel (Senart); Sonatas for two viols. without bass, Book I., by Fischerle (Senart); Sonate à trois, résumé, by Bouvet (Demets-Eschig).

LE COQC, JEHAN, see GALLUS, Joannes.

LECOQC, ALEXANDRE CHARLES (b. Paris, June 3, 1832; d. there, Oct. 24, 1918), composer of opéra-bouffe, entered the Conservatoire in 1849 and in 1850 obtained the first prize for harmony and accompaniment. He took the second prize for fugue in Halévy's class in 1852. He left the Conservatoire towards the close of 1854.

Lecocq found the usual difficulty in obtaining access to the stage, and would probably have had to wait a long time but for a competition for an operetta opened by Offenbach in 1856. He was bracketed with Bizet, and 'Le Docteur Miracle' was produced at the Bouffes Parisiens, Apr. 8, 1857. The operetta was evidently the work of a clever musician, who understood how to write for the voice. Notwithstanding this good beginning the small theatres still closed their doors to him, and Lecocq was driven to teaching for a livelihood. He then tried a different line, publishing, in conjunction with Besozzi, a collection of sacred songs for women's voices called 'La Chapelle au couvent' (1865)—less incongruous when we remember that he was a good organist; but the stage was irresistible, and after the failure of 'Huis clos' (1859), a little one-act piece 'Le Baiser à la porte' (1864) was followed by 'Liline et

This last piece was a brilliant success. Lecoq at last found himself established with the public and produced in rapid succession:

'L'Amour et son carquois,' two acts (1868); 'Gandolfo' and 'Le Rajah de Myore,' 3 both in one act (1869); 'Le Beau Dunolo,' one act (1870); 'Le Barbier de Trouville' and 'Le Testament de M. de Crac,' both in one act (1871); 'Sauvons la calase' (1871), one act, and 'Les Cent Vierges' 5 three acts (Brussels, 1872); 'La Fille de Mme Angot,' three acts (Brussels, Dec. 4, 1872), which ran for 500 nights consecutively; 'Les Pres St. Gervais' 7 and 'Giroflé-Girofla,' 8 both in three acts (Brussels, Mar. 21, 1874); 'Les Jumeaux de Bergame,' (1868), one act, and 'Le Poupon,' three acts (1875); 'La Petite Marie,' three acts (1875) 9; 'Kouiki' (1876) and 'La Marjolaine' 10 (1877), both in three acts; 'Le Petit Duc' 11 and 'Camargo,' both in three acts (1878); 'La Jolie Persane,' 1879; 'La Petite Mademoiselle,' three acts (1879) 12; 'Le Grand Casino,' 1879 13; 'Jancq,' 'Le Jour et la nuit,' 14 1881; 'Le Crur et la main,' 1882; 'La Princesse des Canaries,' 15 1883; 'L'Oiseau bleu' (1884).

An attempt at a higher class of music, 'Plutus,' produced at the Opéra-Comique, Paris, Mar. 31, 1886, failed and was withdrawn after eight representations; the earlier style was returned to in 'Les Grenadiers de Mont-Cornette' (Paris, 1887); 'All-Baba' (Brussels, 1887); 'La Volière' (Paris, 1888); 'L'Égyptienne' (Paris, 1890); 'Nos Bons Chasseurs' (ib. 1894); 'Ninette' (ib. 1895); 'Ruse d'Amour' (1898); 'Barbe-Bleue' (1899); 'Le Cygne' (Opéra-Comique, 1899); 'La Belle au bois dormant' (1900); 'Rose Mousse' (1904); 'La Salutate' (1905); 'Le Chevrier' (not performed); 'Yetta' (1909); 'La Trinité de Pau' (1911); also 4 works in MS. not performed—'Renza,' 'Ma Cousine,' 'Don Japhet d'Arménie,' 'Les Picarons.' To this long list must be added 4 vols. of pieces for P.F., 5 vols. of songs with P.F. accompaniment, orchestral music and compositions for various instruments, a sonata for P.F. and violin, 2 choruses. He arranged Rameau's 'Castor et Pollux' as a vocal score.

Lecoq realised that what the public really liked was light, gay, sparkling melodies. His style, not a very elevated one, made small demand on the poetry or the intellect of the composer; but it required tact, ease, freedom and, above all, animation. These qualities are conspicuous in Lecoq's operettas, which have become universally popular owing to the life, brio and easy gaiety which pervade them.

LEDUC (LE DUC), (1) SIMON L'AINÉ (b. Paris, c. 1748; d. there, Jan. 1777), violinist, pupil of Gaviniès. He appeared as soloist in violin concertos at the Concert Spirituel up to 1763, and afterwards, on various occasions, almost up to the time of his death.

As a composer, he published at the end of 1768 2 books of sonatas, 2 books of duos for 2 violins without bass, 6 trios for 2 violins and bass, 3 violin concertos, worthy of his master Gaviniès.

His work as a publisher is no less important. At the end of 1767 he published not only his own works, but the German and Italian compositions of J. C. Bach, Haydn, Nardini and others. About 1775 he acquired the publishing business of De Roullède de la Chevardière.

(2) PIERRE (b. Paris, c. 1755; d. Holland, 1816¹⁶), brother of the above, made a remarkable début as violinist at the Concert Spirituel in 1770. He followed his elder brother as publisher, succeeding in 1775 to the publisher Venier, rue Saint Thomas du Louvre, and, after the death of Simon, carrying on his brother's business until 1804. His son, (3) AUGUSTE, of whom little is known, succeeded him, and published Les Principes de composition des écoles d'Italie, by A. Choron. It is from him that (4) ALPHONSE (b. Nantes, Mar. 9, 1804), whose relationship with him is not known, acquired the business in 1841.

The firm is now directed by his son (5) ALPHONSE (b. 1878), honorary president of the Chambre Syndicale des Éditeurs de Musique.

LEE, GEORGE ALEXANDER (b. 1802; d. Oct. 8, 1851), theatrical manager and composer, was son of Harry Lee, a pugilist and landlord of the Anti-Gallican tavern, Shire Lane, Temple Bar. When a boy he entered the service of Lord Barrymore as 'tiger,' being the first of the class of servants known by that name; but on the discovery that he had a fine voice and a natural taste for music, he was withdrawn from that position and placed under a master for instruction. In 1822 he appeared as a tenor singer at the Dublin theatre, where he acted as conductor 1823-26, and in 1826 in London at the Haymarket Theatre, where he became conductor in 1827, and soon afterwards began business as a music-seller in the Quadrant.

In 1829, with Melrose, the tenor singer, and John Komble Chapman, he entered upon the management of the Tottenham Street Theatre, and gave performances of popular English operas. Lee succeeded in 1830, on account of the heavy penalties incurred through the infringement of the right of the 'patent theatres,' and became lessee of Drury Lane Theatre. He was soon afterwards joined by Captain Polhill, but at the end of the season he withdrew, leaving Polhill sole manager. In 1831 he undertook the management of the Lenton oratorios at both Drury Lane and Covent Garden. In 1832 he was composer and music director at the Strand Theatre, and in 1845 the same at the Olympic. He had a music shop at 59 Frith Street, Soho, in 1835-36. Lee composed the music for several dramatic pieces, amongst which were—

'The Sublime and Beautiful' and 'The Invincibles,' 1828; 'The Nymph of the Grotto' and 'The Witness,' 1829; 'The Devil's Brother' (principally from Auber's 'Fra Diavolo') and 'The Legion of Honour,' 1831; 'Waverley' (with G. Stanbury), 1832; 'Love in a Cottage,' 'Good Husbands make Good Wives,' 'Sold for a Song,' 'The Fairy Lake' and 'Auld Robin Gray,' the last composed about 1838 but not performed until 1858. He was also composer of many songs and ballads, highly popular in their day ('Away, away to the mountain's brow,' 'Come where the aspens quiver,' 'The Macgregors' Gathering,' etc.), and author of a 'Vocal Tutor.' As other publishers brought out his works, it would appear that the business referred to above was either of short duration or very unimportant. He must not be confounded with Leoni Lee of Albemarle Street, who had a large publishing business. In Feb. 1837 he was part proprietor of the Abbey Street Theatre in Dublin, and in 1849 he was conducting at Vauxhall. Lee married Mrs. Waylett, the popular singer and actress, whose death (Apr. 26, 1851) so seriously affected him that he died the following October.

LEE, SAMUEL (d. Feb. 21, 1776), a distinguished Irish violinist and musical director, who flourished during the second half of the 18th century. Handel often visited his house in 1742, and employed him as copyist. In 1751 he was appointed conductor of the 'City Music,' or Corporation Band, and in 1753 his salary was increased from £40 to £60 a year (Calendar of Ancient Records of Dublin). In the autumn of 1750 he opened a music-shop at the Little Green, off Bolton Street, and printed much music, including 'Lee's Masque, a collection of popular songs,' four in each number, 'price a British sixpence each' (1753-1756). In July 1751 he was one of the syndicate (the others being Signor Marella, Joseph do Boeck, Daniel Sullivan and Stephen Storace) which took a lease of Crow Street Music Hall, for six years, at an annual rent of £113 : 15s. He led the band at Marlborough Green from 1752-1756, and in 1758 was appointed musical director of Crow Street Theatre. In 1768 he removed his music-shop to No. 2 Dame Street, and published a miscellaneous lot of music. Three years later he opened a coffee-house in Essex Street, which was largely patronised by theatrical folk. See O'Keefe's Recollections, i. 320.

LEEDS. Music in Leeds is best described under the two headings of MUSICAL FESTIVAL and CONCERTS.

MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—The first of these important meetings took place on Sept. 7-10, 1858, and formed part of the ceremony connected with the opening of the Town Hall by Queen Victoria. Sterndale Bennett was the conductor, and his 'May Queen' was the chief novelty of the festival. In spite of the great success (£2000 was given out of the profits to the Leeds medical charities) there were difficulties in the way of establishing the festival as a triennial event; and the second did not take place until 1874, Oct. 14-17, when Costa conducted. At the third festival, Sept. 19-22, 1877, Costa was again the conductor, and Macfarren's 'Joseph' was the most important new work. From 1880 (Oct. 13-16) until 1898 inclusive, Sullivan was the conductor. In 1880 Sullivan's 'Martyr of Antioch' and J. F. Barnett's 'Building of the Ship' were commissioned. Oct. 10-13, 1883, was the date of the fourth meeting, at which Macfarren's 'David,' Alfred Cellier's 'Gray's Elegy,' Barnby's 'Psalm xcvii.' were commissioned, and Raff's 'End of the World' was performed for the first time in England. In 1886 (Oct. 13-16) Sullivan's 'Golden Legend,' Stanford's 'Revenge,' Mackenzie's 'Story of Sayid' and Dvořák's 'Saint Ludmila' were commissioned, and a memorable performance took place of Bach's B minor Mass. In 1889 (Oct. 9-12) the profits of the festival rose to the high figure of £3142; the new works were Parry's 'St. Cecilia's Day,' Stanford's 'Voyage of Mael-dune,' Corder's 'Sword of Argantyr,' and Creser's 'Sacrifice of Freia.' In 1892 (Oct. 5-8) Alan Gray's 'Arethusa' and a symphony by Frederick Cliffe were the novelties. Instead of the choir being drawn only from Leeds, the influence was extended this year (and until 1898) by obtaining singers from different centres in the West Riding of Yorkshire, who were trained in their separate towns, and met occasionally at Leeds for general rehearsals. This plan was dropped in 1901, but was resumed in and since 1910. In 1895 (Oct. 2-5) Parry's 'Invocation of Music,' Somervell's 'Forsaken Merman,' and orchestral pieces by Massenet and Edward German were the new works. In 1898 (Oct. 5-8) Stanford's Te Deum, Elgar's 'Carnatacus,' Cowen's setting of Collins's 'Ode on the Passions,' Otto Goldschmidt's 'Music,' Alan Gray's 'Song of Redemption,' and a symphonic poem by Humperdinck were the novelties, and the diapason normal was employed for the first time. For the festival of 1901 (Oct. 9-12) Stanford was appointed conductor and the programme was commemorative of the music of the 19th century. Among actual novelties were Coleridge Taylor's 'Blind Girl of Castel-Cuillé,' and a Memorial Cantata by Glazounov; a most interesting performance of Beethoven's Mass in D took place, in which Joachim took part, as well as playing a concerto of Mozart. In 1904 (Oct. 5-8) Stanford again conducted, and the new works were Mackenzie's 'Witch's Daughter,' Walford Davies's 'Everyman,' Stanford's 'Songs of the Sea,' Charles Wood's 'Ballad of Dundee,' Joseph Holbrooke's 'Queen Mab'

and Stanford's violin concerto (played by Kreisler)

At the festival of 1907 six new works by native composers were given: Stanford's Stabat Mater, Somervell's 'Intimations of Immortality,' Vaughan Williams's 'Toward the Unknown Region,' Bantock's 'Sea Wanderers,' Rutland Boughton's choral variations on Two Folk-Songs, and Brewer's 'Pastorals.' Glazounov's 8th Symphony had its first performance in England. In 1910, from which time onwards the chorus had sectional rehearsals in Leeds and Huddersfield, only two novelties were introduced, Vaughan Williams's 'Sea Symphony' and Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet.' After this festival Stanford resigned the conductorship, and for the festival of 1913 (Oct. 1-4), Nikisch, Elgar, and H. P. Allen shared the duties. The novelties were Elgar's 'Falstaff,' Harty's 'Mystic Trumpeter,' Butterworth's 'Shropshire Lad,' and Basil Harwood's 'On a May Morning.' Preparations were being made for a festival in 1916, but the war intervened, and it was not till 1922 (Oct. 4-7) that the festivals were resumed, Albert Coates and H. P. Allen being the conductors. The only new work was Holst's 'Ode to Death,' but a programme of Hubert Parry's compositions, and another of shorter works by Bach, were interesting features of the event. For the festival of 1925 (Oct. 7-10) the same conductors were engaged, and the programme included a choral symphony by Holst (on poems of Keats), a work for orchestra and chorus by Albert Coates, 'The Eagle,' and compositions by two American musicians, J. D. Taylor and Howard Hanson.

CONCERTS.—The oldest existing Leeds Concert organisation is the LEEDS PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY, founded in 1871, and active ever since. Its first conductor was James Broughton, who was succeeded in 1884 by his brother Alfred, both of whom were also chorus-masters of the Leeds Festivals. Adolf Beyerlag was conductor for two seasons, 1895-97, and then Stanford conducted the society for eleven years, 1897-98 to 1908-09. For some years the society had no official conductor, one being engaged for each concert, but in 1916 the old method was resumed, and Dr. Fricker was conductor for the season 1916-17. On his leaving for Canada, Dr. E. C. Bairstow was appointed, and has occupied the position till now (1927). In 1896 the Leeds Subscription Concerts were run jointly with those of the Philharmonic, but this arrangement came to an end in 1909.

Among the more important events in the career of the Philharmonic may be mentioned the first performance at Leeds of Brahms's 'German Requiem' (1878), and of Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius'; visits to London in 1889 (Choral Symphony under Henschel), 1891, 1897 (Choral Symphony under Mottl), and many subsequent occasions, to sing important works such as Beethoven's Mass in D (under Richter), etc. For many years the Philharmonic supplied choral contingents for the festivals of Worcester, Hereford, Chester, Norwich, Hanley, Hovingham, Scarborough, etc. In 1906 the society paid the first visit to Paris by an English society's chorus, singing under Stanford's direction the Sanctus from Bach's B minor Mass, Beethoven's Choral Symphony, etc., and repeated the visit in 1912, when the Requiem of Berlioz was given. Besides the conductors already mentioned, the choir has sung under Sir Henry Wood, Weingartner, Nikisch, Verbruggen and others. One of Stanford's last public appearances was at a concert of his music on Nov. 23, 1923, when his Stabat Mater was given under Dr. Bairstow's direction, and he was the guest at a dinner given by the members of the society.

The LEEDS CHORAL UNION began operations on Mar. 26, 1896, with the first and only performance of Gounod's 'Redemption' ever given at Leeds. Alfred Benton, organist of the Leeds Parish Church, was the society's first conductor, and was succeeded in 1905 by Henry Coward, who still retains the post. During this period the society has introduced to Leeds many choral works, among them 'Samson and Delilah' (Saint-Saëns), 'Swan and Skylark' (Goring Thomas), 'Hero and Leander' (Mancinelli), 'Rinaldo' (Brahms), 'Te Deum' (Dvořák), 'King Saul' (Parry), 'Byron' (Holbrooke), Choral Ballads (Coleridge Taylor), 'John Gilpin' and 'The Veil' (Cowen), 'Atalanta in Calydon' (Bantock), and Psalm (Florent Schmitt). It has also paid special attention to Elgar's works, and has given most of his choral compositions, in many cases for the first time at Leeds. The Choral Union has had an advantage of no little moment in these days in being subsidised by an enthusiastic amateur, H. C. Embleton, through whose munificence the choir has been taken far afield, several times to London, twice to Canterbury, to Germany in 1912, and to Paris in 1912 and 1924. On the second visit to Paris the choir was accompanied by the London Symphony Orchestra for a series of concerts, and the whole of the proceeds were given to French charities, without any deduction for expenses, all of which were borne by Mr. Embleton.

Another Leeds society of high aims is the Leeds New CHORAL SOCIETY, founded by H. M. Turton, a Leeds organist. Under his conductorship it has done good work, which since his departure for Canada has been carried on by Dr. C. H. Moody of Ripon; and now by H. Bardgett. An effort to make Bach's Christmas Oratorio a recognised alternative to Messiah' at Christmastide is one of its most interesting enterprises.

Perhaps the most influential agency for bringing the best music before the people of Leeds has been the orchestral concerts given on Saturday evenings. These had their origin in the Municipal Concerts, initiated in the autumn of 1903 by Dr. Fricker, then organist of the Town Hall, who adopted an orchestra which had been organised by some local professional musicians. It consisted at first of fifty professionals, a number afterwards increased to about sixty. It had no direct subsidy from public money, but as Dr. Fricker as conductor received no further remuneration than his stipend as organist, and the concerts took the place of the customary Saturday organ recitals, there was no additional expense for hall, lighting, etc., and the small charges made for admission nearly sufficed to maintain the concerts. They were carried on for some years under these conditions, until the economists on the Council discovered that they involved an expenditure of something over £200 a year, and it was decided that this was more than Leeds could afford to expend on an institution whose object was merely artistic, so they were reorganised by a committee under the title of the Leeds Saturday Orchestral Concerts. For a good many years these prospered artistically and financially, but in the season 1925-26 they, in common with nearly all Leeds concert enterprises, suffered from a lack of support which made their future less assured than it had seemed. Since Dr. Fricker left Leeds for Toronto, the conductorship has been in various hands—Hamilton Harty, Eugene Goossens, Aylmer Buesst and Julius Harrison. The programmes have consisted chiefly of favourite classics, and unfamiliar works have been exceptional, but a high standard has always been maintained.

From the orchestra engaged at these concerts was organised the Leeds Symphony Orchestra, which was made into a limited company in 1908, and consists of 35 shareholders, all playing members. The orchestra is augmented according to requirements, and averages about 55 artists. For the season 1926-27 it took the entire responsibility for the Saturday concerts.

Mention should also be made of the LEEDS BOHEMIAN CONCERTS, the 28th season of which took place during 1926-27. A string quartet of West Riding artists, supplemented occasionally by a pianist or other instrumentalist, takes part in a series of four concerts, at which it is customary to sandwich a contemporary work between two classics. LEEVEES, REV. WILLIAM (b. Kensington, June 11, 1748; d. Wrington, May 28, 1828), entered the first regiment of Foot-Guards in 1769, and was promoted lieutenant 1772. After taking holy orders he was appointed in 1779 rector of Wrington, Somerset, the birthplace of John Locke, the philosopher, and the home of Hannah More. He was a good violoncellist, and composed much sacred music, but will be remembered only as the author of the air of 'Auld Robin Gray' (words by Lady Anne Barnard, born Lindsay of Balcarres, written in 1772, autograph in the B.M. Add. MSS. 29,387), published by Exsham of Dublin, 1781, and by Corri and Sutherland in 1783, but not publicly acknowledged by the composer until 1812, when in the dedication of 'Six Sacred Airs' he admitted the authorship of 'Auld Robin Gray.'

LEFÉBURE-WÉLY, LOUIS JAMES ALFRED (b. Paris, Nov. 13, 1817; d. there, Jan. 1, 1870), son of Antoine Lefébvre, organist and composer, who took the name of Lefébure-Wély and died 1831.

He learned his notes before the alphabet, and as soon as he could speak showed a marvellous aptitude for music. At 8 he was his father's deputy at the organ, accompanying the plain-song and playing short pieces. Though only 15 when his father died, he was appointed his successor at St. Roch through the influence of Queen Marie Amélie. Feeling the need of solid study, he entered the Conservatoire in 1832, and obtained the second prizes for pianoforte and organ in 1834, and the first for both in the following year. He then took lessons in counterpoint from Halévy, and in composition from Berton, but, not satisfied with these professors, studied privately with Adolphe Adam, and with Séjan, the organist, who initiated him in the art of improvising and in the management of the stops. He told the author of this article that he owed much to both these men, widely different as they were, and he often sought their advice after he had left the Conservatoire in order to marry. To support his young family he took to teaching, and composed a quantity of pianoforte pieces, some of which were popular at the time.

But it is as an organist that he will be remembered. His improvisations were marvellous, and from the piquancy of his harmonies, the unexpectedness of his combinations, the fertility of his imagination, and the charm which pervaded all he did, he might justly be called the Auber of the organ. The great popularity in France of the free-reed instruments of Debain and Mustel is largely owing to him; indeed, the effects he produced on the instruments of the harmonium class were really astonishing. Endowed with immense powers of work, Lefébure-Wély attempted all branches of composition—chamber music; symphonies for full orchestra; masses; an opéra-comique in three acts, 'Les Recruteurs' (Dec. 13, 1861), etc. Among his best works are his 'Cantiques,' a remarkable 'O Salutaris,' his 'Offertoires,' many of his fantasias for harmonium and his organ-pieces. He received the Legion of Honour in 1850, being at the time organist of the Madeleine, where he was from 1847-58. After this he had for some time no regular post, but in 1863 accepted the organ of St. Sulpice, so long held with success by his friend and master Séjan. Here he remained, till his death from consumption. G. C.

LEFEBVRE, CHARLES ÉDOUARD (b. Paris, June 19, 1843; d. Paris, Sept. 8, 1917), was a pupil of the Conservatoire, and gained the first Prix de Rome with his cantata, 'Le Jugement de Dieu.' He was a composer of sincere and delicate accomplishment in many forms.

His church music includes a setting of Psalm xliii. and some motets. His 'Judith,' of which portions had been given at concerts of the Conservatoire, was brought out as a whole at the Pasdeloup Concerts in 1879, being later heard in many other French towns, as well as in Belgium and Germany. An 'Ouvverture dramatique' was played at the Colonne Concerts; and 'Dalila,' orchestral scenes, and a symphony in D are important works for orchestra. For the stage Lefebvre wrote, 'Lucrèce,' three-act opera, not performed; 'Le Trésor' a one-act opéra-comique (Angers, 1883); 'Zaire,' four-act opera (Lille, 1887); 'Djelma,' three-act opera (Paris, Opéra, May 25, 1894); 'Singoalla,' three-act opera, unperformed. 'Eloa,' a poème lyrique; 'Melka,' a 'legend' given at the Lamoureux Concerts; 'Sainte Cécile,' for soli, chorus and orchestra (Concerts de l'Opéra, 1896); 'La Messe du fantôme,' for voice and orchestra (Colonne Concerts); a Serenade, an Overture, 'Toggenburg' (Colonne Concerts, 1904); sonatas, trios, quartets, suites, etc., for various instruments, a suite for wind instruments, etc. In 1884 he obtained the Prix Chartier for his concerted compositions, and in 1895 he succeeded Benjamin Godard as professor of the instrumental ensemble class in the Conservatoire. G. F.; rev. M. L. P.

LEFÈVRE, JEAN XAVIER (b. Lausanne, Mar. 6, 1763; d. Paris, Nov. 9, 1829), celebrated clarinetist, pupil of Michel Yost, for many years member of the Opéra orchestra. From 1795-1825 he was professor of the clarinet at the Conservatoire; from 1807 member of the Imperial (afterwards Royal) Chapel. He composed concertos, sonatas, trios, duets, etc., for his instrument, to which he added a sixth key. He also wrote the official clarinet Tutor for the Conservatoire which appeared in 1802; also in a German edition; and was translated into Italian (Riemann; Q.-L.).

LEFFLER, (1) JAMES HENRY (d. 1819), was bassoon player and organist of St. Katherine's Hospital by the Tower, the German Lutheran church in the Savoy and Streatham Chapel. He died suddenly in the street in 1819. His son, (2) ADAM (b. London, 1808; d. there, Mar. 28, 1857), was soon after his father's death admitted a chorister of Westminster Abbey. On attaining manhood he was endowed with a bass voice of exceptionally fine quality and extensive compass, from E below the stave to g' above it—and a natural gift for singing. He first attracted notice in Oct. 1829 at a Festival at Exeter, when the casual absence of another performer gave him the opportunity of appearing as a principal singer. He acquitted himself so satisfactorily that he was immediately appointed a deputy at Westminster Abbey, and shortly afterwards took and maintained a good position on the English operatic stage and in the concert-room. LE FROID, see MEREUX.

LEGATO (Ital., sometimes written ligato; Fr. lié; Ger. gebunden) = 'connected,' and is the term used to mean the passage from note to note without any perceptible hiatus between the ending of one and the beginning of the next.

A legato style of singing or playing is presumed in the notation of music unless indications to the contrary (see STACCATO) are given. There are, however, physical limits to the possibility of maintaining the legato in singing and in playing wind instruments supplied by the lungs of the player, due to the necessity for taking breath, though in both these cases the ability to take breath with as little interruption as possible of the tone is a first essential of technique. Similarly in the case of the bowed strings the change of direction of the bow implies a partial interruption of the legato; hence the necessity for the SLUR (q.v.) to indicate where the legato may be broken induced its use as an indication of the legato itself.

On keyboard instruments the legato can be maintained indefinitely, and slurs therefore are only required for the sake of PHRASING (q.v.).

Occasionally the word legato is written at the beginning of a movement or passage as a special warning. The use of the superlative, Legatissimo, has no real meaning. It merely indicates the extreme desire of the composer for the maintenance of the legato style. C.

LÉGENDE DE ST. CHRISTOPHE, LA, lyric drama, in 3 acts and 8 tableaux; words and music by V. d'Indy. First performance, Opéra, June 6, 1920.

LEGER (LEDGER) LINES (Fr. lignes posées, supplémentaires; Ger. Hilfslinien, Nebenlinien; Ital. ligne d'ajuto) are the short lines drawn above and below the staff for those notes which exceed its limits.

The origin of the term is not known. It is proposed to derive it from the French léger, light, or from the Latin legere, to read, or as if it were equivalent to layer—additional lines laid on above or below; but none of these is quite satisfactory. The term came into use in the year 1700. (See C. J. Evans, Mus. T., June 1879, and the Oxf. Diet. s.v. The analogous use of the word ledger, as 'a horizontal timber in a scaffolding, lying parallel to the face of the building,' is interesting.) G.

LEGGÉ, ROBIN HUMPHREY (b. Bishop's Castle, Shropshire, June 28, 1862), has been musical editor of the Daily Telegraph since 1908.

Legge was educated at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, when he read law, and then studied music at Leipzig, Frankfurt-on-Main and elsewhere on the Continent. He joined the staff of The Times in 1891 and acted as assistant musical critic to FULLER MATTLAND (q.v.) for fifteen years. In 1906 he became musical critic to the Daily Telegraph, succeeding to full responsibility for its musical policy two years later when Joseph BENNETT (q.v.) retired. He has chosen to exert his influence rather as editor than as critic, and his choice has been salutary. A man of wide interests and generous enthusiasms, Legge was exactly fitted to sweep away the repressive style of dogmatic criticism to which Bennett had clung, and through the 'Music Page' of the Daily Telegraph he has stimulated the general reader's interest in music and musicians to an uncommon extent. His active pen has been exercised in many directions outside daily journalism. He was a contributor to the second edition of this Dictionary and also to the D.N.B. C.

LEGGIERO (Ital. also leggieramente) = 'lightly.' The word is usually applied to a rapid passage, and in pianoforte playing indicates an absence of pressure, the keys being struck with only sufficient force to produce the sound.

Leggiero passages are usually, though not invariably, piano, and they may be either legato or staccato; if the former the fingers must move very freely and strike the keys with enough percussion to ensure distinctness, but with the slightest possible amount of force. Examples of legato passages marked leggieramente are found in the twenty-fifth variation of Beethoven's op. 120, and in the finale of Mendelssohn's concerto in G minor (which also contains the unusual combination of forte with leggiero); and of staccato single notes and chords in the finale of Mendelssohn's concerto in D minor.

On stringed instruments leggiero passages are as a rule played by diminishing the pressure of the bow upon the strings, but the word generally refers rather to the character of the movement than to any particular manner of bowing. The scherzo of Beethoven's quartet in E♭, op. 74, is marked leggieramente, although it begins forte, and the same indication is given for the second variation of the andante in the Kreutzer sonata, which is piano throughout. F. T.

LEGRANT, (1) GUILLIEME, an early 15th-century composer, whose real name was probably Guillaume, while Legrant (le grand) was merely a qualificative. Some songs of his from the Bodleian Library have been republished by Stainer; others are preserved in the libraries of Bologna, Trient (now Vienna) and Lochheim.

(2) JOHANNES, early 15th-century composer. Songs by him are in the Cod. Trient (Vienna) and the Bodleian Library. E. v. d. s.

LEGRENZI, GIOVANNI (b. Clusone near Bergamo, c. 1625; d. July 26, 1690), composer and conductor, learned music, and received his first appointment, that of organist to the church of St. Maria Maggiore, at Clusone. He next became maestro di cappella of the church of the Spirito Santo at Ferrara, where he still was in 1664. When Krieger, Kapellmeister to the Duke of Weissenfels, visited Venice in 1672, he found Legrenzi settled there as director of the Conservatorio dei Mendicanti. In 1681 he became vice-maestro, and in 1685 maestro di cappella of St. Mark's, and exercised both functions till his death. He entirely reorganised the orchestra of St. Mark's, augmenting it to 34 performers, thus disposed—8 violins, 11 violette, 2 viole da braccia, 2 viole da gamba, 1 violone, 4 theorbos, 2 cornetts, 1 bassoon, and 3 trombones. He composed industriously, and left specimens of his skill in most departments of music—church sonatas (1654, 1655, 1663 and 1677), motets (1655, 1660, 1670, 1692), masses, psalms (1657, 1667), instrumental music of various kinds, and 17 operas, of which the most remarkable are 'Achille in Sciro,' his first (1664); 'La divisione del mondo' (1675); 'I due Cesari' (1683), mentioned in the Paris Mercur galant (Mar. 1683); and 'Pertinace' (1684), his last. The number in Q.-L. is 14. They were nearly all produced in Venice. Like Scarlatti, and other composers of his time, he did not attempt to banish the comic element from his serious operas. One of his orchestral compositions is in seven real parts, and all are important. His best pupils were Lotti and Gasparini.

Legrenzi's name has been handed down to posterity by Bach and Handel, both of whom have treated subjects from his works, the former in an organ fugue in C minor on a 'Thema Legrenzianum elaboratum cum subiecto pedaliter'¹ (B.-G. xxxviii. p. 94); and the latter in the phrase 'To thy dark servant light and life afford,' in the chorus 'O first-created beam' from 'Samson'; this is taken from a motet of Legrenzi's—'Intret in conspectu,'² of which a copy in Handel's handwriting is to be found among the MSS. of the Royal Library now at the British Museum.

LEGROS, JOSEPH (b. Monampteuil, Laon, Sept. 7, 1730; d. Rochelle, Dec. 20, 1793), made his début as operatic tenor at the Paris Opéra on Mar. 1, 1764. When Gluck came to Paris to produce his operas he chose Legros as singer for the principal male parts; but he retired from the stage on account of increasing stoutness. In 1777 he became managing director of the Concert Spirituel until its dissolution in 1791, when he retired to Rochelle. He was a good musician, who, together with Désormery the elder, rearranged and wrote some new music for the opera 'Hylas et Sylvie,' performed in 1775.

LEHMANN, ELIZABETTA NINA MARY FREDERIKA, known as Liza Lehmann (b. London, July 11, 1862; d. Pinner, Sept. 19, 1918), composer and singer, was daughter of Rudolf Lehmann, the painter, by his wife Amelia, daughter of Robert Chambers of Edinburgh, author and publisher.

She was first taught singing by her mother, a highly cultivated amateur, and well known in the musical world, both as a composer and arranger of old classical songs under the initials 'A. L.' Later she studied singing with Randegger, and composition with Raunkilde at Rome, Freudenberg at Wiesbaden, and Hamish MacCunn. On Nov. 23, 1885, she made her début at the Monday Popular Concerts with great success, and was a favourite at these concerts during the nine years she remained in the vocal profession. She appeared at all the chief concerts in the kingdom, receiving especial encouragement from Frau Clara Schumann¹ and Joachim. On July 14, 1894, she gave a farewell concert at St. James's Hall, previous to retiring from the vocal profession on her marriage to Herbert BEDFORD (q.v.) in October of the same year. Her voice—a light soprano, with an extensive compass from A to b', and of a carrying nature—was perfectly produced.

On her retirement, Liza Lehmann devoted herself to composition with conspicuous success. In 1896 her song-cycle, 'In a Persian Garden,' the words taken from FitzGerald's translation of the Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám, was introduced in private at a concert in the house of Mrs. E. L. Goetz, by Mesdames Albani and Hilda Wilson, Ben Davies and Bispham. It was afterwards produced publicly at the Monday Popular Concerts and elsewhere, being received with remarkable enthusiasm, both in America and England.

By this and other song-cycles, 'In Memoriam' (from Tennyson), 'The Daisy-Chain,' 'More Daisies,' 'Songs of Love and Spring,' etc., Liza Lehmann may be said to have established a vogue for song-cycles in England. She was the first woman to be commissioned to undertake the composition of a Musical Comedy, 'Sergeant Brue' (book by Owen Hall), produced at the Strand Theatre, June 14, 1904, transferred to the Prince of Wales's Theatre, and later retransferred to the Strand. Her larger productions for the theatre were 'The Vicar of Wakefield,' a romantic light opera (1906), and a stage setting of 'Everyman,' produced by Beecham, Feb. 1916. She also wrote incidental music for plays, ballads for voice and orchestra, and many songs and pianoforte pieces, several of which gained considerable popularity.

LEHMANN, (1) LILLI (b. Würzburg, May 15, 1848), was taught singing by her mother, Marie Lehmann, formerly a harp-player and prima donna at Cassel under Spohr, and the original heroine of some of the operas of that master.

The daughter made her début at Prague as the First Boy ('Zauberflöte'), and was engaged successively at Dantzig in 1868 and at Leipzig in 1870. She made her début at Berlin as Vielka (Meyerbeer's 'Feldlager in Schlesien'), Aug. 19, 1870, with such success that she was engaged there as a light soprano, remaining there till 1885. In 1876 she played Woglinde and Helmwig, and sang the 'Bird' music in Wagner's trilogy at Bayreuth. In that year she was appointed Imperial chamber singer. She made a successful début at Her Majesty's as Violetta, June 3, as Philine ('Mignon'), June 15, 1880, and sang there for two seasons. She appeared at Covent Garden in German with great success as Isolde, July 2, 1884. In passing through England to America, she gave a concert with Franz Rummel at the Steinway Hall, Oct. 22, 1885. From 1885-90 she sang in German opera in America, but returned to Her Majesty's in June 1887, singing three times in Italian as Fidelio, to the Florestan of her husband, Herr Kalisch. In 1890 she returned to Germany, singing both in operas and concerts. In 1899 she reappeared at Covent Garden as Fidelio, Sieglinde, Norma, Isolde, Ortrud and Donna Anna, and won warm appreciation. She also sang in Paris at the Lamoureux Concerts, and appeared at the Nouveau Théâtre as Donna Anna in 1903.

It should be mentioned that this gifted artist took part, as one of the Rhine maidens, in the first performance in England of 'Der Ring des Nibelungen,' at Her Majesty's Theatre in 1882. The development of her voice from a light to a dramatic soprano followed closely on the growth of her power as a tragic artist. An accomplished musician and actress as well as a magnificent singer, all styles came alike to her. Apart from her striking Wagnerian assumptions, she will be best remembered for her Fidelio, the finest seen in this country since the death of Tietjens. After an active stage career of nearly thirty-five years, she settled down as a teacher in the Berlin suburb of Grunewald, and there, in Oct. 1900, completed her celebrated book on singing, Meine Gesangkunst, which was ably translated into English by Richard Aldrich, and published three years later in New York. Under the title of How to Sing, it met with great success, and it remains an enduring record of sound scientific methods, intelligent observation and practical experience, marred only by some superfluity of physiological illustration and detail.

A younger sister (2), MARIE (b. 1851), also a soprano, sang at Bayreuth as Wellgunde and Ortlinde in the 'Trilogy' in 1876, and was for many years a valued member of the company at Vienna, and an excellent concert singer.

LEIBL, KARL (b. Bavaria, c. 1784; d. Cologne, Oct. 4, 1870). In his youth he was teacher of music at the Munich court, afterwards becoming organist and Kapellmeister of Cologne Cathedral and conductor of the famous Cologne male choir, which he brought to a high state of excellence.

LEICHTENTRITT, HUGO (b. Posen, Jan. 1, 1874), eminent writer on music and editor, has pursued a career singularly free from official appointments of a professional kind.

Leichtentritt spent his youth in America and studied at Harvard under J. K. PAINE (q.v.); he continued his musical studies at the Hochschule in Berlin, and graduated D.Ph. in 1901 with a dissertation on the opera of Reinhard Keiser. He then joined the staff of the Klindworth Schwarenka Conservatorium. He brought out several books of an educational kind, and began biographical work with Chopin (Riemann's Berühmte Meister, 1905). A collection of Beethoven's Letters (1912), Erwin Lendvai (1912), Busoni (1916), Analyse der chopinschen Klavierwerke (1920) show the versatility of his interests, and his Händel (1924) is one of the chief modern authorities on its subject (see HANDEL). His Geschichte der Motette (1908), the several volumes he has edited for the D.D.T. (see DENKMÄLER) and many other editions of old music (for list see Riemann) show the substantial nature of his scholarship. He has also found time for a considerable amount of composition.

LEIDER, FRIDA (b. Berlin, Apr. 18, 1892), operatic soprano, pupil of Leo Leissner. This excellent artist made her mark in Germany, both on the stage and in the concert-room, during the years that followed the close of the war. She made her début at Halle; her first important successes being at Hamburg and at the Berlin Staats-Oper. Under the auspices of Bruno Walter, chief conductor of the German season given at Covent Garden in 1924, she made her début here on May 8 in 'Tristan and Isolde'; appearing a few nights later as Brünnhilde in the second cycle of the 'Ring.' Her success in both characters was emphatic and her talent evoked the most favourable criticism. She may be reckoned among the few German sopranos of recent years who have understood the art of investing Wagnerian declamation with sympathetic charm as well as strong dramatic feeling. In addition, she is an actress of unusual gifts—a Brünnhilde and an Isolde of the true heroic stamp—and in these parts of the modern school, more particularly, she has become a reigning favourite at the Berlin Staats-Oper, where she has been engaged for some years. She sang again in London in 1925 and 1926. She has also sung at Vienna and other leading continental theatres.

LEIGHTON, SIR WILLIAM, Knight (d. before 1617¹), one of the band of Gentlemen Pensioners of Elizabeth and James I., published in 1614

¹ The Teares or Lamentacions of a Sorrowfull Soule; Composed with Metrical Ayres and Songs both for Voyces and Divers Instrumenta. Set forth by Sir William Leighton, Knight, one of his Majesties honourable Band of Gentlemen Pensioners. And all Psalmes that consist of so many feet as the fiftieth Psalm, will go to the four parties for Comfort. London, 1614, Wm. Stansby.

The work consists of 54 metrical psalms and hymns, 17 of which are for 4 voices, with accompaniments in tablature for the lute, bandora and cittern; and 13 for 4 voices and 24 for 5 voices without accompaniment. The first 8 (of the 17) pieces are of Leighton's own composition, and the rest were contributed by the following composers:

From the dedication to Prince Charles we learn that the collection was compiled while Leighton was—unjustly, as he alleges—incarcerated for debt. He had in the preceding year published the poetry alone in a duodecimo volume. Some verses by him were prefixed to Alison's 'Psalms' (1599), and he wrote a poem in praise of James I., called Vertue Triumphant (1603) (D.N.B.). A wordless round printed on the title-page was resolved by E. T. Warren Horne and set to the words 'Resolutio of the Rota,' etc. This is now in B.M. Add. MSS. 31.418/70b. A fragment of a 4-part piece called 'Surdus Melopaeus' or 'The deafe composer of tunes' is also in B.M. Add. MSS. 4388/84. The words of an anthem by him are given in Clifford's 'collection' (1663). LEIPZIG. Leipzig, in Saxony, has for some centuries been one of the foremost musical towns in the world, and owes its high position to several causes, chief of which are: (1) the THOMASSCHULE, with its famous choir and its long list of distinguished cantors, amongst whom John Sebastian Bach, who reigned from 1723–50, stands out pre-eminent; (2) the GEWANDHAUS CONCERTS, with a glorious history of nearly 200 years; (3) the CONSERVATORIUM, founded in 1843 through the instrumentality of Mendelssohn, who was its first chief; (4) the presence of several great music publishing houses, with BREITKOPF & HÄRTEL (q.v.) at the head of the list.

(1) The THOMASSCHULE, or School of St. Thomas, is a public school of ancient foundation consisting of several hundred boys from the ages of 10 to 19, of whom about 60 are musical 'scholars' and receive a free education. These scholars, or 'alumni' as they are called, in addition to their ordinary school-work, are given a thorough musical education under the direction of the cantor and form the choir. They furnish the music at both the Thomaskirche and the Nikolaikirche; and at one or other of these churches on Sunday mornings, either immediately before or in the course of the service, they perform with the assistance of a portion of the Gewandhaus Orchestra a cantata, nearly always one of Bach's. On Saturdays at 1.30 in the Thomaskirche it has long been the practice for the choir to sing unaccompanied motets, which are preceded by some big organ-work—generally by Bach, but also by other of the great organ-writers ancient and modern. The motets embrace music of all periods, from the earliest Netherland and Italian writers down to contemporary composers. For example, Vaughan Williams's unaccompanied Mass in G minor was given in this way more than once in the winter of 1923 with great effect. It has in recent years become the custom to have a 'Hauptprobe' on Friday evenings at 6, with the addition of a short service of about ten minutes inserted between the organ-playing and the motets, and the Friday Hauptprobe has tended to outdo in importance the actual Saturday performance, owing no doubt to the more convenient hour at which it takes place. The large church is always crowded with listeners of all classes and ages, some 3000 people in all, many of them standing in the aisles. It is impossible to exaggerate the influence of these evenings on the musical education of the Leipzig inhabitants, numbers of whom never miss a performance for years together. The choir is remarkable for the precision of its singing and the accuracy of its intonation: nothing is too hard for the singers. The quality of the tenors and basses naturally lacks richness and mellowness owing to the youth of the singers, but the general effect, helped by the superb acoustic qualities of the church, is extremely impressive. There are many distinguished names¹ in the long succession of cantors. Johann Urban, appointed in 1439, was the first holder of the office, and Sethus Calvisius (1594–1615), Johann Hermann Schein (1615–30) and Johann Kuhnau (1701–22) are some of the most famous of Bach's predecessors. The present cantor is Karl STRAUBE (q.v.), appointed in 1918, formerly organist at the Thomaskirche. In this latter office he was succeeded by his brilliant young pupil, Günther Ramin, whose powers and virtuosity are scarcely inferior to his master's. The organ in the Thomaskirche is a specially fine one, and the magnificent organ-playing of these two men has for many years been one of the leading features of Leipzig musical life.

(2) The GEWANDHAUS CONCERTS are so called from their having been held in the hall of the Gewandhaus, the ancient market-hall of the Saxon linen-merchants of Leipzig. They date from the time when Bach was cantor of the Thomasschule, and the original title was 'das grosse Concert.' The first performance was held in a private house in 1743; the conductor was Döles, afterwards cantor of the Thomasschule (1756–89), and the orchestra consisted of 16 performers. They were interrupted by the Seven Years' War, but resumed on its termination in 1763, under the direction of J. A. Hiller, who conducted them at his own risk, and gave them the title of 'Liebhaber-concerte.' The orchestra was increased to 30, and regular performances were held down to Easter 1778. After a pause of three years the concerts were resumed, and located in the Gewandhaus, to which a hall for balls and concerts had lately been added. The credit for this change is due to Bürgermeister Karl Wilhelm Müller, who has a right to be considered as the founder of the institution in its present form. He and eleven of his friends constituted themselves a board of directors, appointed J. A. Hiller as conductor, and opened a subscription list for 24 concerts. The first concert in the new rooms took place on Sept. 29, 1781; the first regular subscription concert on Nov. 25. In process of time the old Gewandhaus became too small and inconvenient for modern conditions, and in 1884 a magnificent new building was opened, containing a large hall for the orchestral concerts and a smaller one for chamber music, both of which possess admirable acoustic properties. At the present day some 20 orchestral concerts, generally with a vocal or instrumental soloist, take place weekly on Thursdays between the middle of October and Easter; and there are usually two or three choral concerts, in which the Gewandhauschor, an excellent voluntary choir, take part. The regular conductor of the concerts (since 1922) is Wilhelm FURTWÄNGLER (q.v.), while Karl Straube, conductor of the Gewandhauschor, directs the choral concerts.

The orchestra is a magnificent one, the strings being especially brilliant. Mendelssohn was the conductor from 1835-43, and was succeeded by Ferdinand Hiller (1843-44). Since then Niels Gade (1844-48), Julius Rietz (1848-60), Karl Reinecke (1860-95) and Arthur Nikisch (1895-1922) have been successively in charge. The most brilliant periods in the past have undoubtedly been those under Mendelssohn and Nikisch; but Furtwängler has already shown that there is little likelihood of any falling away from his predecessor's high standard. For some time past it has been the custom to have a public 'Hauptprobe' of the concerts on the Thursday morning (in the case of big choral works on the previous evening). This Hauptprobe is to all intents and purposes a duplicate of the actual concert, for all the necessary rehearsing has been finished beforehand. In addition to the orchestral concerts, there have been (since 1809) 8 chamber-music evenings in the course of the winter, in which the leading part is borne by the Gewandhaus Quartet, consisting (1925) of Edgar Wollgandt, Karl Wolschke, Carl Herrmann and Julius Klengel. For the centenary celebrations of the concerts in 1881, a history of the institution was written by A. Dörffel.

(3) CONSERVATORIUM. The foundation of the Conservatorium was entirely due to Felix Mendelssohn. It was opened on Apr. 3, 1843, with a brilliant staff of teachers. Mendelssohn himself was the first head, and gave lessons in piano-playing and composition, in both of which subjects he had the co-operation of Robert Schumann. The chief violin-teacher was Ferdinand David, leader of the Gewandhaus Orchestra and one of Joachim's masters. The business and financial management was placed, then as now, in the hands of a committee of leading Leipzig citizens, while the purely musical side was administered by the chief members of the teaching staff. If the Conservatorium cannot boast to-day of quite the same renown as it possessed in those early radiant days, when it was first and alone in the field, that is explained by the subsequent springing up of similar institutions all over Germany. But it has succeeded in maintaining a very high standard of efficiency, particularly perhaps on the theoretical side and in composition, and need not fear comparison with its competitors. At the present day there are between five and six hundred students of many nationalities. The head of the institution is Professor MAX PAUER (q.v.), who succeeded Stephan Krehl in 1924, and prominent amongst the many excellent teachers are Karl Straube and Günther Ramin (organ), Robert Teichmüller and, of course, Pauer himself (piano), Julius Klengel (v'cl.), Walther Davison (violin), Hermann Grabner and Sigfrid Karg-Elert (composition) and Frau Hedmond (singing). The students' orchestra gives, in the Conservatorium Hall, from 8 to 10 concerts every year, and there are about twice as many student chamber-concerts, all of them open to the public. Professor Pauer has also instituted a series of 'Hausmusik' evenings, when he, either alone or assisted by other members of the staff, plays to the students.

(4) OPERA has seldom taken a very prominent position in the musical life of Leipzig. It has had one or two brief periods of brilliance; but Leipzig has always been handicapped by lack of funds and by the possession of too small a theatre. Until it possesses a larger stage it will be impossible for it to compete with such places as Berlin, Dresden or Munich, at all events in the performance of such works as the 'Meistersinger,' 'Götterdämmerung,' etc. But under its present able chief, Gustav Brecher, it has recently made great strides, and very good performances are to be heard, especially of the less exacting works. The body of singers is thoroughly competent, and the orchestra, being the Gewandhaus Orchestra, could scarcely be better.

(5) Amongst other musical institutions should be mentioned the RIEDEL-VEREIN, a choral society founded in 1854 and named after its first conductor, Carl Riedel. It gives a series of excellent concerts every year, and, in particular, has done a great work in popularising by annual performance Bach's B minor Mass. The LEIPZIG SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, though not in the same class as the Gewandhaus Orchestra, gives capital concerts, and, after going through bad times during the inflation period, is now (1926) well on the upward grade. Finally, a striking feature of musical life in Leipzig—as indeed in many other German towns—is the very large number of admirable male choral societies—many of them composed entirely of working-men. In nearly every case the standard of performance is extraordinarily high, both in quality of tone and on the purely musical side.

LEITE, ANTONIO DA SILVA (b. Oporto, May 23, 1759; d. there, Jan. 10, 1833), Portuguese composer. His master is said to have been Girolamo Sertori, an Italian resident in Oporto, many sacred works by whom are now in the Lisbon Public Library. Leite's own church music (Bibl. Nac., Lisbon) shows a technical mastery of his material; his two operas, performed in 1807 (Theatro de S. João, Lisbon), have not been preserved. His printed works include a 'Tantum ergo,' 4 v. with orchestra, printed in London (1815), an instruction book, 'Rezumo de todas as regras, e preceitos da cantoria' (Oporto, 1787). Of more interest are his works for guitar 'Estudo de guitarra' (Oporto, 1796) and '6 Sonatas de guitarra' (Oporto, 1792); some of these have accompaniments for a violin and 2 horns. J. B. T.

LEIT-MOTIV (LEIT-MOTIF) (Ger. plur. Leitmotive) = leading or guiding theme; a term invented by Hans von Wolzogen¹ to mean a short figure of melody or progression of harmony (frequently the two in combination) of marked character, used to illustrate situations, personages, objects and ideas essential in a story or drama to which music forms a counterpart.

'Leit-motive' are appropriate alike to descriptive instrumental music called PROGRAMME MUSIC (q.v.) and the opera. Though the principle of using them as recurrent features to present to the hearers associations of ideas may be traced back to much earlier times, it was Richard Wagner who gave the term a general currency by his reliance on the 'Leit-motiv' as a primary means of characterisation in all his mature music-dramas.² He pushed the method to its extreme limits in 'Der Ring des Nibelungen,' which is constructed on the most elaborate network of 'leading themes.' In his later works, 'Tristan,' 'Meistersinger' and 'Parsifal' Wagner showed that the 'Leit-motiv' principle was no obsession with him, as it became with his immediate followers in dramatic composition. In these works Wagner uses the 'Leit-motiv' more sparingly than in the 'Ring'; in fact it may be said that the simpler the stage situation the less he relied on these guides, and the more he indulged in a lyrical development of his material. The 'Ring,' indeed, contains powerful development of certain 'Motive.' A comparison of the Walhalla theme at the beginning of 'Rheingold,' Scene II. (where it emerges from the 'Ring' theme), with the same at the end of 'Götterdämmerung' gives an outstanding instance of the force of development. It also contains conspicuous transformations, not quite the same thing as development, e.g. that of Siegfried's horn into the majestic form it assumes in 'Götterdämmerung' (see the 'Trauermarsch'). Nevertheless there are many 'Motive' in the 'Ring,' notably those associated with inanimate objects, e.g. the sword and the anvil, which remain the musical labels of those objects, and are never completely merged into the psychological progress of the drama. The same is not the case with the later dramas, and 'Tristan' particularly holds its musical pre-eminence on account of what may be called the symphonic development of its leading themes.

As regards earlier history it may be noted that J. S. Bach illustrates the principle of leading themes in his allusive use of Chorals throughout the church cantatas and kindred works. The introduction of 'Meine Seel' erhebt' by the solo oboe in the 'Suscepit

Israel' of the Magnificat in D is a typical case in point. The romantic movement of the early 19th century favoured the exploitation of all kinds of literary allusiveness and quotation in music. Berlioz's idée fixe in the 'Symphonie fantastique,' Mendelssohn's references to his own leading themes in 'Elijah' and Schumann's quotations of the 'Grossvater-tanz' in the 'Carnaval' and the 'Marseillaise' in the 'Faschingsschwank' show the principle gaining hold in different kinds of music not connected with the stage. Naturally, however, the stage most often suggested the sort of relevance of idea which led composers to something approaching the 'Leit-motiv,' and pre-Wagnerian opera affords numerous instances, from the theme of mourning which links the opening chorus of Gluck's 'Orfeo' with the song 'Ché farò' to the magic theme in Weber's 'Der Freischütz,' the most immediate predecessor of Wagner.

Wagner's exhaustive use of the 'Leit-motiv' and perhaps still more the blind copying of his methods by his followers has produced a certain reaction amongst 20th-century composers against this means of expression. Debussy's 'Pelléas et Mélisande' (1902) marks the turn of the tide. For while the analyst may find themes more or less associated with the several personages of drama, they are no longer 'leading themes' in the true sense of the word, since it is not by them that the hearer's attention is focussed and directed. c.

LEJEUNE, GABRIELLE GILBERT (b. Liège, Belgium), operatic soprano. After her vocal studies at the Liège Conservatoire she graduated to the Monnaie at Brussels, making a promising début there in 1892 as Aida. This led to her engagement at the Opéra-Comique, Paris, where she gained valuable experience and sang in a variety of rôles. She first appeared at Covent Garden on May 15, 1895, as Bertha in 'Le Prophète,' a performance notable for the fact that in it Tamagno sang Jean de Leyden for the first time in England, and that it was the 150th representation of Meyerbeer's opera at this house. Thenceforward until 1909 she sang here regularly, singing among others the part of Suzuki in the production of 'Madama Butterfly' in 1905, with a cast that included Destinn, Caruso and Scotti. She also created the part of Joan in d'Erlanger's opera 'Tess,' on July 14, 1909. Her voice was of very musical quality and excellently trained, but not powerful enough to stand the strain of high parts. She was married to the baritone, Charles Gilbert, and accompanied him to New York, where they both took part in Oscar Hammerstein's opening season at the Manhattan Opera House, 1906-07.

LEKEU, GUILLAUME (b. Heusy, province of Liège, Jan. 20, 1870; d. Angers, Jan. 21, 1894), composer, whose works made considerable mark considering the shortness of his life. He died of typhoid.

Lekeu studied with César Franck (1888) and Vincent d'Indy in Paris. He obtained (1891) the second Prix de Rome in Belgium, with his scène lyrique 'Andromède,' which was followed by various symphonic compositions, works for voice and different instruments, many of which were unfortunately left incomplete at his early death. His works include a sonata in G for piano and violin, dedicated to Ysaÿe, much played by him and subsequently by others; a trio for piano and strings, in which passages of very high rank alternate with weak and confused portions; a string quartet, finished by d'Indy; and a 'fantaisie sur deux airs populaires angevins,' frequently played in Belgium and France, and given in London by Wood (1903). Ysaÿe often conducted Lekeu's Étude symphonique on 'Hamlet,' an intimately poetical work, and an adagio for quartet and orchestra, of finely elegiac character. Most of Lekeu's compositions are published by Baudoux of Paris and Muraille of Liège.

LEMARE, EDWIN HENRY (b. Ventnor, Isle of Wight, Sept. 9, 1865), was elected to the Goss scholarship at the R.A.M. in 1878, and became an associate on the completion of his studies. He was subsequently elected to a fellowship of the same institution, and in 1884 was made a fellow of the R.C.O. His successive appointments as organist are as follows: St. John the Evangelist's, Brownswood Park; St. Andrew's Church, and the Public Hall, Cardiff; the Parish Church, Sheffield (1886); Holy Trinity, Sloane Street; and St. Margaret's, Westminster. During his tenure of these last two posts, he became famous as a solo-player and a giver of recitals of more than the usual interest. M.

He made a prominent feature of transcriptions of modern orchestral music, and his work in this field had a good deal of influence on the subsequent development of the art of registration, and even of organ building. In 1900 Lemare made a recital tour of Canada and the United States, and from 1902-15 he held the post of organist at the Carnegie Institute, Pittsburgh, Pa. He was recitalist at the Panama-Pacific Exposition, San Francisco, 1915, municipal organist at San Francisco, 1917-21; and since 1921 he has held a similar post at Portland, Maine. Lemare is one of the most brilliant players of to-day, an unusually gifted improviser, and a prolific and successful composer, chiefly of organ music. His works for the instrument number about a hundred, among the best being two symphonies, a 'Toccata di concerto' and a 'Fantaisie fugue.' The bulk of the remainder is in popular style, and shows a pleasant vein of fancy and a dexterous management of effect. H. G.

LEMLIN (LAMMLEIN), LORENZ, a German composer of the earlier part of the 16th century, came from Eichstätt in Bavaria, and in 1513 attended the University of Heidelberg. He was afterwards singer and Kapellmeister to the Elector Palatine at Heidelberg. Georg Forster mentions him with respect as his worthy preceptor in music, and inserts fifteen of his master's Lieder in his collections of 1539 and 1549. Eitner¹ speaks very slightly of those Lieder, while on the other hand Ambros² judges them very favourably. The only one accessible in a modern reprint is a humorous 'cuckoo' song for six voices, which Ambros describes as quite a charming piece im Volkston, 'Der Gutz-gauch auf dem Zaune sass.' This was first republished by C. F. Becker in his book, Die Hausmusik in Deutschland, Leipzig, 1840, and is also contained in Eitner's republication of Forster's Liederbuch of 1540. The only other known works of Lemlin are a few Latin motets in collections from which Ambros singles out for special mention 'a very beautiful' 'In manus tuas.' J. R. M.

LEMMENS, (1) NICHOLAS JACQUES (b. Zoerle-Parwys, Westerloo, Belgium, Jan. 3, 1823; d. Castle Linterport, near Malines, Jan. 30, 1881), a distinguished organist, whose performances on the Mustel organ (see MUSTEL) were specially remarkable.

His father was provost and organist at Zoerle-Parwys. His career was attached to the organ from the first. At 11 years of age he was put under Van der Broeck, organist at Dieste. In 1839 he entered the Conservatoire at Brussels, but soon left it owing to the illness of his father, and was absent for a couple of years. In the interval he succeeded his former master at Dieste, but fortunately gave this up and returned to the Conservatoire at the end of 1841. There he became the pupil of Fétis and was noted for the ardour and devotion with which he worked. He took the second prize for composition in 1844 and the first in 1845, as well as the first for organ-playing. In 1846 he went, at the government expense, to Breslau, and remained there a year, studying the organ under A. Hesse, who sent him back at the end of that time, with a testimonial to the effect that 'he played Bach as well as he himself did.' In 1849 he became professor of his instrument at the Conservatoire, and Fétis, as the head of the establishment, bears strong testimony to the vast improvement which followed this appointment, and the new spirit which it infused through the country.

Though distinguished as a pianist, it is with the organ that his name will remain connected. In 1857 Lemmens married Miss Sherrington, and from that time lived much in England. His great work is his Ecole d'orgue, which was adopted by the Conservatoires at Paris, Brussels, Madrid, etc. He also published Sonatas, Offertoires, etc., for the organ, and was engaged for twenty years on a Method for accompanying Gregorian Chants, which was edited by J. Duclos after the author's death, and published at Ghent in 1886. Four volumes of œuvres inédites were published by Breitkopf & Härtel. On Jan 1, 1879, he opened a college at Malines, under the patronage of the Belgian clergy, for training Catholic organists and choirmasters, which was soon largely attended.

(2) Madame LEMMENS, née Sherrington (b. Preston, Oct. 4, 1834; d. Brussels, May 9, 1906), came of a family who had lived for several generations in Preston: her mother was a musician. In 1838 they migrated to Rotterdam, and there Miss Sherrington studied under Verhulst. In 1852 she entered the Brussels Conservatoire, and took first prizes for singing and declamation. On Apr. 7, 1856, she made her first appearance in London, and soon rose to the position of leading English soprano, both in sacred and secular music, a position which she maintained for many years. In 1860 she appeared on the English, and in 1866 on the Italian, operatic stage, and her operas included 'Robin Hood,' 'Amber Witch,' 'Helvollyn,' 'L'Africaine,' 'Norma,' 'Huguenots,' 'Roberto,' 'Don Giovanni,' 'Domino noir,' 'Fra Diavolo,' 'Marta,' etc. G.

LEMOINE, a well-known Paris firm of music-publishers. It was founded in 1793 by (1) ANTOINE MARCEL LEMOINE (b. Paris, Nov. 3, 1763; d. there, Apr. 1817), who was a performer on the guitar, and played the viola in the orchestra of the Théâtre de Monsieur. His son, (2) HENRI (b. Paris, Oct. 21, 1786; d. there May 18, 1854), was a pupil of the Conservatoire in 1798-1809, and was one of the most successful piano-teachers of Paris; he took over the business on his father's death, and raised it to a high position. His educational compositions include a Petite méthode élémentaire for piano; a Traité d'harmonie pratique; a Solfège des solfèges, in ten small volumes; Tablettes du pianiste, etc. (3) ACHILLE PHILIBERT, the son of Henri (b. Paris, 1813; d. Sèvres, Aug. 13, 1895), was a partner from 1850, and two years afterwards undertook the sole direction of the firm. In 1858 he added to it an establishment for engraving and music-printing, which gave a great impulse to the business; this was carried still further by the acquisition of the 'fonds Schonenberger.' In 1885 Lemoine founded a branch establishment at Brussels, in association with his sons, (4) HENRY (d. 1895) and (5) LÉON, who carried it on. Among the numerous publications of the house may be mentioned the Répertoire classique du chant français, and the Répertoire de l'ancien chant classique, both edited by Gevaert. The firm is now carried on under the title Henri Lemoine & Cie, a nephew of the former, Henry, being the present director (1926).

LEMOYNE, JEAN BAPTISTE (b. Eymet, Perigord, Apr. 3, 1751; d. Paris, Dec. 30, 1796). After several engagements as conductor in provincial theatres he went to Berlin in 1770 and studied under Graun, Kirmberger and L. A. P. Schulz; but emotionalism and theatrical effect were more in accordance with his nature than purity of style. After a short engagement as second Kapellmeister at the court theatre, Berlin, he went to Warsaw, and thence to Paris, where he produced an opera, 'Electra' (1782), imitating the style of Gluck, of whom he declared himself to be a pupil. When Gluck indignantly repudiated that statement, Lemoine revenged himself by writing (in 1786) another opera, 'Phédre,' in the style of Piccini. This met with great success, owing largely to the fine libretto by Hoffmann, and the beautiful singing and acting of Mme. Saint-Huberty, Lemoine's pupil. After a visit to Italy he returned to Paris in 1788, where in the following year he achieved with 'Nephté' the (in Paris) unprecedented success of being called before the curtain. Fétis enumerates 16 operas by this composer. E. v. d. s.

LENDVAI, ERWIN (b. Budapest, June 4, 1882), studied music under Koessler in Budapest, and was the winner of a State prize to Milan, where he received a further musical training from Puccini. In 1913 he was appointed teacher of theory at the Jaques-Dalcroze School of Dancing in Hellerau, and in 1919 professor of composition at the Klindworth-Scharwenka Conservatorium in Berlin. His music is of a fine, delicate texture and expresses happily the poetic soul of the composer.

WORKS.—Three string trios, op. 11, 14, 16; string quartet in E min., op. 8; symphony in D maj., op. 10; scherzo, 'Masken,' for orch., op. 7; Archaic Dances, for small orch., op. 30; quintet for wind and brass, op. 23; pieces for PF., op. 6, 9, 12, 13, 15; songs, op. 2, 6; 'Nippon,' for women's choir, op. 5; 'Jungbrunnen,' for voice and orch., op. 20; 'Stimmen der Seele,' for 8-voiced choir, op. 25; four male choruses, op. 29; Minnelieder, op. 21; cycle for male choir and baritone, op. 26; military march for orch., op. 22; four pieces for vcl and PF., op. 3; three pieces for organ, op. 4; opera, 'Elga' (first perf. in Mannheim, Dec. 6, 1916).

LENEPVEU, CHARLES FERDINAND (b. Rouen, Oct. 4, 1840; d. Paris, Aug. 16, 1910), composer. After finishing his classical studies at his native place, he came to Paris by his father's desire to study law, and at the same time he learnt solfège from Savard, a professor at the Conservatoire. His first essay as a composer was a cantata composed for the centenary of the Société d'Agriculture et de Commerce of Caen, which was crowned and performed July 29, 1862. After this success he resolved to follow the musical profession, and through the intervention of Savard he entered the Conservatoire and joined Ambroise Thomas's class. He carried off the Prix de Rome in 1865 as the first competitor, and his cantata, 'Renaud dans les jardins d'Armide,' was performed at the opening of the restored Salle du Conservatoire, Jan. 3, 1866. When he was at Rome he took part in the competition instituted by the Minister of Fine Arts in 1867, and his score of 'Le Florentin,' written on a poem by St. Georges, was accepted from among sixty-two compositions, without hesitation on the part of the judges, or murmurs on the part of the rival competitors. The prize work was to have been given at the Opéra-Comique, but political events and the war delayed the fulfilment of the promise, and Lenepveu, instead of composing for the Concerts Populaires, which were always ready to receive new works, made the mistake of holding aloof, resting on his laurels, while his companions, Massenet, Dubois, Guiraud, Bizet, etc., all of whom were waiting for admittance into the theatres, devoted themselves to symphonic music, and thereby acquired skill in orchestration, as well as the recognition of the public. Lenepveu, who on his return from Rome had resumed his contrapuntal studies with the organist CHAUVET (q.v.), while waiting for the production of 'Le Florentin,' brought forward nothing except a funeral march for Henri Régnault, played under Pasdeloup, Jan. 21, 1872. In the preceding year he had produced a Requiem at Bordeaux for the benefit of the widows and orphans of those killed in the war, May 20, 1871; fragments of these works given at the Concerts du Conservatoire, Mar. 29, 1872, and at the Concerts Populaires, Apr. 11, 1873, showed an unfortunate tendency in the composer to obtain as much noise as possible.

At length, after long delays and repeated applications, 'Le Florentin' was given at the Opéra-Comique, Feb. 26, 1874, and was wholly unsuccessful. After this Lenepveu was never able to get any work represented in France. Having completed a grand opera, 'Velléda' (on the subject of Chateaubriand's 'Martyrs'), he determined to produce it in London, where it was performed in Italian, with Mme. Patti in the principal part (Covent Garden, July 4, 1882). Lenepveu produced a 'drame lyrique,' 'Jeanne d'Arc,' performed in the Cathedral at Rouen (June 1, 1886); a 'Hymne funèbre et triomphal,' at Rouen, 1889; an 'Ode triomphale à Jeanne d'Arc' at the same place, 1892; and a Requiem, 1893. From Nov. 1880 he took a harmony class for women at the Conservatoire in the place of Guiraud. In this capacity Lenepveu was decorated with the Légion d'Honneur on Aug. 4, 1887. He was professor of composition in the Conservatoire from 1894, and was elected a member of the Institute in 1896.

LENER QUARTET. The four artists composing this quartet are wholly the product of the Musical Academy of Budapest, Jeno Lener, the leader (b. 1894), Joseph Smilovits, the second violin (b. 1894), and Sándor Roth, the viola (b. 1895), being pupils of Jeno Hubay, who, as far as chamber music is concerned, owed much to the influence of his master and intimate friend Joachim. Imre Hartman, the violoncellist (b. 1895), was a pupil of the equally famous David Popper.

All won many distinctions and were members in 1918 of the Opera orchestra in Budapest when, at the outbreak of revolution in Hungary, Lener gathered around him his three friends, and the four together retired to a remote Hungarian village, dedicating their best energies to the study of chamber music.

After two years of work they made an appearance in Vienna before an international gathering of musicians, amongst them Maurice Ravel, who personally invited them to Paris, where the concerts they gave proved a revelation to the exacting public of that city. Since then they have played with success in all the musical centres of Europe.

Their fourth visit to London in 1925 was signalled by an historical series of quartet performances, from Stamitz to Debussy, given in Wigmore Hall, and by a unique recital in the Albert Hall, in which a platform was erected in the centre of the hall.

The playing of the Lener Quartet is characterised by fine tone quality, homogeneity of style and technical brilliancy. Gramophone records of their playing are in great demand.

LENTO = 'slow,' implies a pace and style similar to a slow Andante.

LENTON, JOHN (b. 1656), appointed musician for the violin to Charles II., Aug. 2, 1693, one of the band of music of William and Mary and of Queen Anne, from 1692-1718, published in 1694 'The Gentleman's Diversion, or the Violin explained,' with some airs composed by himself and others at the end. A second edition, with an appendix, and the airs omitted, appeared in 1702, under the title of 'The Useful Instructor on the Violin.' It is remarkable that in neither edition is there any mention of 'shifting,' and the scale given reaches but to c'''. In 1692, in conjunction with Thomas Tallet, he published 'A Consort of Musick in three parts.' Lenton composed the overtures and act tunes to the following plays: 'Venice Preserved,' 1682; 'The Ambitious Stepmother,' 1700; 'Tamburlain,' 1702; 'The Fair Penitent,' 1703; 'Liberty asserted,' 'Abra Muley,' 1704; and 'The Royal Captive.' Songs by him are in several of the collections of the period, and other vocal pieces in 'The Pleasant Musical Companion' (1685). He contributed to D'Urfey's 'Third Collection of New Songs,' to 'Apollo's Banquet,' and revised the tunes for the earlier editions of his 'Pills to purge Melancholy.' The second vol. of Playford's Dancing Master, 1713, is 'carefully corrected by J. Lenton, one of Her Majesties Servants.' The date of his death has not been ascertained, but it was probably soon after 1718, when his name disappears from the royal band. W. H. H.; addns. from D.N.B., etc.

LENTZ, HEINRICH GERHARD (b. Cologne, c. 1764; d. Warsaw, Aug. 21, 1839), a pianoforte virtuoso and composer who played at the Concert Spirituel, Paris, in 1785, and at Salomon's concerts in London, 1792. He went to Hamburg in 1795, and was engaged in the same year by Prince Louis Ferdinand of Prussia; but supplanted by Dussek in 1802, he went via Halle to Warsaw, where he became teacher at the Conservatoire in 1826 and retired on the dissolution of that institute in 1831. He composed 3 symphonies, concertos, solos and sonatas, with and without flute or violin, 9 pianoforte trios, and songs. E. v. d. s.

LENZ, WILHELM VON (b. 1808; d. St. Petersburg, Jan. 31, 1883), Russian councillor at St. Petersburg, and author of Beethoven et ses trois styles (2 vols., St. Petersburg, 1852), in which the idea, originally suggested by Fétis, that Beethoven's works may be divided into three separate epochs, has been carried out to its utmost limits. This was followed by Beethoven: eine Kunststudie, in 6 vols.—i.-iii., Cassel, 1855-56; iv.-vi., Hamburg, 1860. This is an entirely different work from the foregoing, and though often extravagant in expression, has a certain value from the enthusiasm of the writer and the unwearied manner in which he has collected facts of all kinds about Beethoven's works. He also published Die grossen Pianofortevirtuosen unserer Zeit (Berlin, 1872), a collection of articles on Liszt, Chopin, Tausig, Henselt, and many other great artists, from personal knowledge, well translated in the Monthly Musical Record for 1878. Aus dem Tagebuche eines Livländers appeared in Vienna, without date.

LEO, LEONARDO (b. S. Vito degli Scavi, Aug. 5, 1694; d. Naples, Oct. 31, 1744), more correctly Lionardo Oronzo Salvatore de Leo, was born of humble parents at S. Vito degli Scavi, now called S. Vito dei Normanni, not far from Brindisi. He was the youngest of the three sons of Leonardo de Leo and Saveria Martino, and was named Leonardo after his father, who died before his birth, Oronzo after an ancestor whose name has been perpetuated in the family up to the present day, and Salvatore because he came into the world poor like our Saviour. According to the family traditions recorded by Cavaliere Giacomo Leo, a descendant of his brother Giuseppe, he was educated at S. Vito by the Dominicans, who discovered his musical talent and persuaded his mother and his uncles Don Stanislao de Leo, cantor of the church of S. Vito, and Doctor Teodomiro de Leo to send him to pursue his musical studies at Naples. He was admitted to the Conservatorio della Pietà dei Turchini in 1703, being then 9 years old, and remained there until he came of age in 1715. He must not be confused with a relative of his, Leonardo Leo (not de Leo), son of Corrado Leo, who was in easy circumstances, and was living at Naples 'in domibus Conservatori,' i.e. in a house belonging to the Conservatorio della Pietà dei Turchini at this time. This Leonardo married in 1713; his namesake would not have been allowed to do so while still a pupil of the Conservatorio, and indeed he remained single all his life.

At Naples Leonardo studied first under Provenzale, and later under Nicola Fago il Tarentino. It has been stated that he was also a pupil of Pitoni at Rome, and of Alessandro Scarlatti at Naples; but although his work was certainly much influenced by both these masters, he cannot have received direct tuition from either of them. He could not have gone to Rome for lessons while a poor student at a Neapolitan Conservatorio, and A. Scarlatti on his return to Naples towards the close of the year 1708 was teaching, not at the Pietà dei Turchini, but at the Poveri di Gesù Cristo.

Leo made his first appearance as a composer with a sacred drama on the subject of Santa Chiara, entitled 'L' Infedeltà abbattuta,' performed by the students of the Conservatorio during the carnival of 1712, and repeated on Feb. 14 of that year at the royal palace, by command of the Viceroy. Florimo names as his first composition another sacred drama, 'Il trionfo della castità di S. Alessio,' produced, according to him, on Jan. 4, 1713, at the Conservatorio, but no trace of either score or libretto is to be found, and it is not mentioned in the newspapers of the time. His first secular opera was 'Pisistrato' (Teatro di S. Bartolomeo, May 13, 1714), which was much admired. In the following year the young composer was made second master at the Pietà dei Turchini, and (according to Florimo) organist of the cathedral; in 1716 he appears to have been appointed supernumerary organist of the royal chapel, and on June 23, 1717, organist, with a stipend of 12.75 lire a month. This promotion was probably connected with the departure for Rome of A. Scarlatti, which took place in the autumn, after which he received no stipend, but continued to hold the title of Primo Maestro della Real Cappella. Leo also became maestro di cappella at the church of S. Maria della Solitaria, which belonged to a convent of Spanish nuns. In 1718 he produced 'Sofonisba,' hitherto supposed to have been his first opera, and in any case the first which definitely established his reputation as a composer for the stage. The scores of most of his operas of this time have disappeared, and only the more important ones need be mentioned here. In 1722 he composed recitatives and comic scenes for Gasparini's 'Bajazette,' first produced under the name of 'Tamerlano' at Venice in 1710. The comic scenes were written by Bernardo Sabbumene, who afterwards became famous as a writer of comic libretti in Neapolitan dialect. This seems to have been the beginning of Leo's brilliant career as a composer of comic opera. 'La mpeca scoperta' ('L'imbroglio scoperto') was produced in 1723 at the Teatro dei Fiorentini, a theatre already celebrated for the comedies of A. Scarlatti and Leonardo Vinci, and was the first of a long series of successes in this line.

In 1725 Alessandro Scarlatti died, and a number of promotions took place on the staff of the royal chapel, Leo now becoming first organist. It was probably at this date that he became master at the Conservatorio di S. Onofrio. His fame now extended outside Naples. 'Timocrate' had been given in Venice in 1723, and in 1726 his 'Trionfo di Camilla' was produced at Rome. The charming pastorale 'In van la gelosia,' which occurs in this opera, enables us to fix the date of the Neapolitan comic opera 'La semmeglianza di chi l'ha fatta,' in which the same air is sung as a show-piece by one of the minor characters. In 1732 he produced his two celebrated oratorios 'La morte di Abele' and 'Sant' Elena al Calvario.' 'Demofonte,' perhaps the most successful of all his operas, appeared in 1735; in this opera occur the well-known duet 'La destra ti chiedo' and the pathetic air 'Misero pargoletto,' considered by Piccinni as a model of dramatic expression. In 1737 he was at Bologna for the production of 'Siface,' which was given twenty-seven times at the Teatro Malvezzi, and for which the composer received 1595 lire. 'Farnace' (1737) was the last opera given at the old Teatro di S. Bartolomeo before its final conversion into a church, the newly built San Carlo having taken its place as court theatre. Leo's 'L' Olimpiade' (1737) was the second opera performed there. In 1738 he composed 'Le nozze di Amore e di Psiche,' a 'festa teatrale' in honour of the marriage of Charles III. with Maria Amalia Walburga of Saxony, and was so much taken up with this work that he was unable to finish the opera 'Demetrio,' on which he was engaged, in spite of being imprisoned in his house and guarded by soldiers to ensure his working. He wrote the first act and part of the second, which was finished by De Majo.

Lorenzo Fago, and Logroscino, the third being written by Riccardo Broschi, brother of Farinelli. The whole opera was, however, eventually finished by Leo himself, and produced at Rome in 1742.

Two important compositions belong to the year 1739: the celebrated Miserere and the comic opera 'Amor vuol sofferenze.' The Miserere was composed in March, for the use of the royal chapel, and afterwards presented to King Charles Emmanuel of Savoy; Florimo tells a story of Leo's refusing to allow it to be copied after this, until his pupils contrived to do so secretly and perform it before him. The comic opera 'Amor vuol sofferenze' is that described with so great delight by the President Des Brosses to de Neuilly:

'Nous avons eu quatre opéras à la fois sur quatre théâtres différents [i.e. S. Carlo, Fiorentini, Nuovo, and della Pace]. Après les avoir essayés successivement j'en quitai bientôt trois pour ne pas manquer une seule représentation de la Frescatana, comédie en jargon dont la musique est de Leo . . . Quelle invention! Quelle harmonie! Quelle excellente plaisanterie musicale!'

The heroine of the opera, Eugenia, disguises herself as a maidservant from Frascati: hence the title La finta Frascatana, under which the opera was revived at Bologna in 1742, and by which it was no doubt conveniently known at the time of its first production. It was also known as 'Il ciò,' from the absurd character Fazio, a muddled-headed person who is always explaining and contradicting himself with the word 'ciò'—'that is to say.' In Nov. 1740 Leo went to Turin for the production of 'Achille in Sciro,' and to Milan for that of 'Scipione nelle Spagne,' being absent from Naples for four months. On Jan. 1, 1741, he succeeded Nicola Fago as first master at the Pietà dei Turchini, and, with the exception of a short visit to Rome in November of that year, he seems to have remained in Naples until his death. On Saturday morning, Oct. 31, 1744, he was found dead, having succumbed to apoplexy while seated at his harpsichord; the romantic statement of Florimo that he was engaged at the moment on the composition of 'La finta Frascatana' is obviously untrue. The records of his death are conflicting, owing to a confusion with his namesake mentioned above; for the various documents the reader may be referred to Cav. G. Leo's biography. He was buried at the church of Montesanto, the last resting-place of A. Scarlatti and many other musicians of his school.

In person, Leo was of middle height and handsome features; in manner he was dignified and urbane. He was a man of serious character, working hard at night when his other occupations left him little opportunity for composition in the daytime, and so careful in the preparation of music for performance that he would begin on Ash Wednesday rehearsing the Miserere to be sung in Holy Week. As a teacher he was severe, but greatly beloved of his pupils, the most distinguished of whom were Piccinni and Jommelli.

As a composer, his fame rests chiefly on his sacred music and his comic operas. He was the first of the Neapolitan school to obtain a complete mastery over modern harmonic counterpoint. In the fugal movements of his psalms and masses he is entirely free from modal influences, and is careful to secure a strong rhythmic contrast between his subjects and counter-subjects, a means of effect but vaguely attempted by A. Scazzati. Leo is in this respect an important factor in the development of modern scholastic counterpoint. In other respects he presents little that is new. His melody is flowing and dignified, but rarely passionate; his harmony clear and logical, with no attempt at romantic expression. Of his ecclesiastical style the Dixit Dominus in C, published by Novello, is a very typical specimen; another Dixit Dominus, for ten voices and orchestra, in D, exhibits similar qualities.

Of his masses that in D major for five voices and orchestra is the best; the well-known Miserere and the series of Intros, etc., for Lent, composed in 1744, show a successful adaptation of old methods to modern needs of expression, combining poetic feeling with a studiously restrained style. His sacred music for solo voices is less severe in manner; we may mention the beautiful Lamentations for Holy Week, a graceful and florid Salve Regina, and a fine motet, 'Inter tot vana insana blandimenta,' for soprano solo and double quartet of strings.

As a composer of serious opera Leo is not especially interesting, and the scarcity of his scores makes it difficult to trace his development. His comic operas, however, are full of life and humour. 'Amor vuol sofferenze' fully merits the praise bestowed on it by Des Brosses, and no more amusing 'plaisanterie musicale' could be found than Fazio's great air, 'Io non so dove mi sto,' in which the mock-ecclesiastical accompaniment admirably illustrates the grotesque pomposity of the character. 'La semmeglianza' shows a keen sense of musical parody; and all the comic operas are full of sparkling and vivacious music, generally including one or two ensemble movements which are spirited, though never developed to a strong climax, either dramatic or musical. Mention must also be made of his instrumental music, which includes a concerto for four violins and six admirable violoncello concertos composed in 1737 and 1738, for the Duke of Maddaloni.

The best collection of Leo's operas is at Montecassino; the British Museum and Fitzwilliam Museum afford the best materials for the study of his sacred music. A complete catalogue of his works, with the libraries where they are to be found, is printed in Cav. G. Leo's biography. The writer's special thanks are due to Cav. Leo for help in the preparation of this article.

LEO DI MODENA, an early 17th-century Jewish composer of Mantua, wrote an essay on choral singing in the Synagogue, in Rossi's Schirha-Schirim (Venice, 1623).

LÉONARD, HUBERT (b. Bellaire, Belgium, Apr. 7, 1819; d. Paris, May 6, 1890), famous violinist, entered the Paris Conservatoire in 1836, and studied under Haboneck. He established his reputation as a brilliant player by a tour through Germany in 1844, and was the first to play Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto in Berlin, under the immediate direction of the composer. In 1847 he succeeded de Bériot as first professor of the violin at the Brussels Conservatoire. In 1867 he resigned on account of ill-health and went to live in Paris, where he died. He was an eminently successful teacher, and counted among his pupils many of the best modern Belgian, German and French violinists. Léonard was a brilliant virtuoso, excelling especially in arpeggios and staccatos.

Madame Léonard (née Antonia Sticher de Mendi, a niece of Manuel Garcia) gained much distinction in concert singing, and was for many years a successful teacher of singing in Paris.

LEONARDA, ISABELLA (b. Novara, c. 1641), abbess of the convent of St. Ursula, Novara; composer of masses, motets (the last book, op. 20, Bologna, 1700) and other church music. (1st in Q.-L.)

LEONARDO, GIOVANNI, DELL' ARPA (late 16th cent.), Neapolitan composer of villanelle and canzone in collective volumes (Q.-L.).

LEONCAVALLO, RUGGIERO (b. Naples, Mar. 8, 1858; d. Montecatini, near Florence, Aug. 9, 1919), composer of 'Pagliacci' and other less famous operas, was the son of a magistrate. His musical studies began with the pianoforte, which he learnt, first, from a musician named Siri, and afterwards from Simonetti, a teacher of some repute at Naples, the author of an Enciclopedia del pianista. In due course Leoncavallo was admitted to the Neapolitan Conservatoire, where he became the pupil of Beniamino Cesi for the piano, of Michele Ruta for harmony, and of Lauro Rossi for composition.

At the age of 18 he left the Conservatoire with the diploma of 'maestro,' and set to work upon an opera. His subject was the tragic story of Chatterton, the libretto being an adaptation of Alfred de Vigny's drama. At Bologna, whither he had gone to attend the lectures of the famous poet and littérateur Carducci, he completed the opera and arranged for its production, but at the last moment the impresario decamped, leaving the unfortunate composer almost penniless. In despair Leoncavallo was compelled to undertake any work that would keep him from starvation. He gave lessons in singing and in piano-playing, and played accompaniments at café-concerts. In the latter capacity he travelled far, visiting England, France, Holland and Germany, and going even as far as Cairo. After many years' wandering he returned to Italy, and presented himself to the house of Ricordi, with the scenario of a vast trilogy dealing with the history of the Renaissance in Italy, for which he had already completed the libretto of the first section, 'I Medici.' The latter was accepted, and in a year Leoncavallo had finished the music.

For three years he waited vainly in the hope of seeing his opera produced, and then betook himself in despair to the rival house of Sonzogno. Here he was well received, and for this firm he wrote his 2-act opera 'Pagliacci,' which was produced at the Teatro dal Verme, Milan, on May 21, 1892, with very great success. Leoncavallo's name soon became famous throughout Italy, and on Nov. 10, 1893, his 'Medici,' the first section of his Renaissance trilogy, 'Crepusculum,' was produced at the Teatro dal Verme. The work, which deals with the Pazzi conspiracy and the murder of Giuliano de' Medici, was a failure; and the composer, discouraged by its unfavourable reception, never completed, or at any rate never published, the remaining sections of the trilogy, 'Savonarola' and 'Cesare Borgia.' Leoncavallo's early opera, 'Chatterton,' which was finally given at the Teatro Nazionale, Rome, on Mar. 10, 1896, was no more successful than 'I Medici,' but 'La Bohème' (Teatro della Fenice, Venice, May 6, 1897), an adaptation of Henri Murger's novel, was far more favourably received, although handicapped by inevitable comparisons with Puccini's opera on the same subject, which had been produced with overwhelming success a few months earlier, and was actually being played to crowded audiences at another theatre in Venice at the same time.

Leoncavallo's next opera, 'Zaza,' an adaptation of the play by Berton and Simon, was produced at the Teatro Lirico, Milan, on Nov. 10, 1900, with fair success, and has subsequently been performed in Germany, Holland and Paris. 'Der Roland' was written in response to a commission of the German Emperor, Wilhelm II., who heard 'I Medici' in Berlin in 1894, and believed that in the Italian poet and musician he had found a bard worthy of celebrating the glory of the house of Hohenzollern, as in 'I Medici' he had celebrated that of the great Florentine family. 'Der Roland' is founded upon Willibald Alexis's romance, 'Der Roland von Berlin,' which deals with the subjugation of Berlin by the Elector Frederick II. Of this work an Italian translation was made for Leoncavallo's benefit by the Emperor's orders, from which he constructed his own libretto. This, after the music was finished, was translated back into German by Georg Droscher, and the opera was produced at the Royal Opera House in Berlin, on Dec. 13, 1904. In spite of the patronage of the Emperor, and the favour of the Court, 'Der Roland' attained no permanent success. It was, in fact, in his most ambitious works, such as this and 'I Medici,' that Leoncavallo showed to least advantage. In operas of the type of 'Zaza' and 'Pagliacci,' his strong feeling for theatrical effect served him well, but his musical inspiration was singularly deficient, and his more pretentious works were hardly more than strings of ill-digested reminiscences.

In 1910 two new operas by him were produced in Rome within four days of each other, 'Maia' in 3 acts, libretto by Paul de Choudens, at the Costanzi Theatre, Jan. 15, 1910; and 'Malbruk,' a comic opera in 3 acts, libretto by Signor Nessi, at the Teatro Nazionale, on Jan. 19.

Later works, several of them no more than operettas of slight quality, were 'I Zingari' (London, 1912), 'La reginalla delle rose' (Rome, 1912), 'Are you there?' (London, 1913), 'La Candidata' (Rome, 1915), 'Goffredo Mameli' (Genoa, 1916), 'Prostami tua moglie' (Montecatini, 1916), 'Edipo Re' (Chicago, 1920).

As a librettist Leoncavallo showed uncommon dramatic ability. Not only did he write the libretti for his own operas, but, like Boito, he occasionally placed his talent at the service of his friends, as in the case, for instance, of 'Mario Wetter,' an opera by the Portuguese composer, Augusto Machado. Apart from his operatic works, Leoncavallo was the composer of a symphonic poem, 'Serafita,' founded upon Balzac's novel, and of a ballet entitled 'La Vita d'una Marionetta.'

LEONETTI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, of Crema, organist of S. Agostino of that town in 1617. He composed a book of masses, 8 v., and a book of madrigals, 5 v.; also 4 madrigals a 6 in Orazio Scaletta's 'Affettuosi affetti' (1604).

LEONI (d. Kingston, 1797¹), a vocalist of repute during the latter part of the 18th century. His real name was Myer Lyons, and he was uncle to John Braham. After being a chorister at the Great Synagogue in Aldgate, London, he made an appearance in opera at Covent Garden in the part of Arbaces, in 'Artaxerxes,' by Dr. Arne, in 1775. He sang in other Covent Garden operas, including Shield's 'Fitch of Bacon,' in 1778.

He joined Giordani in the management of an English opera-house in Dublin, and was also engaged by Palmer for the Royalty Theatre. After remaining some time in England and Ireland, he was appointed 'bazzan' at the Jewish Synagogue at Kingston, Jamaica, being the first to hold that office in the English colonies.

His voice is said to have been of fine quality, surpassing even that of his talented nephew, John Braham. He composed small pieces for the theatre, and for use in the Jewish ritual.

The hymn-tune 'Leoni' was named after him from the circumstance that he supplied Thomas Oliver, the hymn-writer, with it, the tune being sung as a 'Yigdal' in the Synagogue. It was first published in a collection in 1781.

LEONI, GIOVANNI ANTONIO (17th cent.), Italian violinist, composed Sonate di violino a voce sola di . . . lib. 1, op. 3, Rome, 1652. These 31 sonatas are among the earliest written for the violin. A motet by Leoni appears in a collective volume of 1625.

LEONI, LEONE, maestro di cappella at the Duomo of Vicenza from at least 1588, belongs to the Venetian school of composers, whose chief merit does not so much consist in the polyphonic interweaving of the separate voices in skilful and elaborate counterpoint, as in the variety and brilliance of colouring by expressive harmony and the contrasts of double choirs.

His publications are five Books of Madrigals a 5, containing twenty or twenty-one each, Venice, 1588-1602; 'Penitenza,' a book of Spiritual Madrigals a 5, 21 n, 1596; 'Sacri fiori,' four Books of Motets for one to four voices with organ accompaniment, 1606-22; 'Sacrae cantiones,' lib. I. a 8, with double organ score 20 n, 1608; 'Psalmodia,' with two Magnificats a 8, 1613; 'Aurea corona,' concerti a 10 for four voices and six instruments, etc., 25 n., 1615. It will thus be seen that Leoni also followed in the wake of Giovanni Gabrieli in the combining of voices and instruments, using the instruments obbligato. The works of Leoni which would seem to have been most valued by his contemporaries are his motets for double choir a 8, fifteen of which appear in the Promptuarium of Schadaeus, 1611, and four in the Florilegium of Bodenschatz, 1621. Of these Anabros singles out two for special mention. A Passion motet, 'O Domine Jesu Christe adoro te,' he describes as of an almost heavenly beauty, and of 'Petre amas me' he says that hardly any one has given a more beautiful and touching expression to the rapturous utterance of divine love. In Torchi's L'arte musicale in Italia, vol. ii, there are two madrigals of Leoni from the volume of 1602, both interesting, one a nightingale echo song, the two upper voices meant to represent one nightingale echoing the other in canon.

LEONINUS, MAGISTER LEO, a 12th-century organist and maitre de chapelle at 'Beatae Mariae Virginis' (afterwards rebuilt as Notre Dame), Paris, one of the first to mark the different time values of notes. He is said to have surpassed his successor, Perotinus, in the art of organ-playing (Q.-L.).

LEONORA OVERTURES. The four overtures to Beethoven's 'Fidelio' are known as the 'Leonora' Nos. 1, 2 and 3 in C major, and 'Fidelio' in E major. The order and the occasion of their composition is as follows: 'Leonora' No. 2 for production of the opera, Nov. 20, 1805; 'Leonora' No. 3 for the revival, Mar. 1806; 'Leonora' No. 1 for a performance at Prague, May 1807, which never materialised; and 'Fidelio' for final revision of the opera, May 26, 1814. (See FIDELIO.)

LÉONORE, OU L'AMOUR CONJUGAL, the original title of Beethoven's opera FIDELIO (q.v.). The book, written by Bouilly, had been set by Gaveaux (Opéra-Comique, Paris, Feb. 19, 1798); an Italian version was set by Paër (Dresden, Oct. 3, 1804).

LÉPINE, a family of French organ-builders.

(1) JEAN FRANÇOIS (d. Toulouse, Oct. 21, 1762), established at the beginning of the 18th century the reputation of the firm. His principal instruments are the great organ of the Cordeliers at Toulouse (1727) and that of the Cathedral at Lodève (1752). He was nearly 80 years of age at his death.

(2) JEAN FRANÇOIS (b. Toulouse, July 18

1732; d. Pézenas, July 30, 1817), son of the preceding, pupil and friend of Dom Bédos, and the most celebrated of the family. He established his factory at Pézenas. His principal instruments are: the organ at Pézenas (1757); the reconstruction of the organ in the church at Saint-Just de Narbonne (1770-71); the organ of the Cathedral at Saint-Pierre at Montpellier (1776-80), 48 stops and 3471 pipes.

(3) ADRIEN (b. Toulouse, July 15, 1735), brother of (2), established himself at Paris about 1758 and there became the brother-in-law of François Henri Clicquot. In 1767 he restored the great organ of Nantes Cathedral, in 1777 constructed that of the Church of La Chapelle near St. Denis, and in 1778 restored that of the Church of St. Médard in Paris. In 1772 he submitted to the Académie des Sciences (T.I. p. 109) a system of forte piano organisé, of his own invention. A second keyboard combined the speech of an eight-foot bass, a treble flute, a bassoon and oboe stop. F. R.

L'ÉPINE, FRANCESCA MARGHERITA DE, see ÉPINE.

LEPORIN, JOHANN CHRISTOPH, German organist. Dates of birth and death unknown. Was organist of the Domkirche¹ at Halle from 1697-1702. Leporin was removed from his post by Frederick of Prussia owing to his dissolute manner of living, and was succeeded by the 17-year old G. F. Handel. Handel was a Lutheran, but was appointed to this post, a fitting member of the Reformed Church not being obtainable. It is most important to realise that it was Leporin who was the author of the scandals with which many Handel biographers (starting with Mainwaring, who was followed by Schoelcher) have burdened Friedrich Wilhelm Zachau, Handel's master. Zachau's name has been finally cleared (after a general mention of the falseness of the accusations by Mattheson in his G. F. Händels Lebensbeschreibung) by Chrysander (i. p. 61). S. G.

LEROUX, XAVIER HENRY NAPOLEON (b. Velletri, Italy, Oct. 11, 1863; d. Paris, Feb. 2, 1919), was a pupil of Massenet at the Paris Conservatoire, where he gained in 1881 a second accessit for piano and a first prize for harmony; in 1882 a second prize for counterpoint and an honourable mention for the Prix de Rome; in 1884 a first prize for counterpoint and the second Prix de Rome; and finally, in 1885, the Prix de Rome itself with his cantata 'Endymion.' Leroux's dramatic works are 'Cléopâtre,' incidental music to a five-act drama by Sardou and Moreau (Porte Saint-Martin, Oct. 23, 1890); 'Évangeline,' lyric drama in four acts (Brussels, Dec. 1895); incidental music for 'Les Perses,' adapted from Aeschylus (Odéon, Nov. 5, 1896); music for 'La Montagne enchantée' (in collaboration with A. Messager, Porte Saint-Martin, Apr. 12, 1897); 'Astarté,' four-act opera (Paris Opéra, Feb. 15, 1901); 'La Reine Fiammette' (after Catullo Mondès), in four acts (Opéra-Comique, Dec. 23, 1903); 'William Ratcliffe' (Opéra-Comique, Jan. 22, 1906); 'Théodora' (Monte Carlo, Mar. 19, 1907); 'Le Chemineau' (Opéra-Comique, Nov. 6, 1907); 'Xantho chez les courtisanes' (1910); 'Le Carillonneur' (1913); 'La Fille de Figaro' (Paris, Apollo, Mar. 11, 1914); 'Les Cadeaux de Noël' (1916); '1814,' lyric drama (Monte Carlo, Apr. 6, 1918); 'Nausithoé' (Nice, Apr. 9, 1920); 'La Plus Forte' (Opéra-Comique, Jan. 11, 1924). Apart from the stage, Leroux's works include an overture 'Harald,' given at the Lamoureux Concerts; 'Vénus et Adonis,' lyric scene (Concerts de l'Opéra, 1897); and many songs. He also wrote church music, a Mass with orchestra, motets, etc., and filled the post of professor of harmony at the Paris Conservatoire from 1896 till his death. He edited Musica and founded the music-school known as the Conservatoire Musica. G. F.; addns. M. L. F.

LESCHETIZKY, THEODOR (b. Lancut, Austrian Poland, June 22, 1830; d. Dresden, Nov. 14, 1915), a distinguished pianist, whose fame, however, rested more on his teaching than on personal performance. He attracted notice in Vienna by his pianoforte-playing in 1845. He was at St. Petersburg (1852-78) as a professor at the Conservatorium, then settled in Vienna, where he developed his own school of piano-playing, and was responsible for the training of a large number of distinguished pianists, including Paderewski. While at St. Petersburg he married Mlle. Friedeburg, a concert singer. His three subsequent marriages were with pupils, namely, Annette ESSIPOFF (q.v.) (1880-92), Donimirska Benislavska (1894-1908), Marie Gabriele Rozborska (1908). The last-named made her appearance in London as Mme. Leschetizky in the year of her marriage.

Leschetizky's compositions chiefly consist of morceaux de salon for the piano, but an opera, 'Die erste Falte,' was given with success at Prague in 1867, at Wiesbaden in 1881, and elsewhere. He made his début in England at the Musical Union concerts in 1864, playing in the Schumann Quintet, and solos of his own composition, and later frequently appeared at the same concerts. An account of his method was published as Die Grundlage des Methods Leschetizky by Malwine Brée in 1902. The following books shed further light on the principles of his teaching and the qualities of his personality:

LESLIE, (1) HENRY DAVID (b. London, June 18, 1822; d. Llansaintffraid, near Oswestry, Feb. 4, 1896), important in the history of choral music in England for the choir which he directed and brought to a high pitch of excellence, began his musical education under Charles Lucas in 1838.

For several years he played the violoncello at the Sacred Harmonic Society and elsewhere. In 1847, on the formation of the Amateur Musical Society, he was appointed its honorary secretary, and continued so until 1855, when he became its conductor, which post he retained until the dissolution of the Society in 1861. The choir which bore his name was actually formed by Joseph Heming in 1853, and conducted at first by Frank Moir; Leslie undertook the leadership in 1855, and the first concert took place in 1856. At first the number of voices was limited to about sixty, but afterwards it was increased to 240, so that a large work could replace the madrigals, for the sake of which the choir was originally founded. In 1878 it gained the first prize in the International Competition of choirs at Paris. In 1863 Leslie was appointed conductor of the Herefordshire Philharmonic Society, an amateur body at Hereford. In 1874 he became the director and conductor of the Guild of Amateur Musicians. In 1880 his choir was broken up; it was subsequently reorganised under Randegger, and in 1885-1887 Leslie resumed its management. Leslie's compositions were numerous, and included practically every form. They are not now considered important. W. H. H.; rev. C.

His son (2) WILLIAM HENRY PERRY (b. 1860; d. Llansaintffraid, May 23, 1926) united something of his father's musical gifts and enthusiasm with a successful business career. He was a member of Lloyd's (Godwin & Leslie) and was the first chairman of Lloyd's Brokers Association. He furthered various societies for amateur music in connexion with Lloyd's. As a director of John Broadwood & Son he promoted the interesting concerts given by that firm in London. He was a member of the Council of the R.C.M. and Master of the Musicians' Company (1924). His most individual work for music, however, was accomplished in the singing festivals and competitions which he organised in the neighbourhood of his country estate in Wales. C.

LESSEL, FRANZ (b. Pulawy on the Vistula, Poland, c. 1780; d. Aug. 1838), one of Haydn's three favourite pupils, his father, a pupil of Adam Hiller and Dittersdorf, being Musik-director at the neighbouring castle of Prince Czartoryski.

In 1797 he came to Vienna to study medicine, but the love of music proved a great distraction. Haydn eventually took him as a pupil, a service he repaid by tending him till his death with the care and devotion of a son. In 1810 he returned to Poland, and lived with the Czartoryski family, occupied entirely with music. After the Revolution of 1830 had driven his patrons into exile, Lessel led a life of great vicissitude, but being a man of varied cultivation always managed to maintain himself, though often reduced to great straits. In 1837 he was superseded in his post as principal of the gymnasium at Petrikau on the borders of Silesia, and feeling a presentiment of approaching death, he composed his Requiem, and shortly after expired of the disease commonly called a broken heart. He left songs, chamber music and symphonies; also church music, specially indicating gifts of no common order. Among his effects were some autographs of Haydn presented by himself. Some of his works were published by Artaria, Weigl and Breitkopf & Härtel, among them being three sonatas for PF. (op. 2), dedicated to Haydn; fantasia for PF. (op. 8), dedicated to Clementi; another fantasia (op. 13), dedicated to Cecily Beidale; a piano concerto, etc. (See Q.-L.) Lessel's life was a romantic one. He was believed to be the love-child of a lady of rank. Mystery also enveloped the birth of his first love, Cecily Beidale, and he discovered that she was his sister only just in time to prevent his marrying her. One of his Masses—'Zum Cäcilientag'—was composed in all the fervour of this first passion. C. F. P.

LESSON (LEÇON), a name in common use from the beginning of the 17th century to the close of the 18th, to denote pieces for the harpsichord and other keyed instruments. It was generally applied to the separate pieces which in their collected form made up a Suite.

The origin of the name seems to be that these pieces served an educational purpose, illustrating different styles of playing, and being often arranged in order of difficulty. This is borne out by the fact that Domenico Scarlatti's 'Forty-two Lessons for the Harpsichord, edited by Mr. Roseingrave,' are in the original edition called 'Esercizi—xxx. Sonatas per graviembalo,' though they have little of the educational element in them.¹ Rameau's Lessons for the Harpsichord, opp. 2 and 3, are not arranged in order of difficulty, but are connected by the relation of their keys. In the case of Handel's 3 Leçons, the first consists of a Prelude and air with variations in B♭, the second of a Minuet in G minor and the third of a Chaconne in G major; so they may be presumed to be intended for consecutive performance. The

'Suites de pièces pour le clavecin,' in two Books, were called 'Lessons' in the first edition, but in the later editions this name was discarded for that which they now bear. Instances of the use of the word to indicate a composition in three movements are to be found in the works of many 18th-century composers.¹

Although in general the name was applied to pieces for the harpsichord alone,² yet it was sometimes used for concerted chamber music, as in the 'Firste Booke of consort lessons,' collected by Thomas MORLEY (q.v.) (London, 1611), and in Mathias Vento's 'Lessons for the Harpsichord with accompaniment of Flute and Violin.' LESUEUR, JEAN FRANÇOIS (b. Drucat-Plessiel, near Abbéville, Feb. 15, 1760³; d. Paris, Oct. 6, 1837), grandnephew of the celebrated painter Eustache Lesueur. He became a chorister at Abbéville at the age of 7. At 14 he went to the college at Amiens, but two years later, in 1779, broke off his studies to become, first, maître de musique at the cathedral of Séz, and then sous-maître at the church of the Innocents in Paris. Here he obtained some instruction in harmony from the Abbé Roze, but it was not any systematic course of study, so much as his thorough knowledge of plain-song and deep study, that made him the profound and original musician he afterwards became.

His imagination was too active, and his desire of distinction too keen, to allow him to remain long in a subordinate position; he therefore accepted in 1781 the appointment of maître de musique at the cathedral of Dijon, whence after two years he removed to Le Mans and then to Tours. In 1784 he came to Paris to superintend the performance of some of his motets at the Concert Spirituel, and was re-appointed to the church of the Holy Innocents as headmaster of the choristers, in place of the Abbé Roze. He now mixed with the foremost musicians of the French school, and with Sacchini, who gave him good advice on the art of composition and urged him to write for the stage. In 1786 he competed for the musical directorship of Notre Dame, which he obtained, and immediately entered upon his duties. He was allowed by the chapter to engage a full orchestra, and thus was able to give magnificent performances of motets and Messes solennelles. His idea was to excite the imagination and produce devotional feeling by means of dramatic effects and a picturesque and imitative style, and he even went so far as to precede one of his masses by a regular overture, exactly as if it had been an opera. Crowds were attracted by this novel kind of sacred music, and his masses were nicknamed the 'Beggar's Opera' ('L'Opéra des gueux').

This success soon aroused opposition, and a violent anonymous attack was made upon him, under pretext of a reply to his pamphlet Essai de musique sacrée, ou musique motivée et méthodique pour la fête de Noël (1787). Lesueur's rejoinder was another pamphlet, Exposé d'une musique, une imitation et particulière d'une solennité (Paris, Hérissant, 1787), in which he gives a detailed sketch of an appropriate musical service for Christmas, and states expressly that his aim was to make sacred music 'dramatic and descriptive.' Meantime the chapter, finding that his projects had involved them in heavy expense, curtailed the orchestra, while at the same time strong pressure was put upon him by the Archbishop to take Orders. He willingly assumed the title of Abbé, but declined the priesthood, especially as he was composing an opera, 'Télémaque,' which he was anxious to produce. Finding his reduced orchestra inadequate for his masses he resigned, upon which an infamous libel was issued, accusing him, the most upright of men, of having been dismissed for fraud. Completely worn out, he retired in the autumn of 1788 to the country house of a friend, and here he passed nearly four years of repose and happiness. On the death of his friend in 1792 he returned to Paris, invigorated and refreshed in mind, and composed a series of three-act operas—'La Caverne' (Feb. 15, 1793), 'Paul et Virginie' (Jan. 13, 1794) and 'Télémaque' (May 11, 1796), all produced at the Théâtre Feydeau. The brilliant success of 'La Caverne' procured his appointment as professor in the École de la Garde Nationale (Nov. 21, 1793), and he was also nominated one of the inspectors of instruction at the Conservatoire from its foundation in 1795. In this capacity he took part with Méhul, Gossec, Catel and Langlé in drawing up the Principes élémentaires de musique and the Solfèges du Conservatoire.

He was then looking forward to the production of two operas which had been accepted by the Académie; and when these were set aside in favour of Catel's 'Semiramis' his indignation knew no bounds and he vehemently attacked not only his colleague but the director of the Conservatoire, Catel's avowed patron. His pamphlet, Projet d'un plan général de l'instruction musicale en France (Paris, an IX. (1801) anonymous), raised a storm and Lesueur received his dismissal from the Conservatoire on Sept. 23, 1802. Having a family to support, the loss of his salary crippled him severely, and he was only saved from utter indigence by his appointment in Mar. 1804 as maître de chapelle to the First Consul, on the recommendation of Paisiello, who retired on account of his health. As the occupant of the post most coveted by musicians in France, Lesueur had no difficulty in securing the representation of 'Ossian, ou les Bardes' (five acts, July 10, 1804). The piece inaugurated the new title of the theatre as 'Académie Impériale.' Its success was extraordinary, and the Emperor, an ardent admirer of Celtic poems, rewarded the composer with the Legion of Honour, and presented him with a gold snuff-box inscribed 'L'Empereur des Français à l'auteur des Bardes,' intended also as an acknowledgment for a Te Deum and a Mass performed at Notre Dame on the occasion of his coronation (Dec. 2, 1804). During the next five years Lesueur undertook no work of greater importance than a share in Persuis's intermède 'L'Inauguration du Temple de la Victoire' (Jan. 2, 1807), and in the same composer's three-act opera 'Le Triomphe de Trajan' (Oct. 23, 1807), containing the well-known 'Marche solennelle'; but on Mar. 21, 1809, he produced 'La Mort d'Adam et son apothéose' in three acts—the original cause of his quarrel with the management of the Académie and the Conservatoire. The scenery and decorations of the new opera excited the greatest admiration; when complimented on his work, Degotti the scene-painter replied quite seriously, 'Yes, it certainly is the most beautiful paradise you ever saw in your life, or ever will see.'

In 1813 Lesueur became a member of the Institut (Académie des Beaux-Arts); and after the Restoration became, in spite of his long veneration for Napoleon, surintendant and composer of the chapel of Louis XVIII. On Jan. 1, 1818, he was appointed professor of composition at the Conservatoire, a post which he retained till his death. His lectures were largely attended and very interesting from the brilliant remarks with which he interspersed them. Of his pupils no less than twelve gained the Prix de Rome—namely, Bourgeois, Ermel, Paris, Guiraud, Hector Berlioz, Eugène Prévost, Ambroise Thomas (whom he called his 'note sensible,' or leading note, on account of his extreme nervousness), Elwart, Ernest Boulanger, Besozzi, Xavier Boisselot (who married one of his three daughters) and, lastly, Gounod. Lesueur also wrote Notice sur la Mélodie, la Rhythmopée et les grands caractères de la musique ancienne, published with Gail's French translation of Anacreon (Paris, 1793). Ancient Greek music was a favourite subject with him, and he would with perfect seriousness expound how one mode tended to licence and another to virtue; unfortunately, however, some wag in the class would occasionally mislead his ear by inverting the order of succession in the chords and thus betray him into taking the licentious for the virtuous mode, and vice versa.¹

Lesueur died at a patriarchal age and in universal respect; even Berlioz² loved and honoured him to the last. He left three operas which had never been performed, 'Tyrtée,' three acts, composed in 1794; 'Artaxerse,' three acts, accepted by the Opéra in 1801; and 'Alexandre à Babylone,' of which the score has been engraved and considerable portions performed at the Conservatoire concerts. Of his numerous oratorios, masses, motets, etc., the following have been published:

'L'Oratorio ou Messe de Noël.'
Three Messes solennelles.
Mass with 'Domine Salvum.'
Three 'Oratorios pour le couronnement des princes souverains.'
Te Deum (3 settings).
'Domine Salvum' (2).
Two 'Oratorios de la Passion.'
Stabat Mater.
The oratorios 'Debora,' 'Rachel,' 'Ruth et Noémil,' 'Ruth et Boaz.'
Cantata for the marriage of the Emperor Napoleon.
Motet for the baptism of the King of Rome.
Prière for the Emperor on air of Languedoc.
'O Salutaris.'
Psalms and Motets, including a 'Super flumina Babylonis.'

The five operas previously mentioned and all this sacred music furnish ample materials for forming an estimate of Lesueur's talent. His most marked characteristic is a grand simplicity. No musician ever contrived to extract more from common chords or to impart greater solemnity to his choruses and ensembles; but in his boldest flights and most original effects of colour the ear is struck by antiquated passages which stamp the composer as belonging to a past school. 'His biblical characters are set before us with traits and colours so natural as to make one forget the poverty of the conception, the antique Italian phrases, the childish simplicity of the orchestration.'³ By another critic he was said to have taken the theatre into the church and the church into the theatre. Thus, looking at the matter from a purely musical point of view, it is impossible to consider Lesueur the equal of his contemporaries Méhul and Cherubini; though the novelties he introduced derive a special interest from the fact that he was the master of Hector Berlioz.

LEUTGEB (LEITGEB), JOSEF (d. Feb. 27, 1811⁴), a horn-player to whom Mozart was much attached. They became acquainted in Salzburg, where Leutgeb was one of the band, and on Mozart's arrival in Vienna he found him settled there, in the Altlerchenfeld, No. 32, keeping a cheesemonger's shop and playing the horn. Mozart wrote four Concertos for him (Köchel, 412, 417, 447, 496), a Quintet (407), which he calls 'das Leutgebische,' and probably a Rondo (371). This shows that he must have been a good player. There must also have been something attractive about him, for with no one does Mozart appear to have played so many tricks. When Leutgeb called to ask how his pieces were getting on Mozart would cover the floor with loose leaves of scores and parts of symphonies and concertos, which Leutgeb must pick up and arrange in exact order, while the composer was writing at his desk as fast as his pen could travel. On one occasion he was made to crouch down behind the stove till Mozart had finished. The margins of the Concertos are covered with droll remarks—'W. A. Mozart has taken pity on Leutgeb, ass, ox and fool, at Vienna, March 27, 1783, etc.' The horn part is full of jokes—'Go it, Signor Asino'—'take a little breath'—'wretched pig'—'thank God here's the end'—and much more of the like. One of the pieces is written in coloured inks, black, red, green and blue, alternately. Such were Mozart's boyish romping ways! Leutgeb throve on his cheese and his horn, and died richer than his great friend. G.

LEVA, ENRICO DE (b. Naples, Jan. 19, 1867), famous for his very numerous songs, chiefly Neapolitan 'canzonette.' In early youth he studied the pianoforte under Pannain and Rossomandi, receiving lessons in composition from Puzone and D'Arienzo, professors at the R. Conservatorio Musicale of Naples. Ricordi, after the extraordinary success of his Neapolitan canzonetta, 'Non mi guardà,' entered into a contract with the young composer to write for them five songs each year. De Leva's celebrity was still further increased in 1890 by royal favour, when Queen Margherita commissioned him to write a vocal piece for an open-air festivity at the Royal Palace of Capodimonte. This work, a serenata entitled 'A Capomonte,' was directed by the composer, whose songs enjoyed, thenceforward, the advantage of being interpreted by the foremost singers of the day. Of the hundreds of songs written by Enrico de Leva, it must suffice to mention only a few of the most successful, such as 'E spingole frangese,' 'Triste aprile,' 'Voi siete l' alba,' 'Ultima serenata,' 'Voce fra i campi,' 'Ammore piccerillo,' 'Ho sognato' and 'Lacrime amare.' Some of his best have been written for popular local festivals. In these, the composer has skilfully preserved the spirit of the old Neapolitan folk-song, adapting it to the requirements of modern harmony with admirable spontaneity. Among de Leva's larger works may be mentioned his 'Sirenetta,' a setting of some verses from D'Annunzio's Gioconda, and an opera in four acts, 'La Camargo,' produced in Turin in 1898 at the Teatro Regio and in Naples at San Carlo.

De Leva is widely known as a teacher of singing in its higher branches, and as a successful advocate of improved methods in the cultivation of choral singing in elementary schools throughout Italy. In 1907 he succeeded D'Arienzo as director of the Istituto dei SS. Giuseppe e Lucia in Naples (Riemann).

LEVASSEUR, JEAN HENRI, called 'le jeune' (b. Paris, c. 1765; d. there 1823), violoncellist, pupil of Cupis and Dupont. He joined the Opéra orchestra in 1789, was professor at the Paris Conservatoire, and a member of the imperial (afterwards royal) private music. He was a collaborator in the official violoncello Tutor for the Conservatoire, and composed sonatas and duets for his instrument (E. van der Straeten, History of the Violoncello).

LEVASSEUR, MARIE CLAUDE JOSEPH (called ROSALIE) (b. Valenciennes, Oct. 8, 1749; d. Neuwied-on-the-Rhine, May 6, 1826), was a French singer, the natural daughter of Jean-Baptiste Levasseur and Marie-Catharine Tournay. She went young to Paris, where her parents married (Feb. 2, 1761); she first appeared in a fragment of 'L'Europe galante' (1766), and until about 1770 she only took secondary parts, that of l'Amour, among others. Her real gifts, her beautiful voice, her recognised talents as a singer and an actress, would not have served her without the protection of the Austrian ambassador, Count Mercy-Argenteau, who became her lover about this time. In 1775, after the comedy by Palissot, 'Les Philosophes,' of which the heroine was called Rosalie, she retook her own name of Levasseur, which made her say to Sophie Arnould: 'Cette Rosalie, au lieu de changer de nom, elle aurait bien fait de changer de visage,' making allusion to her ugliness, which, it seems, was not without charm.

At the production of 'Iphigénie en Aulide' (Gluck, 1774), by Sophie Arnould, Rosalie Levasseur played a small part, and in that of 'Orphée,' in the same year, she took the part of l'Amour. But at the revivals of these works (1776) she took the principal rôles. In 1775 she created the part of 'Alceste,' then 'Armide,' 1777, and 'Iphigénie en Tauride' (1779). Gluck chose her as his interpreter (he stayed with her at two revivals). She sang further: 'Ernelinde' (Philidor, revived 1777); created 'Roland' (Piccini, 1777), Amadis (Christian Bach, 1779), 'Persée' (Philidor, 1780), 'Électre' (Lemoyne, 1782) and 'Reinaud' (Sacchini, 1783). She had only a short career as a singer entrusted with principal parts, between the retirement of Sophie Arnould and the début of Saint-Huberti, who succeeded her in 'Roland' and in 'Armide.' Rosalie Levasseur had obtained special terms of 9000 livres; her patent of pension (Jan. 14, 1788), was for 2000. She left France at the Revolution, consorting with the 'Émigrés,' and returned about 1801. She married; again left France, and died at Neuwied, aged 77.

LEVASSEUR, NICHOLAS PROSPER (b. Brosles, Oise, Mar. 9, 1791; d. Paris, Dec. 6, 1871), bass singer, entered the Paris Conservatoire in 1807, and became a member of Garat's singing class, Feb. 5, 1811. He made his débuts at the Opéra as Osman Pacha (Grétry's 'La Caravane'), Oct. 14, 1813, and as Edipus (Sacchini's 'Edipe à Colonos'), Oct. 15, and was engaged there. According to Fétis he was successful only as the Pacha; the repertory was either too high for his voice, or unfavourable to the Italian method which he had acquired. He made his début at the King's Theatre, London, in Simon Mayr's 'Adolasia ed Alderano,' Jan. 10, 1815, and played there two seasons with success in 'La Clemenza di Tito,' in 'Gli Orazi,' as Pluto (Winter's 'Ratto di Proserpina') at Mme. Vestris's début, July 20, 1815; in Paër's 'Griselda,' Farinelli's 'Rite d'Efeso,' Ferrari's 'Heroine di Raab' and Portogallo's 'Regina di Lidia.' He reappeared there with some success in 1829, and again in French as Bertram on production of 'Robert,' June 11, 1832. He reappeared at the Opéra about 1816, and remained there as an under-study, but obtained much reputation in concerts with his friend Ponchard. He made his début at the Italiens as Figaro, Oct. 5, 1819, and remained there until about 1827, where he sang in new operas of Rossini, in Meyerbeer's 'Crociato,' and Vaccaj's 'Romeo.' He sang at Milan on the production of Meyerbeer's 'Margherita d'Anjou,' Nov. 14, 1820. He reappeared at the Opéra as Moses on the production of Rossini's opera there, Mar. 26, 1827, a part which he had previously played at the Italiens, Oct. 20, 1822; returned there permanently the next year, and remained until his retirement, Oct. 29, 1853. He created the part of Zacharie in the 'Prophète' at the request of Meyerbeer, who admired his talent as much as his noble character. He was appointed head of a lyric class at the Conservatoire, June 1, 1841, and on his retirement in 1869 was made a Chevalier of the Legion of Honour. He became blind a short time before his death.

A. C.

LEVERIDGE, RICHARD (b. London, c 1670; d. Mar. 22, 1758), a singer noted for his deep and powerful bass voice. His name appears as one of the singers in Dr. Blow's Te Deum and Jubilate for St. Cecilia's day 1695, and he took part in Motteux's 'Island Princess' in 1699, composing some of the music himself. In 1702

'Macbeth' was given at Drury Lane, 'with music by Leveridge.' This is now in the Fitzwilliam Museum at Cambridge. Leveridge usually took the part of Hecate. He appeared in various operas, etc., of Purcell. He sang in the Anglo-Italian operas, 'Arsinoë,' 'Camilla,' 'Rosamond' and 'Thomyris,' at Drury Lane Theatre in 1705-07. In 1708 he was engaged at the Queen's Theatre and sang in 'The Temple of Love,' etc., and in Handel's 'Faithful Shepherd' ('Il pastor fido') on its production in 1712. He subsequently transferred his services to Rich, and sang in the masques and pantomimes at Lincoln's Inn Fields and Covent Garden for nearly thirty years. His voice remained unimpaired so long, that in 1730, when sixty years old, he offered, for a wager of 100 guineas, to sing a bass song with any man in England. About 1726 he opened a coffee-house in Tavistock Street, Covent Garden. He sang in the first performance of Arne's 'Rosamond,' Mar. 7, 1733, and appeared in pantomimes, etc., until 1751, taking his last benefit in that year. He wrote 'Brittain's Happiness,' an interlude performed at both the theatres, in 1704, and 'Pyramus and Thisbe,' a comic masque, in 1716, compiled by him from 'A Midsummer Night's Dream.' In 1727 he published his songs, with the music, in two small 8vo vols. The best known are 'All in the Downs' and 'The Roast Beef of Old England.' Some of his songs are said to be adaptations from Irish traditional tunes. Many others were published singly. In his old age he was maintained by an annual subscription among his friends, promoted by a city physician. There is a good mezzotint of him by Pether, from a painting by Frye.

LEVEY, (1) RICHARD MICHAEL (real name O'SHAUGHNESSY) (b. Dublin, Oct. 25, 1811; d. June 28, 1899), was apprenticed to James Barton in 1821, with whom he continued till 1826, when he entered the Theatre Royal orchestra. Balfé, Wallace and Levey were intimate friends. Levey's earliest recollection was seeing Horn's opera, 'Lalla Rookh,' in Dublin, and he had pleasant memories of G. A. Lee and G. F. Stansbury as conductors of the 'old Royal, of which he himself became leader in 1834. His accounts of the 'stars' between 1827 and 1847 make capital reading (a summary of them is given in his Annals of the Theatre Royal), and he often told the present writer stories of the two Keans, Alfred Bunn, Tyrone Power, Macready, Cooke, Miss Smithson (who married Berlioz), Taglioni, Paganini, Ole Bull, Bochsa, Lablache and Grisi.

In all, from 1836-80 (the 'Royal' was burned on Feb. 9, 1880), Levey composed fifty overtures, and he arranged the music for forty-four pantomimes. His first pantomime was 'O'Donoghue of the Lakes,' the book of which was written by Alfred Howard ('Paddy Kelly'). In 1839 he toured with Balfe's opera company in Ireland, and in 1840 he conducted the first performances in Dublin of 'The Maid of Artois' (with Balfe himself in the cast) and 'The Siege of Rochelle.' Levey often alluded with pardonable pride to Sir Robert Stewart and Sir Charles Villiers Stanford as his pupils. The latter's first appearance in public as a composer, at the age of 8, was as the writer of incidental music for the pantomime of 'Puss in Boots,' duly performed at the Theatre Royal during the Christmas of 1860, under Levey's baton.

In 1850 Levey was one of the founders of the Royal Irish Academy of Music—the other three being John Stanford, Joseph Robinson and Sir Francis Brady, K.C.—and the infant institution was removed to more suitable premises, at 36 Westland Row, in 1870. In 1852–55 he was leader of the 'Dublin Quartet Concert Society'; in 1859–62 he formed and led the 'Classical Quartet Union.' In spite of the short duration of these enterprises, he helped to start the 'Monthly Popular Concerts' in 1868, when the quartet was led by Joachim, and the concerts lasted till 1871. He had a 'jubilee benefit,' Apr. 20, 1876, and was presented with 250 guineas. Sir Robert Stewart conducted a new comic opera, 'The Rose and the Ring,' for Levey's benefit, on Mar. 23, 1878.

Levey lived to see the opening of the 'new' Theatre Royal on Dec. 13, 1897, and repeated his favourite joke that 'he still struggled to beat Time.' Among his published pieces are two volumes of old Irish airs. He married three times.

His eldest son, (2) RICHARD MICHAEL (b. 1833; d. 1904), became a famous violinist, and played at Musard's concerts in Paris in 1851–58. He then appeared in London in an entertainment called 'Paganini's Ghost,' in which he was got up to represent that player, and performed his most difficult feats of virtuosity. In 1865–85 he gave concerts, etc., under the name of 'Paganini Redivivus,' and after 1888 he appeared at the music-halls. W. H. G. F.

Another son, (3) WILLIAM CHARLES (b. Dublin, Apr. 25, 1837; d. London, Aug. 18, 1894), studied at Paris under Auber, Thalberg, and Prudent, and was elected a member of the Société des Auteurs et Compositeurs. He was conductor at Drury Lane from 1868–74, and held the same post at Covent Garden, Adelphi, Princess's, Avenue and Grecian Theatres, etc. His compositions include two operettas, 'Fanchette,' Covent Garden, Jan. 2, 1864; 'Punchinello,' Her Majesty's, Dec. 28, 1864; 'The Girls of the Period,' musical burlesque, libretto by Burnand, Mar. 1869; incidental music to 'Antony and Cleopatra,' 1873; music to the dramas 'King o' Scots,' 'Amy Robsart,' 'Lady of the Lake,' 'Rebecca,' and 'Esmeralda,' and to several pantomimes; 'Robin Hood,' cantata for boys' voices; Saraband for piano on a theme by Henry VIII.; several drawing-room pieces and many songs, one of which, 'Esmeralda,' originally sung by Miss Furtado at the Adelphi in the drama of that name, and in the concert-room by Mme. Bodda-Pyne, obtained considerable popularity. A. C.

The youngest son, (4) JOHN, author and comedian, died at Seaforth, Liverpool, Sept. 17, 1891. W. H. G. F.

LEVI, HERMANN (b. Giessen, Nov. 7, 1839; d. Munich, May 13, 1900), studied with Vincenz Lachner from 1852–55, and for three years from that time at the Leipzig Conservatorium. His first engagement as a conductor was at Saarbrücken in 1859; in 1861 he became director of the German Opera at Rotterdam; in 1864 Hofkapellmeister at Carlsruhe; and finally, in 1872, was appointed to the Court Theatre of Munich, a post which he filled with great distinction until 1896. He attained to a prominent place among Wagnerian conductors, and to him fell the honour of directing the first performance of 'Parsifal' at Bayreuth, on July 28, 1882. In 1895 he came to England, but only conducted one concert, on Apr. 25, in the Queen's Hall. His mental disease showed itself soon afterwards, and, though in 1898 he rearranged the libretto of 'Cosi fan tutte,' he was never able to resume active work. M.

LEVY, ALEXANDRE (b. S. Paulo, Brazil, Nov. 10, 1864; d. there, Jan. 17, 1892), Brazilian pianist and composer. His works include a 'Suite brasileira' (orch.), and 'Variações para piano sobre um thema brasileiro' (PF.). He aimed at the creation of national Brazilian music based on popular melodies. J. B. T.

LEWIS, THOMAS C., originally an architect, started business as an organ-builder in London about the year 1861. He built the organs of the Anglican and Roman Catholic Cathedrals at Newcastle-on-Tyne, Ripon Cathedral, and in London those of St. Peter's, Eaton Square; Holy Trinity, Paddington, and the People's Palace. But his largest work is the organ of St. Andrew's Hall, Glasgow. v. de p.

LEY, HENRY GEORGE (b. Chagford, Dec. 30, 1887), one of the most brilliant of English organists, was educated at St. George's, Windsor (1896), Uppingham, and the R.C.M. (under Parratt). Ley won the organ scholarship at Keble College, Oxford, and while still an undergraduate was appointed organist of Christ Church Cathedral (1909) in succession to HARWOOD (q.v.). His remarkable skill and taste as a performer were quickly recognised, but like most English organists of the first rank he devoted himself to his cathedral work and refused the temptation to gain notoriety by touring as a recitalist. He was appointed Choragus of the University and joined the staff of the R.C.M. as teacher of the organ. The last of these appointments he still (1926) holds, but his Oxford appointments were resigned this year in favour of that of Director of the Music at Eton College. (See Mus. T., Dec. 1922, p. 837.) C.

L'HÉRITIER, JEAN, see HÉRITIER.

L'HOMME ARMÉ (LOME ARMÉ; LOMME ARMÉ). (1) The name of an old French chanson, the melody of which was adopted by some of the great masters of the 15th and 16th centuries, as the canto fermo of a certain kind of Mass—called the 'Missa L'Homme armé'—which they embellished with the most learned and elaborate devices their ingenuity could suggest.

The origin of the song has given rise to much speculation. P. Martini calls it a 'canzone provenzale.' Burney (who, however, did not know the words) is inclined to believe it identical with the famous 'Cantilena Rolandi,' anciently sung by an armed champion at the head of the French army when it advanced to battle. Baini confesses his inability to decide the question; but points out that the only relic of this poetry which remains to us—a fragment preserved in the 'Proportionale Musices' of Tinctor—makes no mention of Roland, and is not written in the Provençal dialect.¹

'Lome, lome, lome armé.
Et Robinet tu m'as
La mort donnée,
Quand tu t'en vas.'

The melody—an interesting example of the use of the seventh mode—usually appears either in perfect time or the greater prolation. Slight differences are observed in the canti fermi of the various masses founded upon it; but they so far correspond, that the reading adopted by Palestrina may be safely accepted as the normal form. We therefore subjoin its several clauses, reduced to modern notation, and transposed into the treble clef.

¹ The text has been the object of considerable research. Michel Brenet (La Chanson de l'Homme armé, Journal musical, Nov. 1906; also Palestrina) discovered one line of it only. A whole verse was more lately found by Dr. Dragan Plamenac at the Biblioteca Nazionale, Naples, in the MS. Cod. VI., E. 40, which contains 6 anonymous masses built on the theme. (See the Proceedings of the Congrès Historique et Archéologique Bruges, Aug. 1926.) M. L. F.

Upon this unpretending theme, or on fragments of it, masses were written by Guglielmo du Fay, Antonio Busnoys, Regis, François Caron, Joannes Tinctor, Philippon di Bruges, La Fage (or Faugues), De Orto, Vacqueras, Monsieur mon Compère, at least three anonymous composers who flourished between the years 1484 and 1513, Antonio Brumel, Josquin des Prés, Pierre de la Rue (Petrus Platenis), Pipelare, Mathurin Forestyn, Cristofano Morales, Palestrina, and even Carissimi.

(2) The title is also attached to another melody, quite distinct from the foregoing—a French dance tune, said to date from the 15th century, and printed, with sacred words, by Jan Pruytiers, in his Ecclesiasticus, published, at Antwerp, 1565. The tune, as there given, is as follows:

LIADOV, ANATOL CONSTANTINOVICH (b. St. Petersburg, May 11 (Apr. 29, O.S.), 1855; d. Novgorod, Aug. 28, 1914), composer. His father and grandfather had been professional musicians.

He received his first musical instruction from his father, after which he went through a course—including composition under Rimsky-Korsakov—at the Conservatoire, St. Petersburg. He left with a brilliant record in 1877, returning the following year as assistant teacher in the elementary classes for theory, and later holding a professorship at this institution, taking special classes for harmony and composition. He also held a similar post in the Imperial Court Chapel. Together with Balakirev and Liapounov, he was charged by the Imperial Geographical Society to make researches into the folk-songs of various districts. As a composer Liadov wrote his best work for the pianoforte. His compositions for this instrument are delicate and graceful in form. The influence of Chopin is clearly evident in them; at the same time their distinctively Russian colouring, and gay—frequently humorous—character, saves them from the reproach of servile imitation. Much of Liadov's piano music has been orchestrated and used for ballets in the repertory of the Diaghilev troupe. The following is a list of Liadov's chief compositions:

PIANOFORTE MUSIC

Op. 2, 'Birlouiki'; op. 3, Six Pieces; op. 4, Arabesques; op. 5, Studies; opp. 6, 7 and 8, Intermezzi; opp. 9 and 10, Preludes and Mazurkas; op. 11, idem; op. 12, Studies; op. 13, Four Preludes; op. 15, Two Mazurkas; opp. 17, 20, 21, 'From Days of Old'; ballades; op. 23, 'On the Sward'; op. 24, Two Pieces; op. 25, Idyll; opp. 26 and 27, Marionettes; opp. 30, 31, 32, Musical Snuff-box; op. 34, Three Canons; op. 35, Variations on a theme by Glinka; op. 36, Three Preludes; op. 37, Studies; op. 38, Mazurkas; op. 39, Four Preludes; op. 40, Studies and Preludes; op. 44, Barcarolles; op. 46, Preludes; op. 48, Studies and Canzonetta; op. 51, Variations on a Polish Song; op. 52, Morceaux de ballet.

VOCAL MUSIC, SOLO WITH PF. ACCOMPANIMENT

Op. 1, Four Songs; opp. 14, 18, 22, Albums of Six Songs for Children to national words; op. 45, Ten National Songs for Female Voice; op. 48, Russian National Songs, 120 National Songs, in three volumes.

CHORAL

Op. 28, Last scene from Schiller's 'Bride of Messina,' for mixed chorus and orchestra; op. 47, 'Slava,' for women's voices, two harps and two pianofortes—eight hands; op. 50, Songs for Female Chorus and PF. accompaniment; Female Chorus (in honour of Vladimir Slavov, 1894).

WORKS FOR ORCHESTRA

Op. 16, First Scherzo; op. 19, Scene; The Inn-Mazurka; op. 49, Polonaise in memory of Poushkin.

Besides the above, Liadov collaborated in 'The Paraphrases' (see BORODIN), the string quartet 'B-la-f' (see BELAIEV), in the 'Fanfare' for the jubilee of Rimsky-Korsakov, etc.

R. N.

LIAPOUNOV, SERGIUS MIKHAILOVICH (b. Yaroslav, Nov. 30, 1859; d. Paris, Nov. 11,¹ 1924), composer. He attended the classes of the Imperial Musical Society at Nijny Novgorod, and afterwards joined the Moscow Conservatoire, which he quitted in 1863. He was appointed by the Geographical Society to collect folk-songs in the governments of Vologda, Viatka and Kostroma (1893). From 1894-1902 Liapounov was assistant director of the court chapel. His chief compositions are:

ORCHESTRA: Ballade (1883); Solemn Overture (1896); Symphony in B minor, op. 12 (1887); Polonaise, op. 16; symphonic poem 'Hasheh'; Second Symphony in B flat (completed but unpublished at date of death).

PIANOFORTE: Two Concertos (opp. 4, 38), preludes, valse, mazurkas, studies (12 Etudes d'exécution transcendante), etc.

VOCAL: 35 national songs with PF. accompaniment. R. N.

LIBERATI, ANTIMO, of Foligno, a pupil of Gregorio Allegri and Orazio Benenoli, became in 1661 a singer in the Papal Chapel. He was also for some time choirmaster and organist to two other churches in Rome. He is chiefly known as the author of an Open Letter addressed to a musical friend (Lettera scritta . . . in risposta ad una del Sig. Ovidio Persapegi . . .), printed and published at Rome in 1685, which has been relied on by Baini and others as the main authority for various statements with regard to the early life and works of PALESTRINA (q.v.). Besides this Letter, Liberati wrote another work, Epitome della musica, which only exists in MS., also two letters in defence of a passage in one of Corelli's sonatas. Baini mentions madrigals, arias and oratorios of Liberati in Roman Archives. J. R. M.

LIBERT, HENRI (b. Paris, Dec. 15, 1869), composer, organist and piano virtuoso, regular organist of the great organ of the Basilica of St. Denis, and professor of the organ at the American Conservatoire at Fontainebleau. At the Paris Conservatoire he was a pupil of Marmontel, Diémer, César Franck, Widor and Massenet, and won the first organ prize in 1894. He has written numerous organ pieces in a large style: 'Variations symphoniques' (Lemoine), 'Chorals,' 'Préludes et fugues,' some piano pieces, songs, motets, and some remarkable didactic works, suggesting a new basis for the formation and perfecting of the technique of pianists and organists. F. R.¹

LIBERTI, HENRI (HENDRIK) (b. Groeningen, c. 1600), organist of Antwerp Cathedral, 1630-1661. He composed a book of Cantiones sacrae (1621), a book of 'Paduanes et galiardes' (1632); also songs in collective volumes (Q. L.).

LIBERTI, VINCENZO, of Spoleto, composed 2 books of madrigals a 5 v. (Bologna, 1608 and 1609).

LIBON, FELIPE (b. Cadiz, Aug. 17, 1775; d. Paris, Feb. 5, 1838), Spanish violinist. He was a pupil of Viotti in London, studied composition with Cimador, and afterwards held court appointments at Lisbon (1796) and Paris (1800). His compositions include 6 violin concertos, string trios, duets, etc. J. B. T.

LIBRARIES AND COLLECTIONS OF MUSIC. I. EUROPE.—This article is arranged alphabetically; first by countries and then by towns within those countries. The territorial adjustments brought about by the Treaty of Versailles have naturally necessitated a regrouping of many of the headings. Strassburg, for instance, is now treated as a French town, and the independent town of Danzig has been entered separately as a 'country.'² An alphabetical arrangement of the individual libraries was not found feasible, as many of them have no distinctive or generally recognised title. Private libraries are entered under the place where they are situated, and after the list of public libraries in that place. It should be pointed out that the main purpose of this article is to give particulars of libraries where the student is likely to find material that is not generally accessible, and for this reason no mention has been made of many excellent municipal libraries which make a special feature of their music collections, since such libraries are forced as a rule to confine their attention to the standard literature of the art. The absence of any detailed reference to them must therefore not be attributed to a failure to recognise the importance of the part they are playing in the musical life of the community. In preparing the present notes as to the musical contents of the libraries of Europe, considerable use has been made of Dr. Emil Vogel's paper, 'Musikbibliotheken nach ihrem wesentlichsten Bestande,' which appeared in the Jahrbuch der Musikbibliothek Peters for

1904. A. Aber's Handbuch der Musikliteratur (1922) and the tenth edition of Dr. Riemann's Musik-Lexikon have also been consulted, and much kind help has been given by various owners of private collections and by many friends and librarians. Information has also been derived from Dr. W. H. Frere's Bibliotheca musico-liturgica (1901); W. H. J. Neale's Descriptive Catalogue of MSS. and Liturgical Books at the Music Loan Exhibition (London, 1885); Riaño's Critical and Bibliographical Notes on early Spanish Music (1887); the Catalogues and Guides to the Music Loan Exhibition (London, 1885); Victorian Era Exhibition (London, 1897); International Loan Exhibition (Crystal Palace, 1900); Company of Musicians' Loan Exhibition (London, 1904); and especially from the Catalogues of the Vienna Music Exhibition of 1892. To these works, as well as to E. Vogel's Bibliothek der gedruckten weltlichen Vocalmusik Italiens aus den Jahren 1500-1700 (Berlin, 1892), to Eitner's Quellen-Lexikon, and the pages of the Monatshefte für Musikgeschichte, the reader may be referred to supply the inevitable deficiencies and shortcomings of the following lists. Information concerning regulations for admission to the various libraries mentioned, and their hours of opening and other administrative details, will be found in such periodical publications as Minerva and the Index generalis.

Austria

EISENSTADT. The Library of Prince Esterhazy's castle contains much MS. music of the 18th and 19th centuries, amongst which are autograph symphonies and quartets by Haydn; a series of masses (from c. 1770 to c. 1830), including works by Haydn, Vogler, etc., and many German and Italian operas.

GÖTTWEIG. The Library of the Benedictine Abbey contains two MS. collections of songs by Mastersingers of the 16th century, and a MS. collection of organ music by Claudio Merulo. Librarian: P. Hartmann Srohsacker.

GRAZ. The University Library possesses some printed theoretical works. Librarian: Dr. J. Fellin.

INNSBRUCK. The University Library contains some rare early printed books on music, some treatises in a MS. of 1460, and a MS. with two-part compositions of the 14th century. Librarian: H. Pogatscher.

KLAGENFURT. The Library of the Historical Society ('Geschichtsverein') possesses inter alia two valuable MS. lute-books of the 16th century. Director: Prof. Dr. H. P. Meier.

KLOSTER NEUBURG. The Monastery of Austin Canons contains liturgical MSS. of the 13th and 15th centuries, and some printed music of the 16th century. See Catalogus codicum manu scriptorum qui in Bibliotheca Canoniorum Regularium S. Augustini Claustro-neoburgi asservantur (Vienna, 1922, etc.). Librarian: Prof. Dr. V. O. Ludwig.

KREMSMÜNSTER. The Benedictine Monastery contains a legendarium of the 11th century, with music in neumes; printed theoretical works of the 16th-19th centuries; about 1000 masses, 300 symphonies, and several operas (mostly of the 18th century). See Huemer: Die Pflege der Musik im Stifte Kremsmünster (Wels, 1877). Librarian: P. B. Lehner.

MELK. Besides a few printed musical works, the Library of the Benedictine Monastery contains liturgical MSS. of the 13th and 14th centuries, and a collection of MS. masses of the 16th century by Orlando di Lasso, A. Scandelli, etc. Librarian: Dr. W. Schier.

REIN. The Library of the Cistercian Monastery contains some printed music of the early 17th century. Librarian: O. Patteder.

SALZBURG. a. The Benedictine Abbey of St. Peter contains church music of the late 18th and early 19th centuries, including compositions by Michael Haydn. Librarian: P. B. Huemer, O.S.B.

b. The Chapter Library, attached to the Cathedral, possesses some MS. music of the early 16th century by Victoria, Palestrina, etc., and some compositions by Michael Haydn. Librarian: J. Strasser, O.S.B.

c. Mozart Museum (Getreidegasse No. 9). Catalogue by J. Horner (1st edition, 1882), continued by J. E. Engl (2nd and 3rd editions). Fourth edition, published by the Mozarteum, 1906. Later editions have appeared in summary form only. The most important Mozart MSS. have, however, now been transferred to the Mozarteum.

d. Mozarteum. The Mozarteum, opened in 1914, possesses a valuable collection of Mozart MSS., books about Mozart and printed editions of his works.

e. Museum Carolino-Augustum. The Library contains the score of O. Benevoli's mass in fifty-three parts (1628), published in Jahrg. x. of the D.T.Ö. Director: J. Leisching.

ST. FLORIAN, near ENNS. The Monastery of Austin Canons possesses a Library of over 100,000 volumes, including 802 incunables and 882 MSS. On the latter see Albin Czerny, Die Handschriften der Stiftsbibliothek St. Florian. (Linz, 1871.) Librarian: Prof. F. Asenstorfer.

ST. PAUL, LAVANT THAL, CARINTHIA. The Library of the Benedictine Monastery contains a valuable MS. collection of French Troubadour songs of the 13th century, besides treatises by Hucbald and J. de Muris. Librarian: Prof. P. T. Raichl.

VIENNA. a. The Nationalbibliothek (formerly Hofbibliothek) received in 1826 and 1829 all the music not connected with church music in the archives of the court chapel. In course of time it has acquired much scarce music (printed by Petrucci, etc.), and is also rich in autographs of different musicians, including a number of letters and MSS. by Beethoven; of special interest to English musicians is a volume of Bull's organ music in tablature. The manuscripts have been catalogued by Dr. Joseph Mantuani. His work appeared in two volumes (in 1897-99) as parts ix. and x. of the Tabulae codicum manuscriptorum . . . in bibliotheca Palatina Vindobonensi asservatorum. The Ambros and Kiesewetter collections, which form part of the library, are not included in this catalogue, but are to form a supplementary volume. A list of recent acquisitions to the Library, by R. Haas, was printed in the Z.M.W. for Sept. 1924. Director: Prof. Dr. J. Bick.

b. Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde (see VIENNA).

c. The University Library possesses printed theoretical works of the 16th and 17th centuries, and lute-books by Judenkunig, Ochsenkhun, Caroso and Deussa. Director: G. A. Crüwell.

d. The Library of the Landesarchiv contains some musical works printed at Vienna about 1600. Librarian: Dr. K. Lechner.

e. The Ministry for Education. Here are deposited the six precious volumes of MSS. formerly in the Chapter Library at Trent, from which volumes of selections have been printed by Dr. Guido Adler and Dr. Oscar Koller in the D.T.Ö. Director: Dr. V. Kreuzinger.

f. St. Peter's Church. See C. Roulland: Katalog des Musik-Archives der St. Peterskirche in Wien (Augsburg and Vienna, 1908).

g. The Benedictine Abbey of our Lady of the Scots (Schottenkloster) possesses some valuable early liturgical MSS. and a small collection of MS. and printed works of the 16th century. See A. Hübl: Catalogus codicum manuscriptorum qui in bibliotheca Monasterii B.M.V. ad Scotos Vindobonae servantur (1899), and the same author's Die Inkunabeln der Bibliothek des Stiftes Schotten in Wien (1901).

h. Monastery of the Minorites. The Library contains some MS. and printed organ music of the 17th and 18th centuries, including three works by Frescobaldi and G. B. Fasolo's Annali (Venice, 1645), and also some vocal music of the 17th century.

i. The Haydn - House (Mariahilferstrasse, 102) contains a small collection of printed and MS. documents relating to Joseph and Michael Haydn.

j. The Arnold Schönberg-Bibliothek, founded in 1924 in celebration of the composer's fiftieth birthday, confines its collections to the music of the last thirty years. Over 1000 volumes have already been acquired to form the nucleus of the library.

Belgium

The musical libraries of the Netherlands have been very fully described by J. G. Prod'homme in an article in Jahrg. 1913/14 of the Sammelbände der Internationalen Musik-Gesellschaft, which has been freely used in the compilation of the following notices.

BRUSSELS. a. Royal Library. In 1872 the Belgian Government was induced by F. A. Gevaert, Director of the Brussels Conservatoire, to purchase the library of Fétis for 152,000 francs. This collection, which comprises 7525 works, together with the collection of C. J. E. van Hulthem, forms the bulk of the musical library. The contents are very valuable, comprising about 4500 theoretical works, about 500 liturgies, over 100 Italian operas, about 170 French operas, and many rarities. The Van Hulthem collection is catalogued in vol. ii. of C. A. Voisin's Bibliotheca Hulthemiana (Ghent, 1836-37); the Fétis Library in the Catalogue de la bibliothèque de F. J. Fétis (by L. J. Aloin) (Brussels, 1870). See also J. van den Ghen: Catalogue des manuscrits de la Bibliothèque Royale de Belgique. Tome I. Écriture sainte et liturgie (Brussels, 1901). Conservateur-en-chef: L. Paris.

b. Conservatoire Royal de Musique. This valuable library, which now numbers some 31,000 items, was in 1904 greatly enriched by the acquisition of the collection of Professor Wagener, of Marburg, which is especially rich in works printed in England in the 18th century. Four volumes of an excellent catalogue by Wotquenne, covering about half the total collection of the library, have been issued (vol. 1, 1898; vol. 2, 1902; vol. 3, 1908; vol. 4, 1912), with an elaborate supplement: Libretti d'opéras et d'oratorios italiens du XVII^e siècle (1901). A catalogue of the remaining portion of the library exists in manuscript. Librarian: C. van den Borren.

GHENT. The Town and University Library contains liturgical MSS. of the 10th-12th centuries, a copy of Monteverdi's 'Lamento d' Arianna' (Venice, 1623), early theoretical works, and printed music from the presses of Phalèse and Gardano. The library of the Grand-Théâtre, including operas and ballets in score and a large number of librettos, is also housed here. See C. A. Voisin: Bibliotheca Gandavensis (Ghent, 1839); J. de Saint Genois: Catalogue méthodique . . . des manuscrits de la bibliothèque de la ville et de l'université de Gand (Ghent, 1849-52), the Monatshefte für Musikgeschichte for 1873, p. 62, and P. Bergmans: Une collection de livrets d'opéras italiens (1669-1710) à la bibliothèque de l'université de Gand (Sammelbände, I.M.G., 1910/11). Head Librarian: P. Bergmans.

LIEGE. a. Conservatoire Royal de Musique. The library contains two extensive special collections, a Grétry library, forming part of the 'Musée Grétry,' and the library formed by the singer Léonard Terry, which includes some 2000 musical works. See Catalogue de la bibliothèque du Conservatoire Royal de Musique de Liège (1862).

b. Société Libre d'Émulation. See Catalogue de la bibliothèque musicale de la Société Libre d'Émulation de Liège (1861).

UDENAERDE. The church of St. Walpurga possesses a collection of church music of the 18th century. See Liste générale de la musique appartenant à l'église parochiale de Ste. Walpurga à Audenarde (s.a.).

TOURNAI. The Chapter Library contains a three-part mass of the 13th century, which was published by Coussemaker in the Bulletin de la Société Historique de Tournai, and reprinted separately in 1861.

Czecho-Slovakia

BARTFELD. The Church of St. Aegidius contains a small collection of printed vocal music of the late 16th and early 17th centuries.

OLMÜTZ. The Studienbibliothek (Studijni knihovna v Olomouci) contains a copy of Schmid's Tabulaturbuch (1607), some printed music of the early 17th century, and MS. graduals of the 13th and 14th centuries. Keeper: B. Vybiral.

PRAGUE. a. The Chapter Library possesses copies of masses by Luyton (Prague, 1609, etc.), and a collection of sacred music of the late 16th and early 17th centuries. See the catalogues by the librarian, Dr. A. Podlaha (Prague, 1904, 10).

b. The Library of the Count von Nostitz-Rieneck contains copies of the Frottole intabulate da sonare per organi, libro primo (Rome, 1517), the Canzoni frottole e capitoli (Rome, 1531), and other printed works of the 16th and 17th centuries.

c. The Library of the Premonstratensian Monastery of Strakow contains a small collection of music, chiefly works of the late 16th and early 17th centuries. Librarian: C. Straka.

d. The Church of St. Thomas contains a copy of Uberti's Contrasto Musico (Rome, 1630).

e. The University Library contains MS. treatises of the 11th and 15th centuries; old Bohemian songs of the 14th and 15th centuries; two Easter mystery plays of the 15th and 16th centuries; printed theoretical works of the 16th and 17th centuries, and lute-books by Caroso, Negri, and Schmid (1607). Librarian: J. Borecký.

RAUDNITZ. The Library of the princely family of Lobkowitz contains some rare MS. and printed music chiefly of the 17th and 18th centuries. Of special interest are a number of 17th-century MSS of lute, guitar and mandoline music in tablature. See P. Nettl: Musicalia der Fürstlich Lobkowitzschen Bibliothek in Raudnitz (Mitt. des Vereines für Geschichte der Deutschen in Böhmen, Jahrg. 58, Heft 1, 1919).

SAAZ. The Capuchin Monastery possesses some sacred and secular music by Orlando de Lasso, Scandelli, Joachim à Burek, etc.

TEPL. The Premonstratensian Abbey contains a number of liturgical MSS., the earliest of which is a Penitential of the 8th or 9th century, with music in neumes. A catalogue of the manuscripts (by M. Nentwich) and a short description of some of the more important (by W. Vacek) are to be found in the volume Zum 700jährigen Todestage des s. Hroznata (Marienbad, 1917). Librarians: M. Nentwich, J. W. Vacek.

Danzig

a. The Town Library contains a valuable collection, principally of works of the second half of the 16th century. See O. Günther: Katalog der Handschriften der Danziger Stadtbibliothek. Teil 4. Die musikalischen Handschriften (Danzig, 1911). There is also a MS. catalogue of the collection, by S. W. Dehn, in the Royal Library at Berlin. Librarian: Dr. H. Bauer.

b. The Allerheiligen-Bibliothek, in the Marienkirche, contains a small collection of sacred music, mostly printed works of the 17th century.

Denmark

COPENHAGEN. a. The Royal Library contains a collection of MS. organ music (in tablature) by German composers of the 17th century, Italian printed music of the late 16th and early 17th centuries, and some rare printed works from Copenhagen and Antwerp presses. Principal Librarian: C. S. Petersen.

b. The Musikhistorisk Museum possesses a number of theoretical works relating to musical instruments and a few liturgical works, both printed and MS., exhibited to illustrate the development of notation. See A. Hammerich: Musikhistorisk Museum. Beskrivende illustreret Katalog (Copenhagen, 1909; German trans., ibid., 1911).

Finland

HELSINGFORS. The University Library possesses a collection of fragmentary MSS., rescued from old bindings, containing a large number of fragments of missals, of which a catalogue (by T. Haapanen) was issued in 1922 (Universitetsbiblioteks Skrifter, vol. 4). See also Die Neumenfragmente der Universität Helsingfors (1924), by the same author. Director: Dr. G. C. A. Schauman.

France

AIX (PROVENCE). The Bibliothèque Méjanès contains a 14th-century MS. of French Troubadour songs, and an early 17th-century collection of nearly 100 chansons with lute accompaniment. See catalogue by the Abbé J. H. Albanès, in Catalogue général des manuscrits des bibliothèques publiques de France, tome xvi.

(1894), and the supplements in tome xl. (1902) and tome xlv. (1915). Conservateur: E. Aude.

AMIENS. The Bibliothèque Communale contains a few early printed treatises, a number of French psalters of the 17th century, operas and song-books of the 18th century, and seventeen volumes of sacred music and five volumes of operas by Lesueur. For the printed music see Catalogue méthodique de la bibliothèque communale de la ville d'Amiens: Sciences et Arts (1859). Among the MSS. there are many interesting liturgies, etc., and a collection of sequences (with music), which belonged in 1572 to a monk named Guglielmus Lovel (described in the Ecclesiologist for October 1859). For the MSS. generally, see the catalogue by E. Coyecque in Catalogue général des manuscrits des bibliothèques publiques de France, tome xix. (1893), and the supplement in tome xl. (1902). Librarian: H. Michel.

AVIGNON. The Bibliothèque de la Ville contains many fine early MS. missals and liturgical works; motets by Mondonville, Blanchard, etc., and some miscellaneous 18th-century music. See catalogue by J. Quicherat, in tomes xxvii.-xxix. of Cat. gén. des MSS. des bibl. publ. de France (1894-1901), and the supplements in tome xl. (1902) and tome xlv. (1911). Librarian: J. Girard.

BESANÇON. The Bibliothèque de la Ville possesses a Boethius de Musica of the 9th century on vellum. See tomes xxxii., xxxiii. and xlv. of Cat. gén. des MSS. des bibl. publ. de France (1897-1915). Librarian: G. Gazier.

BORDEAUX. Bibliothèque de la Ville. See J. Delas: Catalogue des livres composant la bibliothèque de la ville de Bordeaux, musique (Bordeaux, 1856), and tomes xxiii. and xl. of Cat. gén. des MSS. des bibl. publ. de France (1894, 1902). Librarian: J. de Maupassant.

CAEN. Bibliothèque Municipale. See Carlez: Liste des œuvres musicales et des œuvres relatives à la musique (Caen, s.a.), and the catalogues in tomes xiv. (1890) and xli. (1903) of the Cat. gén. des MSS. des bibl. publ. de France. Librarian: M. Guillaume.

CAMBRAI. The Public Library contains a precious collection of MS. church music by early Flemish and Burgundian musicians, besides songs for two, three, and four parts, dating from the 14th century. The collection was described in Coussemaker's Notice sur les collections musicales de la bibliothèque de Cambrai et des autres villes du Département du Nord (1843). See also A. J. Le Glav: Catalogue . . . des manuscrits de la bibliothèque de Cambrai (Cambrai, 1831). Much of the library's stock was destroyed or damaged in the war (1914-18). Librarian: G. Leboyer.

CARPENTRAS. The Bibliothèque municipale possesses a MS. of Kepler's Principium musicæ; some 18th- and 19th-century music; autographs of Schumann, Brahms, Gounod, etc.

The library contains the collections of Peiresc, J. B. Laurens and others. See Cat. gén. des MSS. des bibl. publ. de France, tomes xxxiv.-xxxvi. (1899-1903). Librarian: R. Caillet.

DOUAI. The Bibliothèque Municipale possesses a 12th-century MS. with two-part music, a hymnarium of the 12th century, and some printed theoretical works of the 16th century. See Coussemaker's work (quoted under Cambrai) and the catalogue of the MSS. by the Abbé C. Debraisnes in Cat. gén. des MSS. des bibl. publ. de France, tome vi. (1878). Librarian: L. Noël.

DUNQUERQUE. The Bibliothèque de la Ville possesses some music printed by Phalèse (16th century). See Coussemaker's work (quoted under Cambrai). Librarian: L. Baron.

FOIX. In the Bibliothèque de la Ville there are nine antiphoners and other liturgical works (formerly belonging to the Cathedral of Mirepoix), written between 1497 and 1535. See Cat. gén. des MSS. des bibl. publ. de France, tome xxxi. (1898). Librarian: J. Eychenne.

GRENOBLE. The Bibliothèque de la Ville is rich in valuable liturgies. See the catalogue by P. Fournier, E. Maignien and A. Prudhomme, in tome vii. of Cat. gén. des MSS. des bibl. publ. de France (1889) and the Catalogue des incunables, by E. Maignien (1899). Librarians: L. Royer, N. de Bonfils.

LE HAVRE. In 1894 the Bibliothèque Musicale Publique contained about 4000 works, mostly dating from the latter part of the 18th century.

LILLE. Bibliothèque municipale. See Catalogue des ouvrages sur la musique et des compositions musicales de la bibliothèque de la ville de Lille (Lille, 1879). The collection is rich in operas. See also Coussemaker's work (quoted under Cambrai). The contents of this library were seriously damaged by fire in Apr. 1916, and although the greater number of the books were saved, many were irreparably injured by water. The collection is at present housed in the University. Librarian: P. Vanrycke.

MARSEILLES. a. The Bibliothèque de la Ville possesses some valuable liturgical MSS. of the 12th century. See the catalogue by the Abbé J. H. Albanès, in Cat. gén. des MSS. des bibl. publ. de France, tome xv. (1892), and the supplement in tome xlii. (1904). Librarian: J. Billioud.

b. Sainte Madeleine. The library contains a collection of liturgical MSS. from the 12th century downwards.

MONTPELLIER. The Bibliothèque de la Faculté de Médecine possesses a precious antiphoner (noted in neumes and letters) of the 9th century, published in the Paléographie musicale, and a 14th-century collection of French chansons for two and more voices. See Coussemaker: L'Art harmonique, etc. (Paris, 1865), and Cat. gén. des MSS. des bibl. publ. de France, tome i. (1849), and supplement, tome xlii. (1904).

ORLEANS. The Bibliothèque de la Ville contains a valuable MS. collection of mystery plays of the 12th century. See Cat. gén. des MSS. des bibl. publ. de France, tome xii. (1889), and supplement, tome xlii. (1904). Librarian: A. Bouvier.

PARIS. a. Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal. The library of the Arsenal contains very interesting MSS., such as the 'Mazarinados'—songs sung under the Fronde—with their airs; collections of airs by Michael Lambert, and other little-known compositions of the 17th and 18th centuries, etc. See H. Martin: Catalogue des manuscrits de la Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal (9 vols., Paris, 1885-94, issued as tomes iv.-xii. of Cat. gén. des MSS. des bibl. publ. de France, Paris). There is a good index of the music in tome vii. p. 457. See also the supplementary lists in tome xliii. (1904) and tome xlv. (1915) of the same catalogue. Administrateur: M. Battifol.

b. The Bibliothèque Historique de la Ville de Paris (Musée Carnavalet) is valuable for its MS. and printed works on the theatres of Paris and the instrument-makers of the city. Keeper: G. Cain.

c. Bibliothèque Musicale du Théâtre de l'Opéra. See T. de Lajarte: Catalogue historique, etc. (2 vols., Paris, 1878). Administrateur: Ch. Bouvet.

d. Bibliothèque Nationale. The Bibliothèque Nationale is very rich in French music, both printed and engraved. It is also more complete than any other in Paris in respect of musical literature, periodicals, almanacs, dictionaries and similar works of reference. It is rich in valuable MSS. of Dom Caffiaux, Parfait, Baini, Adrien de la Fage and other distinguished writers, but the great value of the collection consists in its early MSS., in which it occupies the first position for the study of the origins of music in Europe. The library contains MSS. with musical notation from the 9th century downwards, and is especially rich in Troubadour songs of the 13th century, and French and Italian compositions of the 14th century, while later times are well represented in operas, oratorios, etc. See J. Ecorcheville: Catalogue du fonds de musique ancienne de la Bibliothèque Nationale (8 vols., Paris, 1910-14). A new catalogue is in preparation. The MSS. are also catalogued in the various printed catalogues of J. Taschereau, H. Omont, L. V. Delisle, etc., and the books on music are included in the catalogue of the printed books now in course of publication. Administrateur: P. Roland-Marcel.

e. Bibliothèque Ste-Geneviève. This library contains a large number of rare works on music, a fine collection of chansons and dramatic works, with the music, and many curious

MSS., including a valuable MS. of the 11th century. See E. Poirée and G. Lamouroux: Les Éléments d'une grande bibliothèque-Catalogue abrégé de la Bibliothèque Ste-Geneviève (Paris, 1897-1910). Administrateur: M. Boinet.

f. Conservatoire des Arts et Métiers. The library contains few musical works, but is rich in materials for the history of the music trade, such as patents, trade registers, etc. Librarian: E. M. Lévy.

g. Conservatoire National de Musique et de Déclamation. Some account of the library has already been given (see CONSERVATOIRE). To the rare works there mentioned may be added the autograph score of Mozart's 'Don Juan' (presented by Mme. Viardot Garcia), a copy of the Harmonice musices odhecaton (printed by Petrucci in 1504), and the Liber primus missarum of Carpentras (Avignon, 1532). Of especial interest to English musicians are a large folio MS. containing compositions by Coprario, Lawes, Locke, Gibbons, Jenkins, Ferabosco and Ward; and an account-book of the Academy of Vocal Music (from Jan. 7, 1725 to 1726), formerly belonging to Owen Flincoff. The library secured many fine and rare works at the dispersal of the Borghese collection in 1892. See J. B. Weckerlin: Bibliothèque du Conservatoire National de Musique. Catalogue . . . de la Réserve (Paris, 1885). Librarian: H. Expert.

ROUEN. The Bibliothèque Municipale contains a superb illuminated missal, liturgical MSS. of the 9th-11th centuries, and collections of operas and church music. See F. I. Licquet: Catalogue de la Bibliothèque de la Ville de Rouen (1830), and the catalogue by H. Omont, in tomes i. and ii. of Cat. gén. des MSS. des bibl. publ. de France. Départements (1886-88), and the supplement in tome xliii. (1904). Director: H. Labrosse.

STRASSBURG. a. Bibliothèque Universitaire et Régionale. This library possesses a small collection of early printed musical works, the rarest of which are the Harmonie of Tritonius (Augsburg, 1507) and the Novus partus sive concertationes musicae of Besardus (Augsburg, 1617). Director: Dr. E. Wickersheimer.

b. Library of the Priestster-Seminar. A list of the music, by J. Victori, was published in No. 10 of the Kirchliche Rundschau for 1901, and reprinted as a 'Beilage' to the Monatshefte f. M. for 1902.

c. The Cathedral Library contains over 100 MSS. of church compositions by F. X. Richter, who was maître de chapelle at the cathedral from 1769-80. See the catalogue by F. X. Mathias in the Riemann Festschrift (Leipzig, 1909).

TOURS. The Bibliothèque de la Ville possesses a Sacramentarium of the 9th-10th centuries with neumes; mystery plays of the 12th century; liturgies of the 15th-18th centuries; motets of the 17th century; organ music (including autographs by N. Le Bègue, 1676); a MS. of J. de Muris (15th century), and much else of interest. See A. J. Dorange: Catalogue . . . des manuscrits de la bibliothèque de Tours (1875); Cat. gén. des MSS. des bibl. publ. de France. Départements, tome xxxvii. (1900); and Sammelbände of the I.M.G. for 1905 (p. 356, etc.). Librarian: F. Galabert.

TROYES. The Bibliothèque de la Ville possesses a copy of Praetorius's Syntagma; lute-books; publications of Phalèse (Louvain, 1573, etc.); organ and viol music of the 18th century, etc. See E. Socard: Catalogue de la bibliothèque de la ville de Troyes (1875, etc.), tome xiv. pp. 281-300. Librarian: L. Morel-Payen.

VALENCIENNES. The Bibliothèque Municipale possesses some early MS. treatises, including 9th-century MSS. of Huchald, Isidore of Seville, etc. See Cat. gén. des MSS. des bibl. publ. de France, tome xxv. (1894), and also Coussemaker's work (quoted under Cambrai).

VERSAILLES. Bibliothèque de la Ville. This library is rich in sacred music, dramatic works and books on music, and also contains several interesting MSS. of the 17th and 18th centuries, including the Philidor collection. See Manuscrits musicaux de la bibliothèque de Versailles (1884) and Cat. gén. des MSS. des bibl. publ. de France, tome ix. (1888), and the supplement in tome xliii. (1904). Librarian: C. Hirschauer.

BAMBERG. The Public Library contains some liturgical MSS. with neumes of the 11th-13th centuries, and printed music of the late 17th century. See F. Leitschuh and H. Fischer: Katalog der Handschriften der Kgl. Bibliothek zu Bamberg. 3 vols. (Bamberg, Leipzig, 1887-1912.) Librarian: Dr. M. Müller.

BERLIN. a. The Preussische Staatsbibliothek, founded in 1661, possesses one of the finest musical collections in the world, thanks mainly to the liberality of a long series of donors and to the efforts of its librarians, in particular of S. W. Dehn and his successor F. Espagne. The library acquired its first important accession in 1824 when J. F. Naue's extensive collection of liturgical music was added. Its real nucleus, however, was the magnificent Pöhlchau collection, rich in Bach autographs and copies, and in practical and theoretical works of the 16th and 17th centuries, which was purchased in 1841. Since then the most important acquisitions have been the following: in 1843 Schindler's Beethoven MSS., including a MS. of the Ninth Symphony, an autograph transcript of 'Leonore,' the quartet op. 59, No. 2, and sketches, letters and 136 'conversation-books'; in 1851 Count von Voss-Buch's collection of music from 1680 to 1750, including several Bach MSS.; in 1854 the Bach autographs from the Singakademie; in 1855 Karl von Winterfeld's collection of 103 volumes of old church music in score; in 1859 J. Fischhof's collection which included many Beethoven MSS., and Prof. L. Landsberg's collection of early printed music and treatises and MSS. by later composers, especially Schubert; in 1869 Otto Jahn's Mozart library; in 1873 the whole of the Mozart MSS. still in the possession of André's heirs, some 531 compositions in all; in 1874 the score of Mozart's 'Ascanio in Alba,' the first of a series of gifts from Professor R. Wagener which subsequently included autographs of the 'Wohltemperirtes Clavier' and the French Suites of Bach; in 1877 the Mendelssohn MSS.; in 1878 the Cherubini MSS.; in 1881 Jahn's Weber library; in 1890 the Schumann MSS.; in 1901 the library of the music-publisher Artaria, particularly rich in Beethoven MSS.; in 1904 F. Hauser's Bach library, with the autographs of nineteen cantatas and Nos. 2-6 of the English Suites; in 1908 Ernst von Mendelssohn-Bartholdy's collection which included autograph scores by Beethoven (4th, 5th and 7th symphonies, the Septet and the B \flat Trio), by Mozart ('Die Entführung') and by Haydn (several symphonies). In 1915 Meyerbeer's whole musical library, including autographs of most of his works, was deposited on loan. No catalogue of the music has yet been published. For further particulars see the articles by W. Altmann in the Zeitschrift für Musikwissenschaft for 1919-20, 1920-21, 1923 and 1926. Director: Dr. H. Krüss; Director of the Music Section: Dr. W. Altmann.

b. Staatliche Hochschule für Musik. This institution possesses the musical libraries of Professor Spitta, Bach's biographer, and also contains some rare printed music of the 17th and 18th centuries, and a number of printed scores of French 18th-century operas.

c. The Library of the Joachimsthal Gymnasium received in 1787 the music collected by Princess Amalia of Prussia, and in 1858 190 vols. of musical works from the library of Dr. Spiker (see Meicrott's Nachricht, etc., Berlin, 1788). Amongst the music are autographs and many ancient copies of the works of J. S. Bach. See R. Eitner: Katalog der Musikalien-Sammlung des Joachimsthal'schen Gymnasiums (Monatshefte, Beilage, 1884), and also Thematischer Katalog der von Thulemeier'schen Musikalien-Sammlung in der Bibliothek des Joachimsthal'schen Gymnasiums (by R. Jacobs) (Monatshefte, Beilage, 1898-99).

d. The Library of the Grey Friars (zum Grauen Kloster) contains an important collection of works of the 16th and 17th centuries, in parts, carefully arranged so as to present a view of ancient vocal music. See H. Bellermann: Verzeichniss des grösstentheils von S. Streit dem grauen Kloster geschenkten Musikalien (in the Programme of the Gymnasium for 1856).

e. The Kgl. Hausbibliothek. See G. Thouret: Katalog der Musiksammlung auf der Königlichen Hausbibliothek im Schlosse zu Berlin (Berlin, 1895).

f. The Akademie für Deutsche Schul- und Kirchenmusik, formerly the Kgl. Institut für Kirchenmusik. The library contains a collection of 18th-century MSS.

BONN. a. The University Library contains about 600 vols. of music, chiefly of the 19th century. Amongst the few early works is a copy of the 1517 edition of the Micrologus of Ornithoparcus. Director: E. von Rath.

b. The Beethoven-Haus contains a collection of Beethoven MSS. and of old and modern editions of his works. Since 1920 it has published some of the MSS. in critical editions.

BRANDENBURG. The Church of St. Catherine contains an important collection of partbooks and of vocal music of the 16th, 17th and 18th centuries. See J. F. Täglichbeck: Die musikalischen Schätze der St. Katharinen-Kirche zu Brandenburg a/H (in the Programme of the Brandenburg Gymnasium, Easter, 1857).

BREMEN. About seventy-four musical works belonging to the Stadtbibliothek are in the care of the Bremen Tonkünstler-Verein.

BRESLAU. a-c. See E. Bohn: Bibliographie der Musik-Druckwerke bis 1700, welche in der (a) Stadtbibliothek, (b) der Bibliothek des akademischen Instituts für Kirchenmusik, und (c) der Kgl. u. Universitäts-Bibliothek zu Breslau aufbewahrt sind (Berlin, 1893). Also E. Bohn: Die musikalischen Handschriften des 16. und 17.

Jahrhunderts in der Stadtbibliothek zu Breslau (Breslau, 1890), and E. Kirsch: Die Bibliothek des Musikalischen Instituts bei der Universität Breslau (Berlin, 1922). The Brieg collection (see infra) is now in the University Library of Breslau. Directors: (a) M. Hippe, (b) O. Günther, (c) R. Oehler.

d. The Cathedral Library contains about 1000 musical works, of which sixty are in manuscript. The collection chiefly consists of church music of the 18th and 19th centuries. Director: A. Nowack.

e. The Domstifts-Bibliothek contains a small collection of MSS.

f. The Church of St. Elisabeth contains about 4200 musical works, chiefly church music of the 18th and 19th centuries.

BRIEG. The musical collection formerly in the Kgl. Gymnasium is now preserved in the University Library at Breslau. See F. Kuhn: Beschreibendes Verzeichniss der alten Musikalien . . . des Königlichen Gymnasiums, etc. (Leipzig, 1897. Monatshefte, Beilage.)

CASSEL. a. The Landesbibliothek contains about 340 musical works, printed and MS. Amongst the former are copies of Morley and Weelkes's madrigals. Most of the works date between 1560 and 1620. See C. Israel: Übersichtlicher Katalog der Musikalien der ständischen Landesbibliothek zu Cassel (Cassel, 1881). Director: W. Hopf.

b. The Hoftheater possesses the autograph scores of Spohr's 'Jessonda' and of Marschner's 'Templer und Jüdin' and 'Hans Heiling.'

Nach Handschriften der grossherzoglich. Badischen Hof- und Landesbibliothek*, etc. (Karlsruhe, 1889). Director: Dr. T. Längin.

Königsberg, Prussia. The Staats- und Universitätsbibliothek contains the collection made by Director F. A. Gotthold (died 1858), which is of importance for hymnology, and is rich in vocal music of the 17th century and works by minor composers of the 18th century. The library also possesses a number of MS. and printed volumes from the library of the Archduke Albert (1490–1568), and has in recent years been enriched by a number of accessions from various sources. It now numbers more than 50,000 volumes. See Jos. Müller: Die musikalischen Schätze der Königlichen und Universitäts-Bibliothek zu Königsberg i. Pr., etc. (Bonn, 1870), and an article, with the same title, by J. Müller-Blattau in the Zeit. für Musikwissenschaft, Jan./Feb. 1924. Director: Dr. C. Wenkel.

Leipzig. a. The Town Library possesses a valuable 10th-century MS. treatise by Regius of Prüm, and also a collection of theoretical works and instrumental music of the 17th century, collected by C. F. BECKER (q.v.), the well-known writer. Principal Librarian: Dr. E. Kroker.

b. The University Library possesses a small collection of theoretical works and a number of libretti (from 1662 to about 1836), mostly of performances at Dresden and Hanover. Director: Prof. O. Glauning.

c. The Musikbibliothek Peters. This valuable institution, founded by the firm of C. F. PETERS (q.v.), was opened on Jan. 2, 1894, in which year a catalogue (by the first librarian, Dr. Emil Vogel) was published. Accessions have been noted in the interesting Jahrbücher issued from the Library. The collection is particularly complete in modern practical and theoretical works, musical journals, etc., and is kept up to date by the liberality of the founders. There are also many musical autographs, a number of works of antiquarian interest, and some valuable portraits and prints. A catalogue of the important collection of Bach manuscripts, part of the collection of autographs bequeathed by Ernst Rudorff in 1916, was printed in the Jahrbuch for 1919. Librarian: Dr. Rudolf Schwartz.

LEIGNITZ. The Bibliotheca Rudolfina of the Ritter-Akademie contains an extremely valuable collection of 16th- and 17th-century music. See Dr. E. Pfudel: Mittheilungen über die Bibliotheca Rudolfina der Kgl. Ritter-Akademie zu Liegnitz (printed in the three Easter Programmes of the Ritter-Akademie for 1876-78); and the same author's Die Musik-Handschriften der Kgl. Ritter-Akademie zu Liegnitz (M.f.M., Beilage, 1886).

LÜBECK. The Stadtbibliothek contains valuable early German and Italian printed music. See C. Stiehl: Katalog der Musiksammlung auf der Stadtbibliothek zu Lübeck (Lüb., 1893), and also M.f.M. for 1884. Librarian: Dr. W. Pieth.

LÜNEBURG. The Town Library contains a miscellaneous collection of music, chiefly dating from the 17th to the 19th centuries. There is some important organ music, and also a copy of Book I. of the Parangon des chansons, printed by J. Moderne. See M.f.M., 1873. Librarian: Dr. W. Reinecke.

THORN, PRUSSIA. Gymnasialbibliothek. See the Schulprogramm for 1871.

TORGAV, SAXONY. The Library of the Cantorei (founded in 1864) contains church music of the 18th and 19th centuries.

ULM. The Stadtbibliothek has about 142 volumes of printed music, chiefly vocal works dating from the end of the 16th and early 17th century. Librarian: Prof. Dr. Greiner.

WEIMAR. a. The Landesbibliothek contains the music collected by the Duchess Amalia during her visit with Goethe to Italy, including interesting operas of the Neapolitan school. Also the score of Haydn's opera 'La vera costanza,' the autograph of the finale of Act II. of Gluck's 'Orfeo,' and a valuable 14th-century MS. of Meistersingers' compositions. Director: Prof. Dr. W. Deetjen.

b. The Liszt Museum contains a collection of Liszt's autographs.

WERNIGERODE. In 1923 the Library of Count Stolberg contained 128,757 volumes. The hymnological collection comprises over 5000 volumes. The chief treasure of the Library is the Locheimer Liederbuch (15th-cent. MS.), on which see Chrysander's Jahrbücher (Bd. II., Leipzig, 1867) and the M.f.M. for 1872. See also E. W. Förstemann: Die Gräfllich Stolbergsche Bibliothek zu Wernigerode (Nordhausen, 1866). Librarian: Dr. W. Herse.

WIESBADEN. The Nassauische Landesbibliothek. See M.f.M. for 1888. Director: Prof. E. Liesegang.

WOLFENBÜTTEL. The Landesbibliothek (formerly Herzogliche Bibliothek). See E. Vogel: Die Handschriften nebst den älteren Druckwerken der Musik-Abtheilung der Herzoglichen Bibliothek zu Wolfenbüttel (Abth. 8 of Die Handschriften der Herzoglichen Bibliothek zu Wolfenbüttel, 1890). Librarian: Dr. H. Schneider.

WÜRZBURG. a. The University Library contains liturgical MSS. of the 12th-14th centuries, besides theoretical works (from 1497), and some early operas of the 17th century. Principal Librarian: Dr. F. Segner.

b. The Music School contains MSS. and printed music of the 18th and 19th centuries.

c. The Episcopal Seminary possesses a small collection of printed sacred music of the late 17th and early 18th centuries.

ZITTAU. The Stadtbibliothek has seven missals, dating from 1435, decorated with illuminations of great beauty; ten volumes of MS. sacred music of the 17th century; some editions of Moravian hymnals, and many printed works of A. Hammerschmidt. Librarian: Dr. T. Gärtner.

ZWICKAU. a. The Ratsschulbibliothek, now incorporated in the Stadtbibliothek, is rich in early printed music, particularly in psalters and collections of hymns. There are also a few MSS. In 1904 the Library contained 20,000 vols. and 260 MSS. See R. Vollhardt: Bibliographie der Musik-Werke in der Ratsschulbibliothek. (Leipzig, 1896. M.f.M. Beilage, 1893-96.) Librarian: Dr. Kleinebreil.

b. The Robert Schumann Museum, opened in 1910, contains a collection of autograph and printed music by Schumann and a library of Schumann literature. Director: M. Kreisig.

Great Britain and Ireland

ABERDEEN. The University Library contains about 2500 musical works, mostly acquired by the copyright privileges possessed by the University in the early part of the 19th century. In 1910 the Library acquired the extensive collection of psalm-books brought together by William Lawrence Taylor. A catalogue of this collection was issued in 1921. Librarian: W. D. Simpson.

ASHSTEAD, SURREY. J. F. R. Stainer is the present possessor of the valuable musical library formed by his father, the late Prof. Sir John Stainer. The collection is especially rich in printed song and books. See the Catalogue of English Song-Books forming a portion of the Library of Sir John Stainer, with appendices of Foreign Song-Books, Collections of Carols, Books on Bells, etc. (printed for private circulation, London, 1891).

BOURNEMOUTH. The Public Library contains the collection of orchestral scores and other music formed by Mr. John B. M. Camm, and presented by him to the Borough in 1912. The collection is housed in a large room specially designed as a music library. Consisting originally of about 4000 volumes, it now numbers nearly 5000, and is continually being added to. Librarian: C. Riddle.

BRISTOL. The Baptist College contains the Lea Wilson collection of Bibles, included in which are 258 editions of the Psalms, many of the earlier of which are of great rarity. See Lea Wilson: Bibles, Testaments, Psalms, and other Books of the Holy Scripture in English, in the collection of Lea Wilson, Esq. (London, privately printed, 1845).

CAMBRIDGE. a. Caius College. The Library contains a large MS. volume, dating from the early 16th century, containing masses and motets for five and six voices, by Fayrfax, Ludford, Cornysh, Turgis, Prentes and Pasche. The volume seems to have belonged to Edward Higgyens, Canon of Lincoln and Prebendary of Carleton cum Thirleby, Sept. 3; 27 Hen. VIII. (See Valor ecclesiasticus, temp. Hen. VIII., 1821, p. 19.) Librarian: G. A. S. Schneider.

b. Corpus Christi College. The library contains the unique MS. of Walter de Odington's De speculatione musicis and a 10th-century MS. containing two treatises by Hucbald and the Enchiridion of Odo of Cluny. See the catalogue of the MSS. in the library by Dr. M. R. James (1912). Librarian: Sir G. G. G. Butler.

c. Fitzwilliam Museum. See J. A. Fuller Maitland and A. H. Mann: Catalogue of the Music in the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge (London, 1893). Not included in this catalogue is the Musical Library of the late Richard Pendlebury, fellow of St. John's College, comprising about 2000 modern works, presented to the Museum between 1880 and 1902, and a selection from the Musical Library of the late G. F. Cobb, Bursar of Trinity College, presented by his widow. In recent years the Museum has been enriched by a number of important accessions. Thanks to the generosity of various donors, it now possesses autograph MSS. of Bach (the cantata 'Mache dich, mein Geist, bereit'), Beethoven (musical sketches and a letter), Brahms (the songs op. 63, Nos. 7 and 9, and the vocal duet op. 75, No. 1), Chopin (a letter), Haydn (a song), Mozart (the PF. duet, K. 497), Purcell (a volume consisting chiefly of transcripts of works by other composers), Scarlatti (a nameless opera, dated 1710), Schubert (four songs), Schumann (a letter), Wagner and Weber (letters), S. Wesley ('O sing unto the Lord'), and the 67 volumes of J. C. Smith's MS. copies of Handel's works. There have also been large additions of modern music and books on music. Director: S. C. Cockerell.

d. Magdalene College. The Pepsysian Library contains a few early works on music by Butler, Holder, Morelli, Victorini, Wallis and Alstedius; valuable MS. collections of vocal music of the time of Edward IV., Henry VII. and Henry VIII. (comprising compositions by J. Gwinneth, R. Davis, W. Corbronde, G. Banaster, J. Tuder, Sir William Hawte, Nesbet, Fowler and Garnesey); English, French, Scotch and Latin psalters; compositions by Blome, de Bacilly, Kircher, Merseune, Morley, Salmon, Dering, Merbecke, Coprario, Lawes, King, Purcell and Finger; ballads, songs and other compositions adjusted to the compass of Mr. Pepys's voice, and solos, duets and trios for stringed and wind instruments. A MS. of special importance is the Remède d'Amour of G. de Marchant, containing musical settings of several lyrics. A catalogue by W. Barclay Squire is in the press. Librarian: O. F. Morshead.

anthems, services, masses, motets, etc., both Latin and English, in separate partbooks. The anthems and services are by composers of the early 17th century, and were probably collected when Dr. Cosin was Master of Peterhouse (1634–1660). They are in various handwritings, and contain some autograph compositions by Cambridge organists of the period. The masses and motets (in four partbooks) date from the early part of the 16th century, and contain many rare and valuable compositions of the time of Henry VII. and Henry VIII., including four masses by Fayrfax, a Stabat Mater by Hunt, three masses by Ludford and eleven compositions by Taverner. The collection contains works by upwards of eighty different musicians, as well as many anonymous compositions. There is a catalogue by the Rev. Dr. Jebb, which was printed in vol. xx. of the Ecclesiologist (1859). See also an account of the collection (by R. C. Hope) in the Antiquarian Magazine and Bibliographer (vol. iii., 1883). Librarian: E. C. Francis.

f. Trinity College. The Library contains a small collection of musical works and treatises, including copies of Wilson's Psalterium Carolinum (1657) and Cheerful Ayres (1660); Locke's Present Practice of Music (indicated (1673); Carr's Vinculum societatis (1687); four volumes of Zarlino's works (1589), and early editions of the works of Byrd, Watson, Morley, Playford, Simpson, Bannister, Wilson, Gamble, Lawes, Mace, etc. Among the MSS., which have been catalogued by Dr. M. R. James in his Catalogue of the Western MSS. in the Library of Trinity College, Cambridge (1901–04), the most valuable is a 15th-century roll of English carols, which has been published by J. A. Fuller Maitland and W. S. Rockstro (London, 1891). Other MSS. of interest are the volume of 'Ayres to be sung to ye Lute and Base vyole,' by G. Handford (1609), the medius of some anthems by G. Loosemore (1664), and two 15th-century Greek MSS. which contain some music. Of modern MSS. the Library possesses the autograph scores of Hubert Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens' and his 'Ode to a Solemn Musick,' and the autograph of C. V. Stanford's treatise Musical Composition. Librarian: H. M. Adams.

g. The University Library, besides a considerable collection of printed music, which is continually being augmented in virtue of the privileges enjoyed by the Library under the Copyright Act, contains a few musical MSS., consisting principally of collections of well-known airs, dance-tunes and lessons for the lute, bass viol and recorder, arranged and composed by Bachelor, Dowland, Holborne, Byrd, Tallis, R. and J. Johnson, Alison, Cutting, Pilkington, Reade, Nicolson, Robinson and other composers of the early part of the 17th century. They are written in tablature, and date principally from 1600–40. Besides these there is the tenor part of a 16th-century collection of masses and motets by Fayrfax, Prowett, Davy, Austen, Taverner, Lovell, Pasche and Ashwell. The bass part of this collection is in the library of St. John's College, Cambridge. Amongst the masses in this volume may be mentioned a 'Missa regalis' and a mass, 'God save King Harry.' There is also preserved here a 15th-century mass in two parts, unfortunately wanting one page, and the superius and tenor parts of an anonymous mass of the time of Queen Mary. A collection of lute music (in tablature) by R. Taylor, R. Johnson, J. Daniel and T. Greaves is also of interest. MS. installation odes by Boyce and Walmisley are also in the library, and a collection of exercises for the University musical degrees is being gradually accumulated. Librarian: A. F. Scholfield.

CANTERBURY. The Cathedral Library contains a number of volumes of music and works on music, including an incomplete copy of the contra-tenor cantoris of Barnard's Church Music (1641). Librarian: Canon A. J. Mason.

CHATSWORTH, DERBYSHIRE. The Library of the Duke of Devonshire, though not very rich in music, contains a few works of interest. The chief rarities are a volume of altus parts of works printed by Petrucci, comprising the masses of P. de la Rue (Venice, 1503), A. Agricola (Venice, 1504), A. de Fevin (Fossombrone, 1515), J. Mouton's Book I. (Fossombrone, 1515), and Josquin's Book I. (Fossombrone, 1516); there are also a few theoretical works; copies of 'The Maske of Flowers' (1613) and Coprario's 'Funeral Teares' (1606); Campian and Coprario's 'Songs of Mourning' (1613), and a number of single partbooks of English and Italian madrigals, among which are a bassus part of E. Bonzononi's Primo libro delle canzoni a quattro voci (Venice, 1569), and a canto part of the Lieti amanti of 1586. Librarian: F. W. Thompson.

CARDIFF. F. J. Arnold possesses an extensive collection of chamber music of the 17th and 18th centuries; with a number of contemporary treatises on the art of accompanying from a THEOROUGH-BASS (q.v.).

CHESTER. The Cathedral Library contains a good collection of modern church music.

DUBLIN. a. Royal Irish Academy of Music. This Society possesses a good library of scores and orchestral parts of the works of the great composers. It also includes the Library of the long defunct 'Antient Concerts.' Secretary: C. E. Grahame-Harvey.

b. The Library of Christ Church Cathedral contains valuable MS. copies of anthems and services by Purcell, Child, Battishill and others, which are said to differ greatly from those printed in England during the last seventy years.

c. Trinity College. Besides a miscellaneous collection of modern music received under the Copyright Act, the Library contains a few liturgical MSS. and some 16th-18th century music, among which is Thomas Tallis's Lute Book (1583). See T. K. Abbott, Catalogue of the MSS. in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin (Dublin, 1900). Librarian: Dr. J. G. Smyly.

d. Archbishop Marsh's Library. This library contains a good deal of printed and MS. music, chiefly of the late 16th and 17th centuries. The partbooks include a complete set of Adson's 'Courtly Masquing Ayres' (1621); the C.T.B. and quintus of Prima stella de madrigali . . . di O. Lasso, di G. Nascho, di Zanetto, di Palestrina, etc. (Venice, 1570); nine partbooks of 'Gratulationes Marianae' (Antwerp, Phalèse, 1636); twelve partbooks of the Masses of G. Messaus (Antwerp, 1633); eight partbooks of the 'Primitiae Marianae' of J. Willems (Antwerp, 1639); five partbooks of Viadana's First Book of Masses (Antwerp, 1625); and many other partbooks, chiefly by English and Italian composers. The MSS. consist largely of instrumental fantasias, lute pieces, etc., by B. Rogers, R. Dering, S. Ives, T. Giles, G. Jeffreys, J. Coprario, T. Lupo, W. Cranford, Tomkins, R. Mico, Jenkins, Brewer, J. Ward, Lawes, A. Ferabosco, O. and R. Gibbons, C. Coleman, R. Nicolson and other English and Italian composers of the 17th century. Librarian: Rev. N. J. D. White.

e. The National Library. The most important musical works in this library are contained in the collection (upwards of 23,500 volumes) formed by Dr. Jasper Joly, and presented by him to the Library. The musical portion of this collection consists principally of 18th-century works, comprising Irish and Scottish song-books with a number of collections of country dances, some of great rarity. In all there are 683 volumes, 175 of Irish music, 176 of Scottish, 84 of English, 17 of Welsh, and 231 of a miscellaneous character. This latter class includes rare works by Campian, Playford, Durfey, etc., early ballad operas, and sheet-songs of the 18th century. In addition to the Joly Collection there are three others—the Banks, Omeath and Hamilton gifts—comprising about 120 large volumes. Librarian: Dr. R. T. Best.

DUNDEE. The Free Library contains a valuable collection of works relating to Scottish music, formed by A. J. Wighton (1802-66), and bequeathed by him to the Library. The number of volumes is 421. The collection contains many very rare books, besides most of the musical works printed in Scotland down to the early 19th century, as well as several scarce English and Irish musical books. Various letters addressed to Wighton by French, German and British composers and music publishers are also preserved in the collection. In the Music section of the Reference Library there is a comprehensive series of volumes illustrating the folk-songs of all the nations of Europe. A Lending Library of music has recently been formed. Chief Librarian: A. H. Millar.

DURHAM. The Cathedral Library contains a few books of glees and catches of the early 18th century, and an interesting collection of old MS. partbooks, containing anthems and services formerly used in the cathedral. These MSS. were carefully collated and indexed by the late organist, Professor Armes. They consist of four sets of books, all unfortunately imperfect. The old set contains about forty full and fifty verse anthems by Tallis, White, Parsons, Hooper, Morley, Weelkes, Byrd, Batten, Giles, Tomkins, East, Gibbons, etc. The second set is rich in anthems and services for men's voices only. The third consists of eight out of ten magnificent folio volumes containing Preces and Psalms for special days by Byrd, Gibbons, William and Edward Smith; and services by Shepherd, Parsons, Batten and others. The fourth set consists of organ parts of practically all the anthems and services used in the cathedral from Tallis to Purcell. Other works of note are: D. Petersen's 'Spelstucken' (Amsterdam, 1683), the 8th edition of 'Apollo's Banquet' (1701), John Eccles's 'Theater Musick' (2 books, published by Walsh; i. undated, ii. 1699, with a frontispiece showing a scene at the Theatre Royal; iii. 1700), many works by J. Schenck, published at Amsterdam, and the 'Collection of New Ayres for 2 Bass Viols' by Wm. Gorton, organist of Greenwich (Young, London, 1701). Honorary Librarian: J. Meade Falkner.

EDINBURGH. a. The University Music Library has been formed by bequests and donations from the Reid Fund, from General Reid, Professor John Thomson, and M. T. Bucher and others. It was largely added to by the late professor of music (F. Niecks) and his predecessors (Donaldson and Sir H. S. Oakeley). It is well supplied with modern full scores and standard editions, besides works on theory, and also contains some valuable old printed music, such as the Musica getutsch (1511) of Virdung; Praetorius's Syntagma; Morley's Introduction (1597); Heyden's Ars canendi (1537); Cerone's Melopeo (1613); the five volumes of Lasso's Patrocinium musices (1573-79), etc. Among the MSS. are a collection of oratorios by Hasse, and a Kyrie and Gloria in forty-eight real parts by G. Balabene. There is also a fine collection of musical instruments and acoustical apparatus. The Library is in charge of the professor of music, D. F. Tovey.

b. The Advocates' Library, which forms the main part of the newly established National Library of Scotland, receives, under the Copyright Act, copies of all music published in Great Britain. The Library contains some works of special interest to the students of Scottish music, but its chief musical treasures are the Skene MS. (see DAUNEY and SCOTTISH NATIONAL MUSIC), and the important MS. known as the Scone 'Antiphonarium,' or more accurately as the Carver MS. The latter dates from the first half of the 16th century and contains 12 masses, 6 settings of the Magnificat and about 30 motets composed by Robert CARVER (q.v.), Canon of Scone, some of the compositions being in as many as nineteen parts. Keeper: W. K. Dickson.

c. Library of the Society of Writers to the Signet. The Catalogue, with two Supplements, appeared in three parts, 1871-91. The last volume contains a subject-index, in which music occupies a column and a half, chiefly consisting of theoretical and historical works, with a small collection of Scottish airs, etc. Principal Librarian: J. Minto.

d. The Public Library, in addition to a good general collection of music and books on music, contains the collection formed by the late Robert A. Marr. This consists of 481 volumes, comprising chiefly 18th-century music and musical literature, and a few MSS. The latter include three Antiphoners, a Gradual, the autograph score of Sir M. Costa's 'Eli,' and an autograph MS. of a mass by Luigi Rossi. Chief Librarian: E. A. Savage.

e. A very interesting collection of works illustrating the national music of Scotland was formed, during many years of collecting, by John GLEN (q.v.). The collection contains, with the exception of a very few of the rarest works, everything relating to Scottish music that has been printed down to the early 19th century, besides a few MSS. and some collections of English Country Dances and rare English and Irish books. For a detailed list of a great portion of the Library, see J. Glen's Early Scottish Melodies (1900). The collection is now the property of Lady Dorothea Ruggles-Brise, who intends to present it to the newly formed National Library of Scotland.

ELY. The Cathedral Library contains a valuable collection of MSS., principally of English church music, thanks chiefly to the pious care and industry of James Hawkins, its organist from 1682-1739. It consists of 36 volumes—21 of anthems, services and chants in score, 11 of voice parts, and 4 of organ parts. The number of compositions is over 580, and includes some of large dimensions, as Handel's Utrecht Te Deum and Jubilate for voices and orchestra, and a composition inspired by the same occasion by Croft. See W. E. Dickson: A Catalogue of Ancient Choral Services and Anthems, preserved among the Manuscript scores and Partbooks in the Cathedral Church of Ely (Cambridge, 1861).

ETON. The College Library possesses a very fine and valuable MS. of English sacred music of the 16th century. See W. B. Squire: On an Early Sixteenth Century Manuscript of English Music in the Library of Eton College (Archæologia, vol. lvi., London, 1898).

GLASGOW. a. The Euing Library. This Library, containing over 5000 volumes, was collected by the late W. Euing, of Glasgow. In 1866 he founded a musical lectureship in Anderson's University, Glasgow, now merged in the Royal Technical College, which is affiliated to the University. He bequeathed the whole of his musical library to the University for the use of the lecturer and students. It is a large and valuable collection, particularly rich in treatises and histories of music. The anonymous catalogue, which was prepared and printed in accordance with Euing's will, is unfortunately altogether inadequate, and displays the grossest ignorance. Now that the Library is better housed and more accessible, it is hoped that a new catalogue will be printed. Amongst the ancient music in this collection the following works may be mentioned: early editions of Byrd's 'Psalms,' etc.; the Corale Constantini (1550-57); Faber's Melodice Prudentianæ (1533); 3 volumes of Frescobaldi's works; Nicolas de la Grotte's 'Chansons' (1575); 47 volumes of Praetorius's works (1607-18); 9 volumes of G. de Wert's works (1583-89); and a valuable and extensive collection of English psalters and hymn-books, including the 'Gesangbuch' of the Picard Brethren (1538), referred to in Burney's History, iii. 31. See Catalogue of the Musical Library of the late Wm. Euing (Glasgow, 1878) and the select list by A. Hubens, published in R.M.J., 1916. Librarian: W. R. Cunningham.

b. The Stillie Musical Library in Glasgow University was collected and bequeathed to the University by Thomas L. Stillie, a well-known musical critic, who died at Glasgow in 1883. It contains 760 volumes, including many full scores and modern operatic works.

c. The Mitchell (Public) Library contains the collection of music and musical literature, some 1700 items in all, formed by the late Robert Turnbull, for many years music critic of the Glasgow Herald. City Librarian: S. A. Pitt.

GLOUCESTER. The Cathedral Library possesses several old choir-books containing unpublished anthems by Rogers, Tye, Wise, Blackwell, Turner, Pickhaver, Henstridge, Davies, Jefferies, Portman, Parsons, etc., unfortunately wanting several of the parts; a complete full service (in F), and two anthems in MS. by Fortunato Santini; a full MS. score of Boyce's anthem 'Blessed is he that considereth'; a few leaves of illuminated MS. music, and some printed and MS. church music of the 17th century.

GREAT WARLEY, ESSEX. Miss Willmott has an interesting musical library containing many rare MSS. and printed works. Among the former are two sets of partbooks of Italian church music of the early 17th century—one formerly in the Altempi Library—containing many compositions by Palestrina and his school; finely bound volumes of French 18th-century chansons; cantatas by Scarlatti; an autograph of J. S. Bach and a collection of autographs—chiefly of the 19th century. The printed books comprise several complete sets and odd partbooks of English madrigalists of the late 16th and early 17th centuries. Miss Willmott also owns many interesting musical instruments, among which are three clavichords, two harpsichords, two spinets, etc.

HEREFORD. The Cathedral Library contains a few old organ books and other volumes for the use of the choir, and a copy of Kircher's Musurgia (1650).

LEEDS. a. Central Public Free Library. A fairly extensive collection of scores was bought some years ago, and in recent years the Committee has greatly extended the musical portion of the Library. A large quantity of theoretical and historical books has been acquired, considerable purchases being made at the sale of the Taphouse collection (July 1905), and the Library is now one of the most useful in Yorkshire for musical students. A printed catalogue of the music was issued in 1902, but since then much has been added to the collection. Librarian: T. W. Hand.

b. The late Frank Kidson¹ possessed a fairly large library formed to show the development of British vocal and dance music. Besides a mass of 17th- and 18th-century English publications, it was especially representative in Scottish, Welsh and Irish early collections; also in country-dance books and ballad operas. There was also a considerable number of song-books (words only) and of 18th-century tune-books of sacred music.

LICHFIELD. There are 189 volumes of printed and MS. music belonging to the Cathedral. The MSS. include a volume of Croft's anthems and Te Deum (in D) with orchestral accompaniments; two volumes of Blow's anthems; two volumes of anthems by Purcell, Blow, etc.; and a large collection of partbooks. The chief treasure of the printed works is seven parts (three counter-tenors, two tenors and two basses) of Barnard's Church Music (1641).

LIVERPOOL. The Public Library contains a good general selection of musical works, including a number of 18th-century song-books. The music is incorporated in the general catalogue. Chief Librarian: G. T. Shaw.

LONDON. a. British Museum. The musical portion of the library of the British Museum belongs partly to the department of Printed Books, and partly to that of MSS. The foundation of both collections consists in the musical works in the old Royal Library, which was presented by George II., and to this were added a number of treatises presented in 1778 by Sir John Hawkins; the musical library of Dr. Burney, which was bequeathed by its owner to the Museum, and transferred to Bloomsbury on his death in 1814, and the collection of Dragonetti, consisting of 182 volumes of scores of classical operas which became the property of the Museum by bequest on his death in 1846. In 1863 a notable purchase was made of duplicates from the Berlin Library, consisting mainly of old German and Italian madrigals, and church music, valued at about £1000. The collection was increased in 1886 by the acquisition from M. Koekx, of Antwerp, of a large number of works printed by the Phalènes at Louvain and Antwerp. Many of these volumes were exhibited at the Brussels Exhibition of 1880, and described in section D of the catalogue. At the dispersal of the Borghese Library in 1892, the British Museum, the Paris Conservatoire and the Academy of St. Cecilia at Rome were the three principal purchasers; a list of the works acquired for the Museum will be found in the Jahrbuch of the Musikbibliothek Peters for 1896. At the second sale of the Heredia collection in 1892, the British Museum acquired several very rare Spanish treatises and musical works. Besides these important accessions, old music has been steadily bought by the Trustees since the middle of the 19th century, and many valuable works have been received by presentation or bequest, so that from an antiquarian point of view the collection is now fully worthy the national position of the institution. The Catalogue of Printed Music published between 1487 and 1800 now in the British Museum, by W. Barclay Squire (2 vols., 1912), covers the greater part of the older music, but does not include purely liturgical works, which are to be found in the general catalogue of the library. Since its compilation, moreover, approximately 1000 additional titles have been prepared for inclusion in a supplementary volume. Particulars of some of the most important recent accessions may be found in an article in Mus. T., Oct. 1924. The great bulk of the collection, however, consists of music deposited at the museum in accordance with the provisions of the Copyright Act. The disposal of this enormous body of printed matter has been greatly facilitated by the recent adoption of a system by which the great mass of unimportant music which the Museum receives and is bound to preserve is not catalogued, bound and placed in the ordinary way, but is simply arranged in alphabetically ordered bundles, grouped according to the period of issue. Any work of this character that is required can thus be readily found, and the cost of the system is only a fraction of what the ordinary methods of treatment would entail. Until 1884 the catalogue of the printed music remained in manuscript. In 1858 it filled twenty-two volumes; at present it occupies 314 volumes, partly manuscript and partly printed. Since 1884 all the accessions have been printed and issued in separate volumes, the titles in which are afterwards incorporated in the old MS. catalogue. The printed volumes of accessions of modern music issued up to date are as follows: 1884 (452 pp.), 1886 (154 pp.), 1888 (712 pp.), 1889 (197 pp.), 1891 (948 pp.), 1894 (610 pp.), 1895 (292 pp.), 1896 (287 pp.), 1897 (539 pp.), 1898 (372 pp.), 1900 (572 pp.), 1902 (585 pp.), 1903 (537 pp.), 1904 (545 pp.), 1906 (518 pp.), 1908 (580 pp.), 1909 (616 pp.), 1910 (539 pp.), 1912 (547 pp.), 1913 (578 pp.), 1914 (391 pp.), 1915 (161 pp.), 1916 (473 pp.), 1921, 1922 (745 pp.), 1924 (433 pp.), 1925 (2 pts., 233 pp. and 169 pp.), 1926 (2 pts., 229 pp. and 172 pp.). Before the outbreak of the war a start was made with the revision of the larger headings of the catalogue, with a view to the preparation of special and comprehensive lists of the works of individual composers, but the work has been delayed. Besides modern works acquired by copyright, a considerable amount of foreign music is bought every year, special attention being paid to the acquisition of full scores and other works beyond the means of the ordinary musical student. Considerable additions of Russian music and of miniature scores of the works of modern composers have recently been made. The most valuable musical accessions are mentioned in the yearly British Museum Returns to Parliament.

The collection of musical MSS., including ancient service-books and treatises, but excluding Oriental MSS., amounts to about 3000 volumes. The following are among the most noteworthy items: A large volume of autograph music by Purcell; a volume known as Thomas Mulliner's book, containing airs and chants for the virginals, by Tallis and others, and including the earliest known copy of Richard Edwards's madrigal 'In going to my naked bed'; services and anthems of the Church of England down to Queen Anne's reign, collected by Dr. Tudway, 1715-20, in six volumes, containing works by Aldrich, Blow, Gibbons, Humfrey, Purcell, Tudway, etc.; an autograph of Part 2 of Bach's 'Wohltemperirtes Clavier'; two or three volumes of autograph pieces by Handel, some leaves of which supply the place of leaves wanting in the autograph of 'Admetus' in the Royal Music Library; also the thirty-seven volumes of transcripts of Handel's music, mainly in the hand of J. C. Smith, formerly in the possession of Mr. Bernard Granville of Calwich Abbey; the original MSS. of ten string quartets by Mozart, including the sets dedicated respectively to Haydn and to the King of Prussia; several volumes of rough drafts by Beethoven, in which the first ideas of themes of some of his great works were jotted down; eleven volumes of autograph musical extracts, chiefly vocal, made by Dr. Burney for his History of Music; twenty-eight volumes of MS. motets, masses, madrigals, duets, etc., by Italian and English composers, copied by Henry Needler from the libraries at Oxford, and bequeathed in 1782; John Barnard's first book of Selected Church Music, a manuscript copy scored by John Bishop of Cheltenham, from the various part-books; many interesting collections of Italian and early English (16th and 17th centuries) songs, having both words and music; autograph compositions by Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Weber, Wagner, Liszt, Gounod, etc.; collections for a dictionary of music, etc., by Dr. J. W. Callcott; musical compositions and works on music by R. L. Pearsall; thirty-nine operas or musical dramas by Sir Henry R. Bishop, in autograph score; forty volumes of scores of Balfe's operas, presented by his widow; and a large collection of Dibdin's songs and operas. There is also a good deal of lute music in tablature. Among the more important manuscripts acquired by purchase from time to time are numerous operas in contemporary transcripts—many, if not most, probably unpublished in score—especially by Rossini, Meyerbeer, Donizetti, Paisiello, Hasse, Winter, Ricci and Mercadante; and church music, chiefly Italian, in 18th-century copies, comprising compositions by Palestrina, the Scarlattis, Durante, Leo, Bai, Clari, Perez, Pergolesi and others. See the Catalogue of Manuscript Music in the British Museum, by A. Hughes-Hughes, 3 vols., 1906-1909. For the Royal Music Library and the collections of the Royal Philharmonic Society deposited at the British Museum see below. Director: Sir Frederick G. Kenyon, K.C.B.

b. Victoria and Albert Museum. The Science and Art Libraries contain useful collections of works on music and musical instruments, besides some printed editions of German operas of small value, and the autograph MSS. of Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer' and Bishop's 'Legends of the Rhine.' The musical works formerly belonging to John Ella were transferred to the Royal College of Music some years ago. The Museum contains a fine collection of old instruments, many of which are of remarkable beauty. Director: Eric Maclagan.

c. Royal Academy of Music. The Library of this institution, of which there is a MS. Catalogue by Henry Davey, contains many interesting and valuable works, amongst which may be mentioned a collection of English glees (in sixteen volumes) by Atterbury, Callcott, Danby, etc., and MS. operas by Leonardo Leo Gasparini, Bononcini, Porpora and others, which were presented to the R.A.M., together with the whole of his valuable musical library, by R. J. Stevens. From the same source came the MS. full score of Purcell's 'Fairy Queen,' partly in the composer's autograph—the only known complete copy of the work (printed by the PURCELL SOCIETY, 1904); copies of the treatises of Morley and Bevin, three copies of Mace's Musick's Monument, copies of Tallis and Byrd's 'Cantiones' (1575), Yonge's 'Musica Transalpina' (1588), Byrd's 'Songs of Sundrie Natures' (1589), Hilton's 'Ayres' (1627) and Lawes's Psalms (1648). The modern MSS. in the Library include the autograph score of Sullivan's 'Mikado.' There is also a collection of the works of Sebastian Bach, being the library of the defunct Bach Society; a large number of Liszt's works (presented by Miss Constance Bache), and a collection of modern orchestral scores (presented by the publishers, Messrs. Novello). In 1903, the Angelina Goetz Library was founded in memory of Mrs. Goetz by her children; this consists of a valuable collection of full scores, and includes many modern operatic works, etc., rarely found in either public or private libraries. Principal: Dr. J. B. McEwen.

d. Royal College of Music. In addition to an extensive working library, the Royal College possesses the most extensive purely musical library in the United Kingdom. The basis of this collection is the fine library of the old Sacred Harmonic Society, which was acquired for the R.C.M. in 1883 for the sum of £3000, £2000 being contributed by Sir Augustus Adderley and the rest by fifteen subscribers. The Sacred Harmonic collection is catalogued in W. H. Husk's Catalogue of the Library of the Sacred Harmonic Society. A new Edition, revised and augmented (London, 1872), with a Supplement published in 1882. With the exception of No. 1826 in this catalogue (the manuscript score of Mendelssohn's 'Elijah,' which, according to the original terms of its gift to the society, was returned to Mrs. Bartholomew), the whole library, together with the original bookcases, is arranged in a large room specially fitted up for the purpose, extending the whole length of the college buildings. But this collection has been so largely increased by other donations and bequests that it now constitutes less than one-half of the R.C.M. Library. Among the most important accessions the following may be mentioned: the library of the Concerts of Ancient Musick, formerly preserved at Buckingham Palace and presented by Queen Victoria, comprising a very large collection of MS. scores and parts, chiefly of 18th and early 19th century music, and including many volumes of autographs of Bishop, interesting autographs of Croft, an opera by Keiser, and early copies of Handel; the large musical library of Sir George Grove, including autographs by Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Schubert (unfinished symphony in E), and especially rich in musical literature; the collections of Mr. J. W. Windsor (of Bath) and his family, among which are an autograph string quartet (in C) by Haydn and some fine prints of musicians; several hundred bound volumes of music collected by Mr. S. W. Wesley; several hundred volumes of duplicates from the Musical Library of the British Museum; a large collection of chamber music formerly belonging to Franz Ries; over 300 volumes of printed and MS. music (formerly belonging to John Ella, and including 20 MS. volumes of operas by D. Perez) transferred from the Victoria and Albert Museum; the full scores of 'The Golden Legend' and 'The Yeomen of the Guard' (bequeathed by Sir Arthur Sullivan); autographs of H. H. Pierson, A. W. Bach, C. Neate, Benedict (symphony in F), Pearsall and Monk; the full score (MS.) of 'Love in a Village'; MSS. of Mozart, Michael Haydn, Purcell, Durante, Hammerschmidt, Anfossi, Paisiello, Saratelli and many others; a collection of autographs and other MSS. of A. Goring Thomas; over 100 volumes from the library of the late E. Dannreuther; many autographs of S. Wesley, C. Wesley and S. S. Wesley (bequeathed by the last-named's last surviving son); and much printed music and musical literature of all kinds. This immense accumulation of music has naturally resulted in there being a good many duplicates. A sale of a portion of these took place a few years ago, and the proceeds have been devoted to binding, the acquisition of new works, etc. A catalogue of the printed music was published in 1909; the MSS. (over 4000 in number) have been catalogued, as well as the greater part of the large collection of general literature: both these catalogues are at present in manuscript. On the death of Sir Hubert Parry, as a practical memorial to him, a small fund was raised, by which the central bay of the Library was fitted up as a Reading Room for the use of the students. To this 'Parry Room' many contributions of books were given, while volumes from the old collection were moved there for purposes of general reference. A set of the Bach Society's volumes was given by Dr. Emily Daymond, and a special case was set aside for Parry's own compositions and many of his autographs—the latter lent by his executors. Current periodicals are available here, and new books are added from time to time. Though not a public library, access is generally granted on application (during term time) to the director. Besides the MSS. and printed books the library contains many interesting instruments, presented or bequeathed by the late Duke of Saxe-Coburg, Sourindro Mohun Tagore, Mrs. Day, Dr. Turpin, Mr. Hipkins and others. There is also a small collection of paintings, drawings and prints; the former include portraits of Bononcini (by Hogarth) (see PLATE X.), Corelli (by Howard), Attwood (see PLATE II.), Weber (by Cawse) (see PLATE LXXI.), Joachim (by Bendemann), Salomon (by Dance), Hullah (by Bower), M. A. Paton (by T. Sully), E. Paton (by E. T. Crawford), Dibdin, and several portraits of S. S. Wesley (see PLATE X(II.)). There are also busts of Mendelssohn, Thalberg (see PLATE LXXXI.), Mario, Grisi and other musicians. The Donaldson Collection of Old Instruments is preserved in a separate museum (see COLLECTIONS OF MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS). Director: Prof. Sir Hugh P. Allen.

e. Trinity College of Music. The Bridge Memorial Library, opened in 1924 in honour of the late Sir Frederick Bridge, consists at present of some 3000 volumes. There are some old copies, in score, of works by Piccinni, Sacchini, Grétry, Cimarosa, Monsigny, etc.; a fine copy of the second edition of 'Orpheus Britannicus,' and two short pieces for pianoforte in the autograph of W. Sterndale Bennett. Secretary: C. N. H. Rodwell.

f. Gresham College. The College possesses a small collection of printed and MS. music (see the Catalogue of Books and Music in the Library of Gresham College, London, 1872), mostly of the 18th and early 19th centuries, including the MS. and printed glees formerly belonging to the Conventores Society (1798-1805). The rarest works are 8 masses by Henri Fremart (Paris, 1642-45): MSS. by S. Bolio, G. B. Borghi, C. Burney, T. Carapella, G. B. Casali, Cordicelli, Durante; 'fancies' by Locke, Jenkins and W. Young; masses, etc., by G. Fideli, Galuppi, Paisiello, Pergolesi, and a score of Jommelli's 'Don Trastullo.'

g. The Madrigal Society. This Society possesses a valuable collection of more than 300 madrigals, anthems, etc., comprising works by more than 100 composers, principally of the English and Italian schools. The greater part of the collection consists of MS. copies of the 18th century, but there are some early printed partbooks and some MSS. of the 17th century, including some interesting instrumental fancies by English composers of the time of James I. and Charles I. The Library is at present deposited at the Royal College of Music.

h. The Royal Philharmonic Society. This Library, which dates from the formation of the Society in 1813, has now been deposited on loan at the British Museum. It contains all the parts of the principal works of the classical composers necessary for an orchestra, and many full scores and MSS. of unique interest. Amongst the autographs may be mentioned two of Haydn's grand Symphonies; Beethoven's dedication to the Society of his Ninth Symphony; a MS. symphony by Cherubini; Mendelssohn's Symphony in C ('No. XIII,' known as 'No. I.'), dedicated to the Society; also 'Melusina,' the 'Trumpet Overture,' and the original setting of the scena 'Infelice,' with violin obbligato—all three with notes or alterations by himself; also original scores by Cipriani Potter, Ries, Clementi, Spohr and other composers.

i. Westminster Abbey. The Chapter Library contains a collection of music (chiefly in MS.) by Italian and English composers of the 17th and 18th centuries, and a number of madrigals, both English and Italian, of the late 16th and 17th centuries. See W. B. Squire: Musik-Katalog der Bibliothek der Westminster-Abtei in London (M.f.M., Beilage, 1903). Librarian: Rev. L. H. Nixon.

j. Lambeth Palace. The Archiepiscopal Library contains many fine Psalters, Missals and Breviaries, both printed and MS.; a good collection of early editions of psalms and hymn-books; MS. treatises collected by W. Chelle; a MS. volume of English, French and Italian songs with lute accompaniment (written in tablature), containing compositions by Charles and Edward Coleman, Alphonso Marsh, Matthew Locke and John Gulgrum, and an explanation of the tablature; a MS. volume of harpsichord music (dances and airs) by R. Ayleward and others; a copy of Tye's 'Acts of the Apostles'; and a MS. volume containing the bass part of services and anthems by Tallis, Parsons, Byrd, Tomkins, Gibbons, Munday, Portman, Stogers, Morley, and many anonymous compositions. See W. H. Frere: Bibliotheca musico-literaria, vol. i. (fasc. 1, 1901). Librarian: A. B. Robinson.

k. The Royal Music Library, which is the private property of His Majesty, since 1911 has been deposited on permanent loan in a special room at the British Museum. It consists principally of the collection formerly at Buckingham Palace, to which has been added a large amount of music from Windsor Castle. In the main the library was formed by George III., but it was largely increased by George IV., whose music (formerly at Carlton House) is here; important additions of printed music were also made by Queen Victoria and the Prince Consort. The library is chiefly renowned for its priceless Handel manuscripts (see HANDEL, subsection BIBLIOGRAPHY). But besides these the collection is remarkable for its many fine bindings and rare manuscripts and printed works. Amongst the chief treasures are a splendid volume of autograph MSS. by Purcell; a valuable volume of English 16th-century music written by John Baldwin of Windsor, the Virginal Books of B. Cosyn and W. Forster; a curious volume of puzzle canons by Dr. John Bull; a collection of puzzle canons, in from two to twenty parts, by Elway Bevin, in the composer's own handwriting; a fine copy of the second edition of Monteverdi's 'Orfeo'; a MS. volume of 'Aires and Phantasies' by Coprario, which formerly belonged to Charles I.; an original copy of Mendelssohn's 'Oedipus in Colonus,' sent by the composer to the Prince Consort for the production of the work at Buckingham Palace; curious masques by Schmied; a copy of 'Parthenia'; a valuable and extensive collection of Steffani's music, including a set of his operas, bound for the use of the opera at Hanover; many full scores of operas by Lully, Mozart, Christian Bach, Graun, etc.; autograph symphonies by A. Scarlatti; musical compositions by King George IV.; and a very fine collection of madrigals, most of which were formerly in the possession of Sir John Hawkins. Catalogues of the whole collection by Barclay Squire, late Hon. Curator, are in preparation and will eventually be printed. That of the Printed Music and Musical Literature is finished (in manuscript). A catalogue of the Handel MSS. is in the press.

L. Richard Northcott possesses a collection of some 2000 books relating to the Opera and to operatic singers and composers. The two most interesting items are Vice-Chamberlain Coko's papers (see Proceedings of the Musical Association, Jan. 1914), and the volume, with Della Bella illustrations, of the festivities arranged for the marriage at Florence in 1637 of the Grand Duke of Tuscany and the Princess Vittoria of Urbino. Mr. Northcott has also a fine collection of unpublished autograph letters of composers, e.g. of Balfe, Berlioz, Bishop, Bizet, Brahms, M. Costa, Donizetti, Flotow, Gounod, Massenet, Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Offenbach, Puccini, Rossini, Saint-Saëns, Sullivan, Verdi and Wagner; and a collection of programmes, portraits of artists, and libretti relating to opera performances in London, particularly at Covent Garden, of which theatre he is the archivist. These papers form the basis of the recently established Royal Opera Museum.

MANCHESTER. a. Public Library. In 1899 Dr. Henry Watson of Salford transferred the ownership of his Musical Library to the Manchester Free Libraries Committee, with the stipulation that the collection should remain in his custody and under his control during his lifetime, access to the books being granted to students on application to the chief librarian. Dr. Watson died in 1911, and the library is now housed in Portland Street. The library consisted originally of some 16,700 volumes, but now numbers about 40,000. It is extremely valuable for general purposes of reference, and also contains many rare works, among which may be mentioned a MS. Antiphoner of the 14th century, sets of English madrigals by Byrd, Farmer, East, Lichfield, Ward, Pilkington, Tomkins, etc., and many printed treatises of the 16th and 17th centuries. See the Manchester Public Free Libraries Quarterly Record for 1899. A series of 'music lists' has been issued as a guide to the collection, and a brief catalogue of the rarer books and MSS. was printed in connexion with an exhibition held at the Town Hall, Manchester, in 1905. Librarian: J. F. Russell.

b. Chetham Library. Here is preserved a collection of nearly 4000 proclamations, broadsides, ballads and poems, accumulated by and presented to the Library by the late J. O. Halliwell-Philippus. Amongst these will be found the music of many old popular songs ranging through the 16th, 17th and 18th centuries; songs, catches, odes, etc., by Purcell, Eccles, Leveridge, Courteville, Croft, Carey, Weldon and Pepusch, and a large collection of single sheet songs with music, published between 1680 and 1740. Many of the songs in this collection were introduced into operas for special occasions, and are therefore not to be found in the printed editions. There is a privately printed catalogue of this collection prepared by Halliwell-Philippus. Librarian: C. T. E. Phillips.

c. John Rylands Library. This library possesses a certain number of items of musical interest. There are several liturgical MSS. which serve to illustrate the development of notation from the 9th to the 15th century, the most important of which are: the 'Trier Psalter' (9th cent.); 'Cantica ecclesiastica pro dominicis et festis, cum notis musicis' (10th cent.); the 'Sarum Missal' (first half of the 13th cent.); and the 'Colonna Missal' (1517). The collection of early printed books also includes many of the famous Missals, and items such as Merbecke's 'Booke of Common Praier noted and described' (1550), Sternhold and Hopkins's Psalter (1562) and theoretical works by Gaforius. In the collection of Chinese drawings and paintings there is an interesting volume containing about forty coloured drawings of musical instruments, two of which show the arrangement of an orchestra of 32 instruments. Librarian: H. Guppy.

NEWBURY, BERKS. G. E. P. Arkwright has a collection of musical works containing a few manuscripts and many rare books. Among the former are a 12th-century gradual (with neumes) in vellum, and a set of motets for three voices by Steffani. The printed books include Victoria's Masses (Rome, 1583, folio); several partbooks of Italian sacred music of the 17th century; Bevin's Briefve Introduction (1631), and other theoretical works; Coprario's 'Funeral Teares' (1606) and 'Songs of Mourning' (1613); Danyel's 'Songs for the Lute' (1606); Gibbons's 'Madrigals' (1612); 'The Lamentations of Jeremie with apt Notes' (London, J. Wolfe, 1587); Pilkington's 'First Book of Songs' (1605); Ward's 'Madrigals' (1613); and Weelkes's 'Ayres or Phantasticke Spirites' (1608) and 'Balletts and Madrigals' (1608).

OSCOTT, St. Mary's College. The Library contains a collection of masses, sequences, offertories, psalms, hymns, responses, etc., in seven volumes, by Palestrina; masses by Alfieri, and unpublished MSS. by Guglielmi, Alfieri, Morales, Zingarelli, Marotti, Festa, Rovalli, Casciolini, Bolloffi, Fioravanti and Borroni.

OXFORD. a. Bodleian Library. In 1759 and 1769 music began to be received by the Bodleian Library from Stationers' Hall. It was allowed to accumulate until, in the 19th century, it was arranged and bound up in some 400 vols. The cataloguing began in 1882, and since then all accessions, with the exception of certain of the less important works received under the Copyright Act, have been catalogued. Some 3000 or 4000 musical works are received yearly under the Copyright Laws; classified hand-lists of all the music are available for reference. In 1801 a large collection of both MS. and printed music was bequeathed by the Rev. O. Wright. It consists of 209 bound volumes, and includes compositions by Ariosti, Blow, Boyce, Caldara, Clarke, Croft, East, Ford, O. and C. Gibbons, Greene, Lotti, Morley, Purcell, Rogers, Scarlatti, Taylor, etc., besides numerous works by W. and F. Hayes. Much of this collection is autograph. Among musical MSS. acquired from other sources are five partbooks, dated 1585, of motets by Byrd, Tye, Taverner, Fayrfax, Tallis and others. A large number of MSS. also contain mediæval music, mostly liturgical. Among these are a Winchester Troper (date 979 or 980), a Winchester Proser (date after 984), and an 11th-century Winchester Sequentiary (MS. Bodl. 775); the (10th- and) 11th-century Leofric Missal; the 11th-century Heidenheim Troper and Sequentiary, and Novalesa Troper and Proser; MS. Ashmole, 1285, containing (f. 235v.) a Norman-French song, apparently written in England about 1185; MS. Rawlinson G. 22, containing (f. lv.) an English song of about 1225; MS. Selden B. 26, containing a collection of secular and sacred songs written about 1450; and MS. Canonici misc. 213, a collection of 15th-century Belgian, French and Italian songs by Dufay, Binchois, Hugh and Arnold de Lantins, and others; 18 French and Italian songs; 61 sonatas (a 4) by Corelli, Matteis, Ruggiero, Purcell, etc. In the Bodleian is also now deposited the library of the Music School, containing about 880 volumes of manuscripts, among which are six partbooks containing 18 masses by Taverner, Burton, Merbecke, Fayrfax, Raser, Aston, Ashwell, Norman, Sheperde, Tye and Alwood; three Edwardine cathedral partbooks, perhaps in John Taverner's autograph; a collection of In Nomines, in four and five parts, by Byrd, Ferrabosco, Bull, Taverner, Tye, Tallis, etc.; motets by Felice Sances, etc.; motets with instrumental accompaniments by Rosenmüller, Schelling and Knüpfer; sonatas, symphonies, etc., by Corelli and others; 235 pieces from Lully's operas; Henri de Gallot's 'Pièces de guitare' (1680-84); two fine folio volumes containing fantasias, music to masques, etc., by William and Henry Lawes; fantasias in six parts by J. Jenkins, Cooper, Lupo, T. Tomkins, Byrd, etc.; John Jenkins's 'Fancies and Ayres,' and fantasias for two trebles, two basses and organ; pavans, galliards, corantos, dated 1654, by Coleman, Lawes, John Taylor, etc.; about 179 instrumental pieces a 4 by Benj. Rogers; Sylvanus Taylor's Ayres for two trebles and a bass; vocal and instrumental parts of Dryden's 'Secular Masque'; 9 instrumental pieces by C. Gibbons; songs by Purcell, Blow, W. Child, etc.; the 'Oxford Act Music' (or commemoration music) by Blow, Goodson, etc.; Chris. Simpson's 'Months and Seasons' for two basses and a treble (1668), and his 'little Consort'; complete set of Occasional Odes by Boyce for the King's birthday and New Year (1755-79), etc. A good MS. catalogue of the Music School collection was compiled in 1854. Exercises submitted for Oxford musical degrees, from about 1710 onwards, are also deposited in the Bodleian Library. These and the other musical MSS. in the Library (including those of the Music School) are included in the printed Summary Catalogue of the Western MSS. in the Bodleian Library, vols. iv. and v. See also Stainer's Dufay and his Contemporaries (1898), Stainer and Nicholson's Early Bodleian Music (1901, 1913), and Frero's Bibliotheca musico-liturgica (vol. i. fasc. 1), in which are also noticed some early musical treatises in the libraries of Balliol and St. John's Colleges. Librarian: Dr. A. E. Cowley.

b. Oxford University Music Students' Library. In addition to the music in the Bodleian Library there is at Oxford a collection of music designed particularly for use as a working and lending library by persons reading music at the University. This collection of about 4000 vols. consists of the so-called Music Students' Library, the Mee bequest, and the library of the late Captain F. B. Ellis, of Christ Church. The library, which contains most standard works and is rich in modern full scores, is open in the mornings during term. It is housed temporarily in the Clarendon Buildings. Librarian: Dr. T. Wood.

c. Christ Church. The Library of this college contains a very large and valuable collection of early English and foreign music, chiefly bequeathed to the college by Dean Aldrich and Mr. Goodson, but since then increased by many additions. The printed works comprise compositions by more than 180 different composers, while the MSS. contain 1075 anonymous pieces, and 2417 pieces by known composers, of whom 182 are English, 80 Italian, and 14 composers of other nations. This estimate does not include the many separate movements of operas, services, etc., and the Fancies for instruments, which if enumerated would amount to nearly 5000. Amongst the MSS. here are 30 anthems by Dr. Aldrich; 23 anthems, 7 motets, 4 services and a masque ('Venus and Adonis') by Dr. Blow; 29 anthems, 43 motets, 19 madrigals, etc., and a very curious piece of programme music ('Mr. Bird's Battle') by W. Byrd; 18 motets by R. Dering; 20 anthems and 21 madrigals and canzonets by T. Ford; 24 anthems by Orlando Gibbons; 21 anthems by John Goldwin; 33 motets by M. Jeffrey; 21 canzonets by J. Jenkins; 17 motets by W. Mundy; 15 dramatic works by Henry Purcell; 39 motets by J. Shepperde; 17 motets by John Taverner; 10 madrigals by J. Warde; 25 motets by R. Whyte; 47 motets and 45 cantatas by Carissimi; 15 cantatas by Cesti; 67 motets by Gratiani; 27 cantatas by Micheli; 30 motets by Palestrina; 112 cantatas by Luigi Rossi; 12 cantatas, a serenata, 2 dramas, and an opera by A. Scarlatti; and the following anonymous compositions: 239 motets, 162 cantatas, etc., to English words, and 408 cantatas, etc., to Italian words. In 1918 the Library acquired the set of 10 volumes of Barnard's Church Music formerly in the possession of the Cathedral Library at Hereford. See the catalogues of the MSS., by G. E. P. Arkwright (vol. i., 1915; vol. ii., 1923—a third volume is in preparation), and of the printed music prior to 1801, by A. Hiff (1919).

d. St. John's College. The Library of this college possesses two MS. bass partbooks, date between 1625–32. Both books bear the autograph of William Juxon and contain important works not found elsewhere, notably Tallis's five-part service. The conjecture that they were written by Tomkins and East is founded on an error.

RIPON. In the Minster Library is preserved an interesting volume of theological tracts by Gerson and others, on blank leaves of which are written two 16th-century ballads for three voices. The first is entitled 'A ballet of y^e deth of y^e Cardinall' (i.e. Wolsey), and the second, 'A lytyll ballet mayde of y^e yong dukes gece' (i.e. Henry Fitzroy, Duke of Richmond and Somerset, a natural son of Henry VIII., who died in 1536). The words of these ballads are printed in the Yorkshire Archaeological and Topographical Journal, ii. 396. The library also contains some rare liturgical printed books, particularly a York Manuale (W. de Worde) of 1509, and a York Missal (Rouen) of 1517.

ROCHESTER. The Music Library of the Cathedral consists of 478 volumes, 84 of which are in MS., and contain anthems and services (some of which are unpublished) by the following composers: Hopkins, Henstridge, Loch, Wootton, Hine, Turner, Elvey, Child, Dupuis, Lambert, Fussell, Mason, Walmisley, Russell Rogers, Marsh and Pratt.

SEVENOAKS. Newman Flower possesses a Handel Library which includes some transcripts of Handel's works made by John Christopher Smith (from the Aylesford Collection), and a number of early printed editions, the most important of which is an issue of the 'Songs in Messiah,' apparently earlier than any previously recorded. The collection also includes some transcripts of works by other 18th-century composers. See the Catalogue of a Handel Collection formed by Newman Flower (Sevenoaks, 1921).

SHENLEY, HERTS. Edward Speyer has a valuable collection of musical autographs, many of which are of great interest and rarity. The following are the chief musicians represented: Albrechtsberger, Auber, C. P. E. Bach, J. S. Bach (cantata, 'Wo Gott der Herr'); Beethoven (several letters, sketches, and proof-sheets); Bellini, Berlioz, Boccherini, Boieldieu, Brahms (vocal quartets, op. 112, Nos. 1 and 2, and many letters); Bülow, Burney, Cherubini, Chopin, Clementi, Dalayrac, Donizetti, Elgar, Farinelli, Gluck (score of aria from 'Issipile'); Grétry, Handel, Josef and Michael Haydn, Joachim, Liszt, Martini, Méhul, Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Monteverdi, Mozart and his family, Neefe, Paër, Paganini, Philidor, Piccini, Rousseau, Sacchini, Salieri, Schubert, Schumann, Schütz, Spohr, Spontini, R. Strauss, Thalberg, A. Thomas, Verdi, Wagner and Weber.

SHERBORNE. The school Library contains a few rare musical printed works, including complete sets of both parts of the 'Selectissimae Cantiones' (Nuremberg, 1587) and 'Lectiones Hiob' (Nuremberg, 1588) of Lasso; the 'Balletti' of Gastoldi (Antwerp, 1601); 'Paradiso musicale' (Antwerp, 1596); and the five-part madrigals of Marenzio (Antwerp, 1593).

STAMFORD. The Library of the Marquess of Exeter at Burghley House, near Stamford, contains a small collection of MS. music, chiefly operas, church music and cantatas by 18th-century composers, amongst whom may be mentioned Astorga, P. Auletta, Clari, Durante, Giaji, Hasse, Pazzaglia, Pergolesi and Vinci.

STONYHURST. This college possesses the original MS. of de Vico's responses for Holy Week, MS. music by Cartoni, and a few litanies, motets, sequences, etc., by Palestrina.

TENBURY. St. Michael's College possesses the Library of the late Rev. Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley, containing nearly 4000 volumes, and is by far the most important private music library in the United Kingdom. The printed books include a large number of very scarce treatises, and among other great rarities are the four works of Cafori and Case's The praise of Musicke (1586); there is also a good collection of partbooks of English and Italian madrigals. But the chief importance of this library rests upon the manuscripts. The most valuable of these are the numerous sets of partbooks dating about the year 1600 and containing the text of sacred and secular music of the polyphonic school. The works both of continental and English composers are to be found in these books, and they supply the only known text of certain pieces by Taverner, Whyte, Byrd and other Tudor musicians. Perhaps the most notable manuscript in this library belonging to this period is the famous organ-book in the hand of Adrian BATTEN (q.v.) containing a vast store of early English church music. (See Tudor Church Music, vol. ii. xxvi.) The school of Purcell is richly represented in this library by contemporary MSS., and some of the works of Purcell and Blow have survived nowhere else. In this collection are autographs of Blow, Purcell, Croft and Jeremiah Clarke. The later periods of English music are also well represented, and include autographs of Boyce, Burney, Charles Wesley, Crotch, S. Arnold and many more modern composers.

Perhaps the most famous MS. in this library is Handel's 'conductor's' score of 'Messiah' used by the composer at the first performance in Dublin in 1742. Certain numbers and some pencil notes are in Handel's autograph. This MS. is one of the four recognised sources of the text of the oratorio. It is fully described by Chrysander in vol. xxiv. of the German Handel Society Edition, and all the autograph portions may be seen in Chrysander's facsimile reproduction of 'Messiah.'

One further feature of this library is the remarkably large collection of printed and MS. scores of operatic works ranging from the 17th to the 19th century. Among these are a very fine set of scores in the hand of Philidor ainé, which together with vocal and instrumental partbooks (numbering over 200 vols.) once formed part of the Royal Music Library of the French kings. The scores are in especially good condition and the covers are stamped with the coat of arms of the Bourbons. These scores include operas, ballets and motets by Lully, Campra, Colasse and others of the same school. Also in Philidor's hand is a fine set of service books from the French Chapel Royal.

The library has recently been entirely rearranged and catalogued by the present librarian, Rev. Dr. E. H. Fellowes.

WARE, HERTS. St. Edmund's College, Old Hall. The Library contains a valuable English manuscript of the 15th century, containing sacred music by English composers of the period, including two numbers ascribed to King Henry VI. For a full account and thematic catalogue, see Sammelbände of the Int. Mus. Ges. ii. (1900-01), pp. 342-92, 719-22. Librarian: Rev. J. O'Brien.

WELLS. The Cathedral Library contains some fragmentary parts of a vocal composition or compositions by Fayrfax.

WIGAN. The Free Public Library contains a good collection of works on music, mostly English publications of the 19th century, as well as a few pianoforte scores of operas, etc. See Folkard (H. T.): Music and Musicians. A list of Books and Pamphlets relating to the History, Biography, Theory, and Practice of Music, preserved in the . . . Wigan Free Public Library (Wigan, 1903). Librarian: A. G. Hawkes.

WIMBORNE MINSTER. Among the books preserved in the famous 'chain-library' in the Minster are five 17th-century partbooks, an alto, two tenors and two basses. They provide texts of no inconsiderable value as regards Byrd's short service and other English church music.

WINDSOR. a. The Royal Library at Windsor Castle. Most of the music from this library has now been removed to form part of the Royal Music Library (see above under London) now housed at the British Museum. The most important item that remains is the autograph score of Mozart's cantata 'Die Schuldigkeit des ersten Gebotes.'

b. St. George's Chapel. The Chapter Library contains a few 17th-century MS. partbooks; some of these are in the hand of William Child and include several of his services, besides anthems by Tallis and other Tudor composers. Here also are two of the partbooks (and one duplicate) of Tomkins's Musica Deo sacra (1668).

WORCESTER. The Cathedral Library possesses a fine Sarum Missal, a Benedictine Antiphoner of the 13th century, now in process of facsimile reproduction in Paléographie musicale, the primus contratenor, bassus, decani, secundus contratenor and tenor cantoris of Barnard's Church Music, a valuable tenor part-book containing Byrd's Great Service, and, above all, a quantity of fly-leaves of harmonised music, mostly dating from about 1275 to about 1325, which have been recovered from old bindings. Parts of the same collection exist at the Bodleian, at the British Museum, and at Magdalen College, Oxford, and the whole provides the most considerable body of material for the history of English composition during this period that is at present available, containing as it does about thirty complete and eighty incomplete items. See Cathedral Quarterly, Dec. 1916; Proceedings of the Musical Association for 1924, Music and Letters, Apr. 1925, and the article MORTER. Librarian: Canon J. E. H. Blake.

YORK. The Minster Library contains 258 musical works, both printed and MS., besides a large quantity of anthems and services. Amongst the MSS. the following works may be mentioned: a collection of duets, glees, etc., by Aldrich, Wise, Blow, etc.; an installation ode by Hague; Te Deums by Haydn, Neukomm, Schicht, and Weber; 'The Nativity,' an oratorio by Homilius; a mass by Naumann; 'The Intercession,' an oratorio by King; a set of three-part Fancies by Jenkins; a very important set of eight choir-books (formerly belonging to W. Gostling), containing the voice parts complete of a large number of anthems and services of the 17th century. There is also a considerable collection of printed musical works of the 17th century.

AMSTERDAM. a. Vereeniging voor Noord-Nederlands Muziekgeschiedenis. (Maatschappij tot bevordering der Toonkunst.) See Catalogus van de bibliotheken der Maatschappij tot bevordering der Toonkunst en der Vereeniging van Noord-Nederlands Muziekgeschiedenis (Amsterdam, 1884). Lists also appeared in the Society's two first Bouwsteenen, afterwards continued as the Tijdschrift of the Society.

b. The late J. W. Enschedé possessed an extensive musical Library particularly rich in books on church music, with special reference to the history of the organ.

THE HAGUE. a. The Royal Library (Koninklijke Bibliotheek) contains about 1100 volumes of musical interest, which have been catalogued in the Catalogue van schoone kunsten en kunstnijverheid ('s Gravenhage, 1905). Director: P. C. Molhuysen.

b. D. F. Scheurleer possesses a very fine and extensive musical Library, of which he has published an admirable catalogue, containing facsimiles of title-pages, etc. See Catalogue der Muziekbibliotheek van D. F. Scheurleer (Deel i. and ii., 's Gravenhage, 1893, Verfolg, 1903; 2de Verfolg, 1910), and Muziekhistorisch Museum van Dr. D. F. Scheurleer. Catalogus van de muziekwerken en de boeken over muziek (3 vols., 's Gravenhage, 1923-25).

LEYDEN. a. The St. Pieterskerk possesses six choir-books containing compositions of the 16th century. They are described at length in the third of the Bouwsteenen of the Vereeniging voor Noord-Nederlands Muziekgeschiedenis, p. 37, etc.

b. The University Library contains liturgical manuscripts of the 10th, 11th and 15th centuries; a collection of Souterliedekens and some chamber music of the 18th century. See the third of the Bouwsteenen, p. 111, etc. Director: Dr. F. C. Wieder.

c. The Bibliotheek Thysius contains a volume of 17th-century lute music that is of the very greatest importance, partly on account of its size—there are over 1000 pages of music—partly on account of the variety of styles and of composers represented. The MS. has been described at length by G. P. Land in the Tijdschrift of the Vereeniging voor Noord-Nederlands Muziekgeschiedenis, Deel 1-3, 1885-91.

UTRECHT. The University Library possesses valuable liturgical manuscripts of the 12th-15th centuries, among which a 14th-century collection of sequences is especially noteworthy. See Catalogus codicum manuscriptorum bibliothecae Universitatis Rheno-Trajectinae (2 vols., Utrecht, 1887, 1909). Librarian: Dr. A. Hulshof.

Italy

In 1909 the Associazione dei Musicologi Italiani began the issue of a Bulletin, which consists of a valuable series of catalogues of the musical libraries of Italy (referred to below as Boll. Ass. Mus. It.). The following cities have at present been dealt with, either in whole or in part: Assisi, Bologna, Ferrara, Florence, Milan, Modena, Naples, Parma, Rome, Venice, Vicenza. See also Le Biblioteche governative italiane nel MDCCCXCVIII (Rome, 1900).

AREZZO. The Biblioteca Comunale contains some liturgical manuscripts of the 11th, 12th and 15th centuries.

ASSISI. Biblioteca Comunale. See the catalogue by the librarian, F. Pennacchi (Boll. Ass. Mus. It., 1921).

BERGAMO. The Biblioteca Civica possesses some works printed by Petrucci; madrigals of the 16th and 17th centuries; manuscript vocal and instrumental music of the 18th century, and eleven volumes of youthful autograph compositions by Donizetti. Most of the music preserved here formerly belonged to J. S. Mayr. Librarian: A. Mazzi.

BOLOGNA. a. Liceo Musicale. This magnificent Library was founded in 1798 and opened in 1805. It contains the collections of Padre Martini, S. Mattei and G. Gaspari, and is one of the finest and most valuable musical libraries in existence. The musical instruments formerly here are now in the Museo Civico. See the elaborate published Catalogue, vol. i. (1890) and vol. ii. (1892), by G. Gaspari and F. Parisini; vol. iii. (1893), by G. Gaspari and L. Torchi; vol. iv. (1905), by R. Cadolini; and F. Vatielli's La Biblioteca del Liceo Musicale di Bologna (Bologna, 1917). Librarian: F. Vatielli.

b. R. Biblioteca Universitaria. The music here is only manuscript, but it includes a missal of the 11th century, a valuable collection of sacred vocal music of the 15th century (see Vierteljahrsschrift für Musikwissenschaft for 1885), two operas by Scarlatti, and some sacred music of the early 17th century. Director: C. Frati.

c. R. Accademia Filarmonica. This Library contains a small collection of printed and MS. music, chiefly of the 17th and 18th centuries, including the various compositions submitted for the Academy's Diploma. See the catalogue by A. Bonora (Boll. Ass. Mus. It., 1910-13). There is also a collection of MSS., chiefly autograph letters, presented by Dr. M. Masseangeli, of which a catalogue was issued in 1881. Librarian: A. Bonora.

d. San Petronio. The church archives contain some vocal sacred music (both printed and manuscript) of the 16th century. See Dr. L. Frati: Notizie storiche sugli scrittori e miniatori dei libri corali della chiesa di S. Petronio, etc. (in the Rivista delle Biblioteche, Ann. vi. p. 169, etc.), and the catalogue by A. Bonora (Boll. Ass. Mus. It., 1913).

e. Raimondo Ambrosini possesses a Library of works relating to Bologna, which includes a small collection of musical works of the 17th and 18th centuries, for the most part printed at Bologna. See the catalogue in the Boll. Ass. Mus. It., 1913.

CESENA. Biblioteca Malatestiana (now Comunale). This celebrated Library possesses some old manuscript treatises. See J. M. Muccioli, Catalogus codicum manuscriptorum Malatestinae Caesenatis bibliothecae, etc. (Cesena, 1780-84), and Zazzeri, Sui codici e libri a stampa della biblioteca Malatestiana di Cesena (Cesena, 1887). Director: M. T. Dazzi.

CESTONA. The Biblioteca Comunale possesses some liturgical manuscripts, including an Antiphoner of the 12th century.

CIVIDALE. The Biblioteca Capitolare possesses some liturgical manuscripts (in neumes) of the 11th century, and some valuable mystery plays of the 14th century. See Coussemaker: Les Dramas liturgiques (Rennes, 1860). Director: Prof. Dr. R. della Torre.

CORTONA. See G. Mancini: I manoscritti della libreria del Comune e dell' Accademia Etrusca di Cortona (1884). Director: W. Mancini.

CRESPANO. For the contents of the Canal Library see Bibliotheca musicale del Prof. P. Canal in Crespano Veneto (Bassano, 1885).

FABRIANO. The Biblioteca Comunale contains a small collection of Italian madrigals, etc., printed between 1565 and 1611. They are not included in Vogel's bibliography. See the catalogue by Dr. E. Filippini in Ann. v. of the Rivista delle biblioteche, p. 168, etc.

FERRARA. Biblioteca Comunale. The music here chiefly consists of printed vocal works by Italian composers of the 16th, 17th and early 18th centuries. See the catalogue in the Boll. Ass. Mus. It., 1917. Librarian: Prof. G. Agnelli.

FLORENCE. a. Biblioteca Nazionale Centrale (since 1861 combined with the Magliabechiana and Palatina). The musical collections here are very important. The manuscripts include theoretical works of the 12th and 15th centuries, Laudi of the 14th century, and sacred and secular music from the 15th to the 18th centuries. The printed music is also very important, and includes early operas of the 17th century, and many works printed by Marescotti. Among the autographs, Vincenzo Galilei is especially well represented. See F. Possi: Catalogus codicum saeculo XV. impressorum qui in publica bibliotheca Magliabechiana Florentiae adservantur, etc. (Florence, 1793-95); F. Palermo: I manoscritti Palatini di Firenze ordinati ed esposti (Florence, 1853-68); A. Bartoli: I manoscritti italiani della Biblioteca Nazionale di Firenze . . . Sezione prima. Codici Magliabechiani (Florence, tomo 1, 1879; tomo 2, 1881; tomo 3, 1883; tomo 4, 1885); I codici Panciatichiani. I manoscritti della Biblioteca Nazionale . . . Sezione Palatina (Rome, 1887, vol. vii. of the Indici e cataloghi published by the Minister of Public Instruction); Illustrazioni di alcuni cimeli concernanti l' arte musicale in Firenze (Florence, 1892); Monatshefte f. Musikgeschichte for 1872. Director: A. Bruchii.

b. Biblioteca Mediceo-Laurenziana. The liturgical manuscripts here are important, and include an Antiphoner of the 11th century. A precious collection of 13th-century music is described (with extensive excerpts) in vol. i. of the Oxford History of Music. The library also contains a portion of the Ashburnham manuscripts, among which are liturgies from the 10th to the 15th century, Greek hymnologia of the 12th and 14th centuries, treatises of the 14th and 15th centuries, etc. See C. Paoli, I codici Ashburnhamiani della R. Biblioteca Mediceo-Laurenziana, vol. i. (Rome, 1887-97; vol. viii. of the Indici e cataloghi published by the Minister of Public Instruction); and Illustrazioni di alcuni cimeli concernanti l' arte musicale in Firenze (Florence, 1892).

c. Biblioteca Riccardiana. This Library possesses some treatises and printed and manuscript music of the 16th and 17th centuries, including a German organ-book (in tablature) of the early 17th century. See Catalogus codicum manuscriptorum qui in bibliotheca Riccardiana Florentiae adservantur (Lughorn, 1756), and R. Mompurgo: I manoscritti della R. Biblioteca Riccardiana, vol. i. (Rome, 1893-1900, vol. xv. of the Indici e cataloghi of the Minister of Public Instruction).

d. R. Istituto Musicale. This Library possesses the collections of the late A. Basevi, containing valuable theoretical and practical works of the 15th-17th centuries. The Tuscan Court Library, rich in 18th- and early 19th-century operas, is also preserved here. See Burbure: Étude sur un manuscrit du 16^e siècle (Brussels, 1882) and Illustrazioni di alcuni cimeli concernanti l' arte musicale in Firenze (Florence, 1892), and R. Gandolfi: Biblioteca del R. Istituto Musicale di Firenze (Florence, 1901). A catalogue was published in the Boll. Ass. Mus. It. in 1910-11. Librarian: A. Bonaventura.

e. Biblioteca Marucelliana. Here are a few musical works printed in the early 16th century (described in Vogel's Bibliography, vol. ii.). Librarian: Dr. G. Tamburini.

GENOA. The R. Biblioteca Universitaria possesses a few printed works and some MS. lute-books, the most important of which is described by A. Neri in vol. vii. of the Giornale storico della letteratura italiana. Librarian: P. Nurra.

LEGHORN. The Biblioteca Comunale Labronica possesses a collection of libretti printed between 1706 and 1782.

LORETO. See G. Tebaldini: L'archivio musicale della Capella lauretana. Catalogo storico-critico (Loreto, 1922).

LUCCA. a. The Biblioteca dei Canonici contains liturgical MSS. (in neumes) of the 11th and 14th centuries, and choir-books of the 15th century.

b. The Biblioteca Comunale contains a few printed music-books of the 16th century and a MS. lute-book of the same period. For the latter see the Giornale storico della letteratura italiana, vol. viii. p. 312. Librarian: E. Roselli.

MILAN. a. The Biblioteca Ambrosiana contains liturgical MSS. of the 10th-13th centuries; printed works (mostly sacred) by Italian composers of the late 16th and early 17th centuries, and autographs of Gaforius, C. de Rore, Zarlino, etc. See the catalogue, not yet completed, by G. Cesari (Boll. Ass. Mus. It., 1910-11). Prefect: Dr. G. Galbiati.

b. The Biblioteca del R. Conservatorio contains a very large musical library, to which additions are being constantly made by the deposit of copyright copies. The library is strong in printed vocal sacred music of the 16th century, and also possesses autographs of Durante, Leo, Paisiello, Zingarelli, Donizetti, Bellini, Generali and Rossini. In 1889 the collection of G. A. Noseda was deposited here: it contains 700 autographs, 300 masses, 200 orchestral scores of operas, etc. See E. de' Guarinoni: Indice generale dell' Archivio Musicale Noseda . . . con . . . alcuni cenni intorno . . . alla biblioteca del R. Conservatorio di Musica di Milano (Milan, 1897). Librarian: G. Cesari.

c. Biblioteca Nazionale Braidense. This Library contains valuable liturgical MSS. of the 12th-16th centuries, and also some printed theoretical works and lute-books in tablature. See F. Carta: Codici corali e libri a stampa miniati della Biblioteca Nazionale di Milano, Catalogo descrittivo (Rome, 1891. vol. xiii. of the Indici e cataloghi issued by the Minister of Public Instruction). Chief Librarian: Count T. Gnoli.

d. The Archivio del Duomo contains a valuable collection of sacred music, comprising MSS. of the 15th-18th centuries, and a few rare printed works of the 16th and 17th centuries. See Elenco dei maestri di musica le cui composizioni si conservano nell' archivio musicale della cappella del duomo di Milano (Appendix iii. a to vol. ii. of Annali della fabbrica del duomo di Milano, 1877-85).

MODENA. Biblioteca Estense. The musical collections here, both MS. and printed, are important. The former contain valuable compositions of the 15th century, in which Dunstable and his English and foreign contemporaries and immediate successors are unusually well represented. There is a very rich collection of MSS. by Stradella and many 18th-century oratorios, operas, etc. For the printed works, which are almost entirely Italian and French, dating from the 16th to the 18th centuries, see V. Finzi: Bibliografia delle stampe musicali della R. Biblioteca Estense (Rivista delle biblioteche, ann. iii., iv. and v., containing careful descriptions of 321 works, with a good index). The Stradella collection is described by A. Catelani: Delle opere di A. Stradella esistenti nell' archivio musicale della R. Biblioteca Palatina di Modena. Elenco con prefazione e note (Modena, 1866). A catalogue of the whole library, by P. Lodi, has now been published (Boll. Ass. Mus. It., 1916-24). Director: D. Fava.

MONTE CASSINO. Besides liturgical MSS. and treatises of the 11th-16th centuries, the Abbey Library contains a large collection of Neapolitan music in MS. (bequeathed by Maestro Rignano), including operas by A. Scarlatti, Leo, Vinci, etc., and the autograph of Pergolesi's 'Stabat Mater.' A Martyrology of the 14th century (formerly in the Cistercian monastery of SS. Vincent and Anastasius at Rome) is bound up with a valuable collection of 15th- and early 16th-century compositions for one to four voices, containing works by Bernardus, Cornago, Dufay, Okeghem, Oriola, Gaforius, Loyset Compère, Damianus, etc. The words are Latin, French, Italian and Spanish. Director: D. G. Piccinino.

MONZA. The Biblioteca Capitolare contains some valuable liturgical MSS. of the 10th-14th centuries.

NAPLES. a. The Biblioteca Nazionale possesses some liturgical MSS. of the 12th and 13th centuries, and a little printed vocal music of the 16th and 17th centuries. Superintendent: Dr. G. Burgada.

b. The library of some 40,000 volumes illustrative of theatrical and operatic history collected by Count Lucchesi Palli was made over by him to the town of Naples some years ago, and is now administered as an independent section of the Biblioteca Nazionale. Librarian: S. di Giacomo.

c. Real Conservatorio di Musica (Conservatorio S. Pietro a Majella). The Library is important for its collection of MS. Italian music (especially of the Neapolitan school) of the 18th and early 19th centuries. The printed works date from 1550–1728, and include some rare sets of madrigals printed at Naples. There is also a good collection of libretti. Some account of the contents of the library will be found in F. Florimo's La scuola musicale di Napoli e i duoi Conservatorii (3 vols., Naples, 1882). See also Indici di tutti i libri e spartiti di musica che si conservano nell' archivio del Real Conservatorio della Pietà de' Turchini (Naples, 1801). Director: F. Cilèa.

d. The Oratory of St. Philip Neri possesses an important collection of church music, chiefly of the 16th and 17th centuries. See the catalogue by S. di Giacomo (Boll. Ass. Mus. It., 1918).

NOVARA. The archives of the Cathedral contain some sacred vocal music, mostly of the latter part of the 17th century.

PADUA. a. Biblioteca Nazionale. This Library, which is incorporated in the Museo Civico, contains a few printed musical works of the 16th and 17th centuries. Librarian: O. Ronchi.

b. The Biblioteca Universitaria contains MS. French and Italian songs (for one and two voices) of the 15th century; MS. music in organ tablature by Hasler, Erbach, Sweelinck, etc., and a little printed vocal music of the 16th and 17th centuries. Librarian: F. Ageno.

c. The Library of the Episcopal Seminary possesses a small collection of theories and other music of the 16th and 17th centuries. Librarian: T. Lancrotto.

d. S. Antonio. The archives of the Cappella Antoniana contain some rare printed music and several autographs of Tartini. See G. Tebaldini: L' archivio musicale della Cappella Antoniana in Padova. Illustrazione storico-critica (Padua, 1895).

PARMA. R. Istituto Musicale. The musical works formerly in the Biblioteca Palatina of Lucca are preserved here and form what is known as the R. Biblioteca Palatina di Parma (Sezione Musicale). Some of the earlier printed works are described by Prof. G. Maruffi in the Rivista delle biblioteche (anno iv. p. 7), and the whole collection has now been catalogued in the Boll. Ass. Mus. It., 1909–12. This catalogue also includes works from other libraries in Parma. Director: G. Gasperini.

PERUGIA. The Biblioteca Capitolare contains some liturgical MSS., including an Antiphoner of the 11th century.

PESARO. Biblioteca Oliveriana. A 16th-century MS. (songs and lute music) in this Library is described by A. Saviotti in vol. xiv. (1889) of the Giornale storico della letteratura italiana. Director: Prof. L. Castaldini.

PISA. The University Library contains a few theoretical works and a copy of Bucchianti's 'Arie, scherzi e madrigali' (Venice, 1627). Director: U. Otensi.

ROME. a. Vatican Library. The music in this library chiefly consists of liturgical and theoretical works. The former—both printed and MS.—are especially valuable, and there are many MS. treatises from the 10th to the 15th century. A collection of French Troubadour songs (13th and 14th centuries) and a manuscript (in the Urbino collection) containing vocal compositions of the 15th century (Dunstable, Binchois, Ciconia, etc.) may also be mentioned, but the contents of the library are still but imperfectly known. A complete catalogue of the MSS. under the title Bibliotheca Apostolica Vaticana codicibus manuscriptis recensita began to appear in 1885 and is still in progress. See also H. Ehrensberger: Libri liturgici bibliothecae Apostolicae Vaticanae manuscripti (Freiburg, Breisgau, 1897); H. Stevenson: Inventario dei libri stampati Palatino-Vaticani (Rome, vol. i. 1886–89; vol. ii. 1886–91); and G. B. de Rossi: La biblioteca della Sede Apostolica ed i catalogi dei suoi manoscritti (Rome, 1884). Prefect: G. Mercati.

b. Barberini Library. This collection is now transferred to the Vatican. It contains some liturgical MSS. of the 12th to the 15th centuries, and valuable printed musical works of the early 17th century.

c. Archives of the Sistine Choir. For the valuable MSS. preserved here, see F. X. Haberl: Bibliographischer und thematischer Musikalkatalog des päpstlichen Kapellarchivs im Vatikan (Leipzig, 1888. Beilage to the M.f.M.).

d. Archives of St. Peter's. The music here includes an Antiphoner of the 14th century, and some important collections of vocal compositions of the latter part of the 15th and beginning of the 16th centuries. See Vierteljahrsschrift für Musikwissenschaft for 1885 and 1887, and J. Wolf: Die Musikbibliothek der Cappella Giulia in Rom (Kirchenmusikalisches Jahrbuch, 1908).

e. Lateran Choir. The Archives contain MS. and printed sacred music of the 16th and 17th centuries.

f. Santa Maria Maggiore. This church possesses some graduals of the 16th century.

g. Biblioteca Casanatense (S. Maria sopra Minerva). The musical collections of Baini are preserved here. The library contains liturgies of the 11th–14th centuries; MS. treatises by Ugolino of Orvieto, etc.; a volume of three-part compositions by Okeghem and his contemporaries, and MS. works by Scarlatti and Hasse. The collection is rich in printed works—practical and theoretical—of the 16th and 17th centuries. Librarian: L. de Gregorio.

h. Accademia di S. Cecilia. This library is especially rich in printed music and libretti, and receives constant accessions by the copy-right laws. Among the rarer books are the 'Liber quindecim missarum,' printed by Andreas de Montona (Rome, 1516), and the only complete copy known of Cavaliere's 'Rappresentazione di anima e di corpo' (Rome, 1600). Valuable purchases were made at the dispersal of the Borghese Library in 1892. There is also a collection of musical autographs. See the catalogue by O. Andolfi (Boll. Ass. Mus. It., 1912-13). See also the Catalogo delle opere di musica . . . che dall' anno 1836 all' anno 1846 sono state depositate nell' archivio della Congregazione ed Accademia di Santa Cecilia di Roma (s.l. et a.) and the Elenco delle opere musicali donate alla biblioteca della Regia Accademia di S. Cecilia da S. M. la Regina (Rome, 1896). Librarian: Cav. F. Mantica.

i. Biblioteca Nazionale Centrale Vittorio Emanuele. Besides some liturgical MSS. of the 15th-17th centuries this library contains a few musical MSS. of the 16th-19th centuries, among which are a valuable copy of Vittoria's Psalms for four voices (with autograph corrections and additions by the composer), and some compositions by A. Scarlatti. Director: G. Bonazzi.

j. Biblioteca Chigiana. This Library possesses a valuable 15th-century MS. collection containing twelve masses by Okeghem, masses and motets by P. de la Rue, Josquin des Prés, and other contemporary composers. Librarian: Prof. G. Baronci.

SIENA. Biblioteca Comunale. This Library contains a small collection of musical works, both printed and manuscript. Among the former are a few 16th- and 17th-century madrigals, among the latter a 15th-century MS. containing treatises by J. de Muris, Marchettus of Padua, etc., and collection of songs by French minstrels of the 13th century. The music is catalogued under the heading 'Belle arti' in vol. vii. of L. Ilari's Indice per materie della biblioteca comunale di Siena (Siena, 1844-1848); the French songs are described by L. Passy in tome 5 (série 4) of the Bibliothèque de l'École des Chartes (Paris, 1859), and in Mus. T., Nov. 1886. Librarian: F. Jacometti.

TREVISO. The Chapter Library of the Cathedral contains some manuscript vocal sacred music of the 16th and 17th centuries, but the greatest treasure is a complete copy of the rare 'Harmonice musices odhecaton,' printed by Petrucci in 1501. Librarian: A. Marchesan.

TURN. a. Biblioteca Nazionale. The fire of January 1904, which destroyed so many priceless treasures in this library, fortunately spared the musical collections. These include a considerable number of printed madrigals of the 16th century, and a valuable series of ballets performed at the Court of Savoy between the years 1645 and 1660. A selection of music from this library was exhibited at the National Exhibition of Turin in 1898; the catalogue, after appearing in the Rivista delle biblioteche (anno ix.), was issued separately as Esposizione Nazionale di Torino, 1898. Manoscritti e libri a stampa musicali esposti della Biblioteca Nazionale di Torino (Florence, 1898). See also L. A. Villanis: Alcuni codici manoscritti di musica del secolo XVI, posseduti dalla Biblioteca Nazionale di Torino (Atti del Congresso internazionale di scienze storiche, vol. 8, Rome, 1905). Chief Librarian: L. Torri.

b. Biblioteca Civica. See Biblioteca Civica di Torino: cataloghi, sezione teatrale (Turin, 1913). Director: Prof. Dr. H. Mussa.

c. Cathedral (S. Giovanni Battista). The Library possesses some sacred vocal music (both printed and manuscript) of the 16th-18th centuries.

d. The Museo Civico possesses some liturgical MSS. of the 17th and 18th centuries. Director: L. Rovere.

URBINO. Biblioteca Universitaria. The only musical work appears to be an imperfect copy of Cavaliere's 'Rappresentazione di anima e di corpo' (Rome, 1600). Librarian: Count L. Nardini.

VENICE. a. The Library of St. Mark's (now transferred to the Zecca) contains much interesting music. Amongst the theoretical books are copies of the works of Galilei, Aron, Artusi, L. Polianus, Zaccani, Zarlini, J. Froschius, Gafori, Ornithoparcus, Burtius (Opusculum, 1487) and many others. The collection of practical music is rich in part-books of madrigals, chiefly in Venetian editions. The following is a list of composers whose works are contained in this section of the Library: Agostini, Anerio, Antegnati, Arcadelt, Asola, Baccusi, Balbi, Berchem, Bertani, Bianco, Caccini, Cambio Perissone, Corvus, Croce, Donato, Doni, Dorati, La Faya, Ferretti, Fiesco, Freddi, A. Gabrieli, Giovanelli, Gero, Gombert, della Gostena, Sigismondo d' India, Ingegneri, Orlando Lasso, G. de Macque, Manara, Marenzio, A. Marien, Masotti, Mazzone, Merulo, F. di Monte, Monteverdi, Nasco, Peri, Petrino, Phinot, G. da Ponte, Pordenone, Porta, Portinaro, Primavera, Renaldi, Romano, de Rore, Rossi, Rosso, Rubini, Ruffo, Sabino, Spontini, Stabile, Stivori, Striggio, Tarditi, Tigrini, G. da Udine, Vecchi, Verdelot, dalla Viola, G. de Wert, Zacchino, Zappasorgo, Zuccarini, G. A. Bontempi, Crescentini, Crivelli, Frescobaldi, Grossi, Hartmann-Stunz, T. Merula, Miniscalchi, Moretti, Morlacchi and Rinuccini. The MSS. include works by Marcello (two Intermezzi and a Serenata, autograph, a treatise (1707), two cantatas, an aria and two operas); S. Albero; D. Scarlatti (a Serenata a 4, and thirteen vols. of Sonatas, 1752-57); Perez (eight operas, 1752-55); Cafara; T. Traetta; L. Vinci;

Sarti; Graun; Perotti; Haydn; Mysliweczek ('Demofonte,' played at Venice in 1769); Bonno; Galuppi; Guglielmi ('Il re pastore,' 1767); Naumann; Leardini; C. Grossi; Venier (Procurator of St. Mark's, 1732-45); Stradella; Mattheis; Brusa; Giaji (Theatre Airs, 1738); G. Porta; Porpora (Theatre Airs, 1727); D. Terradellas; Hasso (five operas (1730-58) and two oratorios); A. Scarlatti (opera, 'L' Eurillo'); and the following twenty-seven operas by Cavalli: 'Gli Amori d' Apollo e di Dafne,' 'Alcibiade,' 'L' Artemisia,' 'La Calisto,' 'Il Ciro,' 'La Didone,' 'La Doriclea,' 'L' Egista Elena,' 'L' Eliogabalo,' 'Ereole amante,' 'L' Erismena' (two settings), 'L' Eritrea,' 'Il Giasone,' 'L' Hipermestra,' 'Muzio Scevola,' 'Lo nozze di Teti e Peleo,' 'L' Orimonte,' 'L' Orione,' 'L' Oristeo,' 'L' Ormindo,' 'Pompeo Magno,' 'La Rosinda,' 'Scipione Africano,' 'La Statura,' 'La virtù degl' strali d' Amore,' 'Xerse.'

There are also many detached cantatas and songs. For the Contarini collection, which is extremely rich in operas (some autograph) of the early Venetian school, see T. Wiel: I codici musicali Contariniani del secolo XVII nella R. Biblioteca di San Marco (Venice, 1888). Librarian: L. Ferrari.

b. The Museo Correr has a considerable collection of music, chiefly MS. compositions of the later Venetian schools. There are many autographs of B. Furlanetto, and church music, operas, intermezzos, etc., by Morlacchi, Bernasconi, Perotti, Salari, Pergolesi, Jommelli, Mayer, Lotti, Burzolla, Bertoni and many others. In 1881 the collection of Count Leopardo Martinengo, consisting chiefly of detached vocal and instrumental pieces, was added to the collection. See the catalogues in the Boll. Ass. Mus. It., 1913-14.

c. Biblioteca Querini-Stampaglia. This library contains some manuscript vocal music of the late 17th century. See the catalogue by G. Concina in the Boll. Ass. Mus. It., 1914. Librarian: A. Segarizzi.

VERONA. a. The Biblioteca Capitolare possesses some liturgical MSS., including a troper of the 11th century and a missal of the 13th century, and some MS. vocal music of the 16th and 17th centuries, including a volume containing nineteen masses by Orlando di Lasso. See G. B. C. Guiliari: La Capitolare Biblioteca di Verona. Parte Prima. Lib. I. o II. (Verona, 1888). Librarian: Prof. G. Zamboni.

b. Biblioteca Comunale. This library contains a little printed and manuscript music, mostly of the 16th-19th centuries, including autographs of G. B. Beretta, G. Ceffis, F. Morlacchi and others. Sweden

On the music libraries of Sweden, see T. Norlind : Vor 1700 gedruckte Musikalien in den schwedischen Bibliotheken (Sammelbände der I. M. G., 1907/08), where particulars will be found of some smaller collections not mentioned here.

FINSFONG. The Library contains Swedish liturgies of the 16th-18th centuries; a few theories; some partbooks of Italian madrigals; and some French 17th-century chansons (both printed and manuscript). See B. Lundstedt: Catalogue de la Bibliothèque de Finspong (Stockholm, 1883). In 1904 the whole collection passed into the possession of the town of Norrköping.

STOCKHOLM. a. Kongl. Musikaliska Akademien. The Library contains 10,000 volumes of musical works, mostly modern, but including a few of the 16th and 17th centuries. See B. Lundstedt: Notice sur les bibliothèques publiques de Suède (Paris, 1895), reprinted from the Revue Internationale des Archives, des Bibliothèques et des Musées. A catalogue of the collection began to appear in 1905 with a list of scores and pianoforte arrangements of operas. In 1910 the first part of the list of books on music followed.

b. The Royal Theatre library is rich in music of the 18th century.

UPSALA. Kongl. Universitets - Biblioteket. The printed music includes many French and Italian works of the 16th and 17th centuries. The manuscripts chiefly date from the 17th and 18th centuries, and include over 100 autographs of D. Buxtehude. See the M. f. M., 1889; the Catalogus librorum impressorum Bibliothecae Regiae Academiæ Upsalensis (Upsala, 1814), and R. Mitjana: Catalogue critique et descriptif des imprimés de musique des XVI^e et XVII^e siècles conservés à la Bibliothèque de l'Université Royale d'Upsala. Tom. 1. Musique religieuse (Upsala, 1911). Librarian: Dr. J. M. Hulth.

WESTERÅS. The Gymnasium Library contains some printed music of the 16th and 17th centuries. Librarian: S. Landtmanson.

Switzerland

BASEL. The University Library contains a few early printed works, but is chiefly notable for an important collection of MS. parts of symphonies and chamber music by some of the lesser-known 18th-century composers. See J. Richter: Katalog der Musik-Sammlung auf der Universitäts-Bibliothek in Basel (Leipzig, 1892, Beilage of the M. f. M.); the Catalog der Schweizerischen Musikbibliothek [established in 1902]. Pt. 1. Musikgeschichtliche und theoretische Werke (Basel, 1906), and E. Refardt's Katalog der Musikabteilung der Öffentlichen Bibliothek der Universität Basel und der in ihr erhaltenen Schweizerischen Musikbibliothek, of which the first volume dealing with the musical compositions was published in 1925. Principal Librarian: Prof. Dr. G. Binz.

BERN. The Stadtbibliothek possesses some early liturgical MSS. and treatises, many containing music in neumes. See H. Hagen: Catalogus codicum Bernensium (Bibliotheca Bongarsiana) (Bern, 1875). Principal Librarian: Dr. T. Steck.

EINSIEDELN. The Library of the Benedictine Monastery contains important MS. treatises of the 10th-15th centuries. See G. Meier: Catalogus codicum manuscriptorum qui in Bibliotheca Monasterii Einsidlensis O. S. B. servantur (tom. i., Einsiedeln, 1899). See also A. Schubiger: Die Sängerschule St. Gallens vom 8. bis 12. Jahrhundert (Einsiedeln, 1858), and (same author) Die Pflege des Kirchengesanges und der Kirchenmusik in der deutschen katholischen Schweiz (Einsiedeln, 1873). The library also contains the valuable and extensive collection of musical treatises brought together by R. L. Pearsall and presented to the Monastery by his heirs. Principal Librarian: Dr. P. I. Staub.

FRAUENFELD. The Kantonsbibliothek contains some 16th- and 17th-century printed musical works. Librarian: W. Gonzenbach.

GENEVA. The Bibliothèque publique et universitaire possesses some missals of the 10th, 14th and 15th centuries, and a small general collection of printed theoretical and practical works, including a few early treatises and some French 18th-century operas. See J. Senebier: Catalogue raisonné des manuscrits conservés dans la Bibliothèque de la Ville et République de Genève (Geneva, 1779), and Catalogue de la Bibliothèque Publique de Genève, pp. 1631-5 (vol. iii. 1879), 2661-2 (vol. v. 1885) and 3523-3530 (vol. viii. 1899). Director: F. Gardy.

ST. GALL. Stiftsbibliothek. The early MS. liturgies (with music in neumes) are most important. There are also a few early printed theories, among them the Melopoiae of Tritonius (Augsburg, 1507), and two MS. volumes containing 204 sacred compositions by Manfredus Barbarinus Lupas of Correggio, written in 1562 by H. Keller of Rapperswyl, with illuminations by C. Härteli. Some of the liturgical MSS. are described in Weale's Catalogue of MSS. and Printed Books at the Music Loan Exhibition, London, 1885 (London, 1886). See also G. Scherrer: Verzeichniss der Handschriften der Stiftsbibliothek von St. Gallen (Halle, 1875); and the same author's Verzeichniss der Incunabeln der Stiftsbibliothek von St. Gallen (St. Gall, 1880). Librarian: Dr. A. Fähr.

SCHAFFHAUSEN. The Town Library contains a small collection of works on musical history, theory, etc., including a few early treatises. See Fach-Katalog der Schaffhauser Stadtbibliothek (2 vols., Schaffhausen, 1903-05). Librarian: Dr. K. Henking.

ZÜRICH. The Zentralbibliothek, formed in 1916 by the amalgamation of the Cantonsbibliothek, the Stadtbibliothek and a few smaller libraries, possesses some liturgical MSS. of the 11th and 14th centuries and some valuable 16th-century organ music and treatises on the organ. (On the latter see Monatshefte für Musikgeschichte for 1891.) Principal Librarian: Dr. H. Escher.

Yugoslavia

LAIBACH (LJUBLJANA). a. Prince Auersperg possesses a copy of F. Boccella's very rare Primavera di vaghi fiori musicali (Ancona, 1653).

b. The Lycealbibliothek contains a MS. gradual of the 14th century, and a small collection of printed music of the 16th and 17th centuries.

c. The Studienbibliothek contains some printed music of the early 17th century. Keeper: Dr. J. Šlebinger.

II. UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

The number and importance of music collections in the United States is constantly growing. They are no longer found exclusively in the main centres of population or at the chief institutions of learning. In response to a wide demand, music departments have been established in libraries all over the country.¹ In most cases, the purpose of these departments is to fill the wants of the general reader. They furnish information and diversion. The contents are primarily modern; the accessions consist in current publications. In not a few instances, books and music are supplemented by piano-rolls and phonograph records. These are circulating libraries as distinguished from reference libraries. There are exceptions, however, which combine the two types. Notably the public libraries of New York and Boston continue to collect older works or rarities, and supply the needs of the student and scholar as well. The increasing space conceded to music in academic education is responsible for the large and excellent music libraries attached to many of the universities and colleges. A number of conservatories and schools of music maintain collections which exceed the scope of pedagogy. Certain historical and musical societies collect music and books on musical subjects for the use of their members. Musical autographs and similar treasures which the market may offer go frequently into the hands of private collectors. The most comprehensive and richest collection, of course, is the one in the country's national library, known as the Library of Congress, in Washington.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS. The music division was created in 1897. In 1902 the Librarian of Congress, Dr. Herbert Putnam, appointed O. G. Sonneck chief of the division. With extraordinary skill and energy Sonneck organised and built up a music collection which not only stands first in America, but need no longer fear comparison with similar and much older collections in Europe. Except for the wealth of old manuscripts and autographs of the masters, which can be consulted only in some of the great European libraries, the Library of Congress offers to student and investigator more than ample material for reference and research. In certain fields (opera scores and libretti) the collection has attained a position unequalled anywhere. A provision of the U.S. copyright law demands the deposit, in the Library of Congress, of all works registered. This accounts, in part, for the rapid growth of the collection, especially in current publications. For the study of contemporary music its full significance will not be understood until fifty or a hundred years hence, when the historian of that day, bent on an examination of the musical trends of our own time, will find it for his purposes the most complete in the world.

The music collection in 1924 contained close upon 1,000,000 entries. It increases at a rate of over 15,000 a year. Not all the copyright deposits are placed on the shelves of the division. A great number of them is left in the custody of the Register of Copyrights or distributed among other Government libraries. The purchases average 3000 a year. Since 1903, the notable accessions of each fiscal year are mentioned in the annual report of the librarian. They form an impressive array. Suffice it to single out a few of the most conspicuous, such as the collection of books on music printed before 1800 (over one-third of all that were published before that date); orchestral scores of dramatic and symphonic works (over 10,000); opera libretti, including the Schatz collection (c. 25,000); early Americana (rare hymn-books and patriotic pieces); music of the Civil War and of the Great War; over 2600 autographs by c. 650 composers (of whom 375 are American, represented by over 1400 works, most of which are gifts); a considerable number of autograph letters. The musical holographs include several unpublished symphonies of Clementi²; interesting pieces by Wagner (a setting of the omitted passage in the 3rd act of 'Die Götterdämmerung' in his hand, the Parsifal music he arranged for his birthday, 1880, sketches for 'The Flying Dutchman' and the 'Ring'); the entire musical manuscripts of J. Peter Ritter (1763-1846); Mrs. F. S. Coolidge's gift of all the composers' holograph scores of chamber music which have won the 'Berkshire Prize'; and important specimens folk-songs and dances, mediæval and Oriental music. Many volumes have been transferred to the music division, but the greater number are kept with the other John G. White books. The rarer portion of the great folk-song library gathered by the Joliet family of Dijon was purchased by White in 1923. A number of original manuscripts by Jean-Baptiste Weckerlin, the well-known collector of folk-songs, are of unusual interest.

DETROIT. The music department of the Detroit Public Library has been organised and largely developed since the library moved into its new building, and a special room was devoted to this department in 1921. The greater part of the collection is available for outside use, but a reference collection is being developed which includes such works as the complete Bach in the Bach Gesellschaft edition, the Handel Gesellschaft edition, the complete Palestrina, the Denkmäler Deutscher Tonkunst and Denkmäler der Tonkunst in Österreich, and the full orchestra scores of 8 of Wagner's operas. The complete collection includes books on music and the literature of music; a large number of miniature scores, full orchestral scores with parts, and scores of chamber music with parts; also the vocal and piano scores of operas, with the full orchestral scores of a few others, and many libretti. It also includes a collection of 3752 anthems and choral works which are loaned to choirs in sufficient numbers for their use. Besides normal increase the Library has added to its collection by the acquisition of the library of the late Theodore Spiering. The violin section has been increased by the acquisition of the music library of the late Maud Powell. The library also owns many phonograph records, which are loaned to schools and colleges for the use of classes in the music courses.

MINNEAPOLIS. The music collection of the Minneapolis Public Library now includes over 2500 books about music, 3300 bound music scores, and some 7000 pieces of sheet music. The library has acquired several small private collections as gifts, and in 1919 purchased the collection of Gustav Schoettle, which comprised several thousand pieces. The average yearly growth is about 700 items. During the year 1923 the music department circulated 20,000 pieces and served approximately 7000 readers.

NEW YORK. a. The Public Library of the city of New York has over 30,000 catalogued volumes devoted to music, besides several thousand uncatalogued pieces of sheet music.

It consists of what were originally three distinct foundations—the Astor, Lenox and Tilden, established respectively in 1849, 1870 and 1887, and consolidated in 1892. The first had a fair collection of music, with the publications of the Plain-song and Mediæval Music Society of London, and of the Continental antiquarian societies, as special features. The nucleus of the truly remarkable Lenox Library is the musical collection made by Joseph W. Drexel of Philadelphia, and given to the library by will. Drexel began the formation of his library in 1858 by purchasing and combining the collections of H. F. Albrecht, a musician who came to America with the Germania Orchestra in 1848, and Dr. R. La Roche. Many purchases were made at the sale of Dr. E. F. Rimbault's library in London in 1877. A moderately trustworthy catalogue made in 1869 contains 12 vols. of 16th-century musical publications, 48 of the 17th, and 483 of the 18th. The unique copy of 'Parthenia inviolata' is in this library. There are also several theoretical works of the 15th century, and some autograph scores of classical composers. Among the MSS. are two of great beauty and value, one a magnificent gradual on vellum, on which the writer, who calls himself Brother Leonard of Aix-la-Chapelle (Leonardo di Aquisgrano), laboured, according to his own statement, for seven years. It was finished in 1494, and is supposed to have been commissioned by one of the princes who assisted at the coronation of Maximilian as King of the Romans. The other MS. is a gorgeous Antiphoner of 1695, formerly belonging to Charles X. of France. A valuable historical collection of sacred and secular compositions of the 16th century is contained in a MS. vol. entitled 'francis Sambrook his book,' which was in the Rimbault collection. Dr. Rimbault states that Sambrooke died in 1660, aged 70, and was buried in Salisbury Cathedral. A note in the MS., attributed to Dr. Alecock, says that the music was 'wrote out of the Vatican (or Pope's Library) at Rome.'

The Astor and Lenox collections were united and transferred to the new building of the library at Fifth Avenue and 42nd Street in 1911. Since then the following collections have been absorbed by the music division: 1914, Julian Edwards (over 800 vocal and orchestral scores of operas, oratorios, cantatas, overtures, suites, etc.); 1918, Doane collection presented by Mrs. George W. Doane (777 volumes of scores, books about music, sacred and secular American song-books, etc.); 1921, 1923, 1924, parts of the collections belonging to James G. Huneker, Henry E. Krehbiel and Arthur Mees; 1922, musical manuscripts of Horace Wadham Nicholl. The number of readers in the music division during the year 1923 exceeded 23,717. This part of the library is for reference only.

The circulation department of the New York Public Library has its headquarters in the 58th Street branch. It supplies 47 branches of the Public Library system of New York City. Its musical collection contained in 1924 about 25,000 volumes. Since 1920 the department has specialised in the acquisition of contemporary music, chiefly orchestral scores. The strongest section is that of 19th- and 20th-century opera scores. Among recent additions is the collection of the late Charles T. Griffes (mainly scores of modern American composers), purchased and presented by the American Music Guild (1922). The growth of the collection since 1920 has been over 1000 items annually. Statistics of readers are taken only at the 58th Street branch, where the circulation averages 1500 a month.

b. Interesting musical items (old manuscripts and liturgical chants) are in the library of the Hispanic Society of America.

c. The private library of John Pierpont Morgan contains a number of rare musical publications and manuscripts.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS. The Forbes Library has about 1500 books on music, about 6000 bound volumes of music, and over 12,000 unbound pieces of music. Four phonographs with an adequate number of records are kept for use in schools.

PHILADELPHIA, PENN. The library of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania has valuable manuscripts and publications of the Colonial period.

PORTLAND, OREGON. The Library Association of Portland maintains a music collection which in 1924 contained more than 5000 volumes. Its aim is to serve the general reader. In 1923 a total of 19,525 music books circulated among about 6500 readers. A committee of three prominent musicians of Portland supervises the selection and recommends the purchase of new acquisitions.

SALEM, MASS. The Essex Institute has 1000 volumes of or upon music, and 4000 pamphlets, chiefly early American.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS. The City Library Association, in the Grace Rumrill Department of Music, maintains a collection of about 4000 volumes and a large number of phonograph records.

WASHINGTON, D.C. a. The Public Library of the District of Columbia maintains a music collection for purposes of circulation. Its accessions are in part derived through transfers of copyright deposits from the Library of Congress.

b. Frank J. Metcalf, compiler of a valuable bibliography on 'American Psalmody' (1917), has gathered a private collection of some 1600 hymn- and tune-books. The earliest item in the collection is 'The American Harmony,' published by Daniel Bayley at Newburyport, Mass., in 1771. Other books of particular rarity or interest are: Gospel Hymn Book, by Abraham Maxim, printed in Maine, 1813; Psalms, Hymns and Anthems for the Catholic Church, printed in Washington, D.C., in 1830; Manual of the Broad Church, by William D.

Haley, pastor of the Unitarian Church in Washington, D.C., 1859, containing a collection of 70 hymns; Hymns for the Unitarian Church in Washington, D.C., 1821; Hymns and Spiritual Songs, by D. Millard and J. Badger, printed at Union Mills, New York, 1831.

WORCESTER, MASS. The American Antiquarian Society has a collection of about 3000 volumes, including about 1600 volumes of early American psalmody.

UNIVERSITIES AND COLLEGES.¹ a. Harvard is not only the oldest American university (1636), but it was the first to establish a chair for music, in 1862, to which the American composer and organist John Knowles PAINE was appointed. The Harvard University Library has a special musical collection of 14,500 volumes and pamphlets, and includes the collected works of the most prominent composers, full scores of a number of important operas, and a fairly well rounded-out collection of treatises and musical biography and criticism. In addition to the main collection, the library has in its folklore stack an unusually complete set of folk-music (all countries) and ballads and songs (especially English and American). The library has also (not included in its special music collection) a fair collection of hymnology which is supplemented by that contained in the departmental Theological Library. A special file of 25,000 sheet-music songs is worth noting. These are arranged alphabetically by titles, and are in major part American. A similar file of instrumental sheet music has been arranged by composer. A series of 224 manuscript volumes contains the words of over 1500 Italian operas, sacred dramas and cantatas, which are uncatalogued. The musical manuscripts include autographs of Bellini, Haydn (part of the opera 'Armida'), J. J. Rousseau, Gabriel Fauré, J. K. Paine and other American composers. The average yearly growth of the collection is between 300 and 400 volumes. In addition to the main collection of Harvard in the Widener Library, there is a reference library in the Music Building comprising some 2000 volumes.

b. Yale University Library. The music section in the General University Library contains about 6000 volumes. These are divided between the literature of music, with a very good collection of historical and theoretical works, and vocal and church music. Instrumental music has been transferred to the library of the School of Music. The library is particularly strong in song collections. The rate of growth is about 100 volumes a year. The library of the School of Music is intended as a working collection for the benefit of students in the Music School, specialising in works to which reference is made in the very complete courses in musical history which are part of the curriculum, as well as in any music which students may wish to perform or which they may have an opportunity of hearing. The most complete sections are orchestral scores, chamber music, compositions for the pianoforte, and works of modern French composers in all forms. The collection of Horatio Parker's compositions, published works and manuscripts, has found a fitting place in the University, whose first dean of the music department he was.

The Lowell Mason collection of church music is at present kept at the School of Music. It contains about 6000 volumes of works published before 1870. It consists principally of treatises in English and German and in collections of hymns. It has a very complete list of song- and hymn-books published in the United States. Its most notable rarity is a copy of the first edition of Bach's first published work, the 'Klavier Übung, Leipzig, In Verlegung des Autoris, 1726.' No additions are made to the Lowell Mason Library.

A catalogue of both the University and the Lowell Mason collections was made by J. Sumner Smith.

c. University of Illinois, Urbana, Ill. The music collection of the University library contains about 6500 compositions, about 2000 books on musical subjects, 250 bound volumes of musical periodicals, and about 400 pamphlets, catalogues, etc.

d. Oberlin College, Oberlin, Ohio. The music collections of Oberlin College are two: first, a circulating library of music which is maintained by the Conservatory of Music. This collection includes about 25,000 pieces of sheet music for voice, piano, organ, string, wind and other instruments; second, the Oberlin College Library takes care of the literature of music, including the history of music, and musical theory, biographies and periodicals. In addition it has a good working collection of operas, oratorios, songs and music of historical interest. The two collections comprise a total of about 10,000 volumes. It is a general collection rather carefully selected, particularly strong for purposes of the historical worker. Additions average 750 a year.

e. University of Rochester, Rochester, N.Y. The library is attached to, and housed in, the Eastman School of Music. It was established in 1904 (and is supported) by Hiram W. Sib'ey of Rochester. The collection is strong in chamber music and in literature on French music and the French theatre. A complete set of French musical and dramatic almanacs from 1750 to date, with unique copies of those for the years 1735-6-7, is especially notable. The collection, though comparatively young, has absorbed the libraries of Arthur Pougin (literature of French music and theatre), H. P. Kreiner (history of Russian music, operas and folk-songs), O. G. Sonneck (miscellaneous music and literature, including periodicals), Dr. M. J. Fleming (literature concerning violin, pamphlets, clippings, manuscript dictionary of violin and bow makers A-F), H. E. Krehbiel (material on folk-song and folklore from his collection), and chamber music, orchestral music, operas and manuscripts from Arthur Hartmann's library. The average yearly growth averages 1600 volumes. Among signal rarities is the autograph manuscript score of Sir Henry R. Bishop's opera 'Clari, or The Maid of Milan,' containing the song 'Home, sweet Home,' and the autograph of an early work by C. Saint-Saëns, for violin and piano, entitled 'Caprice brillant.' The Brown collection, which through Mrs. C. K. Rogers became the repository of all the works by her father John BARNETT (q.v.), contains many interesting autographs. The librarian is Miss Barbara Duncan (1924).

f. Hartford, Connecticut. The Theological Seminary has about 1000 volumes on music.

g. Bowdoin College, Brunswick, Maine. The Bowdoin College Library specialises in collecting musical settings of Longfellow's poems. It has collected about 1000 of these compositions.

Other universities which maintain considerable music collections as part of their libraries are Columbia (New York), Kansas (Lawrence) and North-western (Evanston, Ill.).

LIBRARIES FOR THE BLIND. a. The New York Institute for the Education of the Blind (New York City) has about 800 pieces of music. The Institute also publishes music for the blind.

b. The Perkins Institution and Massachusetts School for the Blind (Watertown, Mass.) contains in its special library about 250 books on music and over 5000 separate compositions. These are chiefly solos for the piano and songs, with a few choruses for mixed voices. The yearly additions average 200. The average number of readers is 2000 a year.

c. The Iowa College for the Blind (Vinton, Ia.) has about 1000 pieces of music and books on musical subjects.

c. Lib.

LIBRETTO, diminutive of the Italian libro, and meaning 'little book,' is the term generally used to denote the text of an opera or oratorio, but more especially the former. Libretti have undergone many changes in style and character corresponding to changes in musical development; indeed the librettist has frequently played nearly as important a part in such developments as the composer.

An opera libretto is to all intents and purposes a stage play cast in a certain mould, conditioned by musical requirements, and it may be noted that it was really the development of the aria and the formal musical number which marked the first differentiation. Thus the early Florentine experimenters in the opera form would employ their musica parlante in their setting of the text of a play, so that the librettist as such did not come into his own until it was found necessary for the composer to break the monotony of his recitative with moments of purely lyrical expression. Thus arose the aria for which the poem had to be provided, and the difficulty with which the librettist was confronted, owing to the claims of the singers, in maintaining a proper balance between musical and dramatic interest, a balance which Gluck and Calzabigi sought to restore after the type represented by Metastasio's libretti had become prevalent. In later operatic developments the fanciful and fantastic elements of the 'romantic' school offered special opportunities to the imagination of the librettist, while the more recent Italian school again has offered scope for the invention of plots with swiftly moving dramatic action. Meanwhile Wagner had solved all difficulties for himself by writing his own texts, as did Charpentier and Borodin, and in two important cases Debussy ('Pelléas et Mélisande') and Strauss ('Salome') have reverted to the setting of actual plays practically in their entirety.

History has shown that the indispensable requirements for a successful opera libretto cannot be absolutely defined. Sometimes it appears that the musical expression is sufficient to outweigh dramatic and literary deficiencies of the text, and we may predicate that real human interest in the central situations comes first in importance; next, it must afford scope to the composer for musical illustration and expression of those moments. In fact the sway of music is such that it can easily compensate for the absence of literary or poetic style; there are innumerable instances where it has been successfully left to the singer to simulate the delivery of true elevation of thought or passion, only suggested by the text in the crudest form. This, however, is ultimately a matter which concerns the composer alone, for we measure his inspiration by the result. Another example of the power of the music lies in the modern rejection of Wagner's doctrine that the period of an opera must necessarily be put back into legendary times. Many theoretic ideals are shattered by the colder logic of practice, for, in opera, music can idealise almost everything it touches, and its truthfulness of expression or the reverse is not to be measured by comparison with actualities.

Many famous librettists will be found under their own names in this Dictionary; attention may be called to: RINUCCINI, the Florentine poet, whose texts were set by Peri, Caccini, Monteverdi and Gagliano; FERRARI, poet and composer; ZENO, 1668-1750, court poet in Vienna and Venice, supplied texts for, amongst others, Caldara; METASTASIO, whose work enjoyed enormous popularity, being set by all the leading opera composers of his time—Hasse, Porpora, Piccinni, Paisiello, Gluck, Mozart, Caldara, etc., many texts, indeed, being set over and over again. Arne's 'Artaxerxes' was a translation of Metastasio's text.

In the foundation of French opera Perrin was associated with Cambert and Lully. The 'Armide' of Quinault, who wrote for Lully, was later set by Gluck. Other French librettists to be mentioned are Sedaine (1719-97), librettist to Philidor, Monsigny and Grétry, and Favart (1710-92) (his 'Bastien et Bastienne' was set in a German version by Mozart).

Calzabigi (1714-95) was Gluck's collaborator in 'Orfeo', 'Alceste' and 'Paride ed Elena.'

DA PONTE wrote 'Nozze di Figaro', 'Don Giovanni' and 'Così fan tutte,' and SCHIKANEDER 'Die Zauberflöte.'

Weisse, 1726-1804, collaborated with Hiller in the foundation of the German Singspiel, and Kind wrote 'Der Freischütz' for Weber. Bouilly was the author of 'Les Deux Journées' and the original version of 'Fidelio.'

The text of Cherubini's 'Anacreon' was by Mendouze, and that of Spontini's 'La Vestale' was by Jouy (V. J. Étienne).

In Italian opera of the 19th century the chief librettists were: ROMANI, associated with Bellini and Donizetti; Carmarano, wrote 'Lucia' and 'Il Trovatore'; Piave, 'Rigoletto', 'Traviata'; Ghislanzoni, 'Aida'; and Borro, 'La Gioconda', 'Falstaff', 'Otello' and his own 'Nerone.'

In French opera of the same period SCRIBE wrote for Boieldieu 'Dame Blanche'; Aubor, 'Fra Diavolo'; Verdi, 'Vêpres siciliennes'; and Meyerbeer, 'L'Africaine' and 'Robert le Diable'. He was associated with Deschamps in 'Les Huguenots' and 'Le Prophète'. (See also SAINT-GEORGES.) Barbier and Carré wrote 'Faust' and 'Mignon'; Meilhac was associated with Halévy in 'Carmen' and with Gille in 'Manon'; Massenet was also supplied with texts by Gallet and H. Cain.

The librettos of Puccini's most famous operas, 'La Bohème', 'Tosca' and 'Madame Butterfly', are by L. Illica and G. Giacosa.

H. von Hofmannsthal wrote for Strauss 'Eloktia', 'Salome', 'Der Rosenkavalier,' etc.

Among English librettists there should be mentioned Nahum Tate, the author of 'Didc and Aeneas' (Purcell), Bickerstaffe and Gay of the ballad opera period.

J. R. PLANCHÉ wrote 'Oberon' for Weber. Alfred BUNN wrote 'The Bohemian Girl', J. Oxenford 'Lily of Killarney', Fitzball 'Mari-tana' and H. F. CHORLEY 'The Amber Witch,' etc.

In a later period Mackenzie's 'Colomba' and 'Troubadour' had texts by F. HUEFFER. Julian Sturgis wrote 'Ivanhoe' (Sullivan), 'Nadeshda' (Goring Thomas) and 'Much Ado about Nothing' (Stanford).

In light opera the outstanding names have been W. S. Gilbert, Basil Hood and Sydney Grundy, the first of whom, through his masterly collaboration with SULLIVAN (q.v.), created a unique type.

It remains to add a few words about translations of libretti into English. This is a difficult matter for the translator, who has often failed in trying to satisfy all the claims of poetic diction, correct accentuation, correspondence between the salient notes and words in a phrase, rhyme and literalness. It is obvious that something has to be sacrificed, and it is a safe rule to sacrifice rhyme and literalness first. A carefully written paraphrase can be made to fit the case, and occasionally it is legitimate to make a slight alteration in the music itself, at any rate as regards note values in the vocal part. It is a matter for satisfaction that the standard of translation into English has improved in recent years, for inferior work is unquestionably hampering to the English temperament, and hinders truth of expression in performance, besides annoying the hearer, and even tending to discourage the appreciation of opera as an art-form. The best work has been done in the translation of the Wagner operas; there are now several good versions of the 'Ring,' notably that by Ernest NEWMAN. It is, however, one thing to possess a good translation and quite another to get it into general use, owing to the unsettled conditions under which the performance of opera in English is conducted in this country. LICHARD, MILAN (b. Uherska Skalice, Feb. 24, 1853), one of the earlier group of Slovak composers and a great authority on the folk-songs; now living in Bratislava. He was educated in Skalice, Veľká Revúce and Šoprona, and became a railway official under the Magyar regime. His interest in music, which was at first of a general nature, was his chief consolation under hardships and political disabilities. Later on he specialised in the folk-music which gave colour to his compositions, of which the best known are: 'Škovránok' (The Lark), for mixed choir and soprano solo; 'Sláva Ti najvyšší' (Praise to Thee, All-Highest), text by the poet Vajansky; 'Zmlkните žiaľne Kvľby' (Hush your Laments), a funeral ode; a Book of Slovak Songs (composed in prison); the 'Songs of Jonaš' (16); a choral ode for the funeral of Mudroň, words by Leštinsky; a Rhapsody in F; six 'Garlands of Popular Song,' transcribed in their appropriate modes, and the chorus 'Orel' (The Eagle), composed for the first celebration of Slovak independence (1919) but never performed.

Lichard has done great service in the cause of the Slovak folk-songs by insisting upon their modal character and special rhythmic characteristics. In his versions he respects the archaic nature of the songs and ruthlessly eliminates the injurious influence of the gipsy music, with its so-called 'Magyar scale,' and the spasmodic nature of its rhythm.

An interesting article on Slovak songs by Milan Lichard appeared in a pamphlet entitled Slovak Peasant Art and Melodies (reprinted from Prof. Seton-Watson's Racial Problems in Hungary, Constable & Co., 1911).

LICHFIELD, HENRY, madrigal composer, fl. 1613. He published

'The First Set of Madrigals of 5 Parts: apt for both Viols and Voyces. Newly composed by Henry Lichfield London: Printed for M. L., I. B. and T. S. the Assignes of W. Barley 1613.' (See Engl. Madr. Sch. vol. xvii.)

The volume was dedicated to Lady Cheney, or Cheney, of Toddington House, near Luton. Lord Cheney died many years earlier, in 1587. The widow survived till 1614. Lichfield may have been resident musician at Toddington, but it is more likely that he was household steward and that, like Henry WARD (q.v.), he was an amateur musician. Lady Cheney bequeathed a legacy of £20 to Lichfield. Lichfield is one of the smaller figures among the English madrigalists, yet some of his works are pleasant to sing. Perhaps the best of the set is 'I always loved to call my lady Rose.'

LICHNOWSKY, (1) CARL (b. 1758; d. Apr. 15, 1814), Fürst (Prince), by Russian patent issued Jan. 30, 1773, was descended from an old Polish family whose estates were so situated that, after the partition of Poland, it owed allegiance to all three of the plunderers. The principal seat of Prince Carl was Schloss Grätz, near Troppau in Silesia; but Vienna was his usual place of residence. He claims a place in this work as the pupil and friend of Mozart and the Mæcenas of Beethoven.

Readers of Burney's Present State of Music will remember his eulogies of the Countess Thun-Klösterle, so celebrated for her beauty, intellect and culture, whose disregard for mere form gave her the reputation of eccentricity, but whose house and family had charms that attracted even the Emperor Joseph and his brothers thither on the footing of friendly visitors. Of her taste in music it is sufficient to say that she was a profound admirer of the compositions of both the young Mozart and the young Beethoven, at a time when such appreciation was by no means universal. Her daughters—Georg Forster's 'Three Graces'—were worthy of their mother. Elizabeth married Rasoumowsky; Christine (b. July 26, 1765) married Nov. 21, 1788, Lichnowsky; and the third the English Lord Guilford. Schönfeld, a Viennese, writes in 1796 of Lady 'Gilfort' as a guitar-player of very high rank and a singer of uncommon excellence, and of Princess Lichnowsky as 'a strong musician who plays the pianoforte with feeling and expression.'

Lichnowsky, without pretending to rival the great magnates Esterhazy, Lobkowitz and their peers in maintaining a complete 'chapel' of vocal and instrumental music, had within five years after his marriage his regular Friday quartet of youthful virtuosi, Schuppanzigh, Sina, Weiss and Kraft, all of whom became famous, and also gave musical entertainments on a scale requiring a full orchestra.

His relations to the Prussian court compelled him occasionally to appear there; and he thus found opportunity to give Mozart—only two years his senior—a practical and substantial proof of his affection, by inviting him, in those days of tedious and expensive travelling, to join him on one of these occasions free of expense. This was the journey in the spring of 1789, during which the King of Prussia offered Mozart the then noblest musical position in Germany; a kind word from the Emperor, after his return, led him to reject it, without securing an equivalent. There seems to be no doubt that Lichnowsky, deeply moved by the distressing condition of his teacher and friend, had taken him to Berlin in the hope of improving his circumstances, and that the King's offer was partly due to his influence. Two and a half years later Mozart was dead, leaving a void the Lichnowsky-Thun circle which there was no one to fill. Another two years and young Beethoven had come from Bonn.

The relations between him and the Lichnowskys are sufficiently indicated in the article BEETHOVEN; but a current error must be corrected, namely, that the breach caused by the quarrel at Gatz in 1806 was final. Lichnowsky lived in a large house over the Schotten gate—both house and gate disappeared long since—and in the storey below him dwelt Beethoven's friends, the Erdödy's. The Schotten and Mölker bastions were contiguous, and the Pasqualati house, on the latter, was in the same row with that of Lichnowsky, though a few doors away from it. This then was the reason why Beethoven was content to live in rooms in the fourth storey, looking to the cold north, and without a direct ray of the sun. He remained there from 1804-07, and then removed into rooms provided him by the Countess Erdödy.

An outbreak with the Countess led him to remove to the other side of the city, where he passed the years 1809 and 1810. Meantime, so complete a reconciliation had taken place between him and both Lichnowsky and the Countess Erdödy, that in 1811 he went again to Gatz, and on his return once more took his old lodging in the Pasqualati house, where he remained until the death of Lichnowsky.¹ It was during these last years that Schindler records the frequent visits of the Prince to the composer.

(2) EDWARD MARIA (b. Sept. 19, 1789; d. Munich, Jan. 1, 1845), son and successor of Prince Carl, distinguished himself as an agriculturist, but more as a man of letters. He stands high in Austrian literature as a national antiquary, especially for his great History of the House of Hapsburg.

(3) COUNT MORITZ, a younger brother of Prince Carl, was one of that small circle of most intimate friends of Beethoven faithful to the last. He was probably that Count Lichnowsky who published (1798) the seven Variations for P.F. on 'Nel cor più.' After the death of his first wife he became deeply attached to the opera singer Mlle. Stummer; but not until after the death of Prince Carl, when their daughter had already passed the stage of infancy, were they able to marry. It is in relation to this attachment that Beethoven is said to have written the Sonata in E minor, op. 90.

A. W. T.

LICHTENSTEIN, KARLAUGUST BARON VON (b. Lahm, Franconia, Sept. 8, 1767; d. Berlin, Sept. 16, 1845), studied music under Forkel at Göttingen. He served in the English army, returning to Germany, 1793, as gentleman of the bedchamber at the court of Hanover, where he produced his opera 'Knall und Fall,' of which he had written both words and music. In 1798 he became Intendant of the court theatre at Dessau, which, under his management, became a model theatre for all Germany. In about 1800 he was for some time co-director with Baron von Braun of the Vienna court theatre. After a period of directorship of the Bamberg theatre, he took over in 1823 the stage management of the playhouse, and in 1825 that of the Opera at Berlin. He composed a number of operas and operettas (Singspiele). (See list in Q.-L.)

LICHTENTHAL, PETER (b. Pressburg, May 10, 1780; d. Milan, Aug. 18, 1853), Doctor of Medicine, composer and writer on music. He studied medicine in Vienna, where he wrote several books on music and musical subjects, and settled at Milan, producing there in 1826 his important Dizionario e biografia della musica, which was followed by several other theoretical, æsthetical and biographical works. He composed 3 operas, 4 ballets, chamber music, piano-forte pieces, church music, songs, etc. (See Q.-L.)

LICKL, (1) JOHANN GEORG (b. Kornneburg, Austria, Apr. 11, 1769; d. Fünfkirchen, May 12, 1843), church Kapellmeister from 1806 till his death. He composed operettas (Singspiele)

Beethoven since 1838. The new lodging in 1814 was in the lower storey of the Barlenstein house, on the same bastion. He retained it but one year; for, on the departure of the Erdödy's from Vienna in 1815, there was no inducement to remain, and Beethoven moved away from the Mölker Bastel, never to return.

for Schikaneder's theatre; also masses, motets and chamber music.

His son, (2) KARL GEORG (b. Vienna, Oct. 28, 1801), was a virtuoso on the physharmonica, for which he composed a number of works, as also church music.

Another son, (3) AEGIDIUS FERDINAND KARL (b. Vienna, Sept. 1, 1803), was a guitar virtuoso, who also wrote Singspiele and an oratorio.

LIDARTI, CRISTIANO GIUSEPPE, a popular 18th-century violoncellist and composer, lived, according to Burney, at Pisa, his birthplace, in 1770; and for some time in Vienna. Judging from the number of compositions published in London, as well as a fine portrait of his, apparently the work of an English painter, now in the possession of Messrs. W. E. Hill & Sons, he must have been in London between 1768 and 1780. Although represented therein as a violoncellist, he wrote apparently no solo work for that instrument, his compositions consisting of violin and flute sonatas, duets, trios, quartets, a sonata for viola pomposa, a musical drama, an aria with orchestra, and some catches and glees (E. van der Straeten, History of the Violoncello).

LIDL (LIDEL), ANDREAS (b. Vienna, c. 1740; d. ? London before 1789). He was one of the greatest baryton virtuosos, who increased the number of wire strings at the back of the instrument to 27. After visiting all the big continental cities, he made his début in London in 1778 with great success, and appears to have remained there till his death. He wrote a considerable number of quintets, quartets, trios, duets and a song. His baryton compositions remained in MS. The 'Anton' Lidel which appears in many biographical works is the same as Andreas, the former name arising from an error.

LIE, SIGURD (b. May 23, 1871; d. Sept. 29,¹ 1904), an eminent Norwegian musician, was a pupil of the Leipzig Conservatorium in 1891-94. He was soon afterwards appointed conductor of the Harmonien choral society in Bergen, and was the conductor of the Central Theatre. He underwent a second course of musical study in Berlin, and on returning to Christiania was appointed conductor of one of the best choral societies; he was a good violinist, and among his compositions are a symphony in A minor, a 'marche symphonique,' an 'Orientalisk Suite' for orchestra, a quintet for piano and strings, duets, cantatas, songs and choral works, many of which show such high qualities that if he had lived he would have taken a very high place among Scandinavian writers. M.

LIEBE, CHRISTIAN (b. Freiberg, Nov. 5, 1654; d. Zschoppau, Saxony, Sept. 3, 1708), went to Leipzig in 1676; was organist at Frauenstein, 1684, afterwards rector; became LIEBLICH GEDACT (i.e. gedeckt), literally 'sweet-toned covered or closed' pipe. This class of organ stop is a variety of the old quite-stopped Diapason or Gedact. It was invented by the elder Schulze, of Paulinzelle, near Erfurt, and was first brought under notice in England in his organ in the Great Exhibition of 1851. It is made either of 16-foot tone (Lieblich Bourdon), 8-foot (Lieblich Gedact) or 4-foot (Lieblich Flöte). The pipes are made five or six sizes narrower than the Gedact, but are more copiously winded, and the mouths cut up higher. The tone, therefore, is nearly or quite as strong as that of the Gedact, though not so full, yet brighter and sweeter. When the three stops, 16, 8 and 4 feet, are grouped together on the same manual their effect is very beautiful. The late Edmund Schulze combined them in this manner in the choir organ at the Temple Church in 1860, also in his fine organ at Doncaster (1862). Lewis adopted the same plan at Ripon Cathedral, and it was followed by Willis at Salisbury Cathedral.

LIED, see SONG, subsection GERMANY.

LIEDERKREIS, LIEDERCYCLUS or LIEDERREIHE (Ger.), a circle or series of songs relating to the same object and forming one piece of music. The first instance of the thing and the first use of the word appears to be in Beethoven's op. 98, 'An die ferne Geliebte. Ein Liederkreis von Al. Jeitteles.'³ It was followed by Schubert's 'Die schöne Müllerin, ein Cyclus von Liedern,' twenty songs, composed 1823, and published Mar. 1824. Schubert's two other series, the 'Winterreise' and the 'Schwanen-Gesang,'⁴ have not the special title. Schumann has left several Liederkreise—by Heine (op. 24); by Eichendorff (op. 39); 'Dichterliebe, Liedercyklus' (op. 48); 'Liederreihe' von J. Kerner (op. 35); 'Frauenliebe und Leben' (op. 42). Of all these Beethoven's most faithfully answers to the name. The songs change their tempo, but there is no break, and the motif of the first reappears in the last, and closes the circle.

G.

The English equivalent, 'song cycle,' is now in common use, and often applied to any set of songs by one composer meant to be sung in series, not necessarily the work of one poet. Song cycles are now so frequent as to make any enumeration of their composers impossible. c.

² Of the poet of these charming verses little information can be gleaned. He was born at Brünn, June 20, 1794, so that when he wrote the Liederkreis he was barely 21. Like many amateurs of music he practised medicine, and he died at his native place, Apr. 16, 1858.

LIEDERSPIEL (Ger.), a play with songs introduced into it, such songs being either well-known and favourite airs—Lieder—or, if original, cast in that form. It is the German equivalent of the French Vaudeville, and of the English BALLAD OPERA (q.v.).

The thing and the name are both due to J. F. Reichardt, whose 'Lieb' und Treue' was the first Liederspiel. It was an attempt to bring back the musical stage of Germany from artifice to natural sentiment. Reichardt's interesting account of his experiment and the reasons which led to it, will be found in the A.M.Z., 1801 (709-17). After Reichardt, Himmel, Lortzing, Eberwein and a number of other second-class writers composed Liederspiel which were very popular, and they still are to be heard. Mendelssohn often speaks of his 'Heimkehr' (Son and Stranger) as a Liederspiel, but that can only be by an extension of the phrase beyond its original meaning.

LIEDERTAFEL (Ger.), originally a society of men who met together on fixed evenings for the practice of vocal music in four parts, drinking forming part of the entertainment. These clubs arose during the political depression caused by Napoleon's rule in Germany; and the first, consisting of twenty-four members only, was founded by Zelter in Berlin, Dec. 28, 1808. Others soon followed at Frankfort and Leipzig, gradually relaxing the rules as to numbers. Bernhard Klein founded the Jüngere Berliner Liedertafel, which aimed at a higher standard of art. These societies gave an immense impetus to men's part-singing throughout Germany. Since the establishment of the Männergesangsvereine proper (male singing societies), the word Liedertafel has come to mean a social gathering of the 'Verein,' i.e. a gathering of invited ladies and gentlemen at which the members perform pieces previously learned. They are in fact informal concerts, where the guests move about, eat, drink and talk as they please, provided they keep silence during the singing. The Liedertafeln of the large male singing societies of Vienna, Munich and Cologne are pleasant and refined entertainments, not without a musical significance of their own. F. G.

LIED-FORM. The term Lied-form has unfortunately been used by different writers with different significations; and the vagueness which results, conjoined with the fact that the term is not happily chosen, renders it doubtful whether it had not better be entirely abandoned.

Some people use it merely to define any slight piece which consists mainly of a simple melody simply accompanied, in which sense it would be perfectly adapted to many of Mendelssohn's 'Lieder ohne Worte,' and innumerable other pieces of that class of small compositions for the pianoforte by various authors, as well as to songs. On the other hand, some writers have endeavoured to indicate by the term a form of construction, in the same sense as they would speak of the forms of the movements of sonatas. For the diffusion of this view Bernhard Marx appears to be responsible, and his definition will be best given in his own terms:

'Under this name of Lied-form we group all such pieces of music as have one single main idea, which is presented either in one developed section, or as a period (with first and second phrase), or even as a period divided into first and second similar parts, or into first, second and third parts (in which case the last is generally a repetition of the first). It is possible in Lied-form to have even two such complete forms aggregated into one piece; but then they occur without close connexion or interweaving with one another, perhaps with the two parts twice or three times repeated; in which case the second group will be called a Trio, and the third the second Trio, and be treated as a second independent piece. For the sake of contrast, such Trios will often be in another key, or in other key relationship, such as minor corresponding to major, and major to minor, of the same key, etc., return being afterwards made to the first portion and the original key to make the piece complete. In this Lied-form are cast most of the Lieder which are intended to be sung, dances, marches, many études, introductions, etc.'

Marx further gives formulas, or types, of the harmonic distribution of this kind of composition,² and discusses the details of the structure at length.³

To this classification there appear to be two main objections. The first is the choice of the distinctive name 'Lied' for a form which comprises dances, marches and other alien forms of music. Were there nothing else to say against it, it would certainly jar against our sense of fitness to have to speak of the funeral march in the Eroica Symphony, or the Scherzo of the Ninth Symphony, or even of far less conspicuously alien examples, such as the waltz in the 'Freischütz,' or a minuet of Haydn or Mozart, as in 'Lied-form.'

The other objection to the classification is its vagueness when formulated in such an empirical way; but in order to understand fully both this objection and the former it will be necessary to go somewhat deeper into the matter.

In every artistic whole there must be balance and proportion. In musical works this is chiefly obtained by the grouping of harmonies. An artistic whole may be obtained in one key by throwing stress first upon one harmonic centre, passing from that to one which represents an opposite phase, and then passing back to the original again. The harmonies of the Tonic and the Dominant represent the most complete opposition of phase in the diatonic series of any key; the most perfect simple balance is therefore to be found in their alternation. For example, the first fifteen bars of the Trio in the Scherzo of Beethoven's Symphony in A form a complete artistic whole of themselves. There are six bars of tonic harmony and one of dominant forming the first group, and then six of dominant harmony followed by one of tonic harmony forming the second group. The balance is perfect, and the form the simplest in all music; and it might reasonably be called the 'simple primary form.' It is to be found in the most diverse quarters, such as single chants of the Anglican Church, sailors' hornpipes, German popular waltzes and Ländler, and the trivial snatches of tunes in a French opéra-bouffe. The manner of obtaining the balance is, however, not necessarily restricted to the above order, for it is quite equally common to find each of the two groups containing a balance in themselves of tonic and dominant harmony. In that case the balance is obtained thus— $\overline{C} \overline{G} \overline{C} \overline{C} \overline{G} \overline{C}$, instead of $\overline{C} \overline{G} \overline{G} \overline{C}$ as in the former instance; but the principle which underlies them is the same, and justifies their being classed together. The subsidiary harmonies which are associated with these main groups are independent, but are most effective when they converge so as to direct attention to them. When greater extension is required, the balance is found between key and key, each key being severally distinguished by an alternation of harmonic roots so as to be severally complete when they are to be a prominent part of the form. Subsidiary transitions occur much as the subsidiary harmonies in the preceding class, and must be regarded in the same light. The identity of principle in these two classes is obvious, since in both alike it consists of taking a definite point to start from and marking it clearly, then passing to another point which will afford the needed contrast, and returning to the original to conclude. But as in the latter class the process is complicated by the changes of key, it may best be distinguished from the former as 'complex primary form.'

It is not necessary to enter into details on the subject of the extent, treatment and distribution of the keys; neither is it possible, since the principle when put upon this broad basis admits of very great variety, as indeed it is desirable that it should. But to guard against misapprehension, it may be as well to point out a few of the broadest facts.

In the first place, the several sections which serve to mark the elements of form need not be distinct and independent pieces, though they most frequently are so in the older opera and oratorio songs, and in the minuets and trios, or marches and trios, of instrumental music. In many examples, especially such as are on a small scale, there is no marked break in the continuity of the whole, the division at most amounting to nothing more than a cadence or half-close and a double bar, and often to not even so much as that. With regard to the distribution of ideas, it may be said that the several sections are often characterised by totally independent subjects, especially when the piece is on a large scale; but there are many examples, especially in the form of themes for variations, when, notwithstanding a certain freedom of modulation, the predominance of one main idea is unbroken.

Professor Marx has called attention to the fact that this form is sometimes amplified by repetition; that is to say, when the return to the original key has been made to follow the contrasting section or Trio, a fresh departure is made, and another contrasting section or Trio is given, after which follows the final return to the original key and idea. Examples of this occur in the symphonies of Beethoven and Schumann, as well as in less important works; and it is well to take note of the fact that in this case the form under consideration shows its close relationship to the rondo form; for that form in the hands of early instrumental composers such as Rameau and Couperin was little else than the frequent repetition of a main idea in a principal key, interspersed with contrasting episodes, which in the present case answer to the trios.

The occurrence of codas with this form is very common, but for the discussion of that point reference must be made to the article under that head and to the article FORM.

Finally, it will be well to return shortly to the consideration of the distinctive name of 'Lied' which has been given to this form. In the choice of it its author was probably guided by a well-grounded opinion of the superior antiquity of song to other kinds of music, which led him to infer that the instrumental forms which he put under the same category were imitated from the 'Lieder.' But this is not by any means inevitable. It will have been seen from the above discussion that in this form the simplest means of arriving at artistic balance and proportion are made use of; and those would have been chosen by the instinct of the earliest composers of instrumental music without any necessary knowledge that vocal music was cast in the same mould. And there is more than this. In songs and other vocal music the hearer is so far guided by the sense of the words that a total impression of completeness may be obtained even with very vague structure in the music; whereas in instrumental music, unless the form is clear and appreciably defined, it is impossible for the most intelligent hearer to realise the work as a whole. So that, in point of fact, vocal music can do without a great deal of that which is vital to instrumental music; and therefore the Lied is just the member of the group which it is least satisfactory to take as the type: but as this form has been classified under that head, it has been necessary so to review it fully, in order that a just estimation may be formed of its nature, and the reason for taking exception to the title. The form itself is a very important one, but inasmuch as it admits of great latitude in treatment, it appears that the only satisfactory means of classifying it, or making it explicable, is by putting it on as broad a basis as possible, and giving it a distinctive title which shall have reference to its intrinsic constitution, and not to one of the many kinds of music which may, but need not necessarily, come within its scope.

LIE-NISSEN, ERIKA (b. Kangsviger, Jan. 17, 1845; d. Christiania, Oct. 27, 1903), a distinguished Norwegian pianist, was brought up in a family where many eminent musicians were guests. On the death of her father, a lawyer, the family went to live at Christiania, where Erika Lie became the pupil of Kjerulf; in 1860 she went to Berlin to study the piano with Kullak, and her progress was so rapid that she was appointed a teacher in his conservatorium. In 1866 she went to Paris and had some lessons from Tellefsen, and in 1870 she went to Copenhagen as professor of the piano at the Conservatorium there. She undertook many concert tours all over Europe, making a great success in the works of Chopin and the romantic school. In 1874 she married Dr. Oscar Nissen of Christiania; in 1894 she received a yearly grant from the Norwegian Storting. She died at Christiania and was buried at the Vor Frelzers Church. Edvard Grieg conducted the musical part of the service (Musical News, obituary notice, Nov. 28, 1903).

LIGHT, EDWARD, a musician who claimed the invention of the harp-lute and a kindred instrument named the Apollo-lyre. The HARP-LUTE (q.v.), known also as the dital harp, was popular at the junction of the 18th and 19th centuries, and the Apollo-lyre less so. The latter took the form of the ancient instrument, but it had a centre finger-board and a sound chamber. In 1794 Light was living at Kensington, and about this period he was making the above two instruments for sale. He soon removed to 8 Foley Place, Cavendish Square, and was 'lyrist to the Princess of Wales.' In 1818¹ he took out a patent in connexion with the harp-lute which shortly after this date was made by Wheatstone & Co. Light was a teacher of the guitar, and arranged some music for it. He published a number of works, being arrangements and instructions for the harp-lute, Apollo-lyre, and for the guitar. F. K.

LILIENCRON, ROCHUS FREIHERR VON (b. Plön, Holstein, Dec. 8, 1820; d. Coblenz, Mar. 5, 1912). After going through a course of theology and law at Kiel and Berlin, and graduating both as Doctor of Theology and Philosophy, he devoted himself chiefly to Germanistic studies, including Old Norse languages and literature, on which he contributed various essays to periodicals. From 1848-50 he was in the diplomatic service of the Schleswig-Holstein Government during the war with Denmark. In 1850 he became professor of Old Norse languages and literature at Kiel, and in 1852 of 'Germanistik' at Jena. From 1855-68 he was Goheimer Kabinettsrat (Privy Cabinet Councillor) to the Duke of Meiningen. In 1855 he published 'Lieder und Sprüche aus der letzten Zeit des Minnesangs,' containing twenty melodies with texts from the celebrated Jena Minnesänger codex, written about 1320. Dr. Wilhelm Stade of Jena provided the melodies with a modern setting in four-part harmony. Liliencron afterwards settled at Munich as editor of the Allgemeine deutsche Biographie. It was also during his stay at Munich that he published Die historischen Volkslieder der Deutschen vom 13.-16. Jahrh. in five volumes (1865-69), the last volume containing valuable notes on the old tunes, besides eighteen polyphonic settings of some of them by H. Isaac, Senfl, H. Finck, Mahu and others. For Kürschner's Deutsche National-Literatur, Bd. 13 (1884), he published Deutsches Leben im Volkslied um 1530, which contains 147 Volkslieder of the 16th-century texts and melodies.

From 1876 Liliencron chiefly resided at Schleswig as Prälat des St. Johannisstiftes. Later he occupied himself much with the question of church music. Besides contributing various essays on the subject to Siona and other church and musical periodicals, he published in 1893 Liturgisch-musikalische Geschichte der evangel.-Lutherischen Gottesdienste von 1523 bis 1700, which is a valuable sketch of the history of Lutheran church music from the liturgical point of view up to the rise of the form of church cantata as perfected by Sebastian Bach. It is based on a thorough liturgical as well as musical knowledge, and is in effect a plea for the closer welding of music with the liturgy by a return to the older forms of liturgical music. Practical proposals to the same effect were embodied in Chorordnung für die Sonn- und Festtage des evangel. Kirchenjahres (Gütersloh, 1900). The task of providing a musical setting for the liturgical texts contained in this work in accordance with the author's principles, he entrusted to a Berlin musician, H. van Eyken. Another historico-musical work by Liliencron of some importance is Die Horazischen Metren in deutschen Kompositionen des 16ten Jahrhunderts, which includes nineteen Odes of Horace as set in simple note-for-note counterpoint, and in accordance with metrical principles by Tritonius, Senfl and Hofhaimer. An edition of these settings in modern score was published by Breitkopf & Härtel. Among the recent works of Liliencron may be mentioned a novel, Wie man im Amwald Musik macht (1903), written to further the cause of reform in church music. Mention may also be made of an earlier writing on the Danish composer C. E. F. Weyse, and Danish music generally (1878). From 1900 he was appointed president and leading director of the Royal Prussian Commission for the editing and publication of the D.D.T. J. R. M.

LILLIBURLERO, a 17th-century party tune, and used to-day by Irish Orangemen to a song called 'Protestant Boys.' It has been attributed to Henry Purcell, but whether Purcell composed the melody or only fitted the bass is a question not finally settled.¹

The tune first appears as a 'Quick Step' in the 2nd edition of The Delightful Companion, or Choice New Lessons for the Recorder or Flute, 1686, as follows:

The words are a doggerel set of satirical verses upon the appointment of General Talbot to the Lieutenancy of Ireland in 1687. They begin:

'Ho! broder Teague, dost hear de decree,
Lilliburlero, bullen a la,
Dat we shall have a new deputie,
Lilliburlero, bullen a la,
Liero, lero, lilliburlero lero, lero, bullen a la.

'Ho! by Shalnt Tyburn It is de Talbote, Lilliburlero, etc..
And he will cut all de English troate,
Lilliburlero, etc., etc.'

The whole words will be found in Percy's Reliques of Ancient English Poetry. The words or the tune quickly caught on, and Bishop Burnet in his History of His Own Time mentions the effect that the 'foolish ballad, treating the Papists and chiefly the Irish in a ridiculous manner,' had upon the political events of that day. 'The whole army and at last the people, both in the city and country, were singing it, and perhaps never had so slight a thing so great an effect.' There were numerous songs set to the air, all having a strong Protestant bearing.

Whether the tune which we now know as 'Lilliburlero' is the original one for the song is rather doubtful, for in the Bodleian Library is an early broadside, with music, headed 'A New Song,' the words being the same as above quoted. The broadside formerly belonged to Antony à Wood.

The music is as follows:

It will be noticed that the tune is 'Cold and Raw' or 'Stingo.'

Henry Purcell's name was first associated with the tune in the second part of Musick's Hand Maid, containing the newest Lessons, Grounds, Sarabands, Minuets and Jiggs set forth for the Virginal and Spinnet, 1689. It is set down there as 'A New Irish Tune,' and on the same line 'H. Purcell,' either as composer or merely responsible for the bass. There are no words given. Purcell used the air as a ground bass to the fifth piece in 'The Gordian Knot unty'd' in 1691.

An attempt has been made to fathom the mystery of the words 'Lilliburlero,' etc., but nothing that can be relied upon has been elicited. The chances are they are merely nonsense words. F. K.

LILT (verb and noun), to sing, pipe or play cheerfully, or, according to one authority, even sadly; also, a gay tune. The term, which is of Scottish origin, but is used in Ireland and occurs in Chaucer would seem to be derived from the bagpipe, one variety of which is described in the 'Houlate' (an ancient allegorical Scottish poem dating 1450) as the 'Lilt-pype.' Whenever, in the absence of a musical instrument to play for dancing, the Irish peasant girls sing lively airs to the customary syllables la-la-la, it is called 'lilting.' The classical occurrence of the word is in the Scottish song 'The Flowers of the Forest,' a lament for the disastrous field of Flodden, where it is contrasted with a mournful tone:

'I've heard them liltin' at the ewe milkin',
Lasses a-liltin' before dawn of day;
Now there's a moanin' on lila green loanin',
The Flowers of the Forest are a' wede away.'

The Skene MS., ascribed (though not conclusively¹) to the reign of James VI. of Scotland, contains six lilt: 'Ladio Rothemaysis' (the air to the ballad of the Burning of Castle Frindraught), 'Lady Laudians' (Lothian's), 'Ladio Cassilles' (the air of the ballad of Johnny Faa), Leslies, Adornicis and Gilreich's Lilt. We quote 'Ladie Cassilles':

W. Dauncey, editor of the Skene MS., supposes the Liltpipe to have been a shepherd's pipe, not a bagpipe, and the Lilt to have sprung from the pastoral districts of the Lowlands.

He came from a musical family; his younger brother, Bras Francisco de Lima (d. 1813) was the composer of several oratorios (Bibl. da Ajuda, Lisbon). Jeronymo was early recognised as a composer, as his early election to the Brotherhood of St. Cecilia (1767) shows. He visited Italy, and afterwards (1798) succeeded Carvalho as conductor of the Royal Opera. He composed a good deal of minor music, but his claim to remembrance is as one of the founders of the College of Organists, which, owing to his zeal and devotion, was established in 1864. He

LINCKE,² JOSEPH (b. Trachenberg, Prussian Silesia, June 8, 1783; d. Mar. 26, 1837), eminent violoncellist and composer, learnt the violin from his father, a violinist in the chapel of Prince Hatzfeld, and the violoncello from Oswald. A mismanaged sprain of the right ankle left him lame for life.³ At 10 he lost his parents, and was obliged to support himself by copying music, until in 1800 he procured a place as violinist in the Dominican convent at Breslau. There he studied the organ and harmony under Hanisch, and also pursued the violoncello under Lose, after whose departure he became first violoncellist at the theatre, of which C. M. von Weber was then Kapellmeister. In 1808 he went to Vienna, and was engaged by Prince Rasoumowsky⁴ for his private quartet party, at the suggestion of Schuppanzigh. In that house, where Beethoven was supreme, he had the opportunity of playing the great composer's works under his own supervision.⁵ Beethoven was much attached to Lincke, and continually calls him 'Zunftmeister Violoncello,' or some other droll name, in his letters. The State Library at Berlin⁶ contains a comic canon in Beethoven's writing on the names Brauchle and Lincke:

The two sonatas for PF. and violoncello (op. 102) were composed by Beethoven while he and Lincke were together at the Erdödy's in 1815.⁷

Lincke played in Schuppanzigh's public quartets, and Schuppanzigh in turn assisted Lincke at his farewell concert, when the programme consisted entirely of Beethoven's music, and the great composer himself was present. His playing appears to have been remarkable for its humour, and he is said to have been peculiarly happy in expressing Beethoven's characteristic style, whence no doubt the master's fondness for him.⁸ He then went to Grätz, and from thence to Pancovecz, near Agram, the residence of Countess Erdödy, as her chamber virtuoso, where he remained a year and a half. In 1818 he was engaged by Freiherr von Braun as first violoncellist in the theatre 'an der Wien,' and in 1831 played with Merk, the distinguished violoncellist, in the orchestra of the Court Opera.

² It is perhaps in allusion to this that Bernard writes, 'Lincke has only one fault—that he is crouched' (drum).

He lectured frequently on musical subjects, in London, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Manchester, Liverpool, etc. In a lecture on Mendelssohn, at the Western Literary Institution, on Dec. 23, 1845, that master's violin concerto was played for the first time in England by Kreutzor, with Lincoln at the pianoforte. LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS THEATRE stood nearly in the centre of the south side of Lincoln's Inn Fields, the principal entrance being in Portugal Street. It was erected by Christopher Rich, and opened (after his death) in 1714 by his son, John Rich, with Farquhar's comedy 'The Recruiting Officer.' Here Rich first introduced his pantomimes, a curious mixture of masque and harlequinade in which he himself, under the name of Lun, performed the part of Harlequin. Galliard was his composer and Popusch his music director. (See GALLIARD; PEPUSEH.) Here THE BEGGAR'S OPERA (q.v.) was first produced in 1727. Rich removing in 1732 to the new theatre in Covent Garden, the house in Lincoln's Inn Fields was let for a variety of purposes. Here in 1734 Italian operas were given, in opposition to Handel's at the King's Theatre, with Porpora as composer and Senesino as principal singer; and here, when Handel was compelled to quit the King's Theatre, he, in his turn, gave Italian operas, and also, occasionally, oratorio performances. His 'Dryden's Ode on St. Cecilia's Day' was first performed here in 1739, and in 1740 his 'L' Allegro, Il Penseroso, ed Il Moderato,' his serenata 'Parnasso in Festa,' and his operetta 'Hymen.' Plays were occasionally performed here until 1756, when the building was converted into a barrack. It was afterwards occupied as Spode & Copeland's Salopian China Warehouse, until it was taken down in 1848 for the enlargement of the College of Surgeons.

This theatre must not be confounded with two others which previously stood near the same spot, viz. the Duke's Theatre, erected by Sir William Davenant in 1662, and occupied until 1671, when the company removed to Dorset Garden Theatre, and the Theatre in Little Lincoln's Inn Fields, built upon the same site and opened in 1695 with Congreve's 'Love for Love,' and occupied until the company removed to the Queen's Theatre in 1705, when it was abandoned. (See KING'S THEATRE.)

W. H. H.

LIND, JENNY (b. Stockholm, Oct. 6, 1820; d. Wynd's Point, Malvern, Nov. 2, 1887), famous soprano.

When she was 9 years old, Count Puke, director of the Court Theatre, admitted her to the school of singing which is attached to that establishment, and she received there her first lessons from the singing-master and court secretary Croelius, and subsequently from a master named Berg. After appearing in children's parts from 1830 onwards, she made her début at the Opera in her native city, Mar. 7, 1838, as Agatha in Weber's 'Froischütz,' and played afterwards the principal rôle in 'Euryanthe,' Alice in 'Robert le Diable,' and finally 'La Vestale,' all with brilliant success. In 1840 she was made a member of the Royal Swedish Academy of Music, and was appointed court singer. She upheld the Royal Theatre until July 1841, when she went to Paris in hope of improving her style of singing. There Manuel Garcia, after expressing the opinion that her voice had been worn out by faulty method and overwork, ultimately gave her lessons, during a period of eleven months. Meyerbeer, who happened to be at Paris at the time, heard her, was delighted, and foretold a brilliant future for the young singer. He arranged a private 'audition' for her at the Opéra, and recommended her for the Opera at Berlin. She returned to Stockholm for two years, and in 1844 went to Dresden to study German. In September she returned to Stockholm and took part in the fêtes at the crowning of King Oscar, but went to Berlin in October, and obtained an engagement at the Opera through the influence of Meyerbeer, who had written for her the principal rôle in his 'Feldlager in Schlesien,' afterwards remodelled as 'L'Étoile du nord.'

She appeared first, Dec. 15, as Norma, and was welcomed with enthusiasm; and afterwards played, with equal success, her part in Meyerbeer's new opera. She also appeared as Euryanthe and in 'La Sonnambula.' In the following spring she sang at Hanover and Hamburg. After this tour she returned again to Stockholm and once more enjoyed a triumphant success. She sang before Queen Victoria and Prince Albert at Stolzenfels in the following August, and appeared at Frankfort, Darmstadt and Copenhagen; she was again in Berlin in the winter, appearing in the parts of Donna Anna, Agatha, the Vestalin, and Valentine in 'Les Huguenots.' At the Gewandhaus, Leipzig, she made her first appearance Dec. 4, 1845. Engaged soon after for Vienna, she appeared there Apr. 22, 1846, and at Whitsuntide of the same year sang in the Niederrheinische Fest at Aix-la-Chapelle, appearing at Hanover and Hamburg in the summer. After engagements at Darmstadt, Munich, Stuttgart and various cities of South Germany in the autumn, she returned to Vienna and added 'La figlia del reggimento' to her list of characters.

Difficulties had arisen between the two London managers, Bunn and Lumley, as to the validity of a contract which Jenny Lind had been induced to sign with the former, and it was not until May 4, 1847, that she appeared at Her Majesty's Theatre in 'Robert.' Moscheles had already met her in Berlin, and wrote thus (Jan. 10, 1845) of her performances in 'The Camp of Silesia':

'Jenny Lind has fairly enchanted me; she is unique in her way, and her song with two concertante flutes is perhaps the most incredible feat in the way of bravura singing that can possibly be heard. . . . How lucky I was to find her at home! What a glorious singer she is, and so unpretentious withal!'

This character, though true to life, was, however, shamefully belied by the management of the London Theatre, both before and after her arrival. It is curious now to look back upon the artifices employed, the stories of broken contracts (this not without some foundation), of long diplomatic pourparlers, special messengers, persuasion, hesitation and vacillations, kept up during many months,—all in order to excite the interest of the operatic public. Not a stone was left unturned, not a trait of the young singer's character, public or private, unexploited, by which sympathy, admiration, or even curiosity, might be aroused.¹

The interest and excitement of the public at her first appearance was, therefore, extraordinary. Yet her great singing in the part of Alice disappointed none but a very few, and those were silenced by a tumultuous majority of idolaters. She certainly sang the music splendidly, and acted the part irreproachably.

'From that first moment till the end of that season, nothing else was thought about, nothing else talked about, but the new Alice—the new Sonnambula—the new Maria in Donizetti's charming comic opera,—his best. Pages could be filled by describing the excesses of the public. Since the days when the world fought for hours at the pit-door to see the seventh farewell of Siddons, nothing had been seen in the least approaching the scenes at the entrance of the theatre when Mlle. Lind sang. Prices rose to a fabulous height. In short, the town, sacred and profane, went mad about "the Swedish nightingale."'

Her voice, which then at its very best showed some signs of early wear, was a soprano of bright, thrilling and remarkably sympathetic quality, from b to g'''. The upper part of her register was rich and brilliant, and superior both in strength and purity to the lower. These two portions she managed, however, to unite in the most skilful way, moderating the power of her upper notes so as not to outshine the lower. She had also a wonderfully developed 'length of breath,' which enabled her to perform long and difficult passages with ease, and to fine down her tones to the softest pianis-simo while still maintaining the quality unvaried. Her execution was very great, her shake true and brilliant, her taste in ornament altogether original, and she usually invented her own cadenze. In a song from 'Beatrice di Tenda' she had a chromatic cadenza ascending to E in alt, and descending to the note whence it had arisen, which could scarcely be equalled for difficulty and perfection of execution. The following, sung by her at the end of 'Ah! non giunge,' was given to the present writer by an ear-witness:

In this comparatively simple cadenza the highest notes, though rapidly struck, were not given in the manner of a shake, but were positively martelées, and produced an extraordinary effect. Another cadenza,² which, according to Moscheles, 'electrified' them at the Gewandhaus, occurred three times in one of Chopin's mazurkas:

Moscheles wrote (1847):

'What shall I say of Jenny Lind? I can find no words adequate to give you any real idea of the impression she has made. . . . This is no short-lived fit of public enthusiasm. I wanted to know her off the stage as well as on; but, as she lives some distance from me, I asked her in a letter to fix upon an hour for me to call. Simple and unceremonious as she is, she came the next day herself, bringing her answer verbally. So much modesty and so much greatness united are seldom if ever to be met with; and, although her intimate friend Mendelssohn had given me an insight into the noble qualities of her character, I was surprised to find them so apparent.'

Meanwhile Mlle. Lind maintained the mark which she had made in 'Robert' by her impersonation of the Sonnambula, a most effective character—Lucia, Adina in 'L' Elisir,' 'La figlia del reggimento,' and perhaps, altogether her best part, Giulia in Spontini's 'Vestale.' She also croated the part of Amalia in Verdi's 'I masnadieri' (July 22), and sang that of Susanna in 'Figaro.' In 1848 she returned to Her Majesty's Theatre, and added to these 'Lucia di Lammermoor' and 'L' Elisir d'amore.' In 1849 she announced her intention not to appear again on the stage, but so far modified this resolution as to sing at Her Majesty's Theatre in Mozart's 'Flauto magico' arranged as a concert, without acting (Apr. 12); the experiment was so unsuccessful that instead of similar concert performances previously announced, she gave six more operatic performances, appearing as Amina, Lucia, Maria and Alice. Her last appearance 'on any stage' took place in 'Roberto.' May 10, 1849. Henceforward she betook herself to the more congenial platform of the concert-room.

'The wild, queer northern tunes brought here by her, her careful expression of some of Mozart's great airs, her mastery over such a piece of execution as the Bird song in Haydn's "Creation," and lastly, the grandeur of inspiration with which the "Sanctus" of angels in Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was led by her (the culminating point in that oratorio). These are the triumphs which will stamp her name in the Golden Book of singers.'

On the other hand, the wondrous effect with which she sang a simple ballad, in the simplest possible manner, can never be forgotten by those who ever heard it. After another season in London, and a visit to Ireland in 1848, Mlle. Lind was engaged by Barnum,² the American speculator, to make a tour of the United States. She arrived there in 1850 and remained for nearly two years, during part of the time unfettered by an engagement with any impresario, but accompanied by Mr., afterwards Sir, Julius Benedict. The Americans, with their genius for appreciation and hospitality, welcomed her everywhere with frantic enthusiasm, and she made £20,000 in this progress. Here it was, in Boston, on Feb. 5, 1852, that she married Otto GOLDSCHMIDT (q.v.).

Returned to Europe, Mme. Goldschmidt now travelled through Holland, and again visited Germany. Dresden was her home from 1852-1855. In 1856 she came once more to England, and for some years appeared frequently in oratorios and concerts. Her actual last appearance was at a concert for a charity at Malvern, July 23, 1883. In that year she accepted an appointment as teacher of singing at the R.C.M., which she held till 1886.

It must be recorded that the whole of her American earnings was devoted to founding and endowing art scholarships and other charities in her native Sweden; while in England, the country of her adoption, among other charities she gave a whole hospital to Liverpool and a wing of another to London. In the winter of 1848-49 she raised a sum of £10,500 for charities. The scholarship founded in memory of her friend Felix Mendelssohn also benefited largely by her help and countenance. (See MENDELSSOHN SCHOLARSHIP.)

Madame Lind-Goldschmidt was respected and admired by all who knew her, the mother of a family, mixing in society, but in no degree losing her vivid interest in music. The Bach Choir, conducted by Goldschmidt, which gave the English public the first opportunity of hearing in its entirety the B minor Mass of that composer, profited in no small degree by the careful training bestowed on the female portion of the chorus by this great singer, and the enthusiasm inspired by her presence among them. On Apr. 20, 1894, H.R.H. Princess Christian unveiled a medallion of Jenny Lind in Westminster Abbey. (See Billroth's Studies in Music, p. 252.) J. M., with addns.

LINDBLAD, ADOLF FREDRICK (b. near Stockholm, Feb. 1, 1801; d. there, Aug. 23, 1878). This Swedish composer passed several years of his early life in Berlin, and studied music there under Zelter. In 1827 he returned to Stockholm and there resided, giving singing lessons and composing until his death.

Lindblad composed little instrumental music; a symphony in C,³ which was given under Mendelssohn's⁴ direction at one of the Gewandhaus Concerts at Leipzig in Nov. 1839, and a duo for pianoforte and violin (op. 9) are considered the best, but they aim so little at effect and are so full of the peculiar personality of their author that they can never be popular. His vocal compositions made him famous. He was eminently a national composer. He published a large collection of songs for voice and piano to Swedish words, which are full of melody, grace and originality. Written for the most part in the minor mode, they are tinged with the melancholy which is characteristic of Swedish music. In such short songs as 'The Song of the Dalecarlian Maiden,' 'Lament,' 'The Wood by the Aaron Lake,' etc., of which their extreme simplicity is of the very essence of their charm, his success has been most conspicuous. In longer and more elaborate songs, where the simplicity at which he aimed in his accompaniment has limited the variety of harmony and figures, the effect is often marred by repetition and consequent monotony. Yet even in this class of work there are many beautiful exceptions, and 'A Day in Spring,' 'A Summer's Day' and 'Autumn Evening' are specially worthy of mention.

Jenny Lind, who was Lindblad's pupil, introduced his songs into Germany, and their rapidly acquired popularity earned for the author the title of 'the Schubert of the North.' His only opera, 'Fronðärrarne,' was performed at Stockholm, 1835, and revived for the opening of the new opera-house there in 1898. Several of his vocal duets, trios and quartets have a considerable reputation in Sweden. A. H. W.

LINDBLAD, OTTO JONAS (b. Karlstorp, Småland, Mar. 31, 1809; d. N. Mellby, Skåne, Jan. 24, 1864), was a composer, particularly of choral music and quartets for men.

He was sent to Växjö to be educated as a clergyman. Here he was also instructed in music by Svensson, whom Lindblad himself mentions as an excellent organ-player 'à l'abbé Vogler.' In 1829 he matriculated at Lund, and about this time fell ill with smallpox. During his long convalescence he drifted, owing to his musical bent, further and further away from his academic studies. Together with two friends, Lindblad organised a trio, arranged for vocal as well as instrumental music, in which he took part as second tenor and also performed on the violin; it was by studying music and practising it that he developed his own talent in composition, in which he only had a few lessons from Krebs during a visit to Copenhagen. He was taught the violin by K. M. Lundholm, in whose home he lived for three years. Of great significance to Lindblad's musical education became the Henserska Theatre Company, which in 1836 visited the south of Sweden, producing operas by Weber, Mozart, Rossini, Boieldieu, etc. Lindblad took part in the orchestra and joined the company on their tour as orchestral leader. In 1841 he visited Hamburg, where he was invited as guest of honour to the musical festival. Whilst Haefner and Geijer founded the Swedish Student Song in Upsala, it was not long before Otto Lindblad organised the same in Lund, and it is due to him that it was raised to one of the foremost in the north.

He composed 124 songs, of which 66 were quartets; 5 choruses, with solos; 14 trios; 3 duets; and 36 solo songs. G. A. S.

LINDEMANN, MAGISTER JOHANN (b. Gotha, c. 1550), cantor at Gotha from c. 1571 or 1572, resigning 1631. He wrote sacred songs, words and music, and published a collection of New Year and Christmas songs by various masters (1598). Only the second of three volumes has been rediscovered so far; it contains 2 songs by Pevernage (Q.-L.).

LINDLEY, (1) ROBERT (b. Rotherham, Mar. 4, 1776; d. London, June 13, 1855), showed so early a predilection for music that when he was about 5 years of age his father, an amateur performer, began teaching him the violin, and at 9 years of age, the violoncello also. He continued to practise the latter until he was 16, when Cervetto, hearing him play, encouraged him and undertook his gratuitous instruction. He quitted Yorkshire and obtained an engagement at the Brighton theatre. In 1794 he succeeded Sperati as principal violoncello at the Opera and all the principal concerts, and retained undisputed possession of that position until his retirement in 1851. His intimacy with DRAGONETTI (q.v.) lasted for half a century. He was appointed professor of his instrument in the R.A.M. on its foundation in 1822.¹ Lindley's tone was remarkable for its purity, richness, mellowness and volume, and in this respect he has probably never been equalled. His technique, for that date, was remarkable, and his accompaniment of recitative was perfection. He composed several concertos and other works for his instrument, but his composition was by no means equal to his execution. His daughter married John Barnett the composer.

His son, (2) WILLIAM (b. 1802; d. Manchester, Aug. 12, 1869), was also a violoncellist. He was a pupil of his father, first appeared in public in 1817, and soon took a position in all the best orchestras. He gave great promise of future excellence, but was unable to achieve any prominence owing to extreme nervousness.

W. H. H.

LINDNER, FRIEDRICH (b. Liegnitz, Silesia, c. 1540; d. Nuremberg, Sept. 15, 1597), was first a boy chorister in the Electoral Chapel at Dresden, received his further education at the famous school at Pforta, and afterwards studied at Leipzig University. After serving for a while as Hof-musikus to the Margrave of Brandenburg at Ansbach, he received in 1574 the appointment of cantor to the important St. Aegidion Kirche at Nuremberg, where he died. Although Lindner published none of his own compositions, he is known to have sent to the Duke of Würtemberg in 1567 a Cantionalbuch for which he received the then considerable honorarium of 30 thaler, and again in 1570 and 1572 he also sent two musical settings of the Passion for which he received 6 and 10 thalers respectively (Eitner, Monatshefte, xxxi. pp. 18, 19). But he is chiefly known as the meritorious editor of various collections of music, sacred and secular, published by the Nuremberg firm of Gerlach, which are important as testifying to the kind of music which continued to be cultivated and favoured in the Lutheran churches and schools of Nuremberg and elsewhere. They are as follows:

1. Sacrae cantiones, 1585, 41 n. a 5-9; motets by Italian composers, chiefly of the Venetian school, but including some by Palestrina.
2. Continuatio Cantionum sacrarum, 1588, 56 n. a 4-12.
3. Corollarium cantionum sacrarum, 1590, 70 n. a 4-12.
4. Missa quinque, a 5.
5. Magnificat octo tonorum, 1591; three sets by Guerrero, Ruffo and Varotto, a 4 and 5.
6. Bicinia sacra, 80 n.
7. Gemma musicalis: three books, 1588, 1589, 1590, containing altogether 190 Italian madrigals by the most representative composers of the genre, such as Marenzio, the Gabrielli, Striggio and many others.

LINDPAINTNER, PETER JOSEPH VON (b. Coblenz, Dec. 9, 1791; d. Nonnenhorn, Aug. 21, 1856), studied the violin, piano and counterpoint at Augsburg, and subsequently appears to have received some instruction at Munich from Winter. In 1812 he accepted the post of Musik-director at the Isarthor Theatre in Munich, and whilst so engaged completed his musical studies under Jos. Grätz, an excellent contrapuntist. In 1819 he was appointed Kapellmeister to the Royal Band at Stuttgart, and held that post until his death, which took place during a summer holiday at Nonnenhorn, on the Lake of Constance. He was buried at Wasserburg. He died full of honours, a member of almost every musical institution of the Continent, and the recipient of gifts from many crowned heads—amongst others a medal from Queen Victoria, in 1848, for the dedication of his oratorio of 'Abraham.'

By quiet and persistent labour he raised his band to the level of the best in Germany, and acquired a very high reputation. 'Lindpaintner,' says Mendelssohn, describing a visit to Stuttgart in 1831,

'is in my belief the best conductor in Germany; it is as if he played the whole orchestra with his baton alone; and he is very industrious.'

Of the many professional engagements offered him in other towns and foreign countries, he accepted but one, and that, in 1853, three years before his death, was to conduct the New Philharmonic Concerts in London, at which his cantata 'The Widow of Nain,' his overtures to 'Faust' and 'The Vampyre,' and others of his compositions were given with success, including the song of 'The Standard-bearer,' at that time very popular, sung by Pischek. He conducted some of the New Philharmonic Concerts in 1854. He wrote 28 operas, 3 ballets, 5 melodramas and oratorios, several cantatas, 6 masses, a Stabat Mater, and above 50 songs with pianoforte accompaniment. To these were added symphonies, overtures, concertos, fantasias, trios and quartets for different instruments. He rescored 'Judas Maccabaeus.' Some of his symphonies, his operas 'Der Vampyr' and 'Lichtenstein,' his ballet 'Joko,' the overture to which was often heard at concerts, his music to Goethe's 'Faust' and Schiller's 'Song of the Bell,' have been pronounced to be among the best of his works. And two of his songs, 'The Standard-bearer' and 'Roland,' created at the time a veritable furore.

Though wanting in depth and originality Lindpaintner's compositions pleased by their clearness and brilliancy, melody and well-developed form; and the hand of a clever and practised musician is everywhere visible in them.

LINKE (LINECKE), JOHANN GEORG, was appointed violinist in the court orchestra, Berlin, 1711; left in 1713 at the dissolution of the orchestra; was Konzertmeister at the court of Weissenfels in 1718; went thence to England, and became leader at the Hamburg theatre in 1725, where he wrote the recitatives to some of Handel's operas. His own compositions, overtures, suites, concertos, trios, duos and sonatas for various instruments, remained in MS. (See Q.-L.)

LINKE, see LINCKE.

LINLEY, FRANCIS (b. Doncaster, 1771; d. there, Sept. 13, 1800¹), blind from his birth, studied music under Dr. Miller and became an able organist. He was chosen organist of St. James's Chapel, Pontonville, and soon afterwards married a blind lady of considerable fortune. He purchased the business of Bland, the music-seller in Holborn, in 1796, but his affairs becoming embarrassed, his wife parted from him and he went to America in the same year, where his playing and compositions were much admired. He returned to England in 1799. His works consist of songs, pianoforte and organ pieces, flute solos and duets, and an Organ Tutor. His greatest amusement was to explore churchyards and read the inscriptions on the tombstones by the sense of touch.

LINLEY, GEORGE (b. Leeds, 1798; d. Kensington, Sept. 10, 1865), composer. His birthplace² was a house in Briggate, where his father, James Linley, carried on business as a tinplate worker. As a young man he amused himself with much satirical literature, directed against the magnates of the town. He removed to London, and besides doing much literary work of sundry kinds, wrote the words or the music (frequently both) of some of the most popular drawing-room lyrics of the day: 'Ever of thee,' 'I cannot mind my wheel, mother,' 'Thou art gone from my gaze,' being among these productions.

His operas include 'Francesca Doria,' 1849; 'La Poupée de Nuremberg,' acted at Covent Garden in 1861; 'The Toymaker,' produced Nov. 10, in the same year at the same theatre, and 'Law versus Love,' 1862. He edited and arranged several collections of songs as: 'Scottish Melodies,' 'Songs of the Camp,' 'Original Hymn Tunes,' etc. Two books of Nursery Rhymes were among his latest musical works. His Musical Cynics of London, 1862, was an attack on the metropolitan music critics, H. F. Chorley being severely treated. The Modern Hudibras was published in 1864. He is said to have been a skilled violoncellist, and to have played at the Italian Opera. He was buried at Kensal Green.

began the study of music under Thomas Chilcot, organist of Bath Abbey church, and completed his education under Paradisus. He established himself as a singing-master at Bath, and for many years carried on the concerts there with great success. On the retirement of John Christopher Smith in 1774 Linley joined Stanley in the management of the oratorios at Drury Lane, and on the death of Stanley in 1786 continued them in partnership with Arnold. In 1775, in conjunction with his eldest son, Thomas (5), he composed and compiled the music for 'The Duenna,' by his son-in-law, Sheridan, which had the then unparalleled run of seventy-five nights in its first season. In 1776 he purchased part of Garrick's share in Drury Lane, removed to London and undertook the management of the music of the theatre, for which he composed several pieces of merit. He became a member of the Royal Society of Musicians in 1777. Linley died at his house in Southampton Street, Covent Garden, and was buried in Wells Cathedral. His dramatic pieces were :

The Royal Merchant, 1768.
 The Duenna, 1775.
 Selima and Azor (chiefly from Grétry, but containing the charming original melody, 'No flower that blows'), 1776.
 The Camp, 1778.
 The Carnival of Venice, The Gentle Shepherd and Robinson Crusoe, 1781.
 The Triumph of Mirth, 1782.
 The Spanish Maid, 1783.
 The Spanish Rivals, 1784.
 Tom Jones, 1785.
 The Strangers at Home, Richard Cœur de Lion (from Grétry), 1786, and Love in the East, 1788.
 The song in The School for Scandal, 1777, and accompaniments to the songs in The Beggar's Opera.

He also set such portions of Sheridan's Monody on the Death of Garrick, 1779, as were intended to be sung. 'Six Elegies' for three voices, composed at Bath (much commended by Burney), and 'Twelve Ballads' were published in his lifetime. The posthumous works of himself and his son Thomas, which appeared a few years after his death, in two vols., consist of songs, cantatas, madrigals and elegies, including the lovely five-part madrigal by him, 'Let me, careless,' one of the most graceful productions of its kind. As an English composer Linley takes high rank.

(2) ELIZABETH ANN, his eldest daughter, 'The Maid of Bath' (b. Bath, Sept. 7, 1754; d. Bristol, June 28, 1792), received her musical education from her father, and appeared at an early age with great success at the Bath concerts as a soprano singer. In 1770 she sang at the oratorios in London and at Worcester Festival, and rose high in public favour. In 1771 she sang at Hereford Festival, and in 1772 at Gloucester. On Apr. 13, 1773, she became, in romantic circumstances, the wife of Richard Brinsley Sheridan, and, after fulfilling engagements at Worcester Festival and at Oxford, contracted before her marriage, she retired at the zenith of her popularity. Her voice was of extensive compass, and she sang with equal excellence in both the sustained and florid styles. She was painted by Sir Joshua Reynolds as St. Cecilia, and sat for the Virgin in his 'Nativity.' She died of consumption at Hotwells, Bristol. (See the D.N.B., s.v. 'Sheridan, Elizabeth Ann,' from which corrections have been taken.)

(3) MARY (b. Bath; d. Clifton, July 27, 1787), his second daughter and pupil, also a favourite singer, sang with her sister at the oratorios, festivals, etc., and for a few years afterwards, until her marriage in 1780 with Richard Tickell, commissioner of stamps.

(4) MARIA (d. Bath, Sept. 15, 1784), third daughter of Thomas (1), was also a concert and oratorio singer. She died at an early age. Shortly before her death she raised herself in bed, and with momentary animation sang part of Handel's air 'I know that my Redeemer liveth,' and then, exhausted with the effort, sank down and soon afterwards expired.

(5) THOMAS (b. Bath, May 1756; d. Lincolnshire, Aug. 7, 1778), eldest son of Thomas (1), displayed at an early age extraordinary skill on the violin, and at 8 years old performed a concerto in public. After studying with his father he was placed under Boyce. He then went to Florence and took lessons on the violin from Nardini, and whilst there became acquainted with Mozart, then about his own age, and a warm attachment sprang up between them; when they parted they were each bathed in tears, and Mozart often afterwards spoke of Linley with the greatest affection. On returning to England he became leader and solo-player at his father's concerts at Bath, and subsequently at the oratorios, etc., at Drury Lane. In 1773 he composed an anthem with orchestra ('Let God arise') for the Worcester Festival. In 1775 he assisted his father in 'The Duenna' by writing the overture, three or four airs, a duet and a trio. He subsequently composed a chorus and two songs for introduction into 'The Tempest.' In 1776 he produced 'An Ode on the Witches and Fairies of Shakspeare.' He also composed a short oratorio, 'The Song of Moses,' performed at Drury Lane, and added accompaniments for wind instruments to the music in 'Macbeth.' He was unfortunately drowned, through the upsetting of a boat, whilst on a visit at the Duke of Ancaster's, Grimsby, Lincolnshire. The greater part of his miscellaneous compositions are contained in the two vols. of posthumous works above mentioned.

Another son, (6) OZIAS THURSTON (b. 1765; d. Dulwich College, Mar. 6, 1831), was also instructed in music by the father. He entered the Church and obtained a living, which he resigned on being appointed, May 5, 1816, a junior fellow and organist of Dulwich College.

(7) WILLIAM (b. circa 1771; d. London, May

6, 1835), youngest son of Thomas (1), was educated at St. Paul's and Harrow, and learned music from his father and Abel. Fox procured for him a writership at Madras. He came back to England in 1796, joined his brother-in-law, Sheridan, in the management of Drury Lane Theatre, and between that year and 1880 brought out three pieces, 'Harlequin Captive,' 'The Honeymoon' and 'The Pavilion' (afterwards called 'The Ring'). They were unsuccessful, and in 1800 the author resumed his official duties at Madras. He was subsequently paymaster at Nellore, and in 1805 was sub-treasurer to the presidency, Fort St. George. In 1806 he returned from India with a competence, and devoted his attention to literature and music, composed many glees ('At that dread hour' won the Glee Club prize in 1821), published a set of songs, two sets of canzonets, and many detached pieces, edited Shakspeare's Dramatic Songs, two vols. fol. 1815-16, and wrote two novels and several pieces of poetry.

LINTERN, J. and W., music publishers in Bath at the end of the 18th century. Their place of business was in the Abbey Churchyard. One of the partners had been a blacksmith, and is said to have first given the title 'The Harmonious Blacksmith' to Handel's well-known composition on a copy which he published. 'The Harmonious Blacksmith' had been a nickname bestowed on Lintern himself.

LIPINSKI, KARL JOSEPH (b. Radzyn, Poland, Oct. 30,¹ 1790; d. Orlow, near Lemberg, Dec. 16, 1861), eminent violinist, was son of a land-agent and amateur violinist, who taught him the elements of fingering.

He became in 1810 first Konzertmeister, and then Kapellmeister, of the theatre at Lemberg. Not being able to play the piano, he used to lead the rehearsals with his violin, and thus acquired that skill in part-playing which was one of his great characteristics as a virtuoso. In 1814 he resigned his post and gave himself up to private study. In 1817 he went to Italy, chiefly in the hope of hearing Paganini. They met in Milan, and Paganini took a great fancy to him, played with him daily, and even performed in public with him at two concerts (Apr. 17 and 30, 1818), a circumstance which greatly increased Lipinski's reputation. Towards the close of the year Lipinski returned to Germany, but soon went back to Italy, attracted by the fame of an aged pupil of Tartini, Dr. Mazzurana. Dissatisfied with Lipinski's rendering of one of Tartini's sonatas, but unable on account of his great age (90) to correct him by playing it himself, Mazzurana gave him a poem, which he had written to explain the master's intentions. With this aid Lipinski mastered the sonata, and in consequence endeavoured for the future to embody some poetical idea in his playing—the secret of his own success, and of that of many others who imitated him in this respect. In 1829 Paganini and Lipinski met again in Warsaw, but unfortunately a rivalry was excited between them which destroyed the old friendship. In 1835 and 1836, in the course of a lengthened musical tour, he visited Leipzig, and there made the acquaintance of Schumann, which resulted in the dedication to him of the 'Carneval' (op. 9), which had been composed in 1834. In 1836 he visited England and played his military concerto at the Philharmonic Concert of Apr. 25. In 1839 Lipinski became Konzertmeister at Dresden, where he entirely reorganised the Royal Chapel, thus doing very much the same service to Dresden that Hellmesberger subsequently did to Vienna. He retired with a pension in 1861, and died of sudden paralysis of the lungs at Orlow, his country house near Lemberg.

His compositions (now forgotten) are numerous, and his concertos, fantasias and variations are valuable contributions to violin music. One of the best known was the 'Military Concerto,' which for years was much played. In conjunction with Zalewski, the Polish poet he edited an interesting collection of Galician 'Volkslieder' with pianoforte accompaniments.

LIPKOWSKA, LYDIA (b. Russia), operatic soprano. Her musical studies were carried on in St. Petersburg during the three or four years preceding 1910, when she made her début there at the Maryinsky Theatre. She was engaged in the following year for the summer season at Covent Garden, and made her first appearance on July 11 in Wolf-Ferrari's 'Segreto di Susanna.' To a voice of singular purity and sweetness, not lacking power in the head register, mounting easily to the E flat in alt, and admirably trained, she added the charm of an engaging stage presence and a refined, intelligent style. Her success as Susanna she followed up with others as Mimi, Gilda and Violetta, sustaining the last-named rôle on May 22, 1912, when 'La Traviata' was given at Covent Garden for the 150th time. In these same years she also sang with marked acceptance at New York, Boston and Chicago, extending her repertory by singing Tatiana (in Tchaikovsky's 'Eugen Onégini'), Manon Lescaut and Juliette.

LIPOWSKY, FELIX JOSEPH (b. Wiesensteig, Jan. 25, 1764; d. Munich, Mar. 21, 1844), a high official and councillor in the Bavarian Government, who, on the dissolution of the religious orders under Napoleon, saved the documents and collected them in the State Library, of which he became the head. In 1811 he produced his Baierisches Musik-Lexikon.

He composed a Mass, 4 v. (1789), and a number of pianoforte solos and sonatas with and without other instruments, which remained in MS.

LIPPARINO, GUGLIELMO, of Bologna, a 16th-17th century Augustinian monk; maestro di cappella at Como Cathedral from 1619; returned afterwards to Bologna, and composed, between 1609 and c. 1639, 8- and 9-part masses with a Te Deum, madrigals, 5 v. (1614), motets (1635), psalms, 8 v. (1637), sacri concerti, canzonets, canzoni, etc. (Q.-L.).

LIPPIUS, JOHANN, Ph.D. (b. Strassburg, June 25, 1585; d. on journey to Speyer, Sept. 24, 1612). Doctor of Philosophy, theologian and musician; pupil of Calvisius. He wrote a number of theoretical works on music which were held in high repute, and was one of the pioneers who changed the view-point from polyphony to harmony.

LIPSIUS, MARIE (known under the pseudonym 'LA MARA') (b. Leipzig, Dec. 30, 1837; d. there, Mar. 2, 1927), a member of a literary family, devoted her life to the literature of music. Her works consist of the following: Musikalische Studienköpfe (five volumes, 1868-82, of which the first series went through nine editions); Musikalische Gedanken-Polyphonie (1873), a collection of musicians' sayings about their art; Beethoven (2nd ed. 1873); Das Bühnenfestspiel in Bayreuth (1877); a translation of Liszt's Chopin (1880); Musikerbriefe aus fünf Jahrhunderten (1886); Klassisches und Romantisches aus der Tonwelt (1892); and many other books of value. She edited several collections of letters, such as Liszt's correspondence from 1828-86 (translated into English by Constance Bache, and issued with some additional letters, in 1894); three volumes of letters to Liszt from various contemporaries (1893-1904); the correspondence between Liszt and Von Bülow (1898); and Berlioz's letters to the Princess Karolyne zu Sayn-Wittgenstein (1903). Further volumes of Liszt records include Liszt und die Frauen (1911) and Briefe F. Liszts an seine Mutter (1918). (See LISZT BIBL.) In her book Beethoven und die Brunsviks (1920) she held that the 'unsterbliche Gebiete' was Josephine, Therese's younger sister. She held the title of Royal Professor till her 80th birthday (1917), and in that year published her autobiography, Durch Musik und Leben im Dienste des Ideals (2 vols.). (Riemann.) M.

LIRA. A name given in mediæval times to the smaller bowed instruments such as the rebec and also to the hurdy-gurdy, but from the 15th century onward more especially to bowed instruments furnished with additional strings, some of them placed at the side of the fingerboard, like the free-vibrating 'bourdons' of the large theorbo lutes and chitarroni. According to Praetorius (1618) the principal forms were two, viz. the Lira da braccio with 7 strings, two off the fingerboard (see PLATE LXXXVIII. No. 5, and VIOL FAMILY), and the Lira da gamba (Lirone perfetto or Arciviola de lira) with 12, 14 or 16 strings, two of them generally at the side (PLATE LXXXVIII. No. 4). Sixteenth-century specimens of both these forms are preserved in the Museum of the Conservatoire de Musique at Brussels and in the Heyer Musikhistorisches Museum, formerly Cologne, now Leipzig.

For the Lira da braccio, a favourite instrument of Ferdinand IV., King of Naples, Haydn wrote seven nocturnes and five concertos. The tuning was that of the violin for the first three strings, the 4th string (G) was doubled by another an octave higher, while the two strings off the fingerboard were tuned to C (Tenor C) and its upper octave.

The Lira da gamba or Lirone was a much more elaborate instrument, its strings being tuned in a succession of consecutive fifths with two 'bourdons' in octaves: this unique arrangement, together with the almost flat bridge and the long bow, facilitated the execution of chords as an accompaniment to the voice (see art. CRWTH). Hence according to Ceruti (1776) it was called in Italy the Accordo. The English lyra viol of the 17th century was an attempt to reproduce by various tunings the full-chord effect of the Lira upon the Viola da gamba. (See LYRA VIOL; VIOLIN FAMILY.)

LISTENIUS, MAGISTER NIKOLAUS (b. Brandenburg, c. 1500), wrote a small compendium of music, 'Rudimenta musica,' etc., published at Wittenberg, 1533, which until 1583 appeared in numerous editions, legitimate and pirated.

LISZT, FRANZ (FERENCZ) (b. Raiding, Hungary, Oct. 22, 1811; d. Bayreuth, July 31, 1886), as pianist and composer one of the outstanding figures of 19th-century music, was the son of Adam Liszt, a steward in the service of Prince Esterhazy, and a musical amateur of sufficient attainment to instruct his son in the rudiments of pianoforte-playing.

At the age of 9 young Liszt made his first appearance in public at Ödenburg with such success that several Hungarian noblemen guaranteed him sufficient means to continue his studies for six years. For that purpose he sympathy, up to the time when he gave up the regular career of a virtuoso. In regard to pianoforte technique his work was of the utmost importance; the full discussion of this point must be left to another place (see PIANOFORTE-PLAYING). It must suffice here to say that, even to those who only heard him in the last year of his life, his playing was a thing never to be forgotten, or approached by later artists. The peculiar quiet brilliance of his rapid passages, the noble proportion kept between the parts, and the meaning and effect which he put into the music, were the most striking points, for it is quite a mistake to suppose that the habit of thumping, which so many of his pupils and followers thought fit to adopt, came from himself.

His pianoforte transcriptions and arrangements cover an immense field of music, good, bad and indifferent. Yet very few of the productions suggest that they were done 'to order,' or that the task was at all uncongenial to the arranger. Among the most famous of these, and as a matter of fact among the very best, are the arrangements of Schubert's songs, in many of which he contrives to throw a new light on Schubert's ideas, and, in the opinion of a good many people, to enhance their beauty. Naturally there are cases where his additions cannot meet with unqualified approval from every one; but his sympathy with this master was so complete that he very seldom erred in taste in treating his music. Even operatic fantasias, which for the most part are the dreariest of imaginable compilations, became, in Liszt's hands, things of some beauty and musical interest, besides reproducing the theatrical situation with success. One of the many paradoxes of Liszt's nature was his warm admiration for the kind of themes that we associate with Bellini and Donizetti, combined with a rather uncouth type of melodic invention, in the case of his own creations, which assorts remarkably ill with the Italian sentimentality. In his own original work as a composer it is remarkable that he nearly always required a poetic idea to illustrate in his compositions. (In this connexion it is of course possible that the process was similar to that employed by Schumann, i.e. the music may have been composed first, and the fancy title found for it afterwards; but, taking all the compositions into consideration, it would seem more likely that, in the great majority of instances, the music was deliberately written up to an impression produced by some other art, or by some natural scene.) It is not exactly that the imagination was defective, but it required to be kindled from without.

Liszt's efforts at abstract music are very few and, for the most part, very unsatisfactory. This is no doubt explained by the circumstance that so much of his early life had been given to the attainment of his wonderful pianoforte technique that he could not undergo the drudgery of learning how to develop musical themes and how to make them self-dependent and inherently interesting. Their actual fabric as well as their invention often leaves much to be desired, more especially in such things as the pianoforte ballades or the sonata in B minor. Liszt's themes, in fact, are most rarely such as to produce the feeling in the hearer that a new revelation was made in them. Where he was supreme was in his handling of the orchestra, and it must for ever be a problem how he learnt the art of scoring. The 'Hungarian Rhapsodies,' in the transference between the piano and the orchestra of the special effects of the national bands, must have been the means by which he became the master of the orchestra that we know him to have been. The 'Symphonic Poems' mark the point of greatest divergence from the classical ideals, and the discussion they aroused was the chief cause of the defection of Joachim and others from the Liszt camp. Even Wagner hesitated for a time before accepting some of the perversities which occur in them, just as in earlier days some of Liszt's extravagances in his pianoforte works had repelled Chopin. The symphonic poems and the 'Faust' and 'Dante' symphonies are the works in which the theories of 'programme music' were pushed to the furthest point reached in that peculiar department of art until the advent of Strauss. The fact that this latter composer has out-Liszted Liszt must not blind us to the boldness of Liszt's work at the time it was written. (See ABSOLUTE MUSIC; PROGRAMME MUSIC.) From the purely musical point of view the 'Faust' symphony is far superior to the 'Dante,' and the conception of the work seems more spontaneous than that of the other, or of most of the symphonic poems. Of the finale Dann-reuther (see below) says:

'This movement exhibits the outlines of symphonic structure . . . but the details for the most part have reference to the exigencies of the poetical idea, and such exigencies are permitted to overrule considerations of musical consistency and beauty.'

In this class of his compositions Liszt laid great stress upon an innovation which has been generally associated with his name, although it had been practically used from time to time long before his days. The system of 'Transformation of Themes,' as he called it, is beyond question an easier thing to handle than the logical development which the older masters preferred. This may or may not have been the reason why Liszt adopted it so readily. It is easy to see that it lends itself well to the illustrative music of which he and his followers were so fond; for a theme appearing in a new guise, altered in tempo and rhythm—so long as it is easy to recognise in its changed shape—stands well as the counterpart of one character in different circumstances. (See LEIT-MOTIV.)

The larger compositions of Liszt intended for ecclesiastical use have been analysed very minutely, and with great insight and acumen, by Dannreuther in the Oxford History of Music, Romantic Period, vol. vi. He points out that in the 'Graner Festmesse,' and in the two oratorios which Liszt completed, there is a copious use of Wagner's method of employing representative themes, the various movements of the Mass being connected by these means. He says :

'Liszt came to interpret the Catholic ritual in a histrionic spirit, and tried to make his music reproduce the words not only as ancilla theologica et ecclesiastica, but also as ancilla dramaturgica. The influence of Wagner's operatic method . . . is abundantly evident ; but the result of this influence is more curious than convincing' (p. 200).

In speaking of the 'Hungarian Coronation Mass' (1866-67) Dannreuther says :

'Liszt aimed at characteristic national colour, and tried to attain it by persistently putting forward some of the melodic formulae common to music of the Hungarian type. . . . The style of the entire mass is as incongruous as a gipsy musician in a church vestment' (ib. pp. 204, 209).

The same author sums up the other pieces by Liszt that belong to sacred music in these words :

'The majority of them can hardly be accounted good music in the full sense of the word. Taken simply as music, and without regard to any symbolism or casual association with the ritual, they convey an undefinable sense of effort and weakness' (ib. p. 220).

The 'concert oratorio' called 'The Legend of St. Elizabeth' is a living illustration of the dual personality of Liszt ; it is fervently religious in character, and yet is far more of an opera than a real oratorio. It had a far greater success on the stage (at Munich, Weimar, Hanover, Leipzig and elsewhere) than on the concert platform. The scene of the miracle of the roses is by far the finest point of the work, and, as Dannreuther says, 'one of the best things Liszt ever produced.' For an analysis of 'Christus' the reader must be referred to the volume already quoted.

It remains to speak of two branches of art in which Liszt was at his very best. The purely lyrical pianoforte pieces, such as the 'Consolations,' many of the 'Années de pèlerinage,' the beautiful 'Bénédictio de Dieu dans la solitude,' and several of the other 'Harmonies poétiques et religieuses,' have an amount of inspiration which is rarely found in the more ambitious works of the composer ; and in his songs he reaches a level of invention that is untouched for the most part elsewhere. All, or almost all, the songs are highly original, effectively written for the voice, and interesting in the accompaniment ; some are a little forced in sentiment, but in all the natural accentuation of the words is followed with singular fidelity, and a few are among the most expressive lyrics of the world. 'Kennst du das Land' is held by many good judges to be the best of the many excellent settings of the words ;

'Der König von Thule' is another of finest quality ; 'Es muss ein Wunderbares sein' has an emotional directness, and 'Comment, disaient-ils' a whimsical grace, that are obvious to every hearer ; 'Die Lorelei' and 'Du bist wie eine Blume' are perfect counterparts of Heine's words, and if Liszt had been nothing more than a song-writer, he would have been hailed as a composer of rare gift. M.

A branch of Liszt's work that has only recently received due attention in this country is his organ music. His correspondence shows that he was always interested in the organ, and no doubt his compositions and arrangements for it would have been more numerous had the instrument of his day been more tractable in touch and less imperfect in regard to facilities for registration. Owing to these drawbacks he seems to have worked generally with the pedal-piano in view (A. W. Gottschalg's 'Repertorium,' a bulky three-volume collection of transcriptions issued under Liszt's general editorship, and containing his arrangements of some Bach cantata choruses and Chopin's preludes in E minor and E major, was described as being 'für Orgel, Harmonium, oder Pedal-Flügel'), and the bulk of his organ music appeared also in pianoforte versions. As a result, the manual passage work is often suggestive of the pianoforte, and much of it—especially certain bravura passages—must have been difficult to negotiate on old organs. Despite some inevitable lack of consistency in the matter of style, and a tendency to development of a somewhat diffuse character, the outstanding examples of Liszt's organ music are worthy of ranking with the pick of his pianoforte and orchestral music. The best-known appears to be the Fantasia and Fugue on B. A. C. H., a work so much in the style of a dashing improvisation (which was probably its origin) that one readily accepts some lapses into superficiality. Less known, but perhaps finer, is the 'Evocation in the Sistine Chapel,' a picturesque tone-poem based on Mozart's 'Ave Verum' and a phrase from the well-known Miserere of Allegri. With an easily made 'cut,' and a little adaptation in passages that are more effective on the pedal-pianoforte than on the organ, this makes a vivid recital piece. The variations on 'Weinen, Klagen' contain much that is striking, especially in the use of enharmonic changes, but the work is too long. Liszt here, in over three hundred bars, says no more—perhaps less—than does Bach in his brief treatment of the same ground bass in the Crucifixus of the B minor Mass. The finest of Liszt's organ works, and one of the greatest of his essays in any field, is the Fantasia and Fugue on the Choral 'Ad nos, ad salutarem undam' from Meyerbeer's 'Le Prophète.' It is on an immense scale, containing nearly eight hundred bars, and taking over half an hour in performance. (The Fugue alone is a good deal longer than Bach's G minor Fantasia and Fugue.) The Fantasia is now generally played in a much shortened form. In spite of a few passages in which the counterpoint is of the over-facile 'padding' type, the Fugue is a truly splendid example of free use of the form. It is an epitome of Liszt's method, all the thematic material being derived from the Choral. (An interesting point in connexion with the Fugue is its obvious influence on the famous 'Sonata on the 94th Psalm' of Liszt's pupil, Julian REUBKE (q.v.). Before the 'Ad nos' Fugue became generally known it was customary to ascribe much of the Reubke harmonic and thematic treatment to Wagner.) That these works have been neglected until recent times is no doubt due to the fact that they call for an organ of ample and easily managed resource. Now that such instruments are plentiful, and organ technique has developed a good deal along pianoforte lines, justice is likely to be done to this small but striking side of Liszt's output.

The following catalogue of Liszt's works is as complete as it has been possible to make it, while the collected and revised edition of his works undertaken by the Liszt-Stiftung is still in progress. This is compiled with the help of the various published lists, and based on the Thematisches Verzeichniss published by Breitkopf & Härtel (as No. 14,373) shortly before the master's death. The earlier edition of the catalogue, published in 1855, contained mention of early editions and some compositions which Liszt afterwards disowned.

I. ORCHESTRAL WORKS

1. ORIGINAL

1. Symphonie zu Dante's Divina Commedia, orch. and female chorus: ded. to Wagner. 1. Inferno; 2. Purgatorio; 3. Marius-Breit. Score and parts. B. & H. Arr. for 2 P.Fs.
2. Eine Faust-Symphonie in drei Charakterbildern (nach Goethe), orch. and male chorus: ded. to Berlioz. 1. Faust; 2. Gretchen (also for P.F. 2 hands); 3. Mephistopheles. Score and parts; also for 2 P.Fs. Schubert.
3. Zwei Epochen aus Lennau's Faust. 1. Der nächtliche Zug. 2. Der Tanz in der Dorfschenke (Mephisto-Walzer). Score and parts; also for P.F. 2 and 4 hands. Schubert.
4. Symphonische Dichtungen. 1. 'Héroïde funèbre', Berlin in 1839, but not completed until 1849, published in 1857; was at one time intended to form the first movement of a 'Symphonie Révolutionnaire', an intention never carried out. 2. Tasso ('Lamento e Trionfo'), conceived in 1840 as a pianoforte work; orchestrated in 1848; produced as introduction to Goethe's 'Tasso' at the Goethe-Festival at Weimar, Aug. 28, 1849; revised in 1864 and published in 1866. 3. 'Les Préludes', after Lamartine's 'Méditation poétique'; conceived at Marsellus in 1845; completed at Weimar in 1850. 4. Hungaria, sketch dated 1846; published as a 'Hungarian March' for pianoforte; orchestrated in 1863; revised in 1866; published in 1857. 5. 'Bergsymphonie' ('Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne'), first performance, 1853, at Weimar; revised in 1861 and again in 1866, published, 1857. 6. 'Mazeppa' dates from about the same period as No. 6, but was originally destined for a pianoforte duet (the Grove No. 29, 4), enlarged and orchestrated in 1858; published for pianoforte in 1857. 7. 'Prophetie', an original work, from dates from 1850, to a complete revision of the choruses etc. for concert purposes, with text by Richard Pohl, followed in 1859. 8. 'Festspiel' (age dates from 1853; on the fiftieth anniversary of the first performance of Schiller's 'Huldigung der Minne', it served in the dual capacity of overture in the theatre and as a mark of respect for the jubilee of the pianoforte given at the Groves-Fürstin Marie Paulowna, Nov. 9, 1854. An edition was published in June 1856, but in 1863 this was revised, added to, and republished in its new form as at present known. 9. 'Orpheus', conceived in January 1854, during the rehearsal of Gluck's 'Orfeo' at Weimar, and first performed in the middle of February of that year. 10. 'Hunnenschlacht', conceived

- in 1856 after Liszt saw Kaulbach's painting which bears the same title; apparently completed between January and March 1857. 11. 'Die Ideale' (after Schiller's poem), written for the unveiling of the Goethe-Schiller monument at Weimar, September 1857. 12. 'Hamlet', composed in 1859, apparently was not publicly performed until undertaken by the Algen. D. Musilv. at Sondershausen in 1866. 13. 'Von der Wiege bis zum Grabe', founded upon a sketch by Michael Zichov, consists of three parts: (1) Die Wiege; (2) Der Kampf ums Dasein; (3) Am Grabe, der Wiege des zukünftigen Lebens. 5. Fest-Vorspiel, for Schiller and Goethe Festival, Weimar, 1857. Score, Hallberger. 6. Fest-Marsch, for Goethe's birthday. Score and parts, also for P.F. 2 and 4 hands. Schubert. 7. Huldigungs-Marsch, for accession of Duke (Carl of Haxe-Weimar, 1853. Score; and for P.F. 2 hands. B. & H. 8. 'Valse zum Fest'; Patriotic March. Score and parts; also for P.F. 2 hands. Schlesinger. 9. Königs-Fest-Zug, for Schiller Festival, 1859. Score; and for P.F. 2 and 4 hands. Kahnt. 10. 'Gaudemus igitur'. Humoreske for orch., soli and chorus for the centenary of the Académie (concert at Jena, 1870. Score and parts; also for P.F. 2 and 4 hands. Schubert. 11. Music to Italy's play, 'A Hundred Years Ago' (Prague, 1859), not published.

LITANIAE LAURETANAE (Litany of Loreto), a solemn Litany, sung in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

It is no longer possible to ascertain when, where or by whom this Litany was originally written; but, if we may trust the very generally received tradition that it was first chanted at Loreto, and carried thence, by pilgrims, to all parts of the world, it cannot be of earlier date than the closing years of the 13th century. In other places than Loreto (where it is sung every evening) it is most frequently sung either in solemn Processions or during the Exposition of the Blessed Sacrament at Benediction; but its use—especially on the Continent—is by no means restricted to those particular occasions. In Rome, for instance, it is constantly sung, at almost every popular service, to a simple plain-song melody familiar to all Italians, and printed in the Ratisbon edition of the Directorium Chori. This is probably the oldest music to which the words were ever adapted. Its date, like theirs, is uncertain: but it is at least old enough to have attracted the attention of the great polyphonic composers of the 16th century, some of whom have treated it in their best and most devout style.¹

Palestrina was especially devoted to the Litany, and, in 1593, published a volume containing, in two books, ten different settings of exquisite beauty, composed for the use of the Confraternity of the Holy Rosary. One of the most beautiful divisions of the work is reprinted in the fourth volume of Proske's Musica divina, and all are published in the complete edition of Breitkopf & Härtel.

Another volume of Litanies, by various authors, was published at Munich in 1596 by Georgius Victorinus, under the title of Theaurus litaniarum. We here find among other interesting works a charming Litany, by Orlando di Lasso, founded entirely upon the plain-song canto fermo, and so simple in construction that the most modest choir need feel no hesitation in attempting it. This Litany is also reprinted entire in the fourth volume of Musica divina, together with some others from the same rare work, which fortunately is not the only collection that has been preserved to us from the 16th century. Under the title of Litaniae Catholicae ad Christum, Beatam Virginem, et Sanctos, a highly interesting work was printed by Wolfgang Eder at Ingolstadt in 1589. Another, called Sacrae litaniae variae, was published at Antwerp in 1595. A precious volume, believed to be unique, wanting the title and first nine pages—and therefore without date—is preserved in the library bequeathed by Dr. Proske to the cathedral of Ratisbon. And many other printed collections are still extant, containing quite a little treasury of Art.

At Notre-Dame the Litany is annually sung, in grand procession, on the afternoon of the Feast of the Assumption, to a form of the First Tone, which, set with the melody in the tenor, produces an indescribably solemn effect.

LITERES, ANTONIO (d. Madrid, after 1752), Spanish operatic composer. The earliest dated work in the National Library, Madrid, is 'Jupiter y Danae' (1700), a piece in three acts and ballet, scored for violins and bass. 'Azis y Galatea' is dated 1709, while the libretto of a lost oratorio, 'S. Vicente,' belongs to 1720. In a collection of 'Psalmos de Visperae,' etc., printed at Madrid, 1731 (Bibl. Provincial, Toledo), Literes is described as musico violon (musician, bass-viol) in the Chapel Royal. After the disastrous fire at the Royal Palace, Madrid (1734), in which most of the music was lost, Literes and NEBRA (q.v.) were ordered to arrange the MSS. which had survived and write what music was necessary for services in the Chapel Royal. Literes was possibly second organist at the time, and he certainly held that appointment in 1752. He was praised by the moralist Padre Feijoo for the loftiness and sweetness of his style: an example of his music is given by Mitjana.² Besides the opera mentioned above, the Nat. Library at Madrid possesses MS. scores of 'Los Elementos' and 'Dido y Eneas,' both described as opera armonica al estilo Italiano, and 'Coronis,' a ZARZUELA (q.v.) in 2 acts (the last two are unsigned). There exists a quantity of church music by him (Chapel Royal, Madrid). Two hymns were printed by Eslava.

LITOLFF, HENRY CHARLES (b. London, Feb. 6, 1818; d. Bois le Combes, near Paris, Aug. 6, 1891). His father, a French Alsatian soldier taken prisoner by the English in the Peninsular War, had settled in London as a violinist after the declaration of peace, and had married an Englishwoman. In the beginning of the year 1831 Henry Litolff was brought by his father to Moscholes, who on hearing the boy play the piano, was so much struck by his unusual talent that he offered to take him gratis as a pupil; and under his generous care Litolff studied for several years. He made his first appearance (or one of his first) at Covent Garden Theatre, July 24, 1832, as 'a pupil of Moscholes, 12 years of age.' In his 17th year a marriage of which the parents disapproved obliged him to leave England and settle for a time in France. For several years after this event Litolff led a wandering life, and during this period he visited Paris, Brussels, Leipzig, Prague, Dresden, Berlin and Amsterdam, giving in these towns a series of very successful concerts. In 1851 he went to Brunswick, and undertook there the business of the music publisher Meyer, marrying, as his second wife, the widow of the owner. In 1860 he transferred this business to his adopted son Theodor Litoff, and he, in 1861, started the well-known 'Collection Litoff,' as a cheap and accurate edition of classical music, which was among the earliest of the many series of similar size and aim now existing. It opened with the sonatas of Beethoven, Mozart and Haydn (vols. i.-iv.). Henry Litoff himself went to Paris. His third wife was a Comtesse de Larochefoucauld. His opera 'Les Templiers' was produced at Brussels in Jan. 1886.

About 115 of his works, including several operas, a violin concerto, a short oratorio, 'Ruth et Boaz' (1869) and much chamber music, have been published. Among the best of them may be reckoned some of his pianoforte pieces, such as the well-known 'Spinnlied,' a few of his overtures and his symphony concertos, especially Nos. 3, 4 and 5; the latter are remarkable for their wealth of original ideas in harmony, melody and rhythm, and for their beautiful instrumentation (see Berlioz's Les Musiciens, p. 303).

LITUUS. The lituus was used by the cavalry, and answered to the 'cavalry trumpet' of modern armies. It was cylindrical in bore with an expanding bell-mouth, and was turned back upon itself only at the bell-end, so that its general form was that of a crooked staff, or the letter J. (See PLATE LXVIII. No. 2.) The pitch of one discovered in 1827 at Cervetri, and now preserved in the palace of the Vatican at Rome, is g, an octave higher than the Buccina, and a major third higher than the modern cavalry trumpet of the British Army, which is in E flat. That the distinction between the Roman tuba and lituus is real needs no proof nor more scholarship than is contained in Horace's 'First Ode to Maecenas':

'Multos castra luvant, et lituo tubae
Pernixtus sonitus.'

On this passage Torcellini comments, 'Sunt qui lituum a tuba distinguunt, ex eo quod ille equitum sit, haec vero peditum.' The distinction is good to-day. The tuba was the 'Infantry Bugle'; the lituus the 'Cavalry Trumpet.' The derivation of lituus may indeed be originally Greek; certainly it is proximately from the hooked augur's staff of the Oscans, which had been Mercury's wand, and has become the bishop's crozier. Both tuba and lituus figure on Trajan's column, in the triumphal procession. Vegetius defines the former: 'Tuba—quae directa est, appellatur.' This straight form reappears even in more recent times, as in a fine picture by Baltazarini; by comparing it with the average height of the players, it may be estimated at about seven feet long. The lituus is figured by Bartolini from a marble Roman tombstone with the inscription:

'M. Julius Victor
ex collegio
Liticinum Cornicinum,' which is perhaps the first mention of a society of professional musicians.

LITVINNE, FELIA (LITVINOV) (b. Russia, 1861), operatic soprano. Her vocal training took place in Paris under Mme. Barth-Banderoli and Victor Maurel. Her sister was the wife of Edouard de Reszke, and she married Dr. Emmanuel Depoux. After a promising début at the Théâtre des Italiens, Paris (1885), she joined Mapleson's American company and appeared at the Academy of Music, New York, in the following winter as Leonora in 'Il Trovatore,' Arditì being the conductor. On her return she sang with success at St. Petersburg and Moscow; also at the Lamoureux Concerts in Paris during a lengthy period of study entirely devoted, by the advice of the De Reszkes, to the mastery of the leading Wagnerian rôles. In some of these—notably Isolde and Brünnhilde—she created a good impression in France, her fine voice and excellent declamation earning warm praise. She sang meanwhile under Cortot at the Château d'Eau in 1902, and afterwards at the Opéra-Comique and the Gaîté. Later on she appeared with Jean de Reszke in 'Tristan' and 'Siegfried' at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and in 1899 made a successful début with him at Covent Garden as Isolde, besides taking part in subsequent seasons as Donna Anna, Brünnhilde, Aïda, La Gioconda, etc. She last sang in London in the winter season of 1910.

LIVERATI, GIOVANNI (b. Bologna, c. 1772), pupil of Mattei and Gibelli, singer and composer. In 1792 he was tenor singer at Barcellona theatre. After a position in Madrid he became Kapellmeister to the King of Prussia; left Potsdam in 1800 for Prague; went to Trieste in 1804 and thence to Vienna, where he settled as singing-master, and produced successfully some operas. In 1814 he went to London as composer for the opera, but returned to Italy, 1817. He composed operas, chamber duets, arias, etc.

LIVERPOOL. The most important musical organisation in Liverpool is the PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY, founded Jan. 10, 1840. Occasional concerts at first were given in the Colliagate Hall, Shaw Street. In 1849, however, the Philharmonic Hall was opened, which is said to be acoustically one of the most perfect in England. At first a permanent conductor was appointed to conduct orchestral or choral concerts every year, and this position has been held in turn by Sir Julius Benedict (1867), Max Bruch (1880), Sir Charles Hallé (1883) and Sir Frederic Cowen (1896). This policy was abandoned in 1910 in favour of guest conductors. The Liverpool Philharmonic Society possesses a choir of 250 voices under a permanent chorus-master (Dr. A. W. Pollitt).

Chamber music is represented mainly by the RODEWALD CONCERTS SOCIETY, which was founded in 1911 and named after a wealthy patron of music, the late A. E. Rodewald. The Society has a membership of 200 and provides six chamber concerts every season.

Liverpool claims to itself the most flourishing branch of the BRITISH MUSIC SOCIETY (q.v.), which, founded in 1919, possesses its own club-room and library and has been the means of introducing to Liverpool celebrated singers and quartets. Its activities extend to many fields, for the Society has a Choral Circle, a contemporary Music Circle, and affiliated to it is the LIVERPOOL AMATEUR ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY of 80 performers. The first provincial Congress of the British Music Society was held in Liverpool in 1924.

Choral music is cultivated by the LIVERPOOL CHURCH CHOIR ASSOCIATION, which was founded in 1899. It became the means of bringing together all the church choirs of the city for the purpose of an annual festival. Before the war 14 such festivals were given in the St. George's Hall. After a period of suspension during the war the Association was revived in 1921, and the first Festival Service in the new Liverpool Cathedral was given in 1924. H. A. Branscombe has been hon. conductor of the Association since its inception.

The best known of the many choral societies is the LIVERPOOL WELSH CHORAL UNION, founded in 1901, with a chorus of 250 voices. Its first conductor was Harry Evans, after whose death in 1914 T. Hopkin Evans was appointed. In 1923 the choir visited London on the invitation of Lord Howard de Walden, to sing Holbrooke's Dramatic Choral Symphony.

Two organisations undertake to educate young people in musical appreciation :

(1) THE ART STUDIES ASSOCIATION, founded in 1908 by elementary school teachers. It secured a grant from the Education Committee in 1923, which enables it to give 52 recitals every season attended by some 14,000 school children.

(2) THE RUSHWORTH AND DRAPER ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS FOR YOUNG FOLK, which started in 1922, represented a first attempt in England to provide a systematic course of appreciation in orchestral music for children. Eight concerts are given every year. At the invitation of the Annual Conference of the British Association a demonstration concert was given in 1923 before the delegates in the St. George's Hall, and a similar demonstration was given the following year for the delegates of the British Music Society's Congress.

LIVERPOOL UNIVERSITY.—The Alsop Lectureship in Music was founded in 1925 and Gustav Holst gave the inaugural lecture.

ORGAN MUSIC.—The great organ in the St. George's Hall is a particularly fine example of its maker, Willis. Weekly recitals are given by the city organist, H. F. Ellingford, who succeeded Dr. A. L. Peace, who held the appointment after the death of the renowned W. T. Best. The new cathedral has provided Liverpool with a still more magnificent specimen of the organ-builder's art, the gift of Mrs. James Barrow, and the creation of Henry Willis, junior. The instrument was opened on Oct. 18, 1926, by Henry GOSS-CUSTARD (q.v.), the cathedral organist.

LIVERPOOL MUSICAL FESTIVALS.—These did not take place with regularity. The first was held in 1784, the next in 1790, and the next in 1799. They were then suspended till 1823, 1830 and 1836 (Oct. 4-7, Sir G. Smart conductor), when Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' was performed for the second time, and for the first time in England. Up to this date the concerts had been held in churches, but the next festival took place at the Philharmonic Hall in 1874 (Sept. 29-Oct. 1)—conductor Sir Julius Benedict. The St. George's Hall, containing rooms available for music, was opened in September 1854.

LLOYD, CHARLES HARFORD (b. Thornbury, Glos., Oct. 16, 1849; d. Slough, Oct. 16, 1919), a distinguished organist whose compositions take a minor but distinct place in the English revival of the Victorian era.

The son of Edmund Lloyd, a solicitor, he was educated at Thornbury Grammar School and Rossall School. From the latter he went to Magdalen Hall (now Hertford College), Oxford, in Oct. 1868 as the holder of an open classical scholarship. He graduated Mus.B. 1871, B.A. 1872, M.A. 1875, taking a second class in the Final Theological School, but it was not till 1892 that he proceeded to the degree of Mus.D. While an undergraduate he was instrumental in establishing the Oxford University Musical Club, and was elected its first president (see OXFORD). Lloyd was appointed organist of Gloucester Cathedral in June 1876 as successor to S. S. Wesley, and the appointment was backed by the personal recommendation of Wesley, who had been greatly impressed by Lloyd's powers of improvisation. In this capacity he conducted the festivals of the Three Choirs in 1877 and 1880. In Sept. 1882 he succeeded Corfe as organist of Christ Church Cathedral, Oxford, and in the same year became conductor of the Oxford Choral Society in succession to Walter Parratt. From 1887-92 he taught organ and composition at the R.C.M. In 1892 he succeeded Barnby as precentor and musical instructor of Eton College. On his retirement from that post he became (1914) organist of the Chapel Royal, St. James's. In 1902 he was placed on the Council of the R.C.M.; he was at various times examiner in music to the universities of Oxford, Cambridge and London, and was president of the R.C.O. A memorial window to Lloyd has been placed in Gloucester Cathedral, and a scholarship for a chorister to continue his musical training after leaving the choir has been founded there.

As a composer Lloyd was more than the writer of ephemeral works for festival performances. He has left something of permanent value in two directions, Anglican church music and short works for unaccompanied choirs in the madrigal and partsong styles. While these show the influence of Wesley and Parry, and he may be described as a lesser light in the school of which they were the masters, an individual touch appears here and there. There is a poetic subtlety in his 'To morning' (8 voices), dedicated to the Leeds Philharmonic, which is spontaneous, not derived, and the lyrical handling of the voices in 'Mark when she smiles' (Spenser) makes it an example of the English partsong at its best.

LIST OF PUBLISHED WORKS

Cantatas.—'Hero and Leander,' for soli, chorus and orchestra (Worcester Festival, 1884); 'Song of Balder,' for soprano solo and chorus (Hereford Festival, 1885); 'Andromeda,' for soli, chorus and orchestra (Gloucester Festival, 1886); 'The Longbeards' Saga,' male chorus and P.F. acnt., 1887; 'A Song of Judgment' (Hereford, 1891); 'Sir Ogte and Lady Eide' (Hereford, 1894); 'A Hymn of Thanksgiving' (Hereford, 1897); motet, 'The Souls of the Righteous' (Gloucester, 1901).

LLOYD, EDWARD (b. Westminster, Mar. 7, 1845; d. Worthing, Mar. 31, 1927), was the most famous English tenor of his generation.

The son of Richard Lloyd (b. Mar. 12, 1813; d. June 28, 1853), chorister, afterwards assistant lay-vicar of Westminster Abbey, and assistant vicar-choral of St. Paul's, and Louisa (née HOPKINS, q.v.), he received his early musical education in the choir of Westminster Abbey under James Turl. His was a curious instance of a voice which never 'broke,' but deepened gradually from treble to tenor. In 1866 he obtained the appointment of tenor singer in the chapels of Trinity and King's College, Cambridge, which he resigned in 1867 in order to join the choir of St. Andrew's, Wells Street, under Barnby; he retained this post on being appointed a gentleman of the Chapel Royal in 1869, a place which he held about two years. Subsequently he devoted himself entirely to concert singing. He made his first great success at Gloucester Festival in 1871 in Bach's St. Matthew Passion music, and in 1874 won universal admiration by his singing of 'Love in her eyes sits playing' at the Handel Festival at the Crystal Palace. In a very short time Lloyd reached a position of great importance, both as an oratorio and concert singer. He was associated with the production of many important works in the concert-room. The list includes:

The Martyr of Antioch (Sullivan).
The Redemption (Gounod).
Mors et Vita (Gounod).
The Rose of Sharon (Mackenzie).
The Golden Legend (Sullivan).
Saint Ludmilla (Dvořák).
Judith (Parry).
The Voyage of Maeldune (Stanford).
Eden (Stanford).
The Swan and the Skylark (Goring Thomas).
King Saul (Parry).
Caractacus (Elgar).
The Dream of Gerontius (Elgar).

The title-part in this was the last part of importance studied by Lloyd before his retirement from the profession, while still at the top of his powers, in 1900, when he had a series of farewell concerts, and then went to live in Sussex. He emerged from his retirement to sing a solo in the anthem at King George's coronation (1911), and again to sing at a Mansion House concert for the benefit of Belgian refugees (Feb. 3, 1915).

Lloyd's exceptional value as a festival tenor was perhaps not fully realised until his retirement, for no one of his successors had a voice equal to his in range and beauty, or so comprehensive a talent. In looking back on Lloyd's career of about thirty years as a leading tenor, something more than passing mention should be made of his unvarying success in singing Wagner's music in the concert-room. He made the 'Preislied' a familiar melody to thousands of people who had never heard 'Die Meistersinger.' At different times he was heard in the third acts of 'Lohengrin' and 'Tannhäuser,' in the great duet in the first act of 'Die Walküre,' and in the Forging Songs of 'Siegfried.'

LOBE, JOHANN CHRISTIAN (b. Weimar, May 30, 1797; d. Leipzig, July 27, 1881), musician and writer of some eminence on music, owed his musical instruction to the Grand Duchess Maria Paulowna. The flute was his instrument, and after performing a solo at the Gewandhaus, Leipzig, in 1811, he settled at his native place as second flute in the Duke's band. He wrote five operas ('Wittekind,' 'Die Flibustier,' 'Die Fürstin von Granada,' 'Der rote Domino,' 'König und Pächter,' all performed at Weimar), besides overtures and two symphonies for the orchestra, P.F. quartets, and other compositions. But it is as a littérateur that he is most interesting to us. He resigned his place at Weimar in 1842, and in 1846 undertook the editing of the Allgemeine Musik Zeitung of Leipzig, which post he retained until the termination of that periodical in 1848. In 1853 he began a publication called Fliegende Blätter für Musik, of which about twenty numbers were published; he then edited the musical department of the Leipzig Illustrierte Zeitung, and made endless contributions to other periodicals. His principal books, some of which appeared first in the periodicals, are:

Musikalische Briefe . . . von einer Wohlbekannten two vols., Leipzig, 1852.

Aus dem Leben eines Musikers (ib. 1859).

Catechism of Composition, and another of music (both translated into English).

Consonanzen und Dissonanzen (ib. 1869).

Lehrbuch der musikalischen Composition (4 vols., ib. 1850 to 1867). G.

LOBGESANG, EINE SYMPHONIE CANTATE. Mendelssohn's cantata (op. 52), known in England as the 'Hymn of Praise,' was produced at St. Thomas's Church, Leipzig, June 25, 1840; at Birmingham (Mendelssohn conducting), Sept. 23, 1840. Revised and produced at Leipzig, Nov. 27, 1840; Gloucester Festival, Sept. 10, 1841; London, Sacred Harmonic Society, Mar. 10, 1843.

LOBKOWITZ¹ (LOBKOWICZ), a noble and distinguished Czech family, founded early in the 15th century, by Mikuláš Chudý z Ujezda (Nicholas Chuzy von Ujezd), and deriving its name from a place in Bohemia. The chief country seat of the family is at Roudnice (Raudnitz) on the Elbe, near Terezin (Theresienstadt), and its town residences are the Lobkowicz Palace at Prague and the palace on the Lobkowitz-Platz, Vienna. The family has been closely and honourably connected with music.

(1) PHILIP HYACINTH (beginning of 18th cent.), had musical relations with Sylvius Leopold Weiss, the last famous lutenist.

(2) FERDINAND PHILIP (b. Prague, Apr. 17, 1724; d. Vienna, Jan. 11, 1784). By the death of his father and two elder brothers he became the head of the house before he was fifteen. Gluck, whose father was in his service, was much aided in his early success by the assistance of the Prince. The two were present together at the coronation of Francis I. (Sept. 28, 1745); after which they went to London in company with the Duke of Newcastle, who had represented the English Court at the coronation. There² Lobkowicz is said to have lived in a house of the Duke's for two years, and it was during this time that Gluck produced his operas at the King's Theatre, and appeared in public in the strange character of a performer on the musical glasses. (See GLUCK; HARMONICA.) A story is told by Burney of his having composed a symphony bar by bar alternately with Emanuel Bach. The feat was an absurd one, but it at least shows that he had considerable practical knowledge of music. He was succeeded by his son,

(3) JOSE FRAN (JOSEPH FRANCIS) MAXIMILIAN (b. Dec. 7, 1772; d. Dec. 16, 1816). This is the prince whose name is familiar in connexion with Beethoven. He seems, notwithstanding the temptations of his immense early wealth, to have been an exemplary character, with no vices, and with no fault but an inconsiderate generosity rising to prodigality, which ultimately proved his ruin. He married Princess Marie Caroline Schwarzenberg, Aug. 2, 1792. His taste for music was an absorbing passion. He played both violin and violoncello, and had a splendid bass voice, which he cultivated thoroughly and with success. He maintained a complete establishment of orchestra, solo and chorus singers, with Anton Wranitzky (Antonín Vranický) and Cartellieri at their head, for the performances of masses, oratorios, operas, symphonies, etc. When Beethoven arrived at Vienna in Nov. 1792, Lobkowicz was twenty, and the two young men soon became extremely intimate. True, beyond the frequent mention of his name in Ries's Recollections, there is not much definite proof of this³; but it is conclusively shown by the works dedicated to him by Beethoven; for we must remember that the dedication of a work by this most independent of composers was, in nineteen cases out of twenty, a proof of esteem and affection. Excepting those inscribed with the name of the Archduke Rudolph they form the longest and most splendid list of all his dedications. Chief⁴ among them are:

Six quartets, op. 18 (1801-5); Sinfonia Eroica, op. 55 (1806); triple concerto, op. 56 (1807); 5th and 6th symphonies (1808), (shared by Lobkowicz with Rasumowski); quartet in B♭, op. 74 (1810); 'Liederkreise,' 'An die ferne Geliebte,' op. 98 (1816).

We must not suppose that the course of such a friendship as this betokens was always smooth; the anecdote told on p. 264 of Vol. I. of this work, shows that Prince Lobkowicz, like all the intimates of Beethoven, and other men of genius, had occasionally a good deal to put up with. No doubt the Prince was a kind and generous friend to the composer. It was he who advised him to apply for the position of composer to the opera, and promoted two profitable concerts for him in his own palace and with his own band in 1807. Two years later he joined Kinsky and the Archduke in subscribing to Beethoven's annuity, contributing 700 florins (paper) per annum. On Jan. 1, 1807, an association of noblemen, with Lobkowicz at its head, took charge of the court theatres, and during 1810, 1811 and 1812 the Prince had the sole direction of the opera. He was one of the promoters and founders of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Vienna, and sang the bass solos at the second performance of 'Alexander's Feast,' Dec. 3, 1812. He was also one of the leading spirits of the noblemen of Bohemia who, in 1810, founded the 'Jednota ku zvelebení hudebního umění v

Cechách' (Association for the Promotion of the Art of Music in Bohemia) at Prague, which in 1811 started the famous Prague Conservatorium of Music. He had Haydn's 'Creation' translated by Jan Kruchina into Czech, and had it performed in this language for the first time at his castle of Roudnice, on Oct. 27, 1805, conducted by Anton Cartellieri, and himself taking the bass part. Both there and at his other country seat of Jezeří (Eisenberg), at which latter place the theatre still exists, operas and plays were performed, witnessed amongst others by Goethe, and at which occasionally artists from Vienna took part. In addition to his great expenditure on music, he, like Kinsky, raised, equipped and maintained a body of riflemen during the campaign of 1809. At length came the depreciation in the Austrian currency, the bankruptcy of the Government and the Finance-patent of 1811. Lobkowitz was unable to change his habits or reduce his expenditure, and in 1813 his affairs were put into the hands of trustees, and he left Vienna for Prague and Roudnice. By the Finance-patent Beethoven's 700 florins were reduced to 280 flor. 26 kr. in Einlösungsscheine—all that the trustees had power to pay. Beethoven was clamorous, and his letters are full of complaints against the Prince—most unjust as it turned out, for early in 1815, through the Prince's own exertions, the original amount was restored with arrears. Beethoven acknowledged this by the dedication of the Liederkreis. On Jan. 24, 1816, the Princess Lobkowitz died, and in less than a year was followed by her husband.¹

(4) His eldest son, FERDINAND (b. Apr. 13, 1797; d. Dec. 18, 1868), was also a supporter of music. He had his own orchestra and a brass band and cultivated singing himself.

(5) His son, MAURICE (MORIZ) (b. Feb. 1, 1831; d. Feb. 4, 1903), was, in his turn, a music lover, played the piano, and enriched the musical archive of the family with valuable collections.

(6) FERDINAND, a cousin of the former (b. Dolní Bečkovice, 1850), the last marshal of the Diet of the Kingdom of Bohemia, was from 1885 until 1909 president of the above-mentioned 'Jednota ku zvelebení hudebního umění v Čechách' and rendered great services in the development of the Prague Conservatorium.

(7) Prince Maurice's grandson, FERDINAND JOSEPH (b. Břilina, Dec. 27, 1885), in addition to his studies in law (Doctor juris), devoted himself to music and became a brilliant pianist. He studied under Jindřich Káan of Albst (Prague), Stavenhagen and Pombaur (Munich).

He performed as a soloist both in Prague and in Vienna, and in chamber music, together with the famous BOHEMIAN QUARTET (q.v.). As a patron of art he became an enthusiastic supporter of the rhythmic-pedagogical method of Jaques-Dalcroze. He frequently visited the latter's school at Hellerau near Dresden, which he ran from 1910–14, and helped to propagate Dalcroze schools in his own country. He founded (1912) societies in Prague and in Vienna for the promotion of the Dalcroze method by means of lectures and classes. He followed in the musical traditions of his ancestors and caused a thorough research and reorganisation of the musical archive at Roudnice to be made.

LOBO, ALONSO (b. Borja, about 1555; d. ? Seville, after 1610), Spanish church musician (also claimed by the Portuguese, though this is probably owing to confusion with Duarte Lobo). He held an appointment in Lisbon. His name appears in the records of Toledo Cathedral as having been elected maestro de capilla in 1593; he is described as having been assistant to the maestro at Seville. In 1602 he published a book of masses:

Liber primus missarum Alfonso Lobo de Borja Sanctae Ecclesiae Tolitanae Hisp. Primitivae Portionarii Musicusque Praefecti . . . Madrid, 1602. (Córdoba; Valencia, Patriarca.)

This was seen through the press by VICTORIA (q.v.). In 1604 Lobo was succeeded at Toledo by Alonso de Texeda; he returned to Seville, and was in charge of the choir-school until 1610. The following works are known in MS.:

Lectio prima de Jeremia propheta . . . In officio Tenebrarum. Sabbati Sancti. Ildephonsus Lupo, auctore (Seville). Credo Romano ad organo grande. (Escorial; Seville.) Passions. (Toledo, MS. 21.) Responso para el día de defuntos, 6 v. (Toledo, MS. 24.) Vivo Ego dixit Dominus, 6 v. (Escorial.)

LOBO, DUARTE ('Eduardus Lupus,' or 'Lopez' (b. 1540; d. 1643), Portuguese church composer. He studied at Evora under Manuel MENDES (q.v.), and then became choir-master there, perhaps in succession to his teacher, who died in 1605, or more likely under him. He moved to Lisbon, and held an appointment at the Royal Hospital, being transferred to the Cathedral before 1594. Many of his works were printed by Plantin, at Antwerp, and letters are preserved from the composer to the printer. He lived to the age of 103. His style has been compared with that of BENEVOLE, but without justice. Lobo never employed so many voices or so many different groups as Benevoli; his style has more in common with the later manner of Victoria (in the ed. of 1600) but is without Victoria's imagination.

LOCATELLI, PIETRO (b. Bergamo, 1693; d. Amsterdam, Apr. 1, 1764¹), a celebrated violinist, was still very young when he became a pupil of Corelli at Rome. Very little is known of his life, but he appears to have travelled a good deal, and finally to have settled at Amsterdam, where he established regular public concerts.

There can be no doubt that Locatelli was a great and original virtuoso. As a composer we must distinguish between a number of caprices and études—which he evidently wrote merely for practice, to suit his exceptional powers of execution, and which have no musical value—and the sonatas and concertos, which contain very graceful and pathetic movements, and certainly prove him to have been an excellent musician. In these serious works he shows himself as a worthy disciple of his great master. All the more striking is the contrast when we look at his caprices and études. Here his sole aim appears to have been to endeavour to enlarge the powers of execution on the violin at any price, and no doubt in this respect he has succeeded only too well; for, not content with legitimately developing the natural resources of the instrument, he oversteps all reasonable limits, and aims at effects which, being adverse to the very nature of the violin, are neither beautiful nor musical, but ludicrous and absurd. A striking example of this tendency of his is to be found in a caprice entitled, 'Le Labyrinthe,' where the following arpeggiando passages occur:

This savours strongly of charlatanism, and it is astonishing to find a direct pupil of Corelli one of the first to introduce such senseless feats of execution into the art of violin-playing. Wasielowsky not unjustly speaks of him as the great-grandfather of our modern 'Finger-heroes' (Fingerhelden).

LOCATELLO, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a 16th-century composer of the Roman school, who composed a book of madrigals, 2-7 v. (1628), songs and canzonets in collective volumes, 1585-91 (Q.-L.).

LOCKE, MATTHEW (b. Exeter, c. 1630; d. Aug. 1677), was a chorister of the cathedral there in 1638-41 under Edward Gibbons, and afterwards, it has been generally supposed, studied under William Wake.² He is important in musical history as the most eminent of the predecessors of Henry Purcell in the composition of English stage music (see under PURCELL, CHARACTERISTICS OF PURCELL'S ART).

Locke and Christopher Gibbons composed the music for Shirley's masque 'Cupid and Death,' represented at the Military Ground in Leicester Fields before the Portuguese Ambassador, Mar. 26, 1653. In 1656 he published his 'Little Consort of Three Parts' for viols or violins, composed, as he tells us, at the request of William Wake, for his scholars. He composed part of the music for Davenant's 'Siege of Rhodes' in 1656, and sang in it himself. He composed the music, 'for y^e king's sagbutta and cornets,' performed during the progress of Charles II. from the Tower through the city to Whitehall on Apr. 22, 1661, the day before his coronation, for which he received the appointment of Composer in Ordinary to the King. The Register of St. Mary Woolchurch contains the following entry:

Marred, Mch. 21. 1663-4
Mr. Matthew Locke of Westminster gent.
& Mrs. Alice Smith of Annabes, co.
Herford Spinster.

It cannot be definitely stated that this was the musician. There was another Matthew Locke, and in Aubery's Lives (ii. 254) it is stated that one or other of them married 'Mr. Garnon's daughter, of Herefordshire.'

He composed several anthems for the Chapel Royal, and on Apr. 1, 1666, produced there a Kyrie and Credo, in which he departed from the ordinary usage by composing different music to each response. This occasioned some opposition on the part of the choir, in consequence of which he published his composition, with an angry preface, on a folio sheet, under the title of

'Modern Church Music; Pre-Accused, Censur'd, and Obstructed in its Performance before His Majesty, April 1, 1666, Vindicated by the Author, Matt. Lock, Composer in Ordinary to His Majesty.'

(Of this publication, now excessively rare, there is a copy in the R.C.M. Another is in the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge.) To this period may probably be assigned the production of 13 anthems for 3 and 4 voices, all contained in the same autograph MS., which Roger North describes as 'Psalmes to musick in parts for the use of some vertuous ladies in the city.' Soon afterwards, having, according to A. Wood's MS. notes (Bodl. Lib.), become a convert to Rome, he was appointed organist to the queen. He had in 1664 composed 'the instrumental, vocal and recitative music' for Sir Robert Stapylton's tragi-comedy, 'The Stepmother.' In 1672 Davenant's alteration of 'Macbeth,' with the songs and choruses from Middleton's 'Witch' introduced, was produced at the theatre in Dorset Garden; and Downes, the prompter, in his Roscius Anglicanus, 1708, expressly states that the vocal music was composed by Locke. The music then performed remained unpublished until about the middle of the 18th century, when it appeared under the editorial care of Dr. Boyce, with Locke's name as composer, and as his it was long undisputedly accepted. But Downes's proved inaccuracy in some other things at length occasioned doubts of the correctness of his statement as to the authorship of the 'Macbeth' music, and eventually Locke's right to it was denied and its composition claimed by some for Purcell, by others for Eccles, and by others again for Leveridge. No positive proof, however, has been adduced in support of any one of these claims, and until such is forthcoming it would be premature to set aside the long-standing traditional attribution of the music to Locke. (See MACBETH MUSIC.) In 1673 Locke composed the music (with the exception of the act tunes, by Draghi) for Shadwell's 'Psyche,' which he published in 1675, under the title of 'The English Opera,' together with his instrumental music to Shadwell's version (1673-74) of the TEMPEST (q.v.). The work is prefaced by some observations, written with his usual asperity, but is valuable as an exposition of his views of the proper form for opera. The varied songs and dances of 'Psyche' show Locke combining the lessons learnt from the example of the French stage with the traditions of the English masque as he had helped to develop them in 'Cupid and Death.' Locke's personal enterprise is nowhere more strongly shown than in a 'Curtain tune' of 'The Tempest,'¹ which in its directly descriptive features may be regarded as one of the earliest of the many storm fantasies of programme music.

In 1672 an extraordinary controversy was begun between Locke and Thomas Salmon, who had published An Essay to the Advancement of Musick by casting away the Perplexity of different Cliffs and writing all sorts of musick in one universal character. Locke attacked the work in Observations upon a late book entitled An Essay, etc., written in a most acrimonious and abusive tone, to which Salmon replied in A Vindication of his essay, and Locke in 1673 retorted in The Present Practice of Musick vindicated, &c. To which is added Duellum Musicum, by John Phillips [Milton's nephew]. Together with a Letter from John Playford to Mr. T. Salmon in confutation of his Essay, which closed the dispute² (see PLAYFORD). In 1673 Locke published a small treatise entitled

'Melothesia, or Certain General Rules for playing upon a Continued Bass, with a Choice Collection of Lessons for the Harpsichord or Organ of all sorts,' said to be the first of the kind published in England.³

His compositions were numerous and various. His anthem, 'Lord, let me know mine end,' was printed by Boyce, and several other anthems exist in MS. in the Tudway collection, the Fitzwilliam Museum, at Westminster Abbey, Ely and elsewhere. Some anthems and Latin hymns are in 'Cantica sacra, 2nd set,' 1674; some hymns in 'Harmonia sacra,' 1688 and 1714; songs in 'The Treasury of Musick,' 1669; 'Choice Ayres, Songs and Dialogues,' 1676-84; and 'The Theater of Musick,' 1687; and eight three-part vocal compositions by him (including 'Ne'er trouble thyself at the times or their turning,' reprinted in some modern collections) in 'The Musical Companion,' 1667. Instrumental compositions by him are printed in 'Courtly Masquing Ayres,' 1662; 'Musick's Delight on the Cithern,' 1666; 'Apollo's Banquet,' 1669; 'Musick's Handmaid,' 1678 (reprinted in J. S. Smith's 'Musica antiqua'); and 'Greeting,' 'Pleasant Companion,' 1680. In several of these is 'A Dance in the Play of Macbeth,' evidently written for an earlier version than that above mentioned.⁴ A song by him is in D'Urfey's 'Fool turned Critic' (see D'Urfey's Songs, 1683). The R.C.M. possesses the autograph MS. of a 'Consort of floure Parts' for viols, containing six suites, each consisting of a fantazia, courante, ayre and saraband, which Roger North (1728) tells us was 'the last of the kind that hath been made.' Autographs are in the library of King's College, Cambridge, the

LOCKENBURG (GIOVANNI LOCHENBURGO), JOHANN VON (d. circa 1591–92), chamber-valet to the Duke of Bavaria c. 1568, and an excellent composer. He was organist at the Bavarian court c. 1558–91, and was mentioned in 1574 as a member of the ducal chapel. He composed masses, madrigals and sacred songs. (See Q.-L.)

LOCKEY, CHARLES (b. Hatching, near Newbury, Mar. 23, 1820; d. Hastings, Dec. 3, 1901), son of Angel Lockey of Oxford, was admitted a chorister of Magdalen College, Apr. 1, 1828, remaining so until 1836, when he went to Bath to study under Edward Harris. In 1842 he became a pupil of Sir George Smart and lay-clerk of St. George's Chapel, Windsor. In 1843 he was appointed vicar-choral of St. Paul's Cathedral. In 1846 he was engaged (as the youngest of four tenors) for the Birmingham Festival, and allotted the air 'Then shall the righteous,' in the first performance of 'Elijah.' On hearing him rehearse the song, Mendelssohn immediately requested him also to sing 'If with all your hearts,' which had before been assigned to another singer. 'A young English tenor,' says the composer, 'sang the last air so very beautifully that I was obliged to collect myself to prevent my being overcome, and to enable me to boat time steadily.' In Apr. 1848 Lockey was appointed a gentleman of the Chapel Royal. He married, May 24, 1853, Miss Martha Williams, contralto singer, who died at Hastings, Aug. 28, 1897. In 1859 an affection of the throat deprived him of voice and compelled his retirement. w. H. H.

LODER (1), JOHN DAVID (b. Bath, 1788²; d. London, Feb. 13, 1846), father of Edward James, the song-writer (see below), was a skilled violinist, and his General and Comprehensive Instruction-Book for the Violin, 1814; his Modern Art of Bowing, 1842; and Violin School, had considerable reputation. He was a music publisher at 46 Milsom Street, Bath, and about 1820 issued an edition of Handel's songs, as well as many other more or less important publications. From 1826–45 he was orchestral leader at the Three Choirs Festivals. In 1840 he became a professor of the R.A.M., and in 1845 succeeded Cramer as leader of the Ancient Concerts. Another of the same family, A. Loder, was about the same period established as a music-seller at 4 Orange Grove, Bath. F. K.

(2) JOHN FAWCETT (b. 1812; d. Apr. 16, 1853), son of the above, an excellent violinist and able orchestral leader, for many years resided at Bath and managed the concerts there. When Bath ceased to be a place of fashionable resort Loder removed to London, and on the death of his father succeeded him as leader at most of the best concerts and festivals.

(3) EDWARD JAMES (b. Bath, 1813; d. Apr. 5, 1865), son of John David (1), was in 1826 sent to Frankfurt to study music under Ferdinand Ries. He returned to England in 1828, and went back to Germany with the view of qualifying himself for the medical profession, but soon changed his mind and again placed himself under Ries. When he again came back to England he was commissioned by Arnold to compose the music for 'Nourjahad,' an old drama of his to which he had added songs, etc., to convert it into an opera, for the opening of the new English Opera House, then building. The opera was produced in July 1834, and, notwithstanding very general admiration of the music, proved unattractive owing to the poverty of the libretto. In 1835 Loder set Oxenford's 'Dice of Death.' He next entered into an engagement with Dalmaine & Co., the music publishers, to furnish them with a new composition every week, in part performance of which he produced his 'Twelve Sacred Songs,' dedicated to Sterndale Bennett. As it became necessary that some of the pieces produced under this arrangement should be heard in public, an opera entitled 'Francis I.' was written to incorporate them and produced at Drury Lane in 1838. As might have been expected, so heterogeneous a compound met with little success, although one song, 'The old house at home,' obtained a widespread popularity. 'The Foresters, or twenty-five years since,' and 'The Deerstalkers' were brought out in 1845, and 'The Night Dancers,' his finest work, was produced at the Princess's Theatre in 1846, revived there in 1850, and again at Covent Garden in 1860. 'Puck,' a ballad opera, additions to 'The Sultan,' and 'The Young Guard,' were brought out at the Princess's in 1848. His cantata 'The Island of Calypso' was written for the National Concerts at Her Majesty's Theatre in 1850, but, owing to their cessation, remained unperformed until given at the New Philharmonic Concerts in 1852. 'Raymond and Agnes,' an opera, was produced at Manchester, Aug. 14, 1855.

Besides these works Loder wrote some string

quartets and numerous songs, of which 'The Diver,' 'The brave old oak,' and 'Invocation to the deep' are well known. After his retirement a set of twelve songs, six sacred and six secular, was brought out by subscription. Among these, together with several remarkably fine lyrics, there is a setting of an English version of 'Wohin' (immortalised by Schubert) called 'The Brooklet' which is among the most beautiful and effective songs in existence, quite worthy to stand beside Schubert's setting of the original words. His compositions are distinguished by the melodiousness of the parts and their skilful instrumentation. He was for several years conductor at the Princess's Theatre, and afterwards at Manchester, but although musically well qualified for the office his want of regular, business-like habits militated greatly against his success. About 1856 he was attacked by cerebral disease, which long afflicted him, and prevented his resuming his old avocations. Albums of collected songs were issued by Messrs. Novello and Joseph Williams many years after his death.

(4) KATE FANNY (b. Bath, Aug. 1825; d. Headley, Surrey, Aug. 30, 1904), only daughter of George Loder, and first cousin to E. J. Loder. Educated at the R.A.M., where she gained a King's scholarship (1839), she became a distinguished pianist. She quitted the R.A.M. in 1844, in which year she played the adagio and rondo from Mendelssohn's G minor concerto in presence and to the satisfaction of the composer at Mrs. Anderson's concert at Her Majesty's Theatre. She was then appointed professor of harmony at the R.A.M. She first appeared at the Philharmonic Society, Mar. 15, 1847, when she played Weber's concerto in E♭, and in 1848 (May 29) her performance there of Mendelssohn's G minor concerto received the unprecedented distinction of an encore. In 1851 she was married to Mr. (afterwards Sir) Henry Thompson, the eminent surgeon. On Mar. 6, 1854, at the Philharmonic Concert, she made her last public appearance. Among her compositions was an opera, 'L'elisir d'amore.'

About 1871 she gradually became paralysed, but up to the end of her life Lady Thompson was a good friend to young artists of all kinds, and was a powerful influence on the art of her time, even after she had ceased to play. It was at her house, on July 7, 1871, that Brahms's Requiem was first performed in England, three years after it was written; she and Cipriani Potter played the accompaniments as a piano-forte duet.

LOEFFLER, CHARLES MARTIN TORNÖV (b. Mulhouse, Alsace, Jan. 30, 1861), Alsatian-American composer and violinist. The son of a specialist in agriculture and chemistry, as a boy Loeffler was taken to Smjela in Russia, and later to Debreczin in Hungary, the former sojourn in particular exercising an important influence on the formation of his musical tastes and tendencies. In 1875, after two years spent in Switzerland, Loeffler set out to become a professional violinist, studying with Rappoldi and Joachim in Berlin and with Massart in Paris, while his teachers in harmony and composition were Kiel and Bargiel in the former and Guiraud in the latter city. After a season under Pasdeloup in Paris, two years in the private orchestra of Baron Paul von Derwies at Nice and Lugano and a second season with Pasdeloup, Loeffler went, in 1881, to New York City. There he played under Leopold Damrosch and Theodore Thomas. A year later he became a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and from 1885-1903 shared the first violin desk with Franz Kneisel. In this latter year he resigned, simultaneously with Kneisel, that he might devote himself more completely to composition, his orchestral and chamber pieces having already won him conspicuous recognition, and since then he has appeared as violinist only semi-publicly. In May 1887, Loeffler became an American citizen and since 1910 he has made his permanent residence in Medfield, Mass.

As composer Loeffler defies precise classification. The strong feeling for line as well as for colour in his music renders somewhat inaccurate the grouping of him with the French impressionists. A bold and individual harmonist, his dissonances are the outcome of a free polyphony rather than the arbitrary use of discord for its own sake. Loeffler has cultivated the macabre, the mystical and the idyllic. Modal influences derived both from the music of the Russian liturgy and from plain chant play an important part in his style. Although his music has never been influenced by the country of his adoption, it has variously reflected the idioms of Russia, Ireland and Spain. In an era of virtuoso orchestration his instrumentation has commanded especial admiration. A fastidious workman and much given to self-criticism, Loeffler has subjected many of his compositions to repeated and often sweeping revision. Of his orchestral pieces those most widely known are 'La Mort de Tintagiles,' after Maeterlinck, and 'A Pagan Poem,' after Virgil. His Russian-inspired 'Memories of My Childhood,' awarded the prize of $1000 offered in connexion with the 1923 Chicago (Ill.) North Shore Festival, came quickly into popular favour.

The list of his more important compositions includes :

Symphony in one movement, 'Hora Mystica,' with men's chorus.

* 'Vilanelle du diable,' after Rollinat, symphonic poem.

* 'La Mort de Tintagiles,' after Maeterlinck, symphonic poem.

* 'Pagan Poem,' after Virgil, for orchestra with PF. obbligato.

LÖHLEIN, GEORG SIMON (b. Neustadt a. d. Heide, Coburg, 1727 ; d. Danzig, Dec. 17, 1781). Caught on a journey to Copenhagen, in 1743, by a Prussian pressgang he was, on account of his tall stature, placed in the famous Potsdam Guards. After being wounded at the battle of Collin he went to Jena in 1760, studied music and became Musikdirektor. In 1763 he went to Leipzig as violinist and pianoforte soloist in the concert orchestra and instituted a kind of conservatoire. In 1779 he accepted an appointment as Konzertmeister at Danzig. His importance lay in his exceptional gifts as music pedagogue. His pianoforte Tutor (Part I., 1765 ; Part II., 1788) appeared in many editions, the latest revised and edited by Reichard (1797), A. E. Müller (1804), and Czerny (18— ?); his violin Tutor (1774) appeared in at least 7 editions, the latter revised and edited by Reichard and A. E. Müller. His compositions, concertos, quartets, trios, duets, sonatas, etc., are of lesser importance. E. v. d. s.

LOËLLET, a family of distinguished Flemish musicians, whose biographies in some instances have become inextricably confused.

(1) JEAN BAPTISTE of Ghent (b. 2nd half of 17th cent.), a flute-player, oboist and composer, who attained great proficiency at an early age. He went to Paris in 1702, where he published 4 sonatas for flute alone and a set of sonatas for 2 flutes, and flute trios. In 1705 he became a member of the orchestra at the Haymarket Theatre, London. Walsh of London published several sets of sonatas by him c. 1710-15, and Roger of Amsterdam published in 1725 his 6 sonatas for flute, oboe or violin, op. 5. On the title-page he calls himself chamber musician of the Elector of Bavaria, and concert-master of the Duke Ferdinand.

(2) JOHN, 'of London' (as he calls himself on the title-pages of his compositions) (d. 1728), was a flute, oboe and harpsichord player and composer, and either a brother or cousin of the former. In 1710 he started weekly concerts at his house in Hart Street, Covent Garden.

where some of Corelli's works were first performed in London.¹ He left at his death a fortune of £16,000. He wrote several books of sonatas for flute, oboe or violin, some flute trios and a book of harpsichord sonatas, published c. 1725-26.

(3) JACQUES (d. Paris c. 1746), oboist at the court of Munich. In Aug. 1727 he appeared before the French King at Paris, when he played on the oboe, various kinds of flutes, the bassoon and the violin, and sang a motet with accompaniment of a violin and 2 flutes, after which the King appointed him as chamber oboist. Several other Loëllets were members of the Royal Chapel and the cathedral of St. Gudule, Brussels. E. v. d. s.

LOESCHHORN, ALBERT (b. Berlin, June 27, 1819 ; d. there, June 4, 1905), a pupil of Ludwig Berger. He studied subsequently at the Royal Institute for Church Music in Berlin, where from 1851 he was teacher of the pianoforte. The title of Royal Professor was conferred upon him in 1858. For many years he carried on concerts of chamber music at Berlin with eminent success. He served the advancement of classical music by his conscientious and thorough discipline as a teacher ; many of his pupils have distinguished themselves. He became most widely known through his numerous studies for the pianoforte, although he published a long list of other worthy compositions, such as quartets and sonatas. C. E.

LÖWE, FERDINAND (b. Vienna, Feb. 19, 1865), was a pupil of Bruckner at the Vienna Conservatorium and in his work as a conductor has since been specially identified with the furtherance of his master's work (see VIENNA). In 1883 he became a piano teacher at the Vienna Conservatorium, and in 1897 conductor of the Kaim orchestra at Munich. His subsequent career as a conductor has been pursued chiefly in these two cities, and has included such important posts as the 'Singakademie' and 'Gesellschaftskonzerte' in the former and the 'Konzertverein' in the latter. He has also directed concerts in Budapest and Berlin. C.

LOEWE, JOHANN CARL GOTTFRIED (b. Loebejün, near Halle, Nov. 30, 1796 ; d. Kiel, Apr. 20, 1869), famous as the creator of the German ballad as an art-form (voice and piano), was twelfth and youngest child of a cantor and schoolmaster.

Near his home were collieries employing 300 miners, and this underground world, so near in his boyish fancy to the world of spirits, took powerful hold on his imagination, to reappear later when he was composing 'Der Bergmann' (The Miner). His father taught him music early, and his singing having attracted attention, he was offered in 1807 a place in the choir of Cöthen. There he remained two years and went thence to the Gymnasium of the Franke

Institution at Halle. Türk, the head of this, was director of the town choral society, and at the twelve annual concerts produced much good music, although he had some curious notions.¹ Niemeyer, chancellor of the Gymnasium, was proud of the choir, and made them sing to distinguished visitors, among others to Mme. de Staël, who made Loewe a present, and to King Jerome, who at Türk's instigation gave him an annuity of 300 thalers.

This enabled him to devote himself entirely to music. He had already become a pianist by studying Bach's Wohltemperirtes Clavier, and he now took daily lessons from Türk, and worked hard at Kirnberger, Marburg and Forkel. He also learned French and Italian. Two of his songs of this date, 'Clothar' and 'Die Einsetzungsworte des Abendmahls' (op. 2)² have survived. Meantime the war of 1812-13 broke out, and Loewe has left a graphic account of its horrors in his Selbstbiographie (see Bibl.). Türk died in 1814, and the flight of King Jerome (Oct. 26, 1813) deprived Loewe of his income, but by the aid of Niemeyer he entered the University of Halle as a theological student under Michaelis. Naue, Türk's successor, founded a Singakademie like that of Zelter at Berlin. Loewe joined this, and thus became acquainted with his future wife, Julie von Jacob, a very gifted person, whom he married Sept. 7, 1821.

In 1818 he composed his first ballads, 'Edward,' and the 'Erl-König,' followed in 1824 (after his wife's death) by 'Der Wirthin Töchterlein,' which, by Marx's assistance, were printed. In 1819 and 1820 he paid visits to Dresden, Weimar and Jena, making the acquaintance of Weber, Hummel and Goethe. In 1820 he was invited to Stettin, and having passed with credit through various tests, such as a musical exercise submitted to Zelter, and a trial sermon, was duly installed professor at the Gymnasium and Seminary, and cantor. In 1821 he became Musikdirector to the municipality, and organist of St. Jacobus. He made a considerable mark both as a conductor and professor³ in Stettin and throughout Pomerania. In 1837 he was elected member of the Akademie of Berlin. He was a favourite with both Frederick William III. and IV., the latter being especially fond of his ballads. He travelled much, and was present at the Musical Festivals of Düsseldorf (1837) and Mayence (the Gutenberg Commemoration), visiting Hamburg, Lübeck and Bremen on the way. In 1844 he went to Vienna, and in 1847 to London. The Duchess of Coburg had specially recommended him to the Prince Consort and Queen Adelaide;

he sang and played at court, the Prince turning over his music; and here he heard Jenny Lind for the first time; but he left not the least trace of his presence behind him. In 1851 he went to Sweden and Norway, and in 1857 to Franco. In 1864 he had a singular illness—a trance of six weeks' duration, and in 1866 the authorities of Stettin asked him to resign. After this mortification—somewhat atoned for by the King's opportune bestowal of a higher grade of the Order of the Red Eagle than he had before enjoyed—he left Stettin for Kiel, where he quietly expired after another trance. His heart was buried near his organ in St. Jacobus at Stettin.

Carl Loewe was an industrious composer. He wrote five operas, of which one only was performed—'Die drei Wünsche' (Theatre Royal, Berlin, 1834). Mantius was the tenor; Spontini took unusual pains; the opera was a great success, and the Crown Prince presented the composer with a gold medal. The list of his oratorios includes:

'Die Festzeiten' (1833); 'Die Zerstörung Jerusalems' (1829); 'Die sieben Schläfer' (1838); 'Die sieben Schläfer' (1834); 'Die Apostel von Philipp' (1835, for voices only); 'Gutenberg' (1836); 'Palestrina' (1841); 'Huse' (1842); 'Hiob'; 'Der Meister von Avis'; 'Das Bühnenspieler des neuen Bundes'; 'Das hohe Lied Salomons'; and 'Polus Atella' (all between 1848 and 1860); 'Die Hellenen und die Hellenen' (1861); 'Johannes der Tauffer' (1862); and 'Die Auferweckung des Lazarus' (1863).

The last has an organ accompaniment, but the two that precede it, like 'Die Apostel von Philipp,' were for voices only, without accompaniment, a species of composition of which he was specially fond. His second wife and pupil, Auguste Lange of Königsberg, sang in his oratorios with himself.

He published 145 works with opus numbers, symphonies, concertos, duets and other pieces for P.F., but above all, ballads, in which he specially excelled, and in which he may be considered as the successor of Zumsteeg. His complete songs were ultimately published in a series of eight volumes (B. & H., Schesinger, etc.). His poetic feeling and power of musical expression gave him a high rank among composers. He was the author of a Gesanglehre (Stettin, 1826; 3rd ed., 1834), and of Musikalischer Gottesdienst, Anweisung zum Kirchengesang und Orgelspiel (1851, four editions). The University of Greifswald conferred on him a Doctor's degree. F. G.

director of the Lübeck theatre) and daughter of Ferdinand Loewe, an actor. She accompanied her father to Mannheim, Frankfurt and Vienna, where he was engaged at the Burg Theatre, through the influence of his sister, Julie Loewe, a celebrated actress. Here Sophie studied singing under Ciccimara and other good masters. Her début as a concert singer was so successful that she was at once engaged for the court opera, and first appeared on the stage in 1832 in a German version of Donizetti's 'Otto mesi in due ore.' Towards the close of 1836 she went to Berlin, where she created a furore as Isabella in 'Robert le Diable,' and was at once engaged at a high salary, appearing as Amina in the 'Sonnambula' on Apr. 28, 1837. In 1838 she was appointed chamber singer to the King, but soon resigned, and travelled to London, Paris and Italy. In London she appeared at Covent Garden, May 13, 1841, in Bellini's 'Straniera,' but her success was only temporary.¹ She never returned to England. She failed to obtain an engagement in Paris, and in 1845 sang again in Berlin, but coming just after Jenny Lind, was only moderately received. In 1848 she married Prince Lichtenstein and retired. Her special characteristic was the singular harmony between her bodily and mental gifts. In conversation she was witty and intellectual, and as a singer had a great diversity of rôles, playing both Elvira and Donna Anna, Jessondina and Madeleine ('Postillon'), Lucrezia and Adina ('Elisir'). An admirable portrait of her was painted by Krüger, and engraved by Sachse of Berlin.

Her niece and namesake, (2) SOPHIE LOEWE (b. 1848; d. 1926), a soprano, daughter of the régis seur of the Court Theatre at Stuttgart, and pupil of Stockhausen, made her first appearance in London in 1871, and sang at the concerts for several seasons with success, till her marriage with W. von Glehn in 1877.

LOEWENSTERN, MATTHAEUS APELLES VON (b. Neustadt, Upper Silesia, Apr. 20, 1594; d. Bernstadt, Apr. 16, 1648), Silesian poet and composer. Was the son of a saddler of the name of Loewe, and is said to have studied at the University of Frankfurt on the Oder, but devoted himself chiefly to music. He was for a while schoolmaster and cantor at Neustadt and Leobschütz. The troubles of the Thirty Years' War obliged him to seek a home elsewhere.

He settled at Bernstadt near Breslau, where he was appointed Secretary and Privy Counsellor to the Duke of Oels-Bernstadt, and was also director of the church music. About the same time he was raised to noble rank by the Emperor Ferdinand II., and took the name of Loewenstern. His chief published work is a book of thirty Geistliche Lieder, for two to four voices, entitled 'Frühlings-Mayen' (the words also by him). The first dated edition is 1644. Some of these hymns and tunes were received into the various Choralbücher up to modern times, of which the best known are 'Christe du Beistand deiner Kreuz gemeinde,' and 'Mein Augen schliess ich jetzt.' He also composed the choruses to Martin Opitz's tragedy 'Judith,' for three voices with basso continuo, which were published at Rostock, 1646. There remain in MS. a number of Latin and German motets for four to eight voices, and sacred concertos in the style of Viadana with instrumental accompaniment.

LOGIER, JOHANN BERNARD (b. Kaiserslautern, Palatinate, Feb. 9, 1777; d. July 27, 1846) a descendant of a family of French refugees, attained great notoriety by his invention of the 'chiroplast,' a mechanism for training the hands for piano-playing, and a system of piano teaching based on its use.

His father and grandfather were organists at Kaiserslautern. He received his early musical education from his father. After the death of his parents, and when about 10 years old, he came to England and studied the flute and pianoforte. He then joined the band of a regiment commanded by the Marquis of Abercorn, of which Willman, father of the celebrated clarinet-player, was master, and with which he went to Ireland. In 1796 he married Willman's daughter, and engaged in composing for and instructing military bands and teaching the pianoforte. At the close of the war, his regiment being disbanded, he became organist at Westport, Ireland, holding the post till 1807, when he was appointed bandmaster of the Kilkenny Militia. He settled in Dublin in 1809, as did also his brother-in-law Willman, the clarinettist. He opened a music shop at 27 Lower Sackville Street in July 1811, and was musical director of the Royal Hibernian Theatre, Peter Street, for twelve months.

Whilst there he invented the 'chiroplast,' the merits of which were widely debated. His method² included the plan of making several pupils, to the number of twelve or more, play at the same time on as many pianofortes. To this end he wrote a number of studies which were published in his First Companion to the Royal Chiroplast, and other works in which several studies of varying degrees of difficulty were capable of being played simultaneously. He gave his first musical lecture on Nov. 23, 1814. In 1821 the Prussian government sent Franz Stoezel to London to inquire into the merits of the system, and the result was that Logier was invited to Berlin to superintend the promulgation of it in Prussia. He remained in Berlin three years, being allowed an annual vacation of three months to visit England. In 1826, having acquired a competency by the sale of his chiroplast and elementary works, his very numerous classes, and the fees received for permission to use his invention and teach on his system—it was asserted that he had received 100 fees of 100 guineas each for that purpose—he retired and settled in Dublin. He reopened a music shop at 46 Upper Sackville Street; in 1843 we find him at 28 Westmoreland Street, and two years later at 45 St. Stephen's Green. His Thoroughbass was the first musical text-book used by Wagner in 1828. He composed some sonatas and other pieces, besides making numerous arrangements for the pianoforte. He also composed an ode on the beginning of the fiftieth year of the reign of George III., Oct. 25, 1809, performed in Dublin. Besides the publications connected with his chiroplast, he was author of A Complete Introduction to the Keyed Bugle. W. H. H.; addns. from F. T., LOGROSCINO (LO GROSCINO), NICOLA (b. Naples, c. 1700; d. there, c. 1763), became a pupil of Durante at the Conservatorio di Loreto. He is first heard of in 1738, when he collaborated with LEO (q.v.) and others in the production of 'Demetrio'; in the autumn of the same year he produced a comic opera, 'L' inganno per inganno,' at the Teatro dei Fiorentini. This was followed by a long series of comic operas, which were so successful that Logroscino was called by the Neapolitans 'Il Dio dell' Opera buffa.' It was probably in 1747 that he went to Palermo to teach counterpoint at the Conservatorio dei Figliuoli Dispersi, the study of music being first introduced there in that year. (It should be remembered that the Italian Conservatori were originally not schools of music, but simply orphanages.) He is last heard of as a composer in 1760, and is supposed to have died in 1763 at Naples; this, however, is doubtful, since the Conservatorio at Palermo possesses a receipt for his stipend signed by him in August of that year.

* A full description of the chiroplast and of the controversy provoked by the method was given by Franklin Taylor in the earlier editions of this Dictionary under the head GYMNASICS. He there quotes the following:

It has been stated that Logroscino would never compose except for words in Neapolitan dialect, and that he was the inventor of the concerted finale in several movements. Both statements are untrue, as far as can be gathered from his few remaining works. He wrote a certain amount of quite uninteresting church music and at least one serious opera, 'Giunio Bruto' (score at Münster). His finales show no structural advance on those of Leo, but are distinctly superior to them in humorous treatment of voices and instruments. For genuine comic feeling Logroscino stands in the front rank of operatic composers.

A single act from an anonymous Neapolitan comic opera in Brit. Mus. Add. MSS. 14,235 is probably by Logroscino, but does not correspond with any of the above-mentioned libretti.

The names of a few more are mentioned by Florimo. A few airs and concerted pieces from not yet identified operas are to be found in the British Museum, Naples R.C.M., Milan Conservatorio and Montecassino. E. J. D.

LOHENGRIN, a romantic drama in 3 acts; words and music by Wagner. Produced at Weimar, under Liszt, Aug. 28, 1850; New York, Stadt Theatre, Apr. 3, 1871; in London, in Italian, Covent Garden, May 8, 1875; in English, Carl Rosa Co., Her Majesty's Theatre, Feb. 7, 1880; in German, Drury Lane, May 1882; Paris, Eden-Théâtre, in French, under Charles Lamoureux; May 3, 1887; Opéra, Sept. 16, 1891.

LOHET, SIMON, was appointed organist to the court of Würtemberg at Stuttgart, in 1571, and his name is mentioned up to 1611.

Woltz in his Organ Tabulatur-Buch of 1617, inserts twenty-four pieces by Lohet, with some commendatory words in memoriam.¹ Twenty of these pieces are called fugues, though they are not developed fugues in the modern sense, the subjects being very short, and the answer coming in before the subject itself is completed. These fugues are followed by a canzona, and two 'Choral-bearbeitungen,' one on the plain-song melody of the 'Media vita in morte sumus,' with the melody in the bass throughout. Ritter has high words of praise for Lohet's pieces, and gives four specimens (Nos. 68-71 in his book), two fugues, the canzona and the 'Media vita' pieces. The first of these fugues has the familiar theme of the E major fugue in the second part of the Wohltemperirten Klavier. Of the 'Media vita' piece Ritter says it alone would suffice to justify for Lohet a high place among the best

LOISEAU DE PERSUIS, LOUIS LUC, see PERSUIS.

LOLLI, ANTONIO (b. Bergamo, 1728-33; d. Sicily, 1802), a celebrated violinist.

It is generally assumed that he was almost entirely self-taught. We know for certain that he was at Stuttgart in 1762 with Nardini. There he was attached to the court of the Duke of Württemberg, till 1773, when he went to St. Petersburg, where he is said to have enjoyed the special favour of the Empress Catherine II. He remained in her service till 1778. In 1779 he came to Paris, and played with great success at the Concert Spirituel. After this he went to Spain, and in 1785 we find him in London, where, however, according to Burney, he appeared but seldom in public. He continued to travel, and we read of his appearance now at Palermo, now at Copenhagen; then again at Paris, Vienna or Naples.

According to all contemporaneous testimony Loli was an extraordinary performer, but an indifferent musician. Schubart, the well-known German poet and musician, who had many opportunities of hearing both him and Nardini, speaks with unmeasured praise of Loli's feats of execution, the wonderful ease and absolute certainty with which he played the most difficult double stops, octaves, tenths, double-shakes in thirds and sixths, harmonics, etc. As to his having been a bad musician, or rather no musician at all, the testimonies are equally unanimous. The Abbé Bertini plainly states that Loli could not keep time, could not read even easy music, and was unable to play an adagio properly. On one occasion, when asked to play an adagio, he said: 'I am a native of Bergamo; we are all born fools at Bergamo,—how should I play a serious piece?' When in England, he almost broke down in a quartet of Haydn which the Prince of Wales had asked him to play. If, with all these drawbacks as a musician, he nevertheless created, wherever he played, an immense sensation, we are all the more compelled to believe that his powers of execution were of the most exceptional kind.

He is described as a handsome man, but a great dandy and charlatan, very extravagant, and a gambler. The Emperor Joseph II., himself a very fair musician, habitually called him 'muddle-headed Loli' (der Faselhans). Burney² writes that 'owing to the eccentricity of his style of composition and execution, he was regarded as a madman by most of the audience. In his freaks nothing can be imagined so wild, difficult, grotesque and even ridiculous as his compositions and performance.'

True, Burney adds,

'I am convinced that in his lucid intervals he was in a serious style a very great, expressive and admirable performer,' but it appears doubtful whether Burney ever heard him in a 'lucid interval.'

His compositions (concertos and sonatas for the violin), poor and insipid as they are, yet are said to have been his own productions in a limited sense only. We are assured that he wrote a violin part only, and that this was corrected, furnished with accompaniments, and brought into shape, by another hand. The list is in Q.-L., where some other references to his career are given.

LOMAKIN, GABRIEL JOACHIMOVICH (b. Apr. 6 (Mar. 25, O.S.), 1812; d. Gatchina, May 21, 1885). As a boy he sang in the celebrated choir of Count Sheremetiev, of which he became choirmaster in 1830. He also taught singing in the court chapel (1848-59) and the Theatrical School. His services were greatly in demand, and he held singing-classes in the most important educational establishments in St. Petersburg. In 1862 he joined Balakirev in founding the Free School of Music, in which he directed the choral classes until 1870. In 1874 he was compelled, on account of failing health, to retire from active life. Lomakin arranged a great number of the old church tunes, national airs, etc. He exercised a considerable influence upon the musical life of his day.

LONATI (LUNATI), CARLO AMBROGIO, called 'il gobbo' (the hunchback), a 17th-18th century violinist and composer of Milan, who had a great reputation in both capacities. He was the first teacher of Geminiani, and composed an opera (Venice, 1684), an oratorio, cantata, arias, etc., and violin sonatas, all of which remained in MS. (Q.-L.).

LONDON ACADEMY OF MUSIC, THE. Dr. Henry Wylde started a music-school under this name in 1861, and in 1867 St. George's Hall, Langham Place, was opened to accommodate it. Raimo and Denza, and in 1904 was amalgamated with three other teaching institutions: The LONDON MUSIC SCHOOL (formerly called the LONDON ORGAN SCHOOL), founded in 1863 by the Rev. Scotson Clark, and after his death directed by Dr. T. H. YORKE TROTTER; the FOREST GATE COLLEGE OF MUSIC, founded in 1885 by W. Harding Bonner (who became chairman of the Board of Directors); and the METROPOLITAN COLLEGE OF MUSIC, founded in 1889 by the Finsbury Choral Association at Finsbury Park, with C. J. Dale at its head. In 1905 the HAMPSTEAD CONSERVATOIRE, founded in 1885 by G. F. Geaussen, and subsequently directed by Cecil Sharp, was added to the number of amalgamated schools. The present premises of the combined institutions, under the direction and style of 'The United Music Schools, Limited,' are at 22 Princes Street, Cavendish Square. M.

LONDON CHORAL SOCIETY. This society, which gave its first concert in Oct. 1903 at the Queen's Hall, was founded by its present (1926) conductor, Arthur FAGGE (q.v.). Since its first season, when Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius' was performed publicly for the first time in London, the society's policy of performing the new and unfamiliar rather than relying on the usual repertory has done much towards maintaining interest in choral singing in central London. Among works given which were new to London, mention may be made of 'Omar Khayyám' (Bantock), 'Everyman' (Walford Davies) and 'Pied Piper' (Parry). On account of the war no concerts were given from the autumn of 1916 till the spring of 1919.

LONDON MUSICAL SOCIETY, THE (1878-87). This society was formed in 1878 by Heathcote Long and other prominent amateurs for 'the practice and performance of the works of composers which are not generally known to the musical public' (Rule 2). Barnby was appointed musical director, and Long and Alfred Littleton honorary secretaries. An efficient choir was formed, and the first concert was given on June 27, 1879, in St. James's Hall, although, strictly speaking, the occasion was a private one. Goetz's Psalm cxxxvii. was introduced to London at that concert, the solos being sung, as on many subsequent occasions, by competent amateurs. From 1884 until the last season of the society's existence, Heathcote Long was alone in the honorary secretaryship. After the season of 1886, Barnby was succeeded as conductor by Mackenzie, who conducted the final concert on May 24, 1887. In the course of that year the society was disbanded, and a sum of £100 was handed over from its funds to the R.C.M. During the nine years of its existence the institution performed the following works for the first time in England:

CHORAL WORKS

Beethoven. Cantata on the death of the Emperor Joseph the Second.
Brahms. Vier Gesänge, op. 17.
Dvořák. 'Stabat Mater.'
Goetz. Psalm cxxxvii. and 'Noenia.'
Gounod. 'Troisième Messe (selections).'
Grieg. 'Klosterchor' Hiller. 'O weep for those.'

Hofmann, Heinrich. 'Cinderella.'
Jensen. 'Feast of Adonis.'
Rheinberger. 'Christoforus.'
Sillas, E. Magnificat.
Schumann. 'The King's Son, The Minstrel's Curse,' and 'baiser nische Liebeslieder.'

ORCHESTRAL WORKS

Bach. Toccata in F, arranged.
Bartók, Ferd. Violin Concerto in E minor (Miss Shinner).
Dvořák. Legend.
Schubert. Overture, 'Des Teufels Lustschloss.'

LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, THE (1848-56), was formed on Mar. 6, 1848, after the dismissal of Surman from the post of conductor to the Sacred Harmonic Society. The Rev. George Roberts was president, Surman conductor, and the affairs of the society were managed by a committee. Six concerts were given in Exeter Hall during the year 1848, resulting in a loss of £394. The society lingered on for some years, and gave its last concert on Dec. 22, 1856 ('Messiah').

LONDON STRING QUARTET, THE, founded in 1908, stands in the forefront of quartet parties of British nationality. Its composition has varied from time to time, the original leader being Albert Sammons, who relinquished the post in favour of James Levey in July 1917. The original 2nd violin was Thomas Petre, and he is still one of the party; but during the war his post was taken successively by H. Wynn Reeves and Edwin Virgo. The viola, H. Waldo Warner, conspicuous by his dual talent as composer and executant, and the violoncellist, C. Warwick Evans, an artist of wide experience in ensemble playing, have performed continuously from the beginning.

After 2 years of rehearsing, a concert was given on Jan. 26, 1910, the first of a series the avowed object of which was to revive the glories of the old St. James's Hall popular concerts, but with this addition—to seek to bring not only the old masters but modern and living composers' chamber music before the public. After 117 of these concerts had been given, the party started (in Sept. 1920) for a 3 months' tour in the United States, and received a welcome so unmistakably cordial that it was repeated in the years following, the tour in 1925 being the fifth. Their absence (1922-23) spread over a year and a half. They have also visited many European countries and played on several further occasions in London, with programmes which included practically the whole of the classical repertory, and so many new works that space will not allow of their enumeration.

A cycle of the Beethoven quartets, including the 'Grosses Fuge,' has been played (up to Jan. 1925) 14 times, and British composers have from the first received liberal attention.

LONDON SYMPHONY CONCERTS, see HENSCHEL, (1) Sir George.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

This organisation, which gave its first concert on June 9, 1904, was formed by a large number of players belonging to the Queen's Hall Orchestra. Their action was due principally to the vexed question as to the right to send deputies. As the Queen's Hall Orchestra was quickly re-formed, London and the musical public generally gained greatly by the establishment of two permanent orchestras of first-rate quality. The London Symphony Orchestra is run as a 'commonwealth,' the players sharing the risks and controlling the direction. It began operations with a series of symphony concerts conducted by Richter, and these have been continued regularly, although not necessarily under one conductor, the policy of the orchestra being to avail itself of any opportunity that may arise of engaging the best talent for the whole or part of the season. The programmes have maintained the usual orchestral repertory, while a number of new works by British composers have found a place. Eminent soloists have been engaged, and from time to time leading choral societies, to take part in the performance of the larger choral works. Richter was the principal conductor down to 1911, his last appearance being on Apr. 10 of that year. In 1907 a special concert was given to celebrate his thirty years' work in England. The list of conductors includes the names of Nikisch, Safonov, Arbos, Mlynarski, Kussevitsky, Elgar, Steinbach, Mengelberg, Beecham, Walter Damrosch, Furtwängler, Coates, Sokolov and Goossens. In 1912 the orchestra toured America with Nikisch. In 1924 it appeared in Paris with the Leeds Choir. It has been regularly engaged to take part in some of the leading provincial festivals, such as the Three Choirs and Leeds.

LONDON TRIO. This organisation was formed in 1901 by Amina Goodwin (pianoforte), A. Simonetti being the violinist and W. E. Whitehouse the violoncellist. In 1912 L. Pécskai was appointed violinist, being replaced in 1917, while serving in the British Army, by A. Sammons; and in 1925 Lebell succeeded Whitehouse. Subscription concerts, at which the leading pianoforte trios are performed, were initiated in 1905, and until 1912 were given at the Aeolian Hall. Since then they have taken place at the Wigmore Hall, and amount in 1925 to over 300. The Trio has also toured in France and Italy.

LONG (Lat. longa, notula caudata), the note intermediate in value between the Large and the Breve in the early system of Measured Music. It could be triple or duple (i.e. equalling three or two Breves), according to the mood.

(The black form is the earlier.) In early printed music the Long usually supplants the Large in its function of indicating an indefinite pause on the last note of a composition, i.e. used as a fermata, and both in printed music and MSS. it was a conventional form for the last note of a section. Merbecke in his Booke of Common Praier Noted (1550) uses it thus at the end of a verse, and calls it a 'close.' The Duplex Longa of the Franconian Treatises is another name for the LARGE (q.v.). It does not mean double Long as opposed to triple Long, but a Long of double the usual length. (See NOTATION.)

LONG, SAMUEL (latter 18th cent.), organist and composer of glee and catches, including the 3-part prize glee, 'Where'er you tread' (1764, for the Catch Club), psalms in Riley's collection, four lessons and two voluntaries for the harpsichord or organ (1770), and a song for the Mall (1761).

LONGHURST, (1) JOHN ALEXANDER (b. London, 1809; d. 1855), studied under John Watson, musical director at Covent Garden, and on Apr. 22, 1820, came out at Covent Garden as the Page in Bishop's 'Henri Quatre,' and gained great popularity by his singing in the duet 'My pretty page' with Miss Stephens. During that and the next four years Bishop composed original parts for him in 'Montrose,' 'The Two Gentlemen of Verona,' 'Maid Marian,' 'Clari,' 'The Beacon of Liberty,' and 'As You Like It,' besides giving him the boys' parts in 'The Miller and his Men,' 'The Slave,' etc., which he had formerly written for Gladstones and Barnett. Early in 1826 he was allotted the part of Puck in Weber's 'Oberon,' then in preparation; but shortly afterwards, whilst in the middle of a popular ballad, 'The Robin's Petition,' his voice suddenly broke, and he was compelled to relinquish singing. Weber mentions the event in a letter to his wife, Mar. 9, 1826: 'The young fellow who was to have sung Puck has lost his voice, but I have a charming girl,' who is very clever and sings capitally.' After a short time he became known as a teacher of singing and the pianoforte and an excellent accompanist.

His younger brother, (2) WILLIAM HENRY, Mus.D. (b. Lambeth, Oct. 6, 1819; d. Canterbury, June 17, 1904), was admitted a chorister of Canterbury Cathedral, Jan. 6, 1828, under Highmore Skeats, sen., having afterwards Stephen Elvey and Thomas Evance Jones as his masters. In 1836 he was appointed lay-clerk and assistant organist of the cathedral. In 1865 he was one of the earliest Fellows of the College of Organists. On Jan. 26, 1873, he was chosen to succeed Jones as organist and master of the chorists. He retired in 1898, after a period of seventy years' service in the cathedral. His doctor's degree was conferred on him by the LONGMAN & BRODERIP, a well-known firm of London music publishers during the latter half of the 18th century. The business was founded in or before 1767, when James Longman with others, as 'J. Longman & Co.,' were established at the Harp & Crown, 26 Cheapside. The sign of the Harp & Crown was that also of another Cheapside music publisher, John JOHNSON (q.v.), but Longman's was nearer St. Paul's, and on the opposite side of the road, i.e. the south side, between Friday Street and Mitre Court.

In the latter part of 1771 the house became known as Longman & Lukey, and this title remained until 1777 or 1778, when, Francis Broderip entering, it was styled Longman, Lukey & Broderip. In 1779 Lukey's name is absent, and the firm remained as Longman & Broderip until 1798. Before 1785 an additional address was at 13 Haymarket. In or near the year 1798 the firm became bankrupt, and John Longman, who had succeeded the original James, held for a couple of years a partnership with Muzio CLEMENTI (q.v.) at the old address, 26 Cheapside; while the other partner, Broderip, entered with Wilkinson at 13 Haymarket (see BRODERIP & WILKINSON). Fresh information which has come to hand makes it very doubtful whether he was Robert Broderip as has been suggested; it is certain that Francis was the original partner.

John Longman in 1802 had left Clementi and set up for himself at 131 Cheapside, where about 1830 the name stands as G. Longman.

The first James Longman and Longman & Lukey issued much music now of an interesting antiquarian character, while Longman & Broderip's publications embrace a wide range of musical productions. They were also makers, in great quantity, of spinets and harpsichords, pianofortes and the smaller class of musical instruments. Their catalogues chronicle an immense variety of these, and some curious items are mentioned as 'Glove horns,' 'Sticcado pastorales,' 'pipes and tabors' (1781-82); also 'upright harpsichords with a curious new invented swell,' 'pianofortes in commodes, sideboards and dressing-tables for convenience of small rooms (1786); and in the 1789 catalogue is — 'Portable Clavecins . . . agreeable for travelling with, as they may be conveyed and even performed on in a coach.' F. K.

LONGO, ALLESANDRO (b. Amantea, Italy, Dec. 30, 1864), was a pupil of Beniamino Cesi and P. Serrao; at an early age he was made professor for pianoforte at the Naples Conservatory of Music. The founder of the 'Circolo Scarlatti,' and the 'Società del Quartetto' in Bologna he also edits Arte pianistica, a monthly review on musical matters, though chiefly devoted to pianoforte music. His compositions are of the strong classical style, and many of them are excellent imitations of the style of old Italian masters with a certain influence of German classicism and romanticism clearly visible. His works comprise many works for PF., a quintet and several suites. He also edited and published the complete works of Domenico Scarlatti for harpsichord (in 11 vols.) and many editions of old Italian PF. music.

LOOSEMORE, (1) HENRY, Mus.B. (d. Cambridge, 1670), was a chorister in one of the Cambridge colleges, afterwards lay-clerk there, and organist of King's College 1627 until his death.¹ He graduated at Cambridge in 1640. There is a composition by Loosemore for '3 vials to the organs' (B.M. Add. MSS. 34,800). His church music includes a service in D minor, 4, 5 and 6 v. (Harl. MS. 7337), two Latin litanies (in D minor and G minor) printed in Jebb's Choral Responses and Litanies (PH.) and anthems at Durham, PH. and B.M.

His son, (2) GEORGE, Mus.D. (d. ?1682), was a chorister of King's College, Cambridge, under his father, and in 1660 became organist of Trinity College, retaining the post till 1682. He took his Doctor's degree at Cambridge in 1665. Anthems by him include 'Glory be to God on High' (Harl. 7339) described as 'a hymn composed by Mr. George Loosemore, organist of Trinity College, Cambridge, at the Restoration,' and others in B.M. Add. MSS. 34,203.

(3) JOHN (d. 1681), son or possibly brother of Henry (1), built the organ of Exeter Cathedral in 1665. Parts of his work still remain in that organ.

LORENZ, FRANZ (b. Stein, Lower Austria, Apr. 4, 1805; d. Wien-Noustadt, Apr. 8, 1883), physician and writer, took his doctor's degree in 1831. Like many other physicians, he did much for music, and his publications are of special interest and value: In Sachen Mozarts (Vienna, 1851), much praised by Köchel in his Mozart-Catalogue (Preface, p. xvii.); Haydn, Mozart and Beethovens Kirchenmusik, etc.; W. A. Mozart als Clavier-Componist (Breslau, 1866); various accurate and interesting contributions on Mozart, Beethoven and Haydn, to the Deutsche Musik-Zeitung,¹ 1861, 1862; the Wiener Zeitung,² Aug. 3, 1850, Aug. 16, 1863.³ It is to Dr. Lorenz that we owe Krenn's important account of Beethoven's last autumn, and the other anecdotes and traits there given.

LORENZANI, PAOLO (b. Rome, 1640; d. there, Oct. 28, 1713), pupil of the maestro di cappella of the Vatican, Orazio BENEVOLI (q.v.), famous contrapuntist. Lorenzani early showed himself in possession of original talent and a solid style. He made a career as maestro di cappella outside his native town (possibly at Turin), but Benévoli having died in 1672, Lorenzani returned to Rome to scheme for his office.

His fellow-pupil Bernabei was preferred to him, but he gained at all events the post of 'maestro di cappella di Gesu e seminario romano.' He held this important musical post at the Jesuit College for several years, until 1675 apparently, when he accepted from a Sicilian delegation who had come to Rome to engage a maestro, the equally important post at the cathedral of Messina. It was just at the moment when the citizens of that town revolted against the Spaniards, a revolt which gave to Louis XIV., already engaged in wars against the whole of Europe, an opportunity of helping the despatch of an expeditionary force.

Marshal de Vivonne, who became viceroy of Sicily, appreciated Lorenzani, and when the time of evacuation came after the pourparlers of peace, 1678, he engaged him to go and seek his fortune in France. Lorenzani took passage on a vessel of the French fleet at the same time as those inhabitants of Messina who were prominently involved in the revolution, and who dared not expose themselves to the vengeance of the returning Spaniards.

Thanks to the influence of Vivonne and of his sisters, Mmes. de Montespan and de Thianges, Lorenzani succeeded at the court of Louis XIV. He arrived in Aug. 1678, was presented, had one of his motets performed with success, and ten months later (May 1679), thanks to the personal intervention of the king, he was able to buy from Jean-Baptiste Boësset one of the two posts of 'maitre de musique' to the Queen. The following month he went on a mission to Italy, officially with the object of engaging five castrati for the music of the chapel, but also without doubt to arrange his personal affairs. He returned in December, and in the following years a number of his compositions were performed before the king or court, and all were well received: pastorales, serenades, Italian airs, motets, dance airs, instrumental pieces. The Mercure, jealously hostile to Lully and his monopoly of the opera, saw in Lorenzani a champion of Italian music, a rival to the Surintendant, and never lost an opportunity of praising him. Lully, on the other hand, who had made great efforts to create a purely French music and who until then had succeeded in destroying all recollection of the Italian influence which had been so strong at the time of Mazarin, did not view with any satisfaction the arrival of this Roman musician. Their quarrel, however, owing to diplomatic intervention, never came to open hostility. But the death of the Queen (July 1683) gave a fatal blow to the fortunes of Lorenzani in depriving him of his place at court. On June 20, 1685, he accepted as a waiting post the employment of 'maitre de chapelle' to the convent of the Théatins—an Italian order, a branch of which had been established in Paris by Mazarin. His motets were the best known of his works; they were esteemed by amateurs with those of Du Mont, Lalouette and of Lully himself. They made the success of the famous Wednesdays at the Théatins 'Saluts en musique,' to which both court and townspeople went eagerly for almost ten years.

However, in spite of the death of Lully (Mar. 1687), Lorenzani did not readily find access to the king. The French musicians jealously barred the way. Nevertheless, he found means to present an opera with French words (1688), 'Orontée,' which the Prince de Condé had ordered for the festivities at Chantilly in the summer of that year. In spite of good mounting and playing by the Académie de Musique, this opera, on which the composer had founded such great hopes, had no success. His failure was due far more to the absurd libretto in the Italian style which Michel Le Clerc had taken from 'l'Oronte', by Ciccognini and Cesti, than to the music, of which the score unhappily has never been recovered. A few years later Lorenzani embarked again on another scheme which was to cost him very dear. He began to publish his motets (1693) in sumptuous editions (Ballard). In his dedication to the King he let it appear that he hoped to be employed afresh by him. This work sold badly, and Brossard says that the very cause which should have favoured it was of disservice. The motets of Lorenzani were too famous; too many copies of them had been already distributed for the 'maîtres de chapelle' to rush to acquire them in this expensive edition.

Then Lorenzani dreamed of returning to his own country. The post of maestro di cappella at St. Peter's, for which he had schemed years before, was vacant by the death of Francesco Beretta; it was offered to him; he accepted and was nominated July 19, 1694, in the centenary year of the death of his illustrious predecessor Palestrina. After Lorenzani had left France, Ballard published a collection of Italian airs which had a great success. At Rome Lorenzani, director of the Cappella Giulia and Guardiano dei Maestri of the congregation St. Cecilia, had a brilliant career of close on twenty years. He died at the age of 73 and was buried, like Benevoli, at San Spirito in Sassia.

The works of Lorenzani which the circumstances of his life attach at one time to the history of Italian music and at another to that of French music, are valuable. They exist in sufficient numbers in France and probably also in Rome, although in the latter place they have not been counted. His vocal compositions in Italian words, cantatas, detached airs, serenades, and even a little opera, 'Nicandro e Fileno,' presented at Fontainebleau, 1681, denote a musician of the Roman school and a follower of Carissimi. But his melody, already more luscious and with a subtly refined symmetry, his finished harmony, his little developed recitatives recall that he belonged to an epoch of transition, and allow him to be considered as one of the most interesting representatives of the 'bel canto' links between Carissimi and Bononcini. His music to French words is more curious, because it shows that he knew (in order to succeed in France) how to adapt his style to that of Lully as far as he wished; his airs, in the style of Ballard's collections, are in no way distinguished from those of other contemporary composers of works in the same manner. Nevertheless, the motets of his Parisian period take their place in the literature of the French classical motet, alternating soli, chorus and symphonic ritornelles. They hold an important place, and are worthy of the favour in which they were held by the public.

WORKS

- * Motets à I, II, III, IV et V parties. Avec symphonies et basse continue. Par Monsieur Lorenzani, maître de musique de la feuë Reyne. (Paris, Ballard, 1693.) Contains 25 motets. Other motets are found in the following collections: 'Scelta di motetti a 2 e 3 voci.' (Rome, 1675.) 'Sacri concerti a 2 e 3 voci.' (Bologna, 1675.) 'Airs italiens de Monsieur Lorenzani, maître de la musique de la feuë Reyne.' (Paris, 1696.) Contains 6 Italian airs.
- * Airs italiens composez par les plus célèbres auteurs... recueillis par les sieurs Fossard et Philidor l'aîné. (Paris, 1695.)
- Mercur Galant*, May 1680, an air 'Printemps, ne reviens plus,' by M. Laurencin (probably Lorenzani).
- * Airs sérieux et à boire. (Paris, 1696.) An 'Airs sérieux,' 'Quand mon destin, belle Rivière.'
- Théâtre Italien de l'herault.* (Paris, 1700.) The air of 'L'Empereur dans la lune,' 1684, 'Tornant in petto, speranza cara.'
- MSs. of airs and cantatas are preserved in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris. (Brossard Collection.)
- Outside the Brossard Collection: Treble parts of the overture and of the dance airs of the opera 'Oronte' (with a false attribution to Carissimi). The only known fragment of this part.
- Félicité polie* to Rome (after Baini) for some MS. psalms for 4 choirs, and also a volume of Magnificats a 9 voices which would have been printed there in 1690. Q.-L., on the other hand, indicates MS. works in the Library of Modena. The mention which is there made to an oratorio, 'Dinuzi' in the Bibliothèque Mazarienne, rests on a mistake. It should be the 'Santa Dunana,' sung at Rome in 1687, and of which the libretto is by Gio. Andrea Lorenzani.

LORTZING, GUSTAV ALBERT (b. Berlin, Oct. 23, 1801; d. Jan. 21, 1851), opera composer, son of an actor.

He studied for a time under Kungenhagen, but the wandering life entailed by his father's profession made steady instruction an impossibility, and at 9 he was thrown upon his own resources, played the pianoforte, violin and violoncello, studied the works of Albrechtsberger and others, and soon began to compose. At the same time he habitually sang and acted on the stage. In 1822 he went with his parents to Cologne, where he married in 1823, and produced his first operetta, 'Ali Pascha von Janina,' in 1824. The company to which he belonged served the theatres of Detmold, Münster and Osnabrück, in addition to that of Cologne, and at all these his opera was repeated. In 1828 an oratorio, 'Die Himmelfahrt Christi,' was performed. In 1833 he was engaged as first tenor at the Stadttheater at Leipzig, and here he passed a happy and successful ten years. In 1837 he wrote and composed two comic operas, 'Die beiden Schützen' and 'Czaar und Zimmermann.' Both were successful, and the latter was at once performed all over Germany. His next few works, however, fell flat, and it was not till 1842 that his 'Wildschütz,' arranged from Kotzebue's comedy, again aroused the public.

He then gave up acting, and in 1844 was appointed Kapellmeister of the theatre, a post for which he was unfitted, both by his easy disposition and his defective education, and which he resigned in the following year. He next produced 'Undine' (1845) with success at Hamburg and Leipzig, and 'Der Waffenschmied' (1846) at Vienna, where he was for a short time Kapellmeister at the theatre 'an der Wien.' In 1849 the success of his 'Rolandsknappen' at Leipzig again procured him the offer of the Kapellmeistership, but to his disappointment the negotiations fell through, and Rietz was appointed. His life was now a hard one; he travelled from place to place with his numerous family, earning a precarious existence now as an actor, now by conducting his own operas; enduring at the same time the mortification of having his later operas rejected by all the more important theatres. In 1850 he obtained the conductorship at the Friedrich-Wilhelmstadt Theatre in Berlin, where he had only farces and vaudevilles to direct; but he was completely worn out, and died on Jan. 21, 1851.

The public discovered its neglect too late, honoured his remains with a solemn funeral procession, and raised a subscription which placed his family above want. He left an opera, 'Regina' (first performed at Berlin, 1899), several overtures, a second oratorio, 'Petrus,' incidental music for various plays, Lieder and part songs, all unpublished. His operas are still stock pieces at the comic theatres in Germany, and 'Undine' is frequently performed, although romantic subjects were not his forte. 'Czaar und Zimmermann' was produced as 'Peter the Shipwright' at the Gaiety Theatre, London, on Apr. 15, 1871; his 'Beiden Schützen' by the London Academy of Music in St. George's Hall, Mar. 31, 1898; and the 'Wildschütz' by the Saxe-Coburg Opera Company at Drury Lane, July 3, 1895.

As a composer Lortzing aimed at expressing natural and healthy sentiments by means of graceful and pleasing music, and his keen sense of humour enabled him to give an interest to commonplace situations. He was never able to free himself entirely from a slight amateurishness in the technical part of his work, but his compositions, though not belonging to the highest branch of art, are good of their kind, and in spite of an occasional tendency to farcical exaggeration, are sound and artistic music.

LOSSIUS, LUCAS (b. Vacha, Hesse-Cassel, 1508; d. 1582), was rector or conrector of the school at Lüneburg from 1533 to his death.

He is author of a theoretical work, Erotemata musicae practicae . . ., Nuremberg, 1563, which passed through many editions; also the compiler of a comprehensive collection of liturgical music for the use of the Lutheran Church, entitled Psalmodia hoc est Cantica sacra veteris ecclesiae selecta . . ., Nuremberg, 1553. This latter work is introduced with a preface by Philip Melancthon, and is divided into four parts; the first part containing the Latin texts and plain-song melodies of the antiphons, responsoria, hymns and sequences for all Sundays and chief holydays, also the Passion according to St. Matthew and the Lamentations; the second part makes a similar provision for all the minor holydays of the year; the third part contains the plain-song melodies for the mass and for funerals; the fourth contains the psalms and canticles with their antiphons and intonations according to the eight tones. Only a few German hymns appear in the collection. A second revised and enlarged edition of this work was published by George Rhaw at Wittenberg in 1561, and two others in 1569 and 1579. The musical editor of Schöberlein's Schatz des liturgischen Gesangs, F. Riegel, claims that the psalm-tones, with all their differences, have been preserved in greater purity in Lossius than in the form in which they have been current in the Roman Church, based on Guidetti's Directorium chori; Lossius in 1553 being in closer contact with the older Catholic tradition than Guidetti in 1589.

LOTTI, ANTONIO (b. ? Venice, ¹c. 1667; d. there, Jan. 5, 1740), eminent composer, son of Matteo Lotti, a Venetian, Kapellmeister to the then Catholic court of Hanover.² His early years were passed in Venice, and before he was 16 he produced an opera, 'Il Giustino,' to words by a nobleman, Nicolo Beregani. His master was Legrenzi, then maestro di cappella to the Doge. Lotti entered the Doge's chapel as a boy; in 1687 joined the Confraternità musicale di Santa Cecilia; was appointed, May 30, 1689, 'cantore di contra alto,' with a salary of 100 ducats; and Aug. 6, 1690, became deputy organist, with an addition of 30 ducats. On May 31, 1692, the Procuratori of St. Mark's unanimously elected him organist in place of Pollarolo, appointed vice-maestro di cappella. As second organist he composed a book of masses, for which he received 100 ducats, July 22, 1698. On Aug. 17, 1704, he succeeded Spada as first organist, and retained the post forty years, receiving permission in 1732 to employ as substitute his pupil Saratelli, who eventually succeeded him.

In 1733 the maestro di cappella, Antonio Biffi, died, and an eager competition for the vacant post ensued. Lotti's chief rivals were Pollarolo and Porpora, and at the first election, Mar. 8, 1733 (the dates throughout are from State documents), he obtained six votes out of twelve. A majority being necessary, the matter remained in suspense, and meantime Lotti was authorised to call himself maestro di cappella. Porpora retired before the second election (Apr. 2, 1736), but his place was taken by a scarcely less formidable competitor, Giovanni Porta. Lotti, however, received nine votes and thus obtained the post, with its salary of 400 ducats and an official residence. In the interim he composed his celebrated Miserere, which superseded that of his master Legrenzi, and has been performed in St. Mark's on Maundy Thursday ever since. This was followed by a number of masses, hymns and psalms, with organ accompaniment only, although his predecessors had employed the orchestra. He also composed seventeen operas,¹ produced with success between the years 1693 and 1717 at the theatres of S. Angelo, S. Cassiano, S. Giovanni Crisostomo and SS. Giovanni e Paolo. Some of these having attracted the attention of the Crown Prince of Saxony during his stay in Venice (1712), he engaged Lotti to visit Dresden with a company of singers, including Boschi and Personelli, both members of the chapel, and his own wife, a Bolognese singer named Santa Stella. The joint salary of husband and wife was fixed at 2100 'doppii' (about £1600). The party set out on Sept. 5, 1717, having obtained special leave of absence from the Procuratori of St. Mark's—'per farvi un opera.'

In Dresden Lotti composed 'Giove in Argo' (1717), 'Ascanio, ovvero gl' odi delusi del sangue' (1718), and 'Teofane' with Pallavicini (1719); intermezzi, and various other pieces, including church works, among which may be specified the eight-part 'Crucifixus' occurring in a Credo for five voices and instruments. The Procuratori gave him one extension of leave, but in 1719 he was compelled to return or vacate his post; and accordingly left Dresden in October in a travelling-carriage which he ever after retained as a memorial of his visit, and finally bequeathed to his wife. After his return to Venice he composed entirely for the church and chamber. Lotti died of dropsy, and was buried in the church of S. Geminiano, where his widow (who died 1759 and was buried with him) erected a monument to his memory. It was destroyed with the church in 1815.

Besides the compositions already mentioned he wrote for Vienna an opera, 'Constantino,' overture by Fux (1716), and two oratorios, 'Il voto crudele' (1712) and 'L'umiltà coronata' (1714); for Venice, the oratorios 'Gioia Rè di Giuda,' 'Giuditta' (printed by Poletti), and the celebrated madrigal 'Spirito di Dio'² for the Doge's espousal of the Adriatic, performed on the Bucintoro in 1736—a very effective composition. His book of madrigals (1705), dedicated to the Emperor Joseph I., contains the one in five parts, 'In una siepe ombrosa,' which Bononcini claimed in London as his own composition, and which led to his disgrace (see BONONCINI). Another is given as a model by Padre Martini in his Esemplare di contrappunto. Nevertheless they were severely handled at the time in a Lettera famigliare d'un accademico filarmonico, circulated in MS. anonymously, but attributed on Fontana's authority to Marcello, who had been a pupil of Lotti.³ Many of his compositions⁴ are still in the King of Saxony's musical library, and Breitkopf & Härtel once possessed several of his MSS., as did also Dr. Burney.

Lotti's rank among musicians is a high one, from the fact that though the last representative of the old severe school, he used modern harmonies with freedom and grace. The expression and variety of his music struck even his contemporaries, especially Hasse, when he was at Venice in 1727. Burney,⁵ who heard his church music sung in Venice in 1770, credits him with 'grace and pathos,' and characterises his choral music as both solemn and touching, and so capable of expression, though written in the old contrapuntal style, as to have affected him even to tears. Of his cantatas he says that they contain recitatives full of feeling.⁶ As a specimen of his writing for a single voice we may cite the favourite song 'Pur dicesti.' He was so afraid of overloading the voices that he never used orchestral accompaniments in church music. There are wind instruments as well as the four strings in his Dresden operas, but not in those produced in Venice.

Besides Saratelli and Marcello, Alberti, Bassani, Gasparini and Galuppi were among his pupils. A motet of Lotti's, 'Blessed be thou,' and a madrigal, 'All hail, Britannia,' both for four voices, are given in Hullah's Part Music (1st ed.), and a fine Credo in C, also for four voices, in his Vocal Scores and Part Music (2nd ed.). Proske has a Mass of his (a 4) in Musica divina, vol. i., and Rochlitz a Crucifixus, a 6, and another a 8, and a Qui tollis, a 4, in his Sammlung. There is also a Kyrie in the Auswahl vorz. Musikwerke (Trautwein). Four masses and a Requiem are in Lück's Sammlung, and various other pieces in the collections of Schlesinger, Moskowa, etc.

LOTTINI, ANTONIO, the principal Italian basso in London in 1737 and 1738. He sustained that part in Handel's 'Faramondo' in 1737, in his 'Serse,' and in the 'Conquista del Vello d' oro' in 1738. J. M.

LOUISE, musical romance in 4 acts; text and music by Gustave Charpentier. Produced Opéra-Comique, Paris, Feb. 2, 1900; Covent Garden, June 18, 1909; in English (Quinlan Opera Co.), Palace Theatre, Manchester, Oct. 17, 1912.

LOUIS FERDINAND, PRINCE—accurately Friedrich Christian Ludwig—(b. Nov. 18, 1772; d. Saalfeld, Oct. 13, 1806), was the son of Prince August Ferdinand of Prussia, and therefore nephew of Frederick the Great and of Prince Henry (the patron of J. P. Salomon and cousin of Frederick William II.), the violoncello-player, for whom Beethoven wrote his op. 5. His sister Louise married Prince Radziwill, who composed the Faust music, and to whom Beethoven dedicated the overture, op. 115.

Louis Ferdinand thus belonged to a musical as well as a royal family. That he very early entered the army was a matter of course, for no other career was open to a Prussian prince; but that, amid all the distractions of a military life no small part of which (1792-1806) was spent in hard service, he should have become a sound practical musician and composer, proves his energy and perseverance no less than his talent; but music was his passion, and in garrison or camp he had musicians with him and kept up his practice. He preferred English pianofortes, of which he is said to have purchased no fewer than thirteen.

We find no account of his masters and early studies, nor any but vague notices of his rapid progress, until 1793. He was then with his regiment at Frankfort, and is reported to have aided a poor musician not only with his purse, but by a very fine performance of a sonata in a concert. Three years later, in 1796, Beethoven, then in Berlin, formed that opinion of his playing which he afterwards expressed to Ries,¹ that, though the playing of Himmel—then among the most renowned of pianists—was elegant and pleasing, it was not to be compared with that of the Prince. Ries also records Beethoven's compliment to him—that he did not play at all like a king or a prince, but like a thorough, solid pianist. In 1804 the Prince made a journey to Italy. In Bohemia he visited Prince Lobkowitz at his seat, Raudnitz. We see no sufficient reason to doubt the truth of an anecdote the scene of which lay then and there. Lobkowitz had purchased from Beethoven the recently composed Heroic Symphony, and had had it performed in his palace at Vienna. He consulted with Wranitzky, his Kapellmeister, as to a programme for the entertainment of his guest. Wranitzky proposed the new symphony.

Louis Ferdinand listened with the utmost interest, and at the close of the performance requested a repetition, which was of course granted. After supper, having to depart early the next morning, he besought the favour of a third performance, which was also granted.

It was under the fresh impression of this music that Louis Ferdinand renewed his acquaintance with Beethoven. We have no particulars of the meeting. Ries² only relates that an old Countess,³ at the supper after a musical entertainment, excluded Beethoven from the table set for the Prince and the nobility, at which the composer left the house in a rage. Some days later Louis Ferdinand gave a dinner, and the Countess and Beethoven being among the guests, had their places next the Prince on either hand, a mark of distinction of which the composer always spoke with pleasure. A pleasant token of their intercourse survives in the dedication to the Prince of the PF. concerto in C minor, which was first played in July 1804, and published in November.

In the autumn of the next year (1805), the Prince being at Magdeburg on occasion of the military manœuvres, Spohr was invited to join them. 'I led,' says Spohr,⁴

'a strange, wild, stirring life, which for a short time thoroughly suited my youthful tastes. Dussek and I were often dragged from our beds at six in the morning and called in dressing-gown and slippers to the Prince's reception-room, where he, often in shirt and drawers (owing to the extreme heat), was already at the pianoforte. The study and rehearsal of the music selected for the evening often continued so long, that the hall was filled with officers in stars and orders, with which the costume of the musicians contrasted strangely enough. The Prince, however never left off until everything had been studied to his satisfaction.'

Louis Ferdinand was killed at the battle of Saalfeld.

His compositions, like his playing, were distinguished for boldness, splendour and deep feeling; several of those which are in print were composed before the intercourse with Dussek had ripened his taste, and made him more fully master of his ideas. These he would gladly have suppressed. The pianoforte quartet in F minor is considered to be his best work.

Ledebur's list of the published compositions (made 1861) is as follows:

⁴ Selfbiography.

LOULIÉ, ETIENNE, protégé of Mlle. de Guise, and music-master, in the second half of the 17th century, was a pupil of Gehenault and of Ouvrard; entered the Sainte-Chapelle,¹ Paris, in 1663-64, and left it in 1673. He is known as the author of Éléments ou principes de musique dans un nouvel ordre . . . avec l'estampe et l'usage du chronomètre (Paris, 1696; National Lib.), at the close of which is an engraving and description of his 'Chronomètre.' Loulié was the first to attempt to indicate the exact tempo of a piece of music by means of an instrument beating the time. The one he invented took the minute as the unit, and went up to seventy-two degrees of rapidity; but being six feet in height was too cumbersome for general use. Nevertheless to Loulié belongs the merit of the idea which more than a century later was carried into practice by MÆLZEL. G. C.; addns. M. L. P.

LOURÉ (Fr.), a term of uncertain derivation, signified originally a kind of bagpipe common in many parts of France, but especially in Normandy.

From its primary signification the word 'loure' came to mean a dance, in slower time than the gigue, generally in 6-4 time. As this was danced to the nasal tones of the 'loure,' the term 'louré' was gradually applied to any passage meant to be played in the style of the old bagpipe airs. Thus 'lourer' is to play legato with a slight emphasis on the first note of each group. The 'louré' style is chiefly met with in pastoral, rustic and mountaineer music. A 'loure' occurs as the sixth movement of the fifth of the French Suites of Bach, in G. G. C.

LOUYS, MAÎTRE JAN, a 16th-century Flemish singer and composer, member of the Imperial Chapels of Maximilian I. and Ferdinand; organist of the Royal Chapel of the Netherlands in 1576. He composed 3 books of psalms (published Antwerp, 1555); motets, etc., in various collective volumes (Q.-L.).

LOVE IN A VILLAGE, the earliest and the most famous work of the second period of English BALLAD OPERA (q.v.). The libretto was by Isaac Bickerstaffe, and the music was probably arranged and selected by Dr. Arne.

LOVELL, THOMAS, a 15th-16th century English composer, who, in 1501, at the wedding festivities of Prince Arthur with Catherine of Aragon, had 'the ordering and guydinge' of the trumpeters and minstrels, and who is probably identical with the sub-dean of Wells, who died in 1524. Only 2 MS. songs of his are known so far in the University Library and in St. John's College, Cambridge (Q.-L.).

LOVER, SAMUEL (b. Dublin, Feb. 24, 1797; d. St. Heliers, Jersey, July 6, 1868), dramatist and composer, was the eldest son of a stockbroker, and displayed talent in many directions at an early age.

After an unsuccessful attempt to follow his father's business he devoted himself to miniature-painting, and was elected a member of the Royal Hibernian Academy in 1828, becoming its secretary two years afterwards. Ten years before this he had sung a song of his own composition at the banquet given to Moore in Dublin. He also achieved success as a writer of prose and verse, before the publication of his Legends and Stories of Ireland in 1831. On Feb. 9, 1832, his opera, 'Graine Uaile, or The Island Queen,' was given in Dublin. In 1832 he gained much fame by the exhibition of a miniature he had painted of Paganini. In 1835 he settled as a miniature-painter in London, and attained a good deal of social and artistic success. He was associated with Dickens in the foundation of Bentley's Miscellany. His first novel, Rory O'More (the title taken from his own song of the same name, dated 1826), came out in 1836, and he dramatised it in the same year for the Adelphi Theatre, where it ran for more than a hundred nights. Other dramatic pieces were: 'The White Horse of the Peppards,' 1838; 'The Happy Man,' 1839; 'The Olympic Picnic,' 'The Beau Ideal' and 'The Greek Boy,' 1840; 'Il Paddy Whack in Italia' (a burlesque Italian opera, English Opera House, Lyceum, 1841). His last play was 'McCarthy More,' 1861. Meanwhile he was writing novels, etc., and the best known of his works, 'Handy Andy,' came out in 1842. In 1844 the regular practice of his art had to be abandoned, owing to failing eyesight, and on Mar. 13, 1844, he started a musical entertainment, called 'Irish Evenings,' in the Princess Concert Rooms. The success of his experiment was so great that he repeated the entertainment in the chief towns of England, Scotland and Ireland, going to America in 1846. In 1848 he returned to London, and appeared in a new entertainment called 'Paddy's Portfolio.' He wrote two libretti for Balfe, married for the second time in 1852 (his first marriage was to Miss Berrill, 1827), and brought out some books of poems which were not successful.

From 1864 he wrote no more, and in the latter years of his life went back to live in Dublin. He died in Jersey, but was buried at Kensal Green, London. Among his most popular songs were 'The Angel's Whisper,' 'Molly Bawn' and 'The Low-backed Car.' Some of these were adapted to old Irish tunes. (D.N.B.; W. H. G. F.) M.

LOVE'S TRIUMPH, an opera in 3 acts; words by J. R. Planché, after 'Le Portrait vivant,' music by W. Vincent Wallace. Produced Royal English Opera, Covent Garden (Pyne and Harrison), Nov. 3, 1862. G.

In addition to the above the title has been used for other earlier musical productions : (1) 'Love's Triumph thro' Callipos,' printed in 1640. This was a masque written by Ben Jonson, and acted in the court of Charles I. in 1630. The name of the composer of the music has not survived; the decorations for its staging were by Inigo Jones. (2) 'Love's Triumph or the Royal Union' was a tragedy acted in 1678. (3) An opera, 'Love's Triumph,' produced at the Haymarket Theatre in 1708, and printed in folio by Walsh and Haro about that year. Richard Leveridge and Mrs. Tofts were the principal English singers, while the other parts were taken by Italians. The words were adapted from the Italian of Cardinal Ottoboni by Peter Anthony Motteux, and the music was by C. F. Cesarini¹ and F. Gasparini. F. K.

LOWE, EDWARD (b. Salisbury, c. 1610; d. Oxford, July 11, 1682), was a chorister in the cathedral there under John Holmes, the organist. About 1630 he succeeded Dr. William Stonard as organist of Christ Church Cathedral, Oxford. He married Alice, daughter of Sir John Peyton of Doddington, in the diocese of Ely, who died Mar. 17, 1648-49.² In 1660 he was appointed one of the organists of the Chapel Royal. In 1661 he published at Oxford A Short Direction for the performance of Cathedrall Service, published for the information of such as are ignorant of it and shall be called upon to officiate in Cathedral or Collegiate Churches where it hath formerly been in use, containing the notation of the Preces, Responses, Litany, etc., for ordinary days, and, under the title of Extraordinary Responses upon Festivals, a version of Tallis's Responses and Litany, and also 'Veni Creator,' harmonised for four voices. In 1662, on the resignation of Dr. Wilson, he was appointed Professor of Music at Oxford, having been deputy for some time before. In 1664 he published A Review of his Short Direction, adapted to the then newly revised Liturgy, and including also several chants and John Parsons' Burial Service. This edition was reprinted by Dr. Rimbault in 1843, and by Dr. Jebb in his Choral Responses in 1857. Lowe composed several anthems, some of which are in the Tudway collection and at Ely Cathedral. He is buried in the Divinity Chapel on the north side of the cathedral at Oxford. W. H. H.

LOWE, THOMAS (d. Mar. 1, 1783), favourite tenor singer, made his first appearance on any stage at Drury Lane, Sept. 11, 1740, as Sir John Loverule in 'The Devil to pay'; on Oct. 17 he performed Macheath, and on Dec. 20 had the distinction of being the original singer of Arno's beautiful songs, 'Under the greenwood tree' and 'Blow, blow, thou winter wind' in 'As You Like It.' In 1743 he appeared in Dublin in 'The Provoked Wife,' singing O'Carolan's song, 'Bumpers, Squire Jones.' He was the original singer of the following parts in Handel's oratorios: Priest of Dagon and Israelitish Man in 'Samson,' 1742; First Elder in 'Susanna,' 1743; Joshua, 1746; Zadok in 'Solomon,' 1749; and Septimus in 'Theodora,' 1750. In 1745 and several subsequent years he sang at Vauxhall Gardens, and in 1763 became lessee and manager of Marylebone Gardens, and continued so until 1768, when an unsuccessful season compelled him in Feb. 1769 to assign his interest in the place to trustees for the benefit of his creditors. His powers beginning to fail, he was compelled to accept engagements at Finch's Grotto Garden, Southwark, and similar places. In 1772 he was engaged at Sadler's Wells. Lowe is said to have possessed a finer voice than Beard, but to have been inferior as musician and singer.

LUCAS, CHARLES (1) (b. Salisbury, July 28, 1808; d. Mar. 30, 1869), was a chorister in the cathedral under Arthur Thomas Corfe from 1815-23, when he became a pupil of the R.A.M. and studied the violoncello under Lindley, and harmony and composition under Lord and Dr. Crotch. He remained there for seven years. In 1830 he became a member of Queen Adelaide's private band, and composer and arranger of music for it, and soon afterwards music preceptor to Prince George (afterwards Duke) of Cambridge and the Princess of Saxe-Weimar. In 1832 he succeeded Cipriani Potter as conductor at the R.A.M. He also became a member of the opera and other orchestras as a violoncellist. In 1839 he was appointed organist of Hanover Chapel, Regent Street. He was for some time conductor of the Choral Harmonists' Society, and in 1840-43 he occasionally conducted at the Ancient Concerts. On the retirement of Lindley he succeeded him as principal violoncello at the opera, the provincial festivals, etc. From 1856 to June 30, 1865, he was a member of the music-publishing firm of Addison, Hollier & Lucas. In 1859 he was appointed successor to Potter as Principal of the R.A.M., which office he held until July 1866, when ill-health compelled him to relinquish it. His compositions include 'The Regicide,' opera, three symphonies, string quartets, anthems, songs, etc. He edited 'Esther' for the Handel Society.

His son, (2) STANLEY (b. 1834; d. Hampstead, July 24, 1903), was Secretary to Leslie's Choir from its formation to Oct. 1855; Secretary to the Royal Society of Musicians from 1861; and to the Philharmonic Society from 1866; and as a publisher did good work in London for many years. W. H. H.

LUCAS, CLARENCE (b. Niagara, Canada, Oct. 19, 1866), composer and conductor, of mixed Dutch and Irish extraction. He received his early musical education in Montreal, where he played trombone in a military band, and second violin in the local Philharmonic Society, besides acting as organist at different churches. At the age of 20 he went to Paris, and studied under Georges Marty before entering the harmony class of Théodore Dubois at the Conservatoire. In 1889 he returned to Canada and became professor of harmony and counterpoint at the College of Music, Toronto, and conductor of the Philharmonic Society at Hamilton, Ontario. In 1893 Lucas took up his residence in London, acting as critic and correspondent for several papers. He was appointed conductor of the Westminster Orchestral Society in Dec. 1902, but resigned in the summer of 1904. Between 1880 and 1897 he wrote seven operas. He also composed four oratorios and cantatas, one of which, 'The Birth of Christ,' was performed in the Chicago Auditorium, Feb. 17, 1902. His overtures to 'Othello,' 'As You Like It,' and 'Macbeth' have been heard at Queen's Hall under Sir Henry Wood. He has written nearly forty pieces for piano, while a list of sixty-four songs comprises many varieties of styles. Lucas is now living in America. H. K.

LUCCA, PAULINE (b. Vienna, Apr. 25, 1841; d. there, Feb. 28, 1908), one of the most brilliant operatic artists of a brilliant epoch, born of Italian parents. When a child she sang in the choir of the Karlskirche, in 1856. One Sunday the principal singer was missing, and the young chorister, put forward to supply her place in the solo of a Mass by Mozart, revealed a beauty of voice and charm of style that startled all present. She studied under Uschmann and Lewy, and, her parents being in straitened circumstances, entered the chorus of the Opera at Vienna, which she quitted in 1859 to come out at Olmütz. On Sept. 4, 1859, she made her debut at Olmütz as Elvira in 'Ernani,' and there became a favourite at once. In Mar. 1860 she appeared at Prague as Valentine in 'The Huguenots,' and as Norma. At Meyerbeer's instigation Mlle. Lucca was engaged for Berlin, where she first appeared in Apr. 1861, and soon roused an enthusiasm rarely equalled by any former singer. She studied the rôle of Selika ('Africaine') and others under Meyerbeer's personal supervision. At Berlin she was engaged as court singer for life; and on July 18, 1863, made her first appearance in England, at Covent Garden, in the part of Valentine, creating an extraordinary impression, further enhanced by her performance of Margherita, in 'Faust,' during her second visit in the following year. On July 22, 1865, the 'Africaine' was produced at Covent Garden, and Mlle. Lucca's impersonation of Selika was of the highest rank. She reappeared in London every season (excepting 1869) up to 1872; and in 1882-84 she sang again at Covent Garden, in the parts of Selika, Cherubino, Carmen, etc. She sang throughout Germany with triumphant success, and at St. Petersburg, where she was received with the wildest enthusiasm. Her voice, a full soprano, with a compass of $2\frac{1}{2}$ octaves extending easily to C in alt, and sympathetic throughout, seemed capable of taking every grade of expression; and to her rare lyrical endowments she united one still rarer—a genius for representation. In London, besides the parts specified above, she was heard mostly in Zerlina ('Fra Diavolo'), Leonora ('Favorita') and Cherubino; but Berlin knew better the extent of a repertory said to include over fifty-six rôles. Auber was so delighted with her singing of his music that he presented her with the pen with which 'Fra Diavolo' was written, in token of his admiration. In 1872 she severed her connexion with Berlin, and went to America, where she remained two years, on an operatic tour through the States. She returned to Europe in 1874, and sang at all the chief cities of Germany, except Berlin. At Vienna she remained one of the chief attractions of each season. Besides starring engagements in Germany, she reappeared in Brussels, 1876; St. Petersburg and Moscow, 1877; and Madrid, 1878. In 1869 she married Baron van Rahden, but was separated from him in 1872. While in America she married Herr von Wallhofen, who died in 1899. She was honorary member of the court opera in Vienna.

LUCCHESI, ANDREA (b. Motta, Venice, May 28, 1741), opera composer, came to Bonn, 1771, appointed Kapellmeister there in 1774, and was still there in 1784, when the young Beethoven was playing in the orchestra. Lucchesi was a good organist, conductor, composer of 8 operas, symphonies, cantatas, church music, violin sonatas, etc. (Q.-L.; Riemann).

LUCCHESINA, MARIA ANTONIA MARCHE-SINI, an Italian mezzo-soprano, who sang in London, 1737-39. In the former year she played Rosimonda in Handel's 'Faramondo'; in the following year, besides other parts, that of Arsamene, a male character, in 'Serse'; and she sang the music of David in 'Saul' on its first production, Jan. 16, 1739. J. M.

LUCIA, FERNANDO DE (b. Naples, 1860; d. there, Feb. 21, 1925), tenor singer, studied at the Conservatoire of St. Peter at Naples and made his first appearance at the San Carlo in 'Faust' in 1883.

Having gained his reputation at Lisbon and elsewhere he came to London in 1887, being engaged by the late Sir Augustus Harris for that manager's experimental season of opera at Drury Lane. At first, however, de Lucia made no impression on London audiences. He was altogether overshadowed at Drury Lane by the brilliant success of Jean de Reszko, and, moreover, the parts in which he appeared—one of them Don Ottavio in 'Don Giovanni'—were scarcely suited to his voice and style. His real opportunity in London came in 1893, when, again under Sir Augustus Harris's management, he appeared as Canio in the first production in England of Leoncavallo's 'Pagliacci.' He remained associated with Covent Garden for some time, singing in 'Faust,' 'Cavalleria rusticana,' Boito's 'Mefistofele' and also in the first performance in England of Mascagni's 'L' amico Fritz.' Ceasing to be a member of the Covent Garden company, de Lucia sang much in America and had not been in London for some years when he reappeared at the new Waldorf Theatre in May 1905, singing in 'Pagliacci,' 'L' amico Fritz' and other operas with undiminished power. De Lucia's full tones did not fall very pleasantly on English ears, but he had a beautiful mezza voce. He was an admirable actor, especially in parts like Canio, that demand vigour and passion. He was a professor of singing at the Royal Conservatoire of Naples. s. H. P., with addns.

LUCIO, FRANCESCO, a 17th-century Venetian composer, singing-master at the Conservatorio dei Incurabili there from 1650. His operas were held in high esteem, and he composed also 2 books of motets, a book of arias, sacred songs in various collective volumes between 1649 and 1658 (Q.-L.).

LUCIO SILLA, a dramma per musica, in 3 acts; libretto by G. da Camerá, music by Mozart. Produced Milan, Dec. 26, 1772. G.

LUCREZIA BORGIA, opera in 3 acts; libretto adapted by Romani from Victor Hugo; music by Donizetti. Produced La Scala, Milan, spring, 1834; Théâtre Italien, Paris, Oct. 27, 1840. Victor Hugo then stopped the performance, and the words were rewritten under the title of 'La rinnegata.' In England it was produced (in two acts) Her Majesty's Theatre, June 6, 1839; in English, Princess's Theatre, Dec. 30, 1843; New York, Astor Place Opera House, in 1847. G.

LUDFORD, NICHOLAS, an English church composer of the late 15th and early 16th centuries, an important contemporary of Fayrfax. It has been supposed that he was a member of the Chapel Royal, but Gratian Flood¹ traces the biography of a Nicholas Ludford who was born about 1480, married in 1535, and died about 1542, without giving any information which definitely identifies him with the composer. Ludford is mentioned at the end of Morley's Plaine and Basie Introduction as one of the 'practicioners' in music whose work he had consulted. There is a collection of 6 masses (B.M., Roy. App. 45-48), one for each day of the week, bearing the composer's name—Nicholas Ludford. The collection dates from before 1536 (the date of the death of Katharine of Aragon—whose arms, together with those of Henry VIII., are on the binding), and is peculiar in that each Mass begins with a Kyrie and contains a long Sequence inserted between the Gloria and the Credo. They are all for 3 voices (treble, tenor and contra-tenor) and are 'lighter in texture than Fayrfax's work . . . [but] rather more advanced in character, the parts of ten entering in one after another with points of imitation, showing a transition to a late style.'² Part of the first Mass of this interesting series is contained in two greatly mutilated pages (B.M. Add. MSS. 30,520); it is there called 'Le Roy,' as the Mass is founded on a melody of that name (Tye also used it as a basis for a Kyrie).

LUDWIG, FRIEDRICH (b. Potsdam, May 8, 1872), became teacher of musical science in the University of Strassburg in 1905, and has made a special study of the music of the 13th and 14th centuries. His contributions to the Sammelbände of the Int. Mus. Ges. and the Riemann Festschrift, 1909 (Die liturgischen Organa des Leoninus Perotinus), as well as his chapter on the non-liturgical and secular vocal music of the Middle Ages in Adler's Handbuch, record these researches. He has held a professorship at Göttingen since 1911. C.

LUDWIG, JOSEPH (b. Bonn, Apr. 6, 1844), violinist and composer. He began the study of music at the age of 11, and was sent, four years later, to the Cologne Conservatorium, where he studied for four and a half years under Grünwald (violin), and Ferd. Hiller (composition). Later he went to Hanover and was taken in hand by Joachim, with whom he remained two years. Then came the inevitable military examinations, and a period during which music was put aside, after which he accepted engagements to play solos in various German towns.

He came in 1870 to London, where he received, shortly after his arrival, an appointment at the R.A.M. in succession to Leopold Jansa. He identified himself with English musical life, took out naturalisation papers, and won a respected position as a performer of chamber music, both in public and private. He gave numerous quartet concerts in London and provinces, his colleagues being usually G. Collins (2nd violin), A. Gibson or A. Hobday (viola) and W. E. Whitehouse (violoncello).

W. W. C.

LUDWIG, WILLIAM (real name LEDWIDGE), (b. Dublin, July, 1847; d. London, Dec. 25, 1923), operatic baritone. He was educated at the National Schools, Marlborough Street, Dublin, where he received musical instruction from John W. Glover, grandfather of James M. Glover, the conductor. Developing a fine baritone voice, he sang for several years in chorus at the Old Gaiety Theatre in the Strand, under the management of John Hollingshead, and also took small parts in the operatic productions there, in some of which Santley appeared towards the end of his stage career.

What first brought him prominently into public notice was his remarkable performance of Vanderdecken in 'The Flying Dutchman.' The part fell to him when in 1877 he succeeded Santley as chief baritone in the Carl Rosa Company, and for many years he played it with unvarying success. The sombre tone of his voice was exactly suited to the music, and he acted with an imaginative force that even the most famous of German artists can scarcely have excelled. In opera in English there have been few achievements so striking. Ludwig's success both in London and the provinces in the Wagner operas was by no means limited to 'The Flying Dutchman.' He was excellent as Wolfram and Frederic of Telramund, and late in his career, in performances otherwise imperfect, he did excellent work for the Carl Rosa Company, as Wotan in the 'Walküre,' and (in 1896) Sachs in the 'Meistersinger.' It was a pity that the chance of playing Sachs did not come to him while his voice was still in its prime. His conception of the great part was admirable in its blend of dignity, tenderness and kindly humour. Ludwig's voice was always marred by a pronounced tremolo, but he sang with such fervour and sincerity that the defect was readily forgiven. He played Claude Frollo in the production of Goring Thomas's 'Esmeralda' at Drury Lane, in 1883, and on the following night the small part of Barracini in the first performance of Sir Alexander Mackenzie's 'Colomba.' As a concert singer he was never given in London or at the Festivals the opportunities he deserved, but he sang 'Elijah' for Willing's Choir at St. James's Hall in the 'eighties, with Joseph Maas as the tenor.

LÜBECK (1), JOHANN HEINRICH (b. Alphen, Holland, Feb. 11, 1799; d. The Hague, Feb. 7, 1865), conductor and violinist, held the post of Kapellmeister and head of the Conservatoire at The Hague until his death. His eldest son, (2) ERNST (b. Aug. 24, 1829; d. Sept. 17, 1876), a very distinguished pianist, first appeared in public at 12 years of age, when he played Beethoven's E♭ concerto. He made a tour to the United States, Mexico and Peru, which lasted from 1849-54. On his return he was made court pianist at The Hague. In 1855 he moved to Paris, where he principally resided until driven from the city by the disturbances of the Commune, which gave a shock to his brain, from which it never recovered, and he became at length hopelessly insane. He wrote only for piano. Among his compositions are the following: Berceuse in A♭, op. 13; Tarentello; Polonaise, op. 14; 'Trilby the Sprite, Rêverie caractéristique.' The two former were chosen by him for performance at the Philharmonic Concert, May 7, 1860, when he also played Mendelssohn's concerto in G minor. In the same year he first appeared at the Musical Union. His playing was distinguished for brilliancy and technical dexterity. Berlioz says of him:

'Son talent est tout à fait extraordinaire, non seulement par un mécanisme prodigieux, mais par un style musical excellent et irréprochable. C'est la verve unie à la raison, la force unie à la souplesse; c'est brillant, pénétrant, et élastique comme une lame d'épée.'

His brother, (3) LOUIS (b. The Hague, 1838; d. Berlin, Mar. 8, 1904), was for some years teacher of the violoncello at the Leipzig Conservatorium, until about 1872, when he moved to Frankfurt. He was a member of the court orchestra at Berlin from 1880.

LÜBECK, (1) VINCENT (b. Padingbüttel, Hanover, 1654; d. Hamburg, Feb. 9, 1740), an organist of the North German school, famous alike as performer and teacher.

His first appointment, gained when he was 20 years old, was at Stade, where he remained about 30 years. In 1702 he was appointed to the church of St. Nicholas, Hamburg, where he remained till his death. His compositions include three cantatas, seven large works for organ and Choral-preludes. They have been published (1921) in a collected edition by Gottlieb Harms.

Of Lübeck's two sons, the elder, (2) PETER PAUL, was his father's successor at Stade, the younger, (3) VINCENT, was (1724-35) organist of St. George's Church, Hamburg, and his father's assistant and successor at St. Nicholas (Riemann).

LUGG (LUGGE), JOHN (early 17th cent.), English composer and organist. His Service in D (see below) is described in the MS. as being 'composed in King James y^e 1^{sts} time.' He is apparently identical with John Lugg who was a vicar-choral at Exeter in 1634,¹ and who, for some time also, was 'organist in St. Peters in Exeter.' This last description is given in MSS. at Ch. Ch., which, among other compositions by 'John Lugg', includes some (probably) autograph copies of organ scores of motets and 3 organ voluntaries (MS. 49) by him, as well as a 'Jigg for Harpsichord' (MS. 431). Some canons by a John Lugg are included in the 2nd edition of Hilton's 'Catch that catch can' (1658), as well as an anthem, 'It is a good thing to give thanks,' in Thomas Myriell's collection, 'Tristitia remedium' (1616).

LUGG, ROBERT, English church composer and organist, contemporaneous with, and probably a relation of, John Lugg (q.v.). He graduated Mus.B. at Oxford, 1638, and later became organist of St. John's College there. According to the Oxonianenses alumni, he 'changed his religion for that of Rome, and went beyond the seas.' A Service in G and 3 anthems are in a MS. organ-book which once belonged to St. John's College.² With regard to a Service at Ely (Q.-L.) and a Short Service by 'Lugg' (B.M. Add. MSS. 17,792-6), there is no means of ascertaining whether they are the work of John or Robert. J. M^{re}.

LUIGINI, ALEXANDRE CLÉMENT LÉON JOSEPH (b. Lyons, Mar. 9, 1850; d. Paris, July 29, 1906), famous conductor, was a violin pupil of the Paris Conservatoire, gaining a third accessit in 1867, a first accessit in 1868 and a second prize in 1869. In the latter year he was appointed leader of the orchestra in the Grand Théâtre at Lyons, becoming conductor there in 1877. He held this post till 1897, when he became conductor at the Opéra-

Comique in Paris, at first with Danbé, and afterwards (May 4, 1904) as principal conductor. While at Lyons he was professor in the Conservatoire there, and founded the 'Concerts Bellecour' (Lyons) and the concerts of the École de Musique, now the 'Concerts du Conservatoire.' He wrote numerous ballets, and also composed symphonic music: 'Ballet égyptien,' 'Ballet russe,' 'Marche de l'émir,' 'Carnaval turc,' 'Marche solennelle,' etc.; chamber music; a cantata, 'Gloria victis,' performed at Lyons, 1887; and lastly, 'Faublas,' an opéra-comique in 3 acts, Th. Cluny, Oct. 25, 1881. G. F.

LUINIG (LUINEAG), a choral song used to accompany labour, sung (or formerly sung) principally by women in the remote Highlands and Islands of Scotland. Patrick McDonald, 1783, says that they were of a plaintive character, and were then most common on the north-west coast of Scotland and in the Hebrides. He mentions that Luinigs were 'sung by the women not only at their diversions but also during almost every kind of work where more than one person is employed, as milking cows, fulling cloth, grinding of grain,' etc. When the same airs were sung as a relaxation the time was marked by the motions of a napkin held by all the performers. One person led, but at a certain passage he stopped, and the rest took up and completed the air. As they were sung to practically extemporaneous words by the leader with a general chorus, they resembled the sailors' 'shanty' of modern times. A 'Luineag' is given in Albyn's Anthology, 1818, vol. ii. F. K.

LUISA MILLER, opera in 4 acts; text (from Schiller's 'Cabale und Liebe') by Cammarano, music by Verdi. Produced Naples, Dec. 8, 1849; in French, Opéra, Paris, Feb. 2, 1853; in English, Sadler's Wells, June 3, 1858; in Italian, Her Majesty's, June 8, 1858; New York, Academy of Music, Oct. 20, 1886. G.

LULLUS, RAYMUNDUS, Doctor illuminatus (b. Palma, Majorca, 1236; stoned to death in Africa, 1315), a famous philosopher and occultist, devotes 3 chapters of his Ars generalis to music. E. v. d. S.

LULLY (LULLI), (1) JEAN-BAPTISTE (b. at or near Florence, Nov. 29, 1639³; d. Paris, Mar. 22, 1687). The correct orthography of this name may be settled by the fact that all extant authentic documents signed by him end with the y. It is probable that he dropped the Italian i and substituted the y when he became a naturalised Frenchman. Lully, who was greatly in favour with Louis XIV.—whose band of 'Petits-Viols' he led—was a graceful composer of the minuets and dances then in vogue, and was the first composer of legitimate French opera. The whole history of his earliest childhood is veiled in obscurity. In spite of the statement in his lettres de naturalisation granted to him by Louis XIV., in Dec. 1661, wherein he is declared to be the son of Lorenzo de' Lulli, a 'Florentine Gentleman,' and Caterina del Serta, it is most probable that Lully's origin was humble, and that France only learned that about this brilliant genius which he himself chose to reveal. An old shoemaker monk gave the gifted but mischievous child some elementary instruction, and taught him the guitar and the rudiments of music. Lully was in the midst of these studies when the Chevalier de Guise, returning from Malta, chanced to come across him, and, to please his niece Mlle. de Montpensier (who wanted a 'joli petit Italien' to teach her his language), brought this child, then about 10 or 12 years of age, with him to France. It is doubtful whether 'La Grande Mademoiselle' thought Lully joli, for we are told he entered her service as a scullion in the kitchen, and employed his leisure in learning the songs of the day and playing them upon his second-rate violin. The Comte de Nocent, chancing to hear him one day, was so struck with his talent that he mentioned it to Mlle. de Montpensier, with the result that he was promoted from the kitchen to the princess's band, where he soon outdistanced the other violinists. Thus, when quite young, fortune smiled upon the little Lully and further favours were probably in store for him at the Palais d'Orléans, when his mischievous habit of writing sarcastic verses and setting them to characteristic music brought him all at once into disgrace with the princess. Mademoiselle having discovered that he had composed the air of a satirical song, full of gaiety and 'go,' at her expense, promptly dismissed him from her service. However, that which seemed a loss was really a gain to Lully, for the young King Louis—then a youth of fifteen or so—had previously taken a fancy to Baptiste, as he was then called, and astutely perceiving his superior gifts made him a member of his band of 'Twenty-four violins' (Les vingt-quatre violons du Roi). Here his wonderful powers on the violin, 'an instrument which he played with a perfection none had heretofore attained,'¹ so impressed Louis XIV. that His Majesty was pleased to establish a band entirely for his favourite to train. He named these players Les Petits-Violons, and under Lully's instruction they soon surpassed the famous 'Twenty-four violins' both in power and celebrity. His new post enabled him to perfect himself as a solo-player, and gave him valuable practice as a conductor and composer for the orchestra. With his band of Petits-Violons as a means, he completely revolutionised the dull methods of composition formerly employed. Instead of treating his subjects as airs with an accompaniment (as was generally the custom) he studied the capacity of each instrument, and arranged his harmony and counterpoint in such a manner that each one was allotted a 'part' of individual interest, thus greatly adding to the novelty and balance of the whole composition. Baptiste had common sense as well as ambition, and soon perceived that without deeper study he could not make full use of his talents. To remedy his defective education he took lessons on the harpsichord, and in composition, of Nicholas Mertu, a professor of singing; of François Roberdot, who combined the functions of valet de chambre to the queen-mother with those of organist at the Église des Petits-Pères, and of Gigault, the greatest man of the three, who filled the post of organist at several churches, and was also a composer of talent. Lully's brilliant intellect and natural gifts were not slow in profiting by the superior knowledge of these masters, and in the meantime he lost no opportunity of ingratiating himself with men of rank. A born courtier, full of the resource and aplomb necessary to face an intriguing court, he knew, above all, how to please and amuse the king, and how to profit by this precious favour at the beginning of a reign full of youth, passion and art. In the midst of his dissipated life he continued tenaciously composing, and found time to write innumerable songs (amongst them 'Au Clair de la lune'), dances, violin solos and even church music, and gained such a reputation that no court fête was complete without Baptiste's music. He was soon chosen to compose the music for the court ballets, in which Louis XIV. himself danced side by side with Lully; and after the success of 'Alcidiane' (1658, words by Benserade) was commissioned to write the divertissements for 'Serse,' an Italian opera by Cavalli, performed at the Louvre (Nov. 22, 1660) in honour of the king's recent marriage with Marie Thérèse of Austria (June 9 previous), and a year and a half later the ballets for 'Ercole amante,' another opera by Cavalli, performed at the opening of the magnificent 'Salle de Spectacles' at the Tuileries (Feb. 7, 1662). The royal favour was not slow in manifesting its pleasure in these performances in a palpable form. On May 16, 1661, Lully received the 'Brevet de la charge de Composition de la Musique de la Chambre du Roi'; on July 3, 1662, a new brevet, 'La charge de Maître de Musique de la Famille royale.' These two united were fixed at a value of 30,000 livres, and the benefice of them was extended after Lully's death to his daughter for her life. In 1664 Lully married the daughter of Michel Lambert, 'maître de musique de la cour'—a man greatly esteemed for his talents, his singing and his amiable character—who brought with her a dot of 20,000 livres. In the same year he became very friendly with Molière, and collaborated with him in the composition of numberless ballets until 1671. It was by studying the works of the Venetian composer Cavalli, and observing his method, that Lully laid the foundation of his own individual style. In composing the divertissements of 'Le Mariage forcé,' 'Pourceaugnac,' 'La Princesse d'Élide' and 'Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme' he made good use of the feeling for rhythm which he had imbibed from Cavalli, and also endeavoured to make his music express the life and variety of Molière's situations and characters. The exquisitely comic scene of the polygamy in 'M. de Pourceaugnac' (which Lully himself impersonated to such perfection that he often employed it as a means to gain the king's pardon when His Majesty was displeased) is, in itself, sufficient evidence of the point to which he had attained, and of the glorious future which awaited him.

From 1658-71—the year in which Molière produced his tragedy 'Psyché'—Lully composed no less than thirty ballets, all unpublished.¹ These slight compositions, in which he personally took part with considerable success as dancer and comic actor, confirmed him still further in the favour of Louis XIV. But neither the lucrative posts granted him by the king nor his constantly increasing reputation were sufficient to appease his insatiable ambition. With all his genius he possessed neither honour nor morals, and would resort to any base expedient to rid himself of a troublesome rival. His envy had been roused by the privilege conceded to the Abbé Perrin (June 28, 1669) of creating an Académie de Musique, and was still further excited by the success of Cambert's operas, 'Pomone' and 'Les Peines et les plaisirs de l'amour' (1671). With the astuteness of a courtier Lully took advantage of the squabbles of the numerous associés directeurs of the opera, and with the aid of Mme. de Montespan procured the transference of Perrin's patent to himself (Mar. 1672). Once master of a theatre, the man whom honest Boileau branded as a cœur bas, a coquin ténébreux and a bouffon odieux proved his right to a place in the first rank among artists, though as a man he could claim neither sympathy nor respect. In the poet Quinault he was fortunate enough to discover a collaborateur of extraordinary merit, and a docile, modest character, admirably adapted to agree with that of the excitable, domineering court musician. In conjunction with him, Lully composed the first legitimate French opera, 'Les Fêtes de l'Amour et de Bacchus,' which was produced with great éclat at the new theatre on Nov. 15, 1672. The partnership so auspiciously inaugurated continued for a space of fourteen years, within which time Lully composed no less than twenty operas, paying Quinault a retaining fee of 4000 livres to supply him annually with an operatic libretto.

The following is a list of the works produced :

The variety of subjects in this list is surprising, but Lully was perfectly at home with all, passing easily from lively and humorous divertissements to scenes of heroism and pathos, from picturesque and dramatic music to down-right comedy, and treating all styles with equal power. He revolutionised the 'ballets de la cour,' replacing the slow and stately airs by lively allegros, as rapid as the pirouettes of the danseuses whom he introduced on the stage, to the great delight of the spectators. For the 'recitativo secco' of the Italians he substituted accompanied recitative, and in this very important part of French opera scrupulously confirmed to the rules of prosody and left models of correct and striking declamation. On the other hand, he made no attempt to vary the form of his airs, but slavishly cut them all after the fashion set by Cavalli in his operas, and by Rossi and Carissimi in their cantatas. But although the 'chanson à couplets,' the 'air-complainte' (or 'arioso' as we call it) and the 'air déclamé'—afterwards brought to such perfection by Gluck—unduly predominate in his works, that monotony of form is redeemed by a neatness of execution and a sweetness of expression worthy of all praise. He thoroughly understood the stage—witness the skill with which he introduces his choruses; had a true sense of proportion, and a strong feeling for the picturesque. The facts that his works are not forgotten, but are still republished, in spite of the progress of the lyric drama during the last 200 years, is sufficient proof of his genius. Not but that he has serious faults. His instrumentation, though often laboured, is poor, and his harmony not always correct: a great sameness of treatment disfigures his operas, and the same rhythm and the same counterpoint serve to illustrate the rage of Roland and the rocking of Charon's boat. In criticising works of art of a bygone age we should put them back in their original frames; and according to this rule we have no right to demand from the composer of 'Thésée,' 'Atys,' 'Isis,' 'Phaëton' and 'Armide' outbursts of passion or agitation which would have disturbed the solemn majesty of his royal master, and have outraged both stage propriety and the strict rules of court etiquette. The chief business of the king's surintendant de la musique undoubtedly was to please his master, who detested brilliant passages and lively melodies; and making due allowance for these circumstances we affirm that Lully's operas exhibit the grace and charm of Italian melody and a constant adherence to that good taste which is the ruling spirit of French declamation.

Lully was also successful in sacred music. Ballard published his motets for double choir in 1684, and a certain number of his sacred pieces, copied by Philidor, exist in the libraries of Versailles and of the Conservatoire. (See Q.-L.) Mme. de Sévigné's admiration of his Miserere and 'Libera' (letter, May 6, 1672) is familiar to all. Equally well known is the manner of his death. While conducting a Te Deum (Jan. 8, 1687) in honour of the king's recovery from a severe illness, he accidentally struck his foot with the baton; an abscess followed; the quack in whose hands he placed himself proved incompetent, and he died in his own house in the Rue de la Ville-l'Évêque.

During the whole of his fifteen years' directorship of the Opéra, Lully guarded his privileges with the uttermost care and jealousy. The national archives chronicle the numerous commands issued in favour of Lully by Louis XIV.: Aug. 12, 1672, Order forbidding any theatre other than Lully's to employ more than six violins or twelve musicians in all; forbidding Lully's actors and dancers to play at any other theatres but his own, unless expressly given leave by Lully. Apr. 1673, Forbidding any of the other theatres to employ more than 'two voices and six violins' in any of their representations. In 1684 a Royal Command that no Opera should be played in the kingdom unless by the permission of the 'Sieur Lully'; for infringement of this rule a penalty of 500 livres was demanded.

Mounting still higher in the king's favour, Lully was granted in 1681 his Lettres de naturalisation and his Lettres de noblesse, and, through sheer impudence, was made one of the Secrétaires du Roi, a privilege previously only accorded to the noblesse of the land.

As both surintendant de la musique and secretary to Louis XIV., Lully was in high favour at court, and used his opportunities to amass a large fortune. At his death he left four houses, all in the best quarters of Paris, besides securities and appointments valued at 342,000 livres (about £14,000). His wife, Madeleine, daughter of Lambert the singer (or of Michel Cambert, according to Q.-L.), whom he married

July 24, 1662, and by whom he had three sons and three daughters, shared his economical tastes. For once laying aside their parsimonious habits, his family erected to his memory a splendid monument surmounted by his bust, which still exists in the left-hand chapel of the church of the 'Petits-Pères,' near the Place des Victoires. Cotton¹ was the sculptor, and the Latin epitaph was composed by Santeul:

Perfidâ mors, inimica, audax, temeraria et excors,
Crudelisque, e caeca probris te absolvimus istis,
Non de te querimur tua sint munia magna.
Sed quando per te populi regisque voluptas,
Non ante auditis rapuit qui cantibus orbem
LULLUS eripitur, querimur modo surda fuisti.

Lulli musicien, a pamphlet to which both Fétis and the author of this article are indebted, was chiefly compiled by Le Prévost d'Exmes from various articles written by Séneccé, de Fresneuse and Titon du Tillet. There are many portraits of Lully, of which the best known are those engraved by Edelinck, Thomas, St. Aubin (from the bust by Colignon) and Desrochers. The full-length engraving by Bonnard, which forms the frontispiece to the score of 'Psyché,' published by Fourcault, is now extremely scarce.

Lully's eldest son, (2) Louis (b. Paris, Aug. 4, 1664; d. circa 1715), composed with his brother Jean-Louis 'Zéphire et Flore,' five acts (1688), revived in 1715; by himself, 'Orphée' (1690), a failure; and with Marais, 'Alcide,' five acts, successfully produced in 1693, and revived as 'La Mort d'Hercule,' in 1705, as 'La Mort d'Alcide' in 1716, and again under its original title in 1744. He also composed with Colasse a four-act ballet, 'Les Saisons,' the memory of which has been preserved by one of J. B. Rousseau's satires. The second son, (3) JEAN-BAPTISTE DE LULLY (b. Paris, Aug. 6, 1665; d. June 9, 1761²), was appointed surintendant de la musique in 1695, and wrote a cantata, 'Le Triomphe de la raison,' performed at Fontainebleau in 1696.

(4) JEAN-LOUIS (b. Sept. 23, 1667; d. Dec. 28, 1688), third son of the great composer, was a musician of considerable promise. His father's court appointments devolved on him, and on his death his brother became 'Surintendant' and 'Compositeur de la Chambre du roi,' to which posts he owed the slender reputation he succeeded in acquiring.

LUMBYE, (1) HANS CHRISTIAN (b. Copenhagen, May 2, 1810; d. Mar. 20, 1874), Danish composer of marches and dance music. Like Strauss and Lanner he had an orchestra, which, when not travelling professionally, was engaged from 1848 at the Tivoli near Copenhagen. His many marches and dances "Krolls Ballklänge," "Eine Sommernacht in Danemark," "Der Traum des Savoyarden," etc.), were long popular. On his retirement in 1865 he was created a Kriegsrath. His son, (2) KARL (b. Copenhagen, July 9, 1841; d. there, Aug. 10, 1911), succeeded his father in his office of conductor, and composed dance music. His second son, (3) GEORG (b. Copenhagen, Aug. 26, 1843), was the composer of an opera, "Die Hexenflöte" (1869), and other musical pieces for the stage. F. G.; addns.

LUMLEY, BENJAMIN (b. 1811; d. Mar. 17, 1875) (the son of a Jewish merchant named Levy), was bred to the law, and in Nov. 1832 admitted a solicitor. Being concerned for Laporte he became mixed up with the affairs of the opera in London, and on Laporte's death in 1841 was induced to become its manager at HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE (q.v.).

Pursuing a policy initiated by his predecessor, he gave prominence to the ballet to the neglect of the opera, and in a few years had so alienated his performers that at the end of the season of 1846 nearly the whole of his principal singers, band and chorus, seceded and joined the newly formed establishment at Covent Garden. The popularity of Jenny Lind sustained him during the next three seasons; and after her retirement from the stage in 1849, the return of Sontag to public life enabled him to maintain his position for a time, but afterwards the fortune of the house waned, until, at the end of the season of 1852, the manager was compelled to close the theatre until 1856, when the burning of Covent Garden induced him again to try his fortune. Meantime in 1850-51 he had been also manager of the Paris Théâtre des Italiens.

He struggled on at Her Majesty's for three seasons, but at the end of 1858 was forced to submit. Four benefit performances were given for him in 1863. He produced during his period of management the following operas for the first time in England:

Donizetti's "Figlia del reggimento," "Don Pasquale," "Linda di Chamouni" and "Favorita"; Verdi's "Ernani," "Atila," "Nabucco," "Traviata," "Trovatore" and "Masnadieri"; Costa's "Don Carlos," and Halévy's "Tempesta," and introduced, among others, the following singers:

Jenny Lind, Tadolini, Frezzolini, Cruvelli, Parodi, Castellan, Johanna Wagner, Piccolomini, Tietjens, Gardoni, Calzolari, Fraschini, Giuglini, Fornasari, Ronconi and Belletti.

After his retirement he returned to his original profession. In 1863 appeared (2nd edition) an account of his trouble with Lord Dudley, as The Earl of Dudley, Mr. Lumley and Her Majesty's Theatre. In 1864 he published an account of his managerial career, under the title of Reminiscences of the Opera (Hurst & Blackett, 1864). W. H. H.; addns. D.N.B.

LUNN, CHARLES (b. Birmingham, Jan. 5, 1838; d. London, Feb. 28, 1906), tenor singer, teacher, writer and controversialist, studied singing in Italy under Cattaneo, whom he esteemed highly, and other masters. He started professional life as a singer of considerable promise: in 1867 he settled in his native town as a teacher of singing, removing in 1895 to London. Lunn's chief publication, Philosophy of Voice, which ran through nine editions, was a scientific and historical exposition of the old Italian school of singing, associated principally with the names of Porpora and Manuel Garcia. It contained an original and interesting description of the action of the false cords and their influence in the production of true tone; and the development and preservation of the voice, allowing the singer to make full and unhampered use of his elocutionary powers and artistic gifts. Though a noted predilection for the clash of intellectual armour militated against his success in the world at large, Lunn was much esteemed in certain circles for his entertaining and informative conversation and his fearless and untiring championship of what he felt to be the truth. J. M. L.

LUNN, LOUISA KIRKBY (b. Manchester, Nov. 8, 1873), mezzo-soprano, was first taught singing there by J. H. Greenwood, organist of All Saints' Church; later, 1893-96, by Visetti at the R.C.M., where in 1894 she gained a scholarship.

On Dec. 6, 1893, as a student, Miss Lunn made her débuts in opera at Drury Lane as Margaret in Schumann's "Genoveva," and at the Prince of Wales's Theatre on Dec. 13, 1894, as the Marquise de Montcontour in Delibes's "Le Roi l'a dit," on the production of these operas in England by the R.C.M. Her success, both as singer and actress, was such that Sir Augustus Harris engaged her for five years to sing in opera, but the contract became void by his death in 1896. In the meantime, on Mar. 2 of the last-named year, she played with great success as Norah on the production of Stanford's "Shamus O'Brien" at the Opéra-Comique Theatre, since demolished, and later in the summer played small parts at Covent Garden. From 1897-99 she was the principal mezzo or contralto of the Carl Rosa Company, both in London and in the provinces. Her parts included Ortrud, Brangäne, Magdalena, Carmen, both Frederick and the heroine in "Mignon," Julia in a stage version of Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch" (Oct. 23, 1897), Eila on the production of MacCunn's "Diarmid" at Covent Garden, etc. In June 1899 she married

W. J. K. Pearson of London. For a time she sang in concerts only at the Queen's Hall and elsewhere, under the direction of Robert Newman, with whom she had signed a contract. On May 14, 1901, she reappeared at Covent Garden with the Grand Opera Syndicate as the Sandman in Humperdinck's 'Hänsel und Gretel.' In 1904 she made a great advance there in public favour, notably as Amneris and Fricka; June 20, Pallas in Saint-Saëns's 'Hélène,' and July 6, Hesotade in 'Salomo,' a new version of Massenet's 'Hérodiade,' on the production of the two last operas in England. She continued singing each year at Covent Garden up to and including 1914, and has made occasional appearances there since the war.

Mme. Kirkby Lunn, with her fine mezzo-soprano of over two octaves in compass from g to b flat, is equally successful in the concert-room in oratorio, Lieder, and ballads, singing with equal facility in four languages. On Nov. 12, 1902, she sang at the Queen's Hall on the production of Prout's version of the 'Mossiah' by the Royal Society of Musicians, having previously sung the same year at the Festivals of Sheffield and Norwich. Later in this year she went to the United States and played in opera at New York as Brangäne, Ortrud, Erda in 'Siegfried,' Amneris, etc. She also sang six times with the Symphony Orchestra at Boston and elsewhere, twice at Chicago with the Pittsburg Orchestra, and twice with the Chicago Orchestra under Theodore Thomas. In 1904 she took part in the 'Elgar Festival' at Covent Garden, and, late in the summer, she sang at the Kursaal, Ostend, under Léon Rinskoff. In the autumn she went again to America, and on Oct. 17 sang as Kundry at Boston in the first English performance of 'Parsifal' by the Savage Company, under the conductorship of Rothwell, with great success. LUPACCHINO, BERNARDINO, DAL VASTO (mid. 16th cent.), a composer famous for his 2-part solfeggi written in collaboration with J. M. Tasso (1559), which appeared in numerous editions down to the 18th century. He also composed 2 books of madrigals a 4 v. (1543 and 1546), and a book of madrigals a 5 v. (1547) (Q.-L.).

LUPO, the name of a family of musicians, 7 members whereof appear in the State Calendars as musicians at the English court. (1) AMBROSO DA MILAN (d. 1594) appears first in the list of royal musicians as 'Viall' (viol-player) in 1540; AMBROSIUS (de Millane) and Mark Anthony (Bassano ?) are the only musicians mentioned as having received the Queen's customary New Year's gift in 1578-79, and in 1587 Ambrose's New Year gift to the Queen consisted of '2 glasses of sweet water' (bottles of scent ?). We find (2) JOSEPH and (3) PETER first mentioned in 1570 as 'vyolons' (the word was then used for viols). In 1593-94 we find among 'the violins' (still used for viols) (4) JOSEPH, (5) PIETRO and (6) THOMAS (the latter was Joseph's son), and in 1602 'Peter and Thomas his son' and 'Joseph and Thomas his son' appear in the same capacity; Peter's son Thomas was appointed violinist, Nov. 17, 1599. One of the two cousins, Thomas, the son of Joseph, was not only a violinist, but also lute-player, singer and a composer of distinction. He died about April or beginning of May 1628, and his various appointments were filled by different musicians, his son (7) THEOPHIL becoming his successor as violinist on Dec. 1 of that year. He appears still among Charles I.'s musicians in 1640.¹ (8) HORATIO, whose relationship to the foregoing does not appear from the lists, was appointed in 1612 as violinist for lifetime, but his name does not occur in the lists of the king's musicians later than 1625. E. v. d. s.

LUPOT, a family of famous French violin-makers. The family came from the village of Mirécourt in the Vosges mountains, which has been for three centuries or more the seat of a violin manufacture. (1) JEAN LUPOT, the great-grandfather of Nicolas, was a violin-maker here. His son (2) LAURENT (b. 1696) established himself in the trade at Lunéville (1751-56) and Orléans (1756-62). (3) FRANÇOIS, son of Laurent, first worked with his father at Lunéville, and in 1758 migrated to Stuttgart, where he remained for twelve years as fiddle-maker in ordinary to the Grand Duke of Württemberg. In 1770 he returned and settled at Orleans. He was the father of two sons, (4) NICOLAS, the 'French Stradivarius' (b. Stuttgart, 1758; d. 1824), and (5) FRANÇOIS (b. Orleans, 1774; d. 1837), in his time a reputable bow-maker. Nicolas began his career early. We have good instruments made by him at Orleans (Rue d'Illiers) before he had completed his twentieth year.

In 1794 Nicolas Lupot removed to Paris and set up a shop in the Rue de Grammont (1798-1803). He afterwards removed to the Rue Croix des Petits Champs, where he made those famous copies of the great Italian makers on which his reputation rests. Lupot wisely dropped all pretensions to originality, and became the first of copyists. His favourite pattern was the Stradivarius: his few copies of Guarnerius violins are less successful. Many instruments are signed with his autograph. He made several quintets of two violins, two tenors and bass, to which he sought to give a perfect unity of tone and appearance. Nicolas Lupot ranked in his time as the first of his trade

¹ Eitner (Q.-L.) suggests that Trimolpus Thopull, contributor to Leighton's 'Pearles' is a pseudonym of Theophil Lupot. The 'Avre' in Elizabeth Rogers's Virginal book is attributed by Hughes-Hughes (Brit. Mus. Cat.) to Thomas, son of Peter Lupot (Thomas ?), one 5-part fancy (2 parts missing). Add. in Europe. Spohr, who long played on one of his violins, recommends him as a maker. His weakest point is his varnish. He employed several kinds: the usual one is a thick and not very transparent oil varnish, which is sometimes badly dried, and presents a rough and lumpy appearance. His business descended to his son-in-law, Charles Francis Gand, who was his pupil at the end of 1806 and had left him in 1812 to succeed the luthier Koliker. C. F. Gand took the title of 'Luthier du Conservatoire.' At his death, May 10, 1845, his eldest son, Charles Adolphe, took over the firm, at first alone, then (1855) with his brother Eugène, under the name Gand Frères.

Charles Adolphe Gand died in 1866. Eugène then took as his partners Ernest and Gustave Bernardel, sons of Sébastien Philippe Bernardel, an old workman of Nicolas Lupot. The name Gand et Bernardel Frères became in 1884 Gand et Bernardel, by the retirement of Ernest. In 1892 Eugène died. In 1901 Gustave handed over his house to Albert Caressa (b. Dec. 25, 1866), who had entered the firm May 20, 1891, and Henri Français, his partner from 1880. From 1920 Albert Caressa remained sole director of this firm. M. P.

François Lupot (5), the bow-maker, and brother of Nicolas, invented the 'coulisse,' or metal groove attached to the 'nut,' and carefully fitted to the stick, on which it works. He left as his successor Dominique PECCATE, who ranks as the best bow-maker after Tourte.

LUPRANO (LURANO), PHILIPPO DE, a 15th-16th century Italian composer, wrote 31 Frottole in collective volumes by Petrucci and others, published between 1504 and 1517.

LUPUS, JOHANNES DE, see HELLINCK, J. LUPUS.

LUR (LUUR, i.e. Great Horn). A prehistoric instrument of bronze whereof many specimens in a remarkable state of preservation have been discovered from time to time in the peat bogs of Denmark and Sweden, nineteen of them being in the National Museum at Copenhagen.

Its peculiar shape resembles somewhat that of a contorted S, the bell of the instrument—here represented by a flat ornamental disc attached to the larger end of the tube—projecting above the head of the performer. (PLATE LXVIII.)

The natural sound of this horn is rough and blatant, and small pendant plates of metal are attached to the smaller end of the tube apparently for the purpose of increasing by their rattling the terrifying effect of the blast, as noted by Polybius and Diodorus Siculus in connexion with the Celtic and Gallic warriors before the Christian era.

Under the lip and embouchure of a modern player the longer horns easily produce the eleven natural harmonics above the prime or fundamental note, and also certain chromatic sounds descending below the prime. Some writers have therefore supposed that the intervals of the modern scale were known to those horn-blowers of 2500 years or more ago; but it is more probable that as the player's cheeks were in those days puffed out in blowing (whence the need of the capistrum or cheek bandage used by Greeks and Romans), only one or two of the lower harmonics were obtained, the octave and possibly the twelfth. F. W. G.

LURLINE, legendary opera in 3 acts; words by E. Fitzball; music by W. Vincent Wallace. Produced Covent Garden, Feb. 23, 1860. G.

LUSCINIUS, OTTOMAR (Nachtgall) (b. Strassburg, 1487¹; d. near Freiburg-im-Breisgau, 1537), a pupil of Hofhaimer, was organist at Strassburg in 1515, and afterwards canon of St. Stephen's. Owing to the reformation troubles he was obliged to leave Strassburg in 1523, and led a somewhat wandering life, dying at the Carthusian house near Freiburg-im-Breisgau. He was the author of Musicae institutiones, 1515, also of Musurgia, 1536, the latter work mainly a translation into Latin of Virdung's Musica getutscht. His name appears as the composer of a three-part organ piece in Kleber's organ Tabulatur-Buch, with the date 1516. J. R. M.

LUSINGANDO (LUSINGHIERO), literally 'flattering' or 'coaxing,' whence its musical meaning comes to be 'in a soft, tender manner,' resembling Amoroso in character, with perhaps a hint of coquetry in it, except that the latter is generally used at the beginning of movements, and the former as applying only to a short passage. M.

LUSITANO, VICENTE (b. Olivença, 1st quarter of 16th cent.; d. after 1553), Portuguese composer and theorist. In his own country he was known as Vicente de Olivença; but in Rome, where he established himself about 1550, he was called Lusitano (the Portuguese). His name came prominently forward in musical circles in 1551, through an academic dispute with Nicola Vicentino, in which the Spaniard Escobedo and the Netherlander Danckerts were appointed as judges. Baini (ii. 342-7) has related the affair in a footnote which occupies six pages, though in this as in other matters the authority of Baini should not be accepted without question. The verdict was given in favour of the Portuguese, who, to make sure of his position, published an 'Introductione facilissima et nouissima de canto fermo . . .' (Rome, 1553, with two later editions at Venice.)

He also composed a book of motets, 'Epi-grammata, quae vulgo motetia dicuntur, cum 5, 6 et 8 v.' Rome, 1551 (Munich). J. B. T.

LUSSAN, ZÉLIE DE (b. Brooklyn, U.S.A., Dec. 21, 1863), married, 1907, Angelo Fronani, pianist, who died 1918. Her parents, who settled in New York in the '50's, were both French, the mother, a singer, claiming descent from Mme. de Sévigné. In spite of the girl's promising talent, they refused to let her follow a professional career until persuaded by Mme. Christine Nilsson, who heard her privately. Trained by her mother, she first appeared in opera with the Boston Ideals in 1886 as Arline in 'The Bohemian Girl' and won immediate success. In 1888 she came to London and was engaged by Augustus Harris for his first Covent Garden season, appearing in a single performance of 'Carmen' on July 7, directly after Minnie Hauk and Nordica. Comparisons, however, did not prevent her gaining marked favour in a part which she subsequently made her own and sang over 500 times in the United Kingdom and America. Nature and art had combined to make her an ideal exponent of Bizet's heroine: it was alike vocally and histrionically picturesque, forcible and attractive, yet free from exaggeration. With a range of $2\frac{1}{2}$ octaves, her voice had the rich timbre of a mezzo-soprano, whilst mounting easily to a bright, ringing tone in the head register; and thus, thanks to rare technical facility, she was able to do justice to a wide range of parts, including Zerlina, Mignon, Juliette, Desdemona (these two created by her in English), Nedda and Musetta. She appeared more or less regularly at Covent Garden, chiefly as Carmen, between 1890 and 1910. During the same period she was a leading member of the Carl Rosa Company, with which her versatile labours will perhaps be best remembered. In 1894-95 she sang at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, taking among other parts that of Anne in Verdi's 'Falstaff' on its production in America. In the following year she toured successfully in France, Spain and Portugal, and in 1900 again sang in New York with H. W. Savage's English Opera Company. She retired from the stage on her marriage and made her permanent home in London.

LUTE (Fr. luth; Ger. Laute; Ital. liuto or leuto; Dutch luit; Spanish laud; Port. alaude), a large and beautiful stringed instrument with a long neck and fretted finger-board; at one time much in use, but now obsolete. (See PLATE XLV.). In mediæval Latin the lute is called testudo, and the guitar cithara, both inaccurate identifications of ancient Greek instruments of very different construction. (See LYRE.) The lute is of Oriental origin, and its Arabic name is al'ud—from which its European names are derived by the omission of the initial vowel of the definite article al.¹ The Portuguese alaude alone retains it. The lute became known throughout the West in the time of the Crusades. We class the Russian kobsa as a lute; while the balalaika of the same country is of the guitar kind. As in the viola da gamba and violoncello, the formal difference between a lute and a guitar is to be found in the back, which in the lute is pear-shaped and in the guitar is flat. The lute is without ribs, which are essential to the framing of the GUITAR (q.v.).

The invention of stringed instruments with finger-boards, or the neck serving as a finger-board, precedes the earliest historical monuments. The long-necked Egyptian guitar was certainly depicted in the fourth dynasty; and wall-painting of the time of Moses, preserved in the British Museum, shows that it then had frets. We observe a similar instrument in Assyrian monuments. Strangely enough the Greeks had it not. The Arabs derived the lute from Persia, and with the instrument a finesse in the division of the octave into smaller parts than our semitones, rendered possible by the use of frets, and still an Asiatic peculiarity; the best authorities assuring us that the modern Arabian ud and tumbura are thus adjusted. Kiesewetter,² however, gives the Persian-Arab scale as a division of seventeen in the octave; twelve of the intervals being the Pythagorean limma (not quite our equal semitone) and five of the dimension of the comma, an interval, though small, quite recognisable by a trained ear. (See COMMA.) Carl Engel³ states that the Arabs became acquainted with the Persian lute before their conquest of the country, and names an Arab musician who, sent to the Persian king to learn singing and performance on the lute, brought it to Mekka in the 6th century of our era. The strings of the Arab lute are of twisted silk—an Asiatic, especially Chinese, material for strings. The same, bound round the neck, has served for the FRETS (q.v.). The modern Egyptian lute, named *oud*⁴ or e'oud, of which there is a specimen at South Kensington, and an excellent woodcut in Lane's Modern Egyptians, chap. v., has seven pairs of gut strings, and is, moreover, played with a plectrum of eagle's or vulture's quill.

The Western lute was a mediæval and a Renaissance instrument. It flourished during the creative period of Gothic architecture and later, its star beginning to pale as the violin quartet arose. There were publications for the lute as late as 1740—six sonatas by Falkenhagen, Nuremberg; and, 1760, Gellert's Odes by Beyer. The latest use of the instrument in the orchestra seems to have been in Handel's 'Deidamia,' 1741. The great J. S. Bach himself wrote three sets of pieces¹ for the lute, besides introducing the instrument in the 'St. John Passion.'

To proceed to the description of the instrument; the pear-shaped or vaulted body of the lute is built up of staves of pine or cedar. The belly is of pine, and has one or more sound-bars for support and to assist the resonance. It is graduated in thickness towards the edges and is pierced with from one to three sound-holes in decorative knots or 'rose' patterns. Great pains were evidently taken in choosing and making this very essential part of the instrument. Attached to the body is a neck of moderate length covered by a finger-board divided by frets of brass or catgut into a measured scale. The strings were entirely of catgut until towards the end of the 17th century, when silver-spun bass strings were introduced. There would appear by comparison of old lutes to have been much diversity in the stringing and tuning, and there is a broad division in the large lutes between those notes, generally in pairs of unisons, which lie over the finger-board and frets, and the diapason notes that are not stopped, and serve only to determine the key or modulation. When off the finger-board these deeper strings were attached to pegs elevated by a second and higher neck. These extended instruments became afterwards known as theorboes, and in time virtually banished the older single-necked lutes. Mersenne's engraving of lute and theorbo (tuorba, théorbe) gives nine frets besides the nut, to the lute twenty-one strings, to the theorbo twenty-three strings (eight to the upper neck). (See CHITARRONE; THEORBO; ARCHLUTE, the bass theorbo.) The fingers of the right hand, without a plectrum, touched the strings pizzicato in melody or chords. The tender charm and colouring of the lute-player's tone can, in these days of exaggerated sonorosity, be scarcely imagined. The frets of the finger-board followed a division by half-tones, and in the old lutes were eight to each pair of strings. Later, as will be presently shown, they were carried farther in the higher strings. Mace² said nine was the best number, but there was a limitation to this stopping nearer the bridge, by the proportions of the strings in length, thickness and weight being unduly disturbed to the detriment of the tone. According to Baron³ and an older authority, Praetorius, the lute had originally four open notes (a); in course of time two G's were added (b). Melchior Neusiedler of Augsburg, who was living A.D. 1574, added low F, making thirteen strings in all, the highest, or Chanterelle, being a single string. Baron calls compass (b) Gamaut, and the deeper bass strings he calls Brummer or Bombarte, the finer ones Bombärtlein. Brummer was usually applied, and the appellations in German, Italian and English were as follows:

- g'. Quintsaite.—Canto.—Treble.
- d'. Kleinsangsaite.—Sottana.—Small Mean.
- a. Grossangsaite.—Mezzana.—Great Mean.
- f. Kleinbrummer.—Tenore.—Counter Tenor.
- c. Mittelbrummer.—Bordone.—Tenor.
- G. Grossbrummer.—Basso.—Bass.

At page 122 of his work Baron gives the compass of an 'eleven course' lute, thus:

the two highest (the melody strings) being single, the remainder pairs. His division of the finger-board has ten frets for the F; eleven for the G; and twelve for each of the highest six. There is thus a compass of 3½ octaves from C below the bass stave to the f". We gather further from him that this tuning would represent 'cammer,' or theatre pitch; for the 'chor,' or church pitch, the chanterelle would be tuned to the treble G, to the greater peril of the strings.⁴ This would be the 'Discant lute' of Praetorius; see below. Praetorius⁵ has G for the chanterelle. There were at last thirteen pairs of strings in large lutes, descending at the tuner's pleasure to the deep A or G. Mace (p. 41) explains a large compass of strings as bringing the stopping 'to a natural form and aptitude for the hand.' There were other tunings besides the above D minor. Mace gives a new French tuning in E minor, and a 'flat' tuning which he preferred; referring to that we quote from Baron (b) as the old lute, theorbo or viol way: but he wisely remarks (p. 191):

'That tuning upon any instrument which allows the artist most scope, freedom and variety, with most ease and familiarity, to express his conceptions most fully and completely, without limitation or restraint throughout all the keys, must needs be accounted the best.'

It must have been very troublesome to keep a lute in order. Mace, in his often-quoted work, recommends that a lute should be kept in a bed which is in constant use, and goes on to say that once in a year or two, if you have not very good luck, you will be constrained to have the belly taken off as it will have sunk from the stretch of the strings, 'which is a great strength.' Mattheson said a lutenist of eighty years old had certainly spent sixty in tuning his instrument, and that the cost in Paris of keeping a horse or a lute was about the same. Baron replied that the horse would soon be like one of Pharaoh's lean kine.

In Italian lutes of early date the tuning pegs were disposed diagonally across the head in two rows, the projections for tuning being at the back. They were afterwards inserted at the side of the head as in a violin, the head being bent back at an obtuse or even a right angle to the neck. Ultimately metal screws replaced the pegs, but only when large single strings were put on instead of double strings. The lute is now esteemed solely for the great beauty of its form and design. Inlays of various hard woods, tortoiseshell, ivory and mother-of-pearl, and sometimes painting on the sound-board, have been employed to decorate them. Through their decorative value many lutes have been preserved; and many were transformed into Vielles or Hurdy-gurdies. Lutes and viols having been made by the same artists, the word luthier in French still designates a maker of violins.

The lute-player had not our musical notation; systems special to the instrument, and known as TABLATURE (q.v.), being long in vogue. The lute and organ are the two instruments for which the oldest instrumental compositions we possess were written.¹ Many instruction-books were written for the lute, with examples in tablature; the oldest known to exist in this country is the Lauttenbuch of Wolf Heckel (Strassburg, 1562), preserved at the R.C.M. The next in order of date are The Science of Luting, licensed to John Allden in 1565; A Brief and easy instruction to learne the tableture, to conduct and dispose the hand into the Lute [by Adrien Le Roy]. Englished by J. Alford, London, 1568; an English translation by F. K. (London, 1574), of the famous Tutor of Adrien Le Roy, which had appeared in Paris in 1551; Thomas Dallis's MS. Lute-Book (1583), in the library of Trinity College, Dublin; and William Ballet's MS. Lute-Books (1594) in the same library. There is another in the British Museum by Thomas Robinson, written in the form of a dialogue (London, 1603). We must not omit the treatise by Thomas Mace (London, 1676), to which we have so frequently referred, and the lute-books of Thvisius.

Praetorius, in his Organographia, was careful to describe the then (1619) familiar lute. He gives (p. 51) a graduated family of lutes with their quints or chanterelles, which show how much variety in size and scale was permitted. They are—(1) Klein Octav (a); (2) Klein Discant (b); (3) Discant (c); (4) Recht Chorist oder Alt (d); (5) Tenor (e); (6) Bass (f); (7) Gross Octav Bass (g).

Thus it will be seen that the lute generally known and described here, the 'French' lute of Mace, is the Alto lute. Vincentio Galilei, the father of the astronomer, was the author of a dialogue on the lute (Venice, 1583) and a book on lute tablature (1620). Other noteworthy continental publications were by Judenkünig, Vienna, 1523; Gerle, Nuremberg, 1545; Hans Neusiedler, Nuremberg, 1556; Melchior Neusiedler, 1574; Ochsenkhuns, Heidelberg (1558); Kargel, Strassburg, 1586; Besardus, Cologne, 1603; Campion, Paris, 1710; and Baron, Nuremberg (already quoted from), 1727.

Much valuable information collected about lute-makers and the literature of the lute is communicated by Carl Engel² in his admirable catalogue of the Victoria and Albert Museum referred to. The finest lutes were made in Italy; and Bologna, Venice, Padua and Rome were especially famous for them. There would appear to have been a fusion of German and Italian skill in northern Italy, when the Bolognese lutes were reputed to excel all others. Evelyn in his Diary (May 21, 1645) remarks their high price, and that they were chiefly made by Germans. One of the earliest of these was Lucas (or Laux, as he inscribed his name on his instruments) Maler, who was living in Bologna about 1500–20. There is one of his make at South Kensington, but the head is modernised to correspond with that of the modern guitar. There is a perfect specimen in the University Museum, Philadelphia, U.S.A.³ According to Thomas Mace, 'pittifull old, batter'd, crack'd things' of Laux Maler would fetch a hundred pounds each. He (p. 48) quotes the king (Charles I.) as having bought one for £100 through the famous lutenist Gaultier; but the correspondence of Huygens⁴ relates that the lute belonged to Jehan Ballard, who would not part with it. After his death Charles I. bought it of the relations for £100, and gave it to Gaultier. The discant lute dated 1593, shown in PLATE XLV. No. 3, is typical of the instrument used in England in the 16th and early 17th centuries. The head is turned sharply backward, not merely for portability but to secure a firm pressure of the 13 strings on the upper nut. Both lutes and theorboes are now being made again on the Continent.

LUTENIST, a lute player. In the 16th and 17th centuries lutenists, or, as they were sometimes called, 'lewters' or 'luters,' invariably formed part of the musical retinue of kings and princes, and one at least was commonly attached to the households of nobles and landed gentry. As late as Aug. 8, 1715, a lutenist's place was created in the Chapel Royal of St. James's, and John Shore was appointed to it, who held it until his death in 1752, when it was given to John Immyns, who filled it until his death in 1764. The office afterwards became a sinecure, and was eventually annexed to the Mastership of the Children as a means of increasing the stipend. It continued until the death of William Hawes in 1846, when it was abolished.

LUTHER, MARTIN (b. Eisleben, St. Martin's Eve, Nov. 10, 1483; d. there, Feb. 18, 1546). For the main facts of the life of the great Reformer the reader must consult some other work, as our space compels us to confine ourselves to his relation to music, and especially to the hymns and services of the Church. It was after his departure from the Wartburg, Mar. 22, 1522, that he began to occupy himself with projects for the reform of the services of the Church, among which his alterations in the musical parts of the Mass led to important results. There is ample evidence that German hymns were sung during the service before Luther's alterations; but, if not the actual founder, there is no doubt that he was the establisher of congregational singing. In his first 'Formula Missae' (1523), Luther objects to the singing of long graduals, and recommends that the choice of certain hymns should be left to the priest. The Reformer had long cherished the idea of a German Mass, and during the latter part of the year 1524 he was occupied with arranging that service. In order to help him in the musical part of his work he summoned to Wittenberg two able musicians, Conrad Rupff, Kapellmeister to the Elector of Saxony, and Johann Walther, cantor at the court of Frederick the Wise at Torgau. To the latter we are indebted for much information about Luther as a musician.

He says that at this time he stayed with Luther at Wittenberg for three weeks, and that the Reformer himself set to music several Gospels and Epistles and the words of Consecration, inventing the tunes on his flute, while Walther noted them down. Luther used also to discuss the eight church tones; giving the Epistle to the 8th tone, and the Gospel to the 6th. 'For,' said he, 'Christ is a gentle Lord, and His words are lovely; therefore let us take the 6th tone for the Gospel; and since St. Paul is a grave apostle, we will set the Epistle to the 8th tone.' The result of these labours was the publication of the 'Order of the German Mass,' which contained the following alterations. Instead of the introit there was ordered to be sung a hymn or German psalm ('Ich will den Herrn loben,' or 'Meine Seele soll sich rühmen'). Then followed the Kyrie Eleison, sung three times (instead of nine). After the Collect and Epistle a German hymn ('Nun bitten wir den heil'gen Geist,' or another) was sung, and after the Gospel, instead of the Latin Creed, the German ('Wir glauben all'). The sermon then followed, and after this a paraphrase of the Lord's Prayer, and the Exhortation to Communicants. After the Consecration was sung 'Jesaia dem Propheten,' Huss's hymn 'Jesus Christus, unser Heiland,' or 'Christe, du Lamm Gottes.'

This form of service was first used on Christmas Day, 1524, in the parish church of Wittenberg, but it was not published until the following year. It is evident that while introducing a more popular element into the music of the Mass, Luther did not despise the singing of a trained choir. In the 'Vermahnung zum Gebet wider den Türken' (1541) he says:

'I rejoice to let the 79th Psalm, "O God, the heathen are come," be sung as usual, one choir after another, according to the rubric, let one sweet-voiced boy step before the desk, let the choir and sing alone the antiphon or sentence "Domine, ne secundum," and after him let another boy sing the other sentence, "Domine, ne memineras," and then let the whole choir sing on their knees, "Adjuva nos, Deus," just as it was in the Popish Fast, for it sounds and looks very devotional.'

At the same time that he was engaged in arranging the German Mass, Luther was turning his attention to writing and adapting hymns to be sung during the service. In 1524 he wrote to his friend, George Spalatin :

'I wish, after the example of the Prophets and ancient Fathers of the Church, to make German psalms for the people, that is to say, sacred hymns, so that the word of God may dwell among the people by means of song also.'

In the same year (1524) the first Protestant hymn-book appeared :

Etlich christliche Lyeder Lobgesang und Psalm dem reinen Wort Gottes gemess auss der h. gschrift durch mancherlay Hochgelerter gemacht, in der Kirohen zu singen, wie es den zum teil bereyt zu Wittenburg in yebung ist. Wittenburg, 1524.

It is not certain whether Luther actually arranged this book; it contains only eight hymns (four of which are by him), and five tunes. During the same year several other collections appeared, and their number increased rapidly. (See CHORAL.) Scattered through these different collections there is great difficulty in deciding what hymns are really Luther's, and what are merely adaptations. The immediate popularity which these early Protestant hymns attained was immense; they were taught in the schools, and carried through the country by wandering scholars, until his enemies declared that Luther had destroyed more souls by his hymns than by his writings and speeches.

On June 11, 1525, Luther was married to Catherine von Bora, formerly a nun at Nimptsch in Saxony. This marriage proved a most happy connexion, and the letters of his friends abound with descriptions of the domestic felicity to which it gave rise. We are told that after supper he used to sing motets and hymns with his children and friends, his favourite composers being Senfl and Josquin des Prés, the works of the latter of whom he particularly admired. Luther possessed a fine deep voice, and played both the flute and lute, the latter so well as to attract the attention of passers-by as he journeyed to Worms. It has been said that he wrote motets himself, but there is no proof of this, and it is probably a mistake arising from the existence, in the Munich Library, of a collection of motets with a preface by the Reformer. In 1538 Luther wrote a short treatise in praise of music; a poem by him on the same subject (entitled 'Frau Musica') also exists, and may be found in the Leipziger A.M.Z. for 1811. The latter years of Luther's life were principally spent at Wittenberg, but he died at Eisleben. He was buried in the Schloss-Kirche at Wittenberg; his greatest hymn, 'Ein feste Burg,' being sung over his grave.

The following is a list¹ of hymns, the words of which were written or arranged by Luther, together with their dates, so far as it has been possible to ascertain them:

I. Translations and Arrangements of Latin Hymns.

1. Jesus Christus unser Heiland, 1524. From John Huss's hymn 'Jesus Christus nostra salus'.
2. Verleih uns Frieden gnädiglich, 1529. From 'Da pacem Domine,' an antiphon of the 6th or 7th century.
3. 'Christum wir sollen loben,' 1521. From a Christmas hymn by Coelius Sedulius (5th cent.).
4. 'Der du bist dret,' 1543. From 'O Lux beata,' an Epiphany hymn of the 5th century.
5. 'Herr Gott, dich loben wir,' 1529. From the 'Te Deum.'
6. 'Komm, Gott, Schöpfer,' 1524. From the 'Veni Creator.'
7. 'Komm, heiliger Geist,' 1524. From the 'Veni sancte Spiritus' attributed to King Robert of France, 907.
8. 'Nun komm der Helden Heiland,' 1524. From a Christmas hymn by St. Ambrose, 'Veni Redemptor.'
9. 'Was fürcht'et du Feind,' Dec. 12, 1541. From 'Hostis Herodes impius,' an Epiphany hymn by Coelius Sedulius.

10. 'Wir glauben all' an einen Gott,' 1524. From the creed 'Patrem credimus.'

II. Amplifications of early German translations of Latin Hymns.

11. 'Gelobet seist du,' 1524. Six verses added to a 15th-century translation of the Christmas Sequence of Gregory the Great, 'Grates nunc omnes.'
12. 'Mitten wir im Leben sind,' 1524. Two verses added to a 15th-century funeral hymn on Notker's Antiphon 'Mœlia vita in morte sumus.'

III. Corrections or Arrangements of early German Hymns.

13. 'Christ lag in Todesbanden,' 1524. From the 12th-century hymn 'Christ ist erstanden.'
14. 'Gott der Vater wohn uns bei,' 1524. From a 15th-century Litany.
15. 'Gott sei gelobet und gebenedet,' 1524. From a sacramental hymn of the 16th century.
16. 'Nun bitten wir den heiligen Geist,' 1524. From a 15th-century Whitsuntide hymn.

IV. Hymns based upon Latin Psalms.

17. 'Ach Gott vom Himmel,' 1523. Ps. xl. 'Salvum me fac.'
- 18a. 'Aus tiefer Noth,' 1523. First version, containing four verses. Ps. cxviii. 'De profundis.'
- 18b. Do., 1524. Second version, containing five verses.
19. 'Ein feste Burg,' 1529. Ps. xlv. 'Ista nox erit.' 1529.
20. 'Es spricht der Unweisen,' 1524. Ps. xlv. 'Dixit insipiens.'
21. 'Es wollt uns Gott,' 1524. Ps. lxxvii. 'Deus miseratur.'
22. 'War' Gott nicht mit uns,' 1524. Ps. cxxiv. 'Nisi qui Dominus.'
23. 'Wohl dem, der in Gottes fürchte,' 1524. Ps. cxxviii. 'Beati omnes.'

V. Hymns based upon passages of the Bible.

24. 'Christ unser Herr,' 1541. The Baptism of Christ.
25. 'Dies sind die heiligen zehn Gebot,' 1524. The Decalogue.

VI. Original Hymns.

26. 'Jesaja, d. im Propheten,' 1526. The Vision of Isaiah.
27. 'Mensch, willst du leben,' 1524. Abbreviated version of the Decalogue.
28. 'Milt Fried und Freud,' 1524. The 'Nunc Dimittis.'
29. 'Sie ist mir Heil,' 1535. The Christiana (church (Rev. xl.).
30. 'Vater unser,' 1539. The Lord's Prayer.
31. 'Vom Himmel hoch,' 1535. The Nativity (a children's hymn).
32. 'Ein neues Lied,' 1523. A hymn to the memory of two Lutheran martyrs, H. Voes and J. Esch, who were burnt at Brussels, July 1, 1523.
33. 'Erhalt uns, Herr,' 1541. A children's hymn against the two arch-enemies of Christ, the Pope and the Turk.
34. 'Jesus Christus, unser Heiland,' 1524. An Easter hymn.
35. 'Nun freut euch,' 1523. A hymn of prayer.
36. 'Vom Himmel kam,' 1543. A Christmas hymn.

The following are the hymn tunes which have been ascribed to Luther, though none with any degree of certainty:

1. 'Jesaja dem Propheten das geschah,' Appeared in the place of the Sanctus in Luther's 'Eine Wels, Christlich Messe zu halten,' 1529.
2. 'Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott,' First appeared in 'Geistliche Lieder, aufs neu geordnet zu Wittenberg, Dr. Mart. Luther, 1529.' This book was printed by Joseph Klug.
- The following arrangements of this hymn appeared during Luther's life:
 - (a) For 3 voices, with the melody in the tenor, in 'Neues Gesang, mit dreien Stimmen der Kirchen und Schulen zu nuß, nützlich in Præsen zu Joannem Kuchmann gesetzt' (Augsburg, 1540). Hans Kugelmann was Kapellmeister to Duke Albert of Brandenburg.
 - (b) For 4 voices, with the melody in the bass, in G. Rhaw's 'Neue deutsche geistliche Gesänge' (Wittenberg, 1544).
 - (c) For 5 voices, with the melody in the tenor, by Stephen Mahu, in G. Rhaw's Hymn-book.
 - (d) For 4 voices, with the melody in the bass, by M. Agrecolis, in G. Rhaw's Hymn-book.
 - (e) For 4 voices, with the melody in the bass, by L. Heilnick, in G. Rhaw's Hymn-book.
3. 'Aus tiefer Noth ruf ich zu dir,' First appeared in the 'Geistliche Gesangbüchleyn.' Tenor.

LUTZ, WILHELM MEYER (b. Männerstadt, Kissingen, 1822²; d. London, Jan. 31, 1903). His father was organist and teacher of harmony to the Schoolmasters' Institute at Männerstadt. He showed a gift for the piano at a very early age, and when twelve played in public with the orchestra. His father removing to Würzburg, he entered the Gymnasium and University there, and at the same time studied music under Eisenhofer and Keller. From 1848 Lutz was settled in England, first as organist to St. Chad's, Birmingham, and St. Ann's, Leeds, and then organist and choir-master to St. George's R.C. Cathedral, London, for which he composed several masses and much other music.

Meyer Lutz also had a long and wide experience of the stage as chef d'orchestre, first at the Surrey Theatre (1851-55), and from 1869 at the Gaiety Theatre; and also had the management of the operatic tours of Grisi and Mario, Pyne and Harrison, and other eminent artists. Many of his operas and operettas were favourably known in England, amongst them 'Faust and Marguerite' (Surrey Theatre, 1855), 'Blonde and Brunette' (1862), 'Zaida' (1868), 'Miller of Milburg' (1872), 'Legend of the Lys' (1873), a cantata entitled 'Herc the Hunter,' etc. etc. More generally popular than these are the many compositions for the Gaiety Theatre in its most fashionable days. The well-known tune of the 'Pas de Quatro' was by him. A string quartet, which he wrote for Sainton's chamber concerts, was very well spoken of, and he left much music, orchestral and chamber, in MS.

LUYTON (LUYTHON), CARL (b. Antwerp, c. middle of 16th cent.; d. Prague, 1620), important both as a vocal and instrumental composer.

The earliest known date in his life is 1576, in which year he dedicated a Mass to the Emperor Maximilian II., and in the same year was appointed Kammer-musikus or organist to the Emperor. On Maximilian's death at the end of 1576, Luyton was reappointed organist at Prague to the new Emperor Rudolf II., and also for a time held other offices about the court. On Rudolf's death in 1612, Luyton seems to have remained in Prague up to his own death in 1620, although even then the arrears of pay due to him for his service under Rudolf had never been made up. (See Q.-L.)

His chief vocal works are: one book of Italian madrigals a 5, 1582, 21 n.; Sacrae cantiones a 6, Prague, 1603, 29 n.; Lamentationes a 6, Prague, 1604; Lib. I. Missarum, Prague, 1609, 9 masses a 3-7. Of these F. Commer republished the Lamentations in vol. 20 of his Musica sacra, and 3 masses a 3-4, in vols. 18 and 19. See Eitner for a characterisation of these masses. Ritter describes two of Luyton's motets appearing in the Promptuarium of Schadaeus as masterly in treatment and full in harmony. Generally speaking, Luyton is remarkable as a pioneer in the use of chromatic modulation without any sacrifice of harmonic euphony or pleasing melody.

Of his instrumental works only two are preserved, one entitled a Fuga suavissima, which appeared in Woltz's Tabulatur-Buch of 1617, and fully deserves its name. It is reproduced in Ritter's Geschichte des Orgelspiels, Ex. 29, and is remarkable for its union of attractive melody with a freedom of modulation into different keys after the modern fashion. The other work is an organ Ricercare in a MS. of 1624, concerning which and the Fuga suavissima see Ritter, pp. 51, 52. In connexion with these experiments in chromatic modulation, it is interesting to be told by Michael Praetorius that he had seen, in the possession of Luyton at Prague, a clavicymbal of Vienna manufacture, in which different keys were provided for two distinct semitones between each whole tone, so as to have pure major thirds, and to allow the transpositions of the church modes on any key; also two keys were inserted between the semitones e-f and b-c, for enharmonic modulation; there were thus, as Praetorius says, seventy-seven keys in the four octaves from C to c''' (Syntagma, vol. ii. c. xl.).

LUZZASCHI, LUZZASCO, of Ferrara (d. 1607) was a pupil of Ciprian de Rore at Ferrara, before Ciprian left that city in 1558, and was afterwards first organist at the court chapel of the Duke of Ferrara, Alfonso II. He is also designated as maestro di cappella. Van der Straeten¹ communicates the text of a document, relating to a composition of Rore, subscribed by Luzzaschi in 1606. Frescobaldi was his most illustrious pupil. His compositions consist of seven books of madrigals a 5, published from 1575 to 1604, but not all perfectly preserved (two books altogether missing); another book of madrigals for one, two and three sopranos, 1601; and a Liber I. Sacrarum Cantionum a 5, 1598, containing fourteen motets. A few other madrigals appeared in collections. In Diruta's Il Transilvano there is an organ Toccata in the fourth tone, reprinted in Ritter, Geschichte des Orgelspiels, also two Ricercari in the first and second tones.

LUZZO, FRANCESCO (mid. 17th cent.), an Italian composer, four of whose operas were produced at Venice between 1651 and 1658.

LVOV (LWOFF), (1) FEODORE PETROVICH, succeeded Bortniansky as Director of the Imperial Court Chapel in 1825. He was an authority upon church music and folk-songs.

(2) ALEXIS FEODOROVICH (b. Reval, June 6 (May 25, O.S.), 1799 or 1798; d. near Kovno, Dec. 16, 1870), son of the above. Before entering the army he received some musical education at home. He rose rapidly in the military service, and was appointed Adjutant to the Emperor Nicholas I. In 1836 Alexis Lvov succeeded his father as director of the Imperial Court Chapel. An excellent violinist, he was well known in Russia and Germany as a good quartet player. The permanent string quartet which he organised in St. Petersburg was celebrated for its perfection of ensemble.

Lvov composed a violin concerto, a fantasia ('Le Duel'—for violin and violoncello), and twenty-four caprices. His operas 'Bianca e Gualtiero' (Dresden and St. Petersburg, 1845), 'Undine' (1846), and 'Starosta Boris' (1854) had very little success. He also wrote a considerable quantity of church music, but the work by which his memory lives is the Russian National Hymn, 'God save the Tsar' (words by Joukovsky) composed in 1833. Previously to this the English or Prussian national anthems had been used on State occasions. The tune is devoid of those national characteristics which endear the 'Slavsia' from Glinka's opera 'A Life for the Tsar' to the hearts of musical Russians. Lvov, who suffered from deafness, retired from active service in 1867, and died on his estate near Kovno.

LYCEUM THEATRE. The original theatre bearing this name occupied the site of a building erected in 1765 (on ground formerly belonging to Exeter House) for the exhibitions of the 'Society of Artists' (subsequently 'Royal Academy of Arts'), but afterwards used for a great variety of entertainments. It was constructed about 1798 under the direction of Dr. Arnold, who contemplated performing in it operas and other musical pieces, but being unable to obtain a licence was compelled to abandon his intention, and the house was occupied, occasionally only, for pictorial exhibitions, table entertainments, etc., until 1809, when Samuel James Arnold, the Doctor's son, succeeded in getting a licence for English operatic performances during four months in each year, June 3 to Oct. 3.

Drury Lane Theatre having been burnt down, Feb. 24, 1809, the company performed at the Lyceum from Apr. 11 following during the rebuilding of their own house. Arnold opened the theatre June 26, under the title of 'The English Opera House,' for the performance of operas, melodramas and musical farces. In 1815, having obtained a ninety-nine years' lease of the ground, he employed Samuel Beazley to rebuild the theatre on the same site, behind the houses on the north side of the Strand, a narrow avenue from which formed the approach to the box entrance, the pit and gallery doors being in Exeter Court to the westward. On Apr. 2, 1818, the elder Charles Mathews gave here his 'Mail Coach Adventures,' the first of that remarkable series of entertainments known as his 'At Home.' The most noticeable operatic event in the history of the house was the production on the English stage of Weber's 'Der Freischütz,' July 23, 1824. The house being burnt down, Feb. 16, 1830, another theatre (also designed by Beazley) was erected. It did not occupy the exact site of its predecessor, advantage having been taken of the opportunity to form the continuation of Wellington Street on the north side of the Strand, by building the stage of the new house at the west instead of the east end. During the rebuilding the company performed at the Adelphi and Olympic Theatres.

The new house opened July 14, 1834, the first new opera performed in it being Loder's 'Nourjahad,' and Barnett's 'Mountain Sylph,' produced later in the year, achieving a great success. Early in 1839 'Promenade Concerts à la Musard' (the first of the kind given in England) took place here under the conductorship of Signor Negri. In 1841 the management passed into the hands of Balfe, who produced his opera 'Keolanthé,' but his career was brief.

The house then ceased to be an English opera-house and became, under its old name of 'Lyceum,' a theatre for the performance of the general drama, Keeley, Madame Vestris, Madame Celeste, Falconer, and others by turns holding the reins of management. In four seasons, 1837, 1838, 1841 and 1871 under Bottesini, Italian opera buffa was given here in the winter, and the house was frequently occupied by French comedians. During the rebuilding of Covent Garden Theatre after the fire in 1856 the performances of the Royal Italian Opera were given at the Lyceum, and in the same year the Pyno and Harrison English Opera Company performed there. It was occupied for the performance of operas in English by the Carl Rosa Company in 1876 and 1877, and as a special enterprise, Verdi's 'Otello' was given there in July 1889. The history of the long and successful management of the late Sir Henry Irving does not belong to a musical dictionary; in 1904 the building, very much modified in design, was turned into a music hall, but the Carl Rosa Opera Company once more occupied it for a season of opera in English in 1919.

LYRA VIOL (sometimes 'Lero Viol' or 'Viol Lyra way'), a term used in the 17th century to indicate a method of playing the ordinary viola da gamba from a letter TABLATURE (q.v.) instead of from note.

This was in use in 1650 to the end of the 17th century, and it was considered a simpler and easier way of reading for the instrument than from the ordinary notation. John Playford, who printed several editions of a work on the subject, speaks of it as 'but a late invention in imitation of the old English lute or bandora'; and that the first authors he 'had met with in setting lessons this way to the Viol, was Mr. Daniel Farrant, Mr. Alphonso Pera-bosco, and Mr. John Coperario, who composed lessons not only to play alone, but for two or three viols in consort.¹

Playford also, in his Introduction to the Skill of Musick, mentions that the viol used to play 'Lyra-way' is 'somewhat less in size, with strings proportionable, than the other two sizes of viols.' The principle of the lyra viol is the simple adaptation of the lute tablature to the fretted six-stringed viol, the music being written on a six-line stave, each line corresponding to a string on the instrument. Burney² says that 'the lyra viol was a viol da gamba with more strings, but differently tuned from the common six string base. Its notation, like that of the lute, was written in entablature.' It is possible that in odd cases the viol played lyra-way had more than six strings, but contemporary writers always treat it as being a six-stringed instrument (see PLATE LXXXVII. No. 8). The stopping is indicated by letters placed either on or above the lines, thus: a, open string; b, first fret; c, d, e, f, g, h, succeeding half note stoppings. The viol finger-board only having seven frets, other letters, i, k, l, m, etc., are to be stopped, 'according to the judicious ear of the performer,' above the last fret. The time duration in viol tablature is shown by the crochets, quavers, etc., being placed above the stave. The reading of the tablature is of course simplicity itself, provided that the tuning is known; but as this tuning seems to have been somewhat elastic, each viol-player apparently having one of his own, the translation of viol tablature from manuscript is sometimes puzzling; in a printed source, however, the tuning is generally given, which renders the task easier. For ease of fingering in certain pieces, tunings named 'harp-way sharp,' and 'harp-way flat,' besides some others, were in use (see TABLATURE and VIOL). The principal English work on the lyra viol was, as above indicated, by John Playford who, in his Musicall Banquet, 1651 (Bodl. Lib.), published some 'new lessons for the Lira Viol,' afterwards developing this into Musick's Recreation on the Lyra Viol, which in some editions is named Musick's Recreation on the Viol Lyra-way. The work consists of 'lessons' and instructions besides a number of popular melodies all in viol tablature. Copies are dated 1651 (in Musicall Banquet), 1652-53, 1661, 1669 and 1682 with other issues, whose existence is mainly proved by old advertisements.

LYRE (Nirpa), an ancient musical instrument, in use among the Greeks, and undoubtedly derived by them from Asia. It consisted of a hollow body or sound-chest, from which were raised two arms, sometimes also hollow, which were curved both outward and forward. These arms were connected near the top by a crossbar or yoke. Another crossbar was on the sound-chest, and formed a bridge to convey the vibrations of the strings to it. The strings—at different times, four, seven, or ten in number—were made of gut, and were stretched between the yoke and the bridge, or carried on to a tail-piece below the bridge. The lyre differs from the harp in having fewer strings, and from the lute or guitar in having no finger-board. It was played by being struck with the plectrum, which was held in the right hand, but the fingers of the left hand were also used to touch the strings. The larger lyres (Cithara) were supported by a ribbon slung across the player's shoulders, or held as shown in the illustration, but the treble lyre (or Chelys) was held by the left arm or between the knees. The illustration is taken from a drawing upon an amphora (B.C. 440-330) in the British Museum, first vase-room, Case 53, No. 744. The portion engraved represents Apollo holding a Cithara or large lyre as rarely shown in detail in Greek art. With his left hand he at once supports the instrument and stops the strings. The plectrum would be held in the right hand and be guided by the thumb, the fingers closing over it.

The modern Greek 'lyra' is a kind of rebec, a bowed instrument with three strings, having no connexion with the ancient lyre or cithara (see REBEC). A. J. H.; revised F. W. G.

LYRE-GUITAR, a guitar, called in England the Apollo lyre, modelled on the lines of the ancient lyre, the six strings, however, being placed over a fretted finger-board. It appeared in France towards the end of the 18th century when the classical style was in vogue (PLATE XXXIII. No. 6). The 'Harpo-Lyre,' invented by Salomon of Besançon in 1829, has a guitar body from which rise three fretted necks united at the top, the left-hand neck having 7 chromatic bass strings, the middle neck 6 strings for accompaniment, as in the ordinary guitar, and the other neck 8 diatonic strings for melodic passages.

F. W. G.

LYRIC; LYRICAL. The term Lyric is obviously derived from the lyre, which served as an accompaniment or support to the voice in singing the smaller forms of poetry among the ancient Greeks. The poems thus accompanied were distinguished by the name of Odes, and all Odes were in those times essentially made to be sung. Among the Romans this style of poetry was not much cultivated, and the poems which fall under the same category, such as those of Horace and Catullus, were not expressly intended to be sung; but, inasmuch as they were cast after the same manner as the Greek poems which had been made to be sung, they also were called Odes or Lyrics.

On the same principle, the name has been retained for a special class of poems in modern times which have some intrinsic relationship in form to the Odes of the ancients; though, on the one hand, the term Ode has considerably changed its signification, and become more restricted in its application; and, on the other, the term Lyric is not generally associated either in the minds of the poets or their public with music of any sort. It is true that a great proportion are not only admirably fitted to be sung, but actually are set to most exquisite music; but this fact has little or no influence upon the classification. Thus the able and intelligent editor of the beautiful collection of modern lyrics called The Golden Treasury explains in his preface that he has held the term 'Lyrical' 'to imply that each poem shall turn upon a single thought, feeling, or situation,' and though he afterwards uses the term 'Song' as practically synonymous, he does not seem to imply that it should necessarily be sung. In another part of his preface he suggests an opinion which is no doubt very commonly held, that the lyrical and dramatic are distinct branches of poetry; and Mendelssohn has used the word in this sense even in relation to music in a letter where he speaks of his 'Lobgesang' as follows: 'The composition is not a little oratorio, its plan being not dramatic but lyrical.'

But it is in respect of this sense of the term that its use in modern times is so singularly contradictory. It is true that the class of poems which modern critics have agreed to distinguish as Lyrics are quite different in spirit from the dramatic kind—Robert Browning's 'Dramatic Lyrics' notwithstanding—but the principle of classification has really been erroneous all along, as though a man were called a sailor because he chose to wear a sailor's hat. Consequently the apparent anomaly of calling dramatic works lyrical when they are associated with music is not the fault of musicians, but of the long-continued habit of mankind of classifying things according to outward resemblance, instead of regarding the true basis of the terms of classification.

The term Lyric, then, originally implied music, and the Lyre stood as the type of accompaniment, of whatever kind; and it is strictly in conformity with this derivation to give the name 'Lyrical' to dramatic works which are associated with music; and we have a forcible and substantial reminder of this use of the term in the name of the celebrated 'Théâtre Lyrique' in Paris.

It has been necessary to enter into some detail on this subject in order to explain the confusion which exists in the use of the word. It must be confessed that nothing can now be gained by trying to go back to its original meaning; for the modern sense, as expressed by the editor of The Golden Treasury, has a prescriptive title of such great antiquity as would suffice to bar the most unquestionable prior claim. It would be well to bear in mind, however, that the term can have two significations, and that in relation to poetry pure and simple it does not necessarily imply music, in our language at least; and that in relation to the stage it should imply nothing else.

He was the son of Antoine Bovy, a well-known stamp-engraver, who after giving his son a good musical education sent him, at the age of 15, to Paris, where he became a pupil of Chopin and studied composition under Belaire. Subsequently he returned to his native country, and was appointed a professor of the Conservatoire at Geneva. He was chiefly successful as a writer of brilliant pieces for the pianoforte, and it was in this capacity that he borrowed the name of his birth-place as a pen-name. He published over 130 compositions in various styles, including barcaroles, nocturnes, caprices, waltzes, concert-études and operatic paraphrases; also a romantic sonata entitled 'L'Absence,' and an opera, 'La Fille du carillonneur,' which was produced with tolerable success at Geneva, but never attained the dignity of a stage performance elsewhere.

MAAS, JOSEPH (b. Dartford, Jan. 30, 1847; d. London, Jan. 16, 1886), began his career as a chorister at Rochester¹ Cathedral, and was taught singing by J. L. Hopkins, the organist, and later by Mme. Bodda-Pyne. He was for some time a clerk in Chatham dockyard, but went to Milan in 1869, and studied under San Giovanni. He made his début at one of Leslie's concerts, Feb. 26, 1871, and sang 'Annabell Lee' in the place of Sims Reeves, with great success. He played the hero in 'Babil and Bijou' at Covent Garden, Aug. 29, 1872; he then went to America, and played in Miss Kellogg's English Opera Company. He reappeared in England at the Adelphi under Carl Rosa, as Gontran on the production of Brüll's 'Golden Cross,' Mar. 2, 1878, and was engaged by Rosa for three years as his principal tenor both at Her Majesty's and in the provinces. His principal parts were Rienzi on its production at Her Majesty's, Jan. 27, 1879; Raoul, Feb. 12, 1879; Wilhelm Meister on the production in English of 'Mignon,' Jan. 12, 1880; Radamès on the production in English of 'Aida,' Feb. 19, 1880; also Faust, Thaddeus, Don César, etc. He played at Her Majesty's in Italian in 1880, at Covent Garden (as Lohengrin) in 1883, and under Rosa at Drury Lane in 1883-85, his new parts being Edgar of Ravenswood, Apr. 19, 1884, and the Chevalier des Grieux on production in London of Massenet's 'Manon,' May 7, 1885.

He was very popular on the stage, on account of his very fine voice, which was said to resemble Giuglini's in character, rather than for his dramatic gift, since he was a very indifferent actor. He was equally popular in the concert-room, where he appeared first at the Sacred Harmonic, in the 'Messiah,' Apr. 4, 1879, and at the Philharmonic, May 21, 1879. He sang at all the principal concerts, and at the various Handel and provincial festivals. He sang also in Paris at Pasdeloup's concerts, Apr. 6, 1884, and at Brussels at the Bach and Handel Festival of 1885. His last important engagement was at the Birmingham Festival of 1885, where he sang in Dvořák's 'Spectre's Bride,' Aug. 27, and Stanford's 'Three Holy Children,' Aug. 28, on the production of those works. At the Norwich Festival of the previous year he had introduced 'Apollo's Invocation,' a scena written for him by Massenet. He died from a complication of disorders, brought on from a cold taken while fishing. He was buried in West Hampstead Cemetery. Maas's greatest triumphs were gained in the concert-room rather than on the stage. For several years he has stood in the very first rank of tenor singers, not only by reason of his magnificent voice, but of his thoroughly finished and artistic style. . . . By his amiable personal character the deceased artist won the esteem and affection of all who had the privilege of his friendship.'²

A 'Maas Memorial Prize' was established at the R.A.M. A. C.

MAATSCHAPPIJ TOT BEVORDERING DER TOONKUNST (Society for the Furtherance of Tonal Art) is the largest musical society in Holland. Founded in 1829, it to-day includes 40 branches in different places, with altogether about 8000 members. The chief centre is Amsterdam. The objects of the Society include: the improvement of musical teaching; the education of capable instrument-makers; the performance of choral and orchestral works; the systematic encouragement of young talent; the support and pensioning of old musicians; the collection and circulation of a comprehensive music library. The chief activity of the branches is choral singing. Amongst numerous choirs that of the Toonkunst in AMSTERDAM (q.v.), conducted by W. Mengelberg, has received world-wide recognition. The annual Palm Sunday performance of the Matthew Passion in the Concertgebouw, Amsterdam, has been famous since 1899. The Society also controls altogether seventeen schools of music in the large and smaller towns of Holland. R. M^c.

MABELLINI, TEODULO (b. Pistoia, Apr. 2, 1817; d. Florence, Mar. 10, 1897), was a pupil of the Istituto Reale Musicale in Florence, and when he was only 19 years of age, his opera, 'Matilda di Toledo,' was given at Florence (1836), with the result that the Grand Duke Leopold II. gave the composer funds to study under Mercadante at Novara. His second opera, 'Rolla,' was given at Turin in 1840 with great success. Mabellini settled in Florence in 1843, becoming conductor of the Società Filarmonica, and eventually court maestro di cappella and conductor at the Pergola (from 1848); from 1859-87 he was professor in his old school, until his death.

His other operas were: 'Ginevra degli Almieri' (Turin, 1841), 'Il Conte di Savagna' (Florence, 1843), 'I Veneziani a Costantinopoli' (Rome, 1844), 'Maria di Francia' (Florence, 1846), 'Il Venturiero' (with L. Giordani, Leghorn, 1851), 'Baldassare' (Florence, 1852), 'Fiammetta' (Florence, 1857). Two oratorios, 'Eudossia e Paolo' and 'L' Ultimo Giorno di Gerusalemme,' the cantatas, 'La Caccia,' 'Il Ritorno,' 'Elegiaca,' 'Rafaele Sanzio,' 'Lo Spirito di Dante,' are among his more important works, as well as a great quantity of church music (Riemann).

(4) An overture for orchestra in B minor, by Spohr (op. 75).

(5) The first act of an opera, 'Macbeth,' was published by von Collin in 1809; and sketches by Beethoven for the overture (D minor, 6-8) and first chorus therein, are given by Nottebohm in Mus. Wochenblatt, 1879, No. 10.

(6) A tone-poem for orchestra by Strauss, (op. 23).

MACBETH, ALLAN (b. Greenock, Mar. 13, 1856; d. Glasgow, Aug. 25, 1910), received his musical education chiefly in Germany, studying at the Leipzig Conservatorium under F. Richter, Jadassohn and Reinecke in 1875-76. In 1880 he was appointed conductor to the Glasgow Choral Union, but resigned the post in 1887. He was organist of various churches in Edinburgh and Glasgow, being appointed to St. George's-in-the-Fields Established Church in 1884. He was appointed principal of the music school connected with the Glasgow Athenæum in 1890. Macbeth, in spite of much occupation of his time in teaching (pianoforte and singing), wrote a number of pleasing pianoforte pieces, besides two or three orchestral movements played at the Choral Union Concerts, and since transcribed for piano. As a song-writer he was specially successful; he ably arranged for voices several Scots melodies, and wrote some original partsongs. His cantata, 'The Land of Glory,' won a prize given by the Glasgow Society of Musicians, and was performed in 1890. He left other cantatas, short orchestral pieces and chamber music, as well as incidental music to a play, 'Bruce (Lord of the Isles),' and an operetta in MS., 'The Duke's Doctor.' w. n.

MACCARTHY, MAUD (b. Clonmel, Ireland, July 4, 1884), violinist, singer and lecturer. She gave evidence of great talent at an early age, but was not sent to a musical college, her parents preferring to place her under the direction of Señor Arbós. She made her début in London at the age of 9, and in the ensuing years, after an interval of further study, made many public appearances under August Manns, Richter, Wood, Nikisch, etc. During a tour in the U.S.A. she played with the leading American orchestras, her repertory including the principal violin concertos. At the age of 23 she was compelled to give up solo-playing owing to neuritis, and went to India with Mrs. Annie Besant, where she studied Indian music. On her return she gave a series of Indian vocal lecture-recitals before the Musical Association, the Oxford Folk-Song Society, etc. She was an early exponent of unaccompanied song and of the performance upon Indian instruments of minute subdivisions of the scale (microtones). She married John Foulds, the composer, in 1915, and led the orchestra during the performance of his 'World Requiem' on Armistice Night, 1923. w. w. c.

MCCORMACK, JOHN (b. Athlone, June 14, 1884), tenor singer, won the Gold Medal for singing at the National Irish Festival (Feis Ceoil), Dublin, joined the choir of the Dublin R.C. Cathedral in the following year, and in 1901, with that choir, sang at the St. Louis Exhibition. In 1905 he went to Milan and received instruction in singing from Sabbatini.

On Feb. 17, 1907, he sang at a Sunday League concert in London, and on Mar. 1, 1907, appeared at a London Ballad Concert, when he sang with such success that Messrs. Boosey engaged him for the remaining concerts of the season. On Oct. 15 he made a successful début on the stage at Covent Garden as Turiddu in 'Cavalleria,' and confirmed his success the same season as Don Ottavio and as the Duke in 'Rigoletto.' He established his reputation as an oratorio singer when on Nov. 7 he undertook the tenor music in 'Elijah' at the Royal Choral Society's concert, and subsequently he fulfilled several engagements at the English festivals. In the spring of 1909 he sang at the San Carlo, Naples, and in the autumn (Nov. 10) made a successful début at the Manhattan Opera House, New York, as Edgardo in 'La Traviata.' He has pursued his career principally in America, becoming a citizen of the United States in 1917. He sang with the Boston Opera Company (1910-11) and with the Chicago Opera Company (1912-13), but later devoted himself more especially to concert work, in which his success has been gained not only through the natural qualities of a remarkable voice, but through his interpretative power. Trained in the Italian style, he has added German Lieder to his repertory. He paid a visit to England after a prolonged absence, and gave a highly successful recital at Queen's Hall on June 10, 1924. A. c.; addns. c.

MACCUNN, HAMISH (b. Greenock, Mar. 22, 1868; d. London, Aug. 2, 1916), son of James MacCunn, shipowner of Greenock, showed an early aptitude for music, and on the opening of the R.C.M. in 1883, won a scholarship for composition. He was a pupil there of Sir Hubert Parry, and resigned his scholarship in 1886. An overture (see list) was given at the Crystal Palace in Oct. 1885, and a cantata, 'The Moss Rose,' was sung at the R.C.M. in December of that year, but it was not until 1887 that his name became widely known, from the success of his overture, 'Land of the Mountain and Flood,' produced at the same place. It was at once evident that the young composer had a strongly individual note of his own, and in quick succession other orchestral works were brought forward, for the most part at the Crystal Palace, where his first cantata, 'Lord Ullin's Daughter,' was given on Feb. 8, 1888. In that year he was commissioned to write a cantata for the Glasgow Choral Union; this was 'The Lay of the Last Minstrel,' given at Glasgow, Dec. 18, 1888, and at the Crystal Palace, Feb. 16, 1889. 'Bonny Kilmeny' had been given at one of Paterson's concerts in Edinburgh a few days before. In 1888 he gave a series of orchestral concerts in the studio of John Pettie, R.A., whose daughter he married in 1889. In 1894 his opera, 'Jeanie Deans,' was produced by the Royal Carl Rosa Company in Edinburgh, and performed in London by the same company, after much success throughout the provinces, on Jan. 22, 1896. He was for some years connected with this company as conductor. He directed the production in English of many of the later works of Wagner, including 'Tristan' and 'Siegfried,' as well as the stock repertory. After the death of Sullivan, during the last seasons of the Savoy Theatre as a home of English light opera, he conducted the run of 'Merrie England' and 'A Princess of Kensington.' His compositions show a strongly national colouring, and certain sides of Scottish music, particularly those which deal with the more intimate and tender emotions, had scarcely been brought into the world of artistic or 'composed' music until his time.

List of works :

OPERAS, etc.

- 'Jeanie Deans' (libretto by Joseph Bennett), in 4 acts, Lyceum Theatre, Edinburgh, Nov. 15, 1894.

M'DONALD, MALCOLM, a Scottish composer of Strathspeys of some note during the latter part of the 18th century. Little is known of his personal history save that he was associated with the Gow family, and that he lived (and probably died) at Inver, the birthplace of Niel Gow. A footnote in The Beauties of Niel Gow states that he played the violoncello in Gow's band at Edinburgh. His published collections of Strathspey reels number four. The first in oblong folio was published in 1788; 2nd in folio, circa 1789; 3rd folio, circa 1792; a 4th folio, circa 1797.

M'DONALD, (1) PETER (b. Durness Manse, Sutherland, Apr. 22, 1729; d. Sept. 25, 1824), a Scottish minister and son of one. He was educated at St. Andrews, and ordained minister of Kilmore in Argyllshire, Oct. 12, 1756. He remained in this position for sixty-nine years. He was one of a musical family, and was a skilled performer on the violin. He is deserving of remembrance for his valuable work (the first attempt at such a gathering), a 'Collection of Highland Vocal Airs,' issued in Edinburgh in 1783. In his preface he mentions that a number of the melodies were noted down by his brother (2) JOSEPH (b. Feb. 26, 1739; d. 1762), also a clever musician, who left Scotland for India in 1760. Joseph was the author of a Treatise on the Theory of the Scots Highland Bagpipe, which forms part of a work, a Collection of Bagpipe Music, published in Edinburgh in 1808. F. K.

MACDOWELL, EDWARD ALEXANDER (b. New York City, Dec. 18, 1861; d. there, Jan. 24, 1908), American composer and pianist, was descended from a Quaker family of Scotch-Irish extraction that emigrated to America about the middle of the 18th century.

As a boy he studied the pianoforte with Juan Buitrago, a South American, and Pablo Desvernine, a Cuban, and for a brief space with Teresa Carroño, a native of Venezuela. The nationality of these early teachers is recorded to enable the curious to study or speculate on the influences which, with the varied training received in Europe, may have helped to shape the artistic character of MacDowell, who, though entitled to rank with contemporary composers of the highest class irrespective of country, is yet specially significant as a representative of the best that America has produced in music.

His European studies were varied. In 1876 he became a pupil of Savard in composition, and Marmontel in pianoforte at the Paris Conservatoire. For three years he remained under French influences, then exchanged them for German, going first to Stuttgart to Lebert; but wearying of that teacher's pedagogic methods in less than a month, he went to Wiesbaden, where he studied with Louis Ehlert during the summer months of 1882. In the autumn he joined the pianoforte class of Karl Heymann at the Conservatorium, and the class in composition under Joachim Raff, director of the institution. The admiration which he felt for Raff's music, and the attachment which sprang up between master and pupil were among the strongest influences which shaped his creative career, and speak out of much of his music, especially the first suite for orchestra, op. 42. On Heymann's departure from the Conservatorium MacDowell was a candidate for the position vacated by him, but failed of appointment, ostensibly because of his youthfulness, probably because of his adherence to the romantic ideals exemplified in Heymann's playing. Thereupon he went to Darmstadt as chief teacher at the Conservatorium there. The duties were onerous, and the compensation inadequate. MacDowell had made up his mind to stay in Germany as a country more congenial to his artistic nature than his native land. He returned to Frankfort as a private teacher. In 1882, at the instance of Raff, he went to Weimar to visit Liszt. He played his first concerto for that master with D'Albert at the second pianoforte, and was invited to take part in the approaching meeting of the Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein at Zurich. There he played his first pianoforte suite. Raff died shortly after, and MacDowell set up a home in Wiesbaden, where he devoted himself to composition for four years, that is, till 1887. Then he went to America, settled in Boston, where he made his first appearance as a pianist with the Kneisel Quartet, Nov. 19, 1888, taught and gave concerts, producing his two pianoforte concertos with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, and the Theodore Thomas Orchestra in New York. The second concerto was played by the composer at the Philharmonic Concert, London, on May 14, 1903. In 1896 he was called to Columbia University in New York to fill the chair of music¹—a new foundation. He remained professor at the institution until Jan. 1904, when he resigned the post because of a disagreement with the faculty touching the proper footing of music and the fine arts in the curriculum. For two years he was conductor of the Mendelssohn Glee Club, one of the oldest and best male choruses in the United States. Princeton University and the University of Pennsylvania conferred on him the degree of Mus.Doc. MacDowell's career ended in the spring of 1905, when overwork and insomnia, the consequence of morbid worry over disagreeable experiences, brought on what eminent medical specialists pronounced to be a hopeless case of cerebral collapse.

When MacDowell went to Boston he gave a healthy impulse to American composition, chiefly through the performances of his works which had been stimulated by his return to his native land, but also by the attitude which he assumed as to the proper treatment of the American composer by the American public and press. He expressed himself as opposed to their segregation for the purpose either of laudation or condemnation. Naturally this came somewhat easier to him than to some of his fellows. He had grown artistically into man's estate in Germany, and had won quite as much recognition there as he found waiting for him in America when he returned thither. It deserves to be said that he found his position upheld by the majority of American musicians worthy of association with him. As a composer MacDowell was a romanticist. He believed in poetical suggestion and programmatic titles; but he was not a musical cartoonist. He aimed at depicting the moods of things, and the moods awakened by things rather than the things themselves. He was fond of subjects and titles which, like those of his master Raff, smack of the woods;—not the greenwood of the English ballads, but the haunted forests of Germany, in which nymphs and dryads hold their revols and kobolds frolic.

The supernaturalism which is an ineradicable element of German romanticism breathes through his first suite for orchestra. In his second suite, entitled 'Indian,' he makes use of aboriginal American idioms, forming his principal themes out of variants of Indian melodies—a harvest-song, war-song and women's dance of the Iroquois, and a love-song of the Iowas. A similar device is practised in the fifth of his 'Woodland Sketches' for pianoforte, op. 51, which has a melody of the Brotherton Indians as its theme. MacDowell was contemporaneous with Dvořák in thus calling attention to the existence of native American folk-song elements capable of use in a characteristic body of artistic music, though, unlike the composer of the symphony 'From the New World,' he never permitted himself to be influenced by the melodic idioms of the negro slave. His 'Indian' suite, op. 48, first played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, Jan. 23, 1896, was fully sketched before Dvořák's symphony appeared, though it was not performed till three years afterwards, the composer wishing to become better acquainted with what to him, as well as the world, was a new kind of music. As for the rest: great concentration, refined and highly emotionalised harmonisation, exalted poetical feeling and a spirit of breezy freshness are the characteristics chiefly to be found in MacDowell's compositions for the pianoforte. His published works are as follows :

MACDOWELL MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION, THE. On the death of Edward MacDowell his widow transferred to this Association the property at Peterboro', New Hampshire, which had been his summer home, in order that it might be maintained as a 'centre of interest to artists working in varied fields, who, being there brought into contact, may learn to appreciate fully the fundamental unity of the separate arts.'

This idea, which originated with MacDowell himself, has been carried out in the summer colony at which artists foregather for work and intercourse. Since 1910 an annual festival, chiefly musical, has been held there.

MACE, JOHN, an English church composer, possibly the father of Thomas MACE (q.v.). He presumably lived some time at the end of the 16th century or early in the 17th, as the bassus cantoris part of an anthem by him, 'Let Thy merciful ears,' is included in Barnard's MS. collection (R.C.M. 1051). J. M^r.

MACE, THOMAS (b. Cambridge c. 1619), was one of the clerks of Trinity College, Cambridge, and author of a remarkable book published (in small folio, 272 pp., besides 18 pp. of prefatory matter) in 1676, entitled :

'Musick's Monument; or A Remembrancer of the best Practical Musick, both Divine and Civil, that has ever been known to have been in the world,' the first part of which treats of the then condition of parochial psalmody and cathedral music and the means of improving their performance; the second of the lute, including directions for choosing, tuning, repairing, performing on and composing for the instrument, with a full explanation of the tablature and numerous lessons; and the third of the viol and of music generally, with other curious matter.

The book is written in a quaint, familiar style, intermingled with a profusion of strangely compounded terms, and produces a striking impression of the author's love of his art and his devout and amiable disposition. It was published by subscription at 12s. per copy in sheets. A lengthy epitome of it is given in Hawkins's History, pp. 727-33, Novello's edition. A few scanty biographical particulars are culled from it, viz. that Mace married in or shortly after 1636; that before the marriage his wife resided in Yorkshire, he in Cambridge; that in 1644 he was in York during the siege of the city by the Parliamentary army; that in consequence of having broken both arms he was compelled to make a shake upon the lute in an irregular manner; that he invented a 'table organ' (described in his book, with an engraving) to accompany a 'consort of viols'; that in consequence of partial deafness, rendering the soft tones of the lute inaudible to him, he in 1672 invented a lute of fifty strings, which he termed the Dyphone, or Double Lute; that he had a family, and that his youngest son, John, learned in 1672 to play well upon the lute almost solely by the perusal of the MS. of his book (see IMMYNS, John); that the writing of the work was not begun until after Christmas 1671, and it was licensed for publication May 5, 1675; and lastly that owing to his increased deafness, which we may presume prevented him pursuing his profession, he was in somewhat straitened circumstances. Hawkins asserts that Mace was born in 1613, evidently arriving at that conclusion from the inscription beneath the portrait (engraved by Faithorne after Cooke) prefixed to his book, 'Ætat. suæ. 63.' The date of his death is not known, but 1709 is conjectured. See an important advertisement in the Bagford Collection (Harl. MS. 5936 (384)). Mace was further responsible for another quaint work, Profit, conveniency and pleasure to the whole Nation, being a short rational discourse lately presented to His Majesty concerning the Highways of England, etc. 1675. A copy is in the British Museum. An anthem, 'I heard a voice' (MS. at PH.) is the only record of Mace as composer.

MC EWEN, JOHN BLACKWOOD (b. Hawick, Apr. 13, 1868), composer, teacher and Principal of the R.A.M. (1924), was educated at Glasgow, where from 1871 his father was minister of Sydney Place Church. He entered the university there, took his M.A. degree in 1888 and studied music while he held the choir-mastership of St. James's Free Church and subsequently of Lanark Parish Church.

He came to London in 1891 and entered the R.A.M. as a student two years later. There Prout, Corder and Matthay were his teachers. His studentship was, however, comparatively short, for in 1895 he returned to Scotland and settled at Greenock as choirmaster of South Parish Church and teacher of pianoforte and composition at the Athenæum School of Music at Glasgow. In 1898 he was invited to join the teaching staff of the R.A.M. as professor of harmony and composition, and henceforward his life as a teacher became bound up with that of the R.A.M. He exerted an ever increasing influence not only on the pupils who passed through his hands, but on the policy of the institution in the direction of a sane liberalism of outlook. On the retirement of Sir Alexander Mackenzie in 1924, the appointment of McEwen to succeed him in the principalship was widely approved as an assurance of continuity and progress in the work of the R.A.M. While his personal career has been uneventful it has been one of incessant activity, particularly in undertakings for the advancement of British music. He was one of the founders of the SOCIETY OF BRITISH COMPOSERS (q.v.) in 1905 and later of the ANGLO-FRENCH MUSIC PUBLISHING COMPANY (q.v.), which was begun with similar educational aims. He was for a time musical adviser to the Æolian Company, but these latter interests he resigned on assuming the principalship of the R.A.M. In 1926 he received the degree of Mus.D. honoris causa from the University of Oxford.

Apart from his executive work, McEwen has steadily pursued his way as a creative artist in composition, though few modern composers have been so little concerned as he about the problem of bringing their work before the public. He has never composed for the festivals, though a short prelude for orchestra was played at the Gloucester festival of 1925, and scarcely one of the long list of his works (see B.M.S. Ann., 1920) bears any trace of having been composed for an occasion. Incidental music for three scenes of the Empire Pageant held at the Crystal Palace in 1910 is almost the only work so marked; a concerto for viola seems to be a recognition of the demand of Lionel Tertis for such music for his instrument. Otherwise the major events of McEwen's output are symphonic works for orchestra and string quartets, the qualities of which he has left performers to discover when publication allowed them opportunity. His work first became generally known through 'Grey Galloway,' one of three Border ballads for orchestra, which has been widely played. Of his several symphonies that in C sharp minor known as 'Solway' (produced Bournemouth 1922) has alone received repeated performance owing to its publication by the Carnegie Trust. The suggestions of a programme in the one case and of some delicate landscape painting in the other are incidental rather than essential. McEwen's characteristics, found most decisively in the string quartets, notably those in E minor, C minor, A minor and the one called 'Biscay' (which may almost be said to be popular), are a seriousness of musical purpose which is never dull because the composer always remains free from the conventions of style, and an aptness of expression which, while perfectly direct, leaves the hearer feeling that the composer could say more if he would. A concert of his chamber-music given as part of the R.A.M. centenary celebrations (1922) gave a rare opportunity of hearing a number of his works together. Their total impression was described as music 'for those who are ready to forego excitement and take measured delight in fine quality.'¹ C.

MACFARREN, (1) SIR GEORGE ALEXANDER, Mus.D. (b. London, Mar. 2, 1813; d. Oct. 31, 1887), composer and teacher, was son of George Macfarren, dramatist. In early life he displayed partiality for music, but did not begin regular study until 1827, when he became a pupil of Charles Lucas.

In 1829 he entered the R.A.M., and made composition his principal study, learning also the pianoforte and trombone; and in 1834 he was appointed one of its professors. On Oct. 27,

1834, he produced at the Society of British Musicians his first important work, a symphony in F minor, and in 1836 his fine overture 'Chevy Chase.' In Aug. 1838 his 'Devil's Opera,' produced at the English Opera House, Lyceum, at once drew public attention to him. In 1840 he produced at Drury Lane an 'Emblematical Tribute on the Queen's Marriage,' and also edited, for the Musical Antiquarian Society, Purcell's opera, 'Dido and Æneas.' In 1843 he became secretary of the Handel Society, for which he edited 'Belshazzar,' 'Judas Macabaeus' and 'Jephthah.' In Jan. 1845 he directed the successful production of Mendelssohn's 'Antigone' at Covent Garden Theatre. In 1846 his opera 'Don Quixote' was successfully produced at Drury Lane, and in 1849 his opera 'Charles II.' was given at the Princess's. His serenata, 'The Sleeper Awakened,' was brought out at the National Concerts at Her Majesty's Theatre in 1851, and in the same year he composed his cantata 'Lenora.' His cantata 'May Day' (long a favourite with choral societies) was written for the Bradford Festival, 1856, and his cantata 'Christmas' was composed in 1859. He then resumed the composition of opera, and brought out 'Robin Hood' at Her Majesty's Theatre in 1860, with great success. This was followed by 'Freya's Gift,' masque, and 'Jessy Lea,' opera, 1863; 'She stoops to conquer,' 'The Soldier's Legacy' and 'Helvellyn,' operas, 1864. Several more operas remained in MS., and Macfarren also wrote music for a number of farces and melodramas.

Macfarren's eyesight had at a comparatively early age become impaired; the malady increased year by year, until it terminated in total blindness. But this calamity did not diminish his exertions; and with extraordinary energy he continued to perform his duties as a professor at the R.A.M. and to compose, dictating his compositions to an amanuensis. On Oct. 23, 1873, his oratorio 'St. John the Baptist' was produced at the Bristol Festival with marked success. On Mar. 16, 1875, he was elected Professor of Music at Cambridge on the death of Sterndale Bennett, and greatly distinguished himself by the manner in which he performed the duties of the office. In April following he accumulated the degrees of Bachelor and Doctor of Music. In 1876 he was appointed Principal of the R.A.M. 'The Resurrection,' oratorio, was produced at the Birmingham Festival in 1876; 'Joseph,' oratorio, at the Leeds Festival in 1877; 'The Lady of the Lake,' a cantata, at Glasgow, on Nov. 15, 1877; the music to 'Ajax' was performed with the play at Cambridge in 1882; the oratorio 'King David' was produced at the Leeds Festival of 1883, and in that year Macfarren was knighted. Besides the before-mentioned works his compositions are very numerous; they include a cathedral service, anthems, chants and psalm tunes, and 'Introits for the Holy Days and Seasons of the English Church,' 1866; 'Songs in a Cornfield,' 1868; 'Shakespeare Songs for 4 voices,' 1860-64; Songs from Lano's 'Arabian Nights,' and Kingsley's and Tennyson's poems; very many songs (among which the beautiful 'Pack, clouds, away,' with clarinet obbligato, is perhaps the best known), duets, etc.; overtures to 'The Merchant of Venice,' 'Romeo and Juliet,' 'Hamlet,' 'Chevy Chase' (already mentioned) and 'Don Carlos'; symphonies, string quartets and a quintet; a concerto for violin and orchestra; and sonatas for pianoforte alone and in combination with other instruments. He harmonised the airs in Chappell's Popular Music of the Olden Time, and arranged 'Moore's Irish Melodies,' 1859, and Scotch Songs. He was eminent as a writer on music having produced Rudiments of Harmony, 1860, and Six Lectures on Harmony, 1867; analyses of oratorios, etc., for the Sacred Harmonic Society, 1853-57, and of orchestral works for the programme-books of the Philharmonic Society, 1869-71; also many articles in The Musical World and lives of musicians for the Imperial Dictionary of Universal Biography. He lectured at the Royal and London Institutions. His Addresses and Lectures were published in 1888. His last published work was an Andante and Rondo in E for violin and organ, contained in the Organist's Quarterly Journal for Oct. 1887. A cantata for female voices, 'Around the Hearth,' was published posthumously. He was buried in the Hampstead Cemetery; his life, by H. C. Banister, appeared in 1891.

(2) NATALIA MACFARREN, née ANDRAE (b. Lübeck, 1828; d. Bakewell, Derbyshire, Apr. 9, 1916, appeared as contralto singer at the Princess's Theatre, London, Oct. 1849, in Macfarren's 'Charles II.'; having previously appeared in the United States with Catherine Hayes in 'Linda,' with great success.

She was married at 17, to George Macfarren at Marylebone Church; her life was spent in teaching and in translating operas and German Lieder. She was endowed with a fine intellect, her power of musical interpretation was extraordinary, and she was an excellent linguist.

(3) WALTER CECIL (b. Aug. 28, 1826; d. Sept. 2, 1905), brother of Sir George, was chorister of Westminster Abbey under James Turle from 1836-41, and pupil of the R.A.M. from 1842-46, studied the pianoforte under W. H. Holmes, and composition under his brother and Cipriani Potter. He was a professor of the pianoforte at the R.A.M. from 1846-1903, and conductor of its concerts from 1873-80. He was elected a director of the Philharmonic Society in 1868, and its treasurer in 1876. He composed two Church Services and a number of chants and hymn-tunes; a symphony in B flat, produced at Brighton, 1880; overtures, 'A Winter's Tale' (1844); 'Taming of the Shrew' (1845); 'Beppo' (1847); 'Pastoral' (1878); 'Hero and Leander' (Brighton Festival, 1879); 'Henry V.' (Norwich Festival, 1881); 'Othello' (Queen's Hall, 1896); a pianoforte concerto; sonatas for pianoforte alone and in combination with other instruments; songs both sacred and secular; many madrigals and partsongs; and numerous pieces of all kinds for pianoforte. He edited Mozart's pianoforte works, Beethoven's sonatas and the extensive series of pianoforte pieces known as 'Popular Classics.' He was buried at St. Pancras Cemetery, East Finchley, on Sept. 7. A biographical article appeared in the Mus. T. for Jan. 1898, and a volume of Reminiscences was published in 1905.

M'GIBBON, WILLIAM (b. end of 17th cent.; d. Edinburgh, Oct. 3, 1756), a musician residing in Edinburgh in the earlier half of the 18th century. Little is known of his biography save what is related of him and of other Scottish musicians by William Tytler of Woodhouselee, who contributed to the Transactions of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, vol. i., 1792, some personal remembrances of them.

He was the son of Matthew M'Gibbon, who was a hautboy-player in Edinburgh. William was early sent to London, and studied the violin under William Corbett. On his return to Edinburgh he was appointed leader of the orchestra in the Gentlemen's Concerts, and held the post for a long period. He was considered an excellent performer. In 1740 M'Gibbon published 'Six Sonatas [sic] or Solos for a German Flute or Violin. Edin.: R. Cooper for the author, 1740,' ob. folio. A copy of this now very rare publication was sold at the Taphouse Sale, July 1905. Another of his compositions is 'Six Sonatas for two German Flutes, compos'd by Mr. Wm. M'Gibbon of Edinburgh.' Lond.: J. Simpson, royal 8vo. His most important work, however, was a valuable collection of Scots Tunes, in three oblong folio volumes, of great value in the study of Scots music. These were issued in Edinburgh, and originally published in 1742, 1746 and 1755, though there are several later reprints. He died in Edinburgh and was buried in Greyfriars' Churchyard, having bequeathed the whole of his effects to the Royal Infirmary. He is mentioned in a verse by Robert Ferguson, the poet, and a portrait of him occurs in the title-page of Flores Musicae (Edin.: J. Clark, 1773), which is reproduced in Glen's Early Scottish Melodies, 1900.

F. K.

M'GLASHAN, ALEXANDER (d. May 1797), an Edinburgh musician and performer on the violoncello and violin during the latter half of the 18th century. From his stately appearance and dress he was nicknamed 'King M'Glashan.' He was in the habit of giving fashionable concerts at St. Cecilia's Hall, near the Cowgate, and issued three important books of Scottish national airs, of great value in tracing the history of these melodies, viz.: 'A Collection of Strathspey Reels' (1780), 'A Collection of Scots Measures' (1781) and 'A Collection of Reels' (1786), all in oblong folio, and published by Stewart of Edinburgh. He was buried in Greyfriars' Churchyard.

F. K.

M'GUICKIN, BARTON (b. Dublin, July 28, 1852; d. Stoke Poges, Apr. 17, 1913), tenor singer, began his career as a chorister at Armagh Cathedral. He received instruction from R. Turle, then organist there, in singing, organ, violin and pianoforte. He became first tenor at St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, in 1871, and was for a time a pupil of Joseph Robinson. He sang at one of the Philharmonic Concerts in Dublin in 1874, and in the following year made his début at the Crystal Palace Concerts, July 5, 1875, after which he went to Milan and studied under Trevisi. He reappeared with success at the same concerts, Oct. 28, 1876, where he first appeared as an oratorio singer in the 'Lobgesang,' Nov. 3, 1877. He made his début on the stage as Thaddeus under Carl Rosa at Birmingham, Sept. 10, 1880; at Dublin as Wilhelm Meister, May 9, 1881; in the same part at Her Majesty's, Jan. 20, 1882, and as Moro on the production in England of 'The Painter of Antwerp,' an English version of Balfe's Italian opera 'Pittore e duca,' Jan. 28, 1882. He remained in Rosa's company both in London and the provinces until the summer of 1887, and became a great favourite both as a singer and actor. His most important parts were Lohengrin, Faust and Don José; in new operas he created at Drury Lane the parts of Phœbus ('Esmeralda'), Mar. 26, 1883; Orso ('Colomba'), Apr. 9, 1883; Waidemar ('Nadeshda'), Apr. 16, 1885; Guillem de Cabestanh ('Troubadour'), June 8, 1886; Oscar ('Nordisa'), May 4, 1887; at Edinburgh, Renzo on the production in English of Ponchielli's 'Promessi sposi,' and at Liverpool, Des Grieux ('Manon'), Jan. 17, 1885. He sang in opera in America in 1887-88, and rejoined the Carl Rosa Company from 1889-96, adding to his repertory the part of Eleazar in 'La Juive,' and that of Thorgrim in Cowen's opera of that name. Apr. 22, 1890.

MACHAUT, GUILLAUME DE (b. Diocese of Reims, c. 1300; d. there, 1377), was the first practical exponent of the Ars nova of Philippe de Vitry (q.v.). He took holy orders at an early age, and about 1323 became secretary to John of Luxembourg, King of Bohemia, and accompanied that monarch on his expeditions to Poland, Lithuania and Italy. After the King's death at Crécy in 1346, Machaut entered the service of his daughter, the Duchess of Normandy, and on her death in 1349 he found a new patron in Charles, King of Navarre. The Dauphin of France (afterwards King Charles V.) and his brother Jean, Duke of Berry, were among his later patrons. Machaut had been made a canon of Reims Cathedral in 1333, and the later part of his life was passed chiefly in that city. (For a full account of his life see V. Chichmaref, Poésies lyriques de Guillaume de Machaut, vol. i. Introduction, published by H. Champion, Paris; or E. Hoepfner, Œuvres de Guillaume de Machaut, vol. i. Introduction, published by the 'Société des anciens textes français,' Paris.)

Machaut is an important figure in the history of French music and poetry. His musical compositions include a Mass for four voices, 23 motets and a wordless 'double hoquet,' and musical settings of 45 ballades, 22 rondeaux, 32 chansons baladées and 18 lais. In addition to the latter there are musical settings of 7 lyrical poems—1 lai, 1 chanson royal, 1 complainte, 1 rondel, 1 chanson baladée and 2 ballades—interpolated into a narrative poem, 'Le Remède de Fortune.'

Musically, the most important of his compositions is the Mass, which is traditionally said to have been composed for the coronation of Charles V. in 1364 at Reims, though we have no proof that this was the case. With the exception of the anonymous 3-part 'Messe de Tournai' it is the oldest extant polyphonic setting of the Mass (described in the Oxf. Hist. Mus. vol. ii.; in P. Wagner: Geschichte der Messe, vol. i.; and in 'Earliest Polyphonic Masses' (in Blackfriars, vol. ii., June 1921) by Barbara Smythe).

The motets, which include 6 with Latin words of a sacred character, 15 with secular French words in the upper parts and 2 which are bi-lingual (i.e. with Latin words in motetus and French words in triplum; see MOTET), are written for three voices, with the exception of 1 French and 3 Latin examples, which are in four parts. The fourth part, both in these and in the Mass, is a second tenor (contra-tenor). Three of the French motets are written over French tenors, but the majority have liturgical Latin tenors, according to the more usual custom of the time.

The lais (long lyrical poems written in twelve pairs of stanzas, each pair having a different metrical form and a different melody from the rest, except the last pair, which repeats metre and melody of the first) are all set to one musical part only, as are also the majority of the chansons baladées. The latter are the simplest and musically the most attractive of all Machaut's songs. The majority of the Ballades and all the Rondeaux have a polyphonic setting. The second part is a tenor, the third, when there is one, a contra-tenor. Words are given only to the topmost part, and it is generally supposed that the tenor and contra-tenor were intended to be played on instruments. Four Ballades and two Rondeaux have a fourth part, a triplum, written above the voice part, but this, too, is wordless, and probably instrumental. Machaut was an innovator in supplying a written accompaniment to his songs. Polyphonic Rondeaux had been written in the previous century, but these were really vocal trios, and the majority of the lyrics of trouvères and troubadours have a purely melodic setting. He was, on the other hand, the last of the French poets to compose the music for his songs.

His music is written according to the rules laid down by Philippe de Vitry in the Ars nova, with regard both to harmony and to rhythm. He makes much use of binary rhythm—hitherto unknown in French music—and he is the first French composer to use the minim (♩).

The musical works of Guillaume de Machaut are preserved wholly or in great part in six MSS., five of which are in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris—Nos. 22,545-6, 1584, 1585, 1586 and 9221 of the fonds français—and one in the private collection of the Marquis de Vogüé. Nos. 1585 and 1586 are of the 15th century, the others are of the 14th, and Nos. 22,545-6 and 1584, which are the most authoritative, were probably compiled under the poet's own direction. For a full description of the musical contents of all the Paris MSS., and a list of other MSS. containing a few of Machaut's songs, see J. Wolf, Geschichte der Mensural-Notation, vol. i. part iii. The account of the MSS. is followed by an account of Machaut's musical notation.

A good account of Machaut's music is given by F. Ludwig in Adler, Handbuch der Musik-Geschichte. See also the same writer's article on Die mehrstimmige Musik des 14ten Jahrhunderts in Sammelbände der Int. Musikgesellschaft, vol. iv.

No complete edition of Machaut's music has yet been published. Specimens of it—in modern notation unless otherwise indicated—have been published as follows:

- J. Wolf, Geschichte der Mensural-Notation, vol. II. (original notation) and vol. III. (modern notation).
 Kyrie and Credo (omitting last section, from Confiteor to Amen).
 3 3-part French motets.
 1 4-part Latin motet.
 3 Ballades, two in 3 and one in 2 parts.
 4 Rondeaux one in 4, two in 3 and one in 2 parts.
 1 Chanson baladée in 2 parts.

 One of the Rondeaux given by Wolf is reproduced in Combarieu's Histoire de la musique, vol. I.
 Adler, Handbuch der Musik-Geschichte (p. 232), quotes a ballade a 4, with two parts instrumental. B. S.

MACHÊTE, a small 4-stringed guitar used by the Portuguese and found also in Madeira and the Azores. (See GUITAR.) F. W. G.

MACICOTATICUM or MACHICOTAGE, a species of ornamentation applied to PLAIN-SONG (q.v.) melodies by means of extraneous notes inserted between those of the true Canto fermo, after the manner of floritura. To the once prevalent custom of machicotage in France are to be attributed many of the corruptions observable in Gallican Office Books before the modern revisions. The Processionale Parisiense (Paris, 1787) directs that the melodies shall be machicotée by the clergy, and continued by the choir 'sine macicotalico'; and in former times the ecclesiastics entrusted with the duty of so singing them were called maceconici or machicots.

MACINTYRE, MARGARET, soprano, possessed a voice of exceptional beauty, but she had a tendency to force the tone and her career as a leading singer was rather short. She made her début in 1888 on the second night of Augustus Harris's first season at Covent Garden, playing Micaëla to the Carmen of Madame Nordica. Her success was emphatic, and during the season she sang Inez in 'L'Africaine,' Mathilde in 'Gulielmo Tell' to the Tell of Lassalle, and Marguérite in Boito's 'Mefistofele.' In the following year she sang, among other parts, Marguérite in Faust. Soon in request as a concert singer, she made her first festival appearance at Leeds in 1889. She was the first Rebecca in Sullivan's 'Ivanhoe' at D'Oyly Carte's English Opera House, on Jan. 31, 1891, alternating the part with Miss Thudichum. At Covent Garden in 1892 she sang Senta in the 'Flying Dutchman' to Lassalle's Vanderdecken. She was at the Leeds Festivals in 1892 and 1895, and at the Birmingham Festival in 1891. While her voice was still at its best she sang at St. Petersburg and Moscow, an interesting feature of her visit to Russia being her appearance as Elizabeth in 'Tannhäuser' with Battistini as Wolfram.

MACKAY, ANGUS (d. near Dumfries, Mar. 21, 1859), a famous Highland piper, who collected and published some interesting pipe melodies taken down from traditional sources. The book is now rare, and its title runs: 'A Collection of Ancient Piobaireachd or Highland pipe music,' folio, 1838. Another of his works is 'The Piper's Assistant.' He was piper to Queen Victoria, and was accidentally drowned in the Nith, near Dumfries.

MACKENZIE, SIR ALEXANDER CAMPBELL (b. Edinburgh, Aug. 22, 1847), both as composer and as teacher (he was Principal of the R.A.M. for 36 years) is accounted one of the leaders of the British musical renaissance.

He was the fourth musician of his family in direct descent. His great-grandfather belonged to the Forfarshire Militia Band; his grandfather, John Mackenzie (1797-1852), was a violinist in Aberdeen and Edinburgh; and his father, Alexander Mackenzie (1819-57), was also a violinist, pupil of Sainton and Lipinski; he edited the 'National Dance Music of Scotland,' and was leader of the band at the Theatre Royal in Edinburgh.

A. C. Mackenzie was educated at Hunter's School in Edinburgh, and, when only 10 years old, was sent to study music at Schwarzburg-Sondershausen in Germany on the recommendation of a member of Gung'l's band named Bartel. Here he was a pupil of K. W. Uhlrich for the violin, and for theory, of Eduard Stein, the conductor of the Sondershausen Ducal orchestra. The boy played second violin in the orchestra, and took part in many performances of the most advanced music, Liszt, Berlioz and the then existing works of Wagner being his daily bread. In 1862 he returned to Edinburgh, and soon afterwards came to London, intending to take lessons from Sainton; but on the latter's advice Mackenzie entered for the King's Scholarship at the R.A.M., and won it in December of the same year, remaining at the Academy till 1865. Besides Sainton, who taught him the violin, his masters were Charles Lucas for harmony and counterpoint, and F. B. Jewson for piano. While at the Academy Mackenzie played in various theatre orchestras, and thereby acquired experience of orchestral work at first hand. On the conclusion of his course at the Academy, Mackenzie returned to Edinburgh, where he quickly became known as an excellent violinist; he also gave chamber concerts, at which Schumann's pianoforte quartet and quintet were given for the first time in Scotland. He was appointed conductor of the Scottish Vocal Music Association in 1873, and meanwhile fulfilled many teaching engagements, and officiated as precentor in St. George's Church. He found time to compose some chamber music, a PF. trio and string quartet (unpublished), besides a pianoforte quartet in E flat, published by Kahnt of Leipzig as op. 11.

Hans von Bülow had seen the proof-sheets at the German publishers', and had made inquiries about the composer. When he came to Glasgow and Edinburgh in 1877-78, he made Mackenzie's personal acquaintance, and accepted his overture 'Cervantes' (performed at Sondershausen in 1877) for performance at Glasgow, where it was given on Dec. 17, 1879. As Mackenzie added to his other labours by playing in the orchestra of the Birmingham Festivals of 1864, 1867, 1870 and 1873, it is not surprising that his health was affected by the strain of his work. He wisely went abroad, and settled in Florence in order to devote himself to composition. For about ten years, in fact until his appointment to the principal ship of the R.A.M., Florence was his residence for at least part of the year; but as time went on his importance in regard to music in London steadily increased, and at last he was obliged to live altogether in England. From the beginning of his residence in Florence dates the first of his more important choral works, the cantata 'The Bride,' performed at the Worcester Festival of 1881. Each year after this saw some work of large calibre, and many festival and other commissions followed rapidly. In 1885-86 Mackenzie was appointed conductor of Novello's Oratorio Concerts, and introduced many important works to London audiences. It was primarily in order to hear his 'Saint Elizabeth' under Mackenzie's direction that Liszt paid his final visit to England in 1886, and Mackenzie renewed his old friendship with the composer. By this time his second Scottish Rhapsody called 'Burns,' the opera 'Colomba,' and 'The Rose of Sharon,' an oratorio composed for the Norwich Festival of 1884, had raised Mackenzie to a high position among English composers, and on the death of Sir George Macfarren he was appointed to succeed him as Principal of the R.A.M. He undertook the duties of the post on Feb. 22, 1888. Mackenzie's long tenure of office at the R.A.M. (1888-1924) was begun when the institution was feeling the pressure of criticism and the competition of younger teaching schools (see ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC). He brought his musicianship to bear on its internal problems, and showed such statesmanship in guiding its fortunes that not only was the artistic reputation of the Academy completely vindicated, but its material resources were increased and stabilised. Mackenzie taught composition, conducted the students' orchestra and lectured for many years in addition to all the administrative work which he personally controlled. The Academy's move into its new building (1911) and the celebration of its centenary (1922) witnessed the triumph of Mackenzie's organisation; the subsequent careers of the innumerable students who passed through his hands are still more decisive evidence of his power as a teacher and leader.

As a concert conductor Mackenzie's work outside the R.A.M. was important. He conducted the Royal Choral Society occasionally during the lifetime of Sir Joseph Barnby, on whose death he directed the concerts for the remainder of the season. In 1892 he was appointed conductor of the Philharmonic Society, and during his tenure of the post, which he resigned in 1899, introduced Tchaikovsky's Pathetic symphony to London, as well as Borodin's symphony in B minor. In 1903 he undertook a tour in Canada, in the course of which he conducted concerts of British music in all the most important towns of the Dominion.

The tour (organised by Charles A. E. Harriss) lasted six weeks, and extended from Halifax, N.S., to Victoria, B.C. Eleven new choral bodies were raised for this scheme; other existing ones were augmented, and thus, besides introducing many contemporary British works for the first time in Canada, a movement in the direction of choral singing was begun which was the foundation of the present widespread cultivation of the art, furthered by the competition festivals. Mackenzie was General President of the International Musical Society (Int. Mus. Ges.) 1908-1912, a period which included congresses at Vienna (1909) and London (1911). As a lecturer Mackenzie has done important work in frequent courses delivered before the Royal Institution. One lecture, given there in 1919, on 'Hubert Parry, his work and place as a British composer,' was of peculiar value as the estimate of a close friend and contemporary.

Mackenzie received the Mus.D. degree from St. Andrews in 1886; Cambridge in 1888; Edinburgh in 1890; that of D.C.L. from Glasgow, 1901, and the McGill University in 1903; that of LL.D. from Leeds in 1904, and Mus.D. from Oxford in 1922. He received the gold medal for art and science from the Grand Duke of Hesse in 1884, and the Saxe-Coburg and Gotha Order for Arts and Science in 1893. He is a corresponding member of the Istituto Reale Musicale of Florence, a member of the Royal Swedish Academy and honorary member of the Accademia di S. Cecilia in Rome. In 1895 he was knighted; he was created Knight Commander of the Victorian Order (1922); and received the gold medal of the Royal Philharmonic Society (1923).

QUALITIES OF COMPOSITION.—Mackenzie's high importance to his generation rests primarily on the fact that he is essentially both a Briton and a cosmopolitan. His early upbringing in Scotland was removed from those influences of the church and the organ loft which set their stamp both for good and ill on so many of his English contemporaries. As a violinist he lived in the freer atmosphere of the orchestra and the theatre, and his long periods of life on the Continent, besides giving him a command of the German and Italian languages equal to his command of English, enabled him to mix with the keenest musical minds of his time, to breathe their air and live their life, without for one moment being deflected from his own course, or belying his character as a sturdy long-sighted North Briton. These qualities are reflected in his music.

His appointment to the R.A.M. suggests a natural division of his compositions into two periods at about opus 40. Before that time (1888) composition was the first business of his career; after that it had to take second place, to be accomplished in time snatched from other duties, and be undertaken either for a special occasion or for relaxation.

Equality of output is scarcely to be expected, and for the most part Mackenzie's reputation has rested on his earlier works. Among these none served to establish his position more firmly than the oratorio 'The Rose of Sharon,' when it was produced at the Norwich Festival in 1884. Its romantic style, the warmth and fervour of its orchestral colouring and its freedom from the conventions of current English oratorio, marked its composer as a man of individual outlook and originality of ideas. Fortunately the libretto, though devised in a quasi-operatic manner, was put together by Joseph Bennett from the words of Holy Scripture, so that the work is saved from the worst literary banalities of Bennett's own texts. Mackenzie, however, has suffered seriously from his librettists, both in his larger choral works and in his operas. At a time when English composers, led by Stanford and Parry, were rediscovering the musical possibilities of great English literature and poetry, Mackenzie accepted too readily the hackwork of Bennett and Hueffer for cantatas and operas respectively. They stultified much fine and imaginative work on his part. Mackenzie's apparent indifference to the qualities of a libretto seems, however, to be the defect of one of his strongest qualities. Without the literary sensitiveness of Stanford or the philosophic mind of Parry, he took his stand on purely musical values, and wrote with a freedom and frankness which showed genuine creative impulse.

It is significant that the list of his instrumental works contains neither symphony nor sonata; but suites and overtures, generally with descriptive titles, rhapsodies, ballads, preludes and entr'actes are numerous, and testify to his refusal of any classical pose. The three Scottish rhapsodies, the piano concerto, the Pibroch suite for violin and 'The Cottar's Saturday Night' (one of his most effective choral works) have sufficient reference to Scottish folk-song and other suggestions of local colour to give him a place among musical nationalists; but his idiom is really cosmopolitan, and he does not generally handle Scottish themes with special native sensitiveness. Max Bruch's Scottish fantasia, for example, might be placed beside his Scottish concerto. His nationality finds expression in more general characteristics less easily defined, in a steadfast persistence in the pursuit of an aim, in an imagination which is not afraid of the commonplace, and, by no means least, in a buoyant sense of humour. A volume of reminiscences by Mackenzie is (1927) in the press.

MACKINTOSH, (1) JOHN (b. London, 1767; d. there, Mar. 23, 1844), an eminent performer on the bassoon, who from 1821-35 held the first place in all the principal London and provincial orchestras. He produced a full, rich and powerful, but somewhat coarse tone. His son (2) ALPHONSO was a violinist.

W. H. H.

MACKINTOSH, (1) ROBERT (d. London, Feb. 1807), a Scottish musician and famous composer of Strathspey reels, etc., nicknamed 'Red Rob.' He was from the Highlands (probably from the Vale of Athole), and was established as a musician in Skinner's Close, Edinburgh, in 1773. At various addresses in the northern capital he advertised himself as teacher of the violin, and he organised concerts; ultimately conducting the orchestra at the Theatre Royal. He removed to London in 1803. He was a clever violinist, and his Scottish dance music is of considerable merit. He published four books of compositions and arrangements as under: 'Airs, Minuets, Gavottes and Reels' (1783); 'Sixty-eight new Reels' (1792); a second book (1793); 'A Third Book of Sixty-eight new Reels' (1796); and 'A Fourth Book of new Strathspey Reels,' c. 1804-05; all, except the last, which was published in London, being issued in Edinburgh, in folio. It is said that Mackintosh gave the first professorial lessons on the violin to Nathaniel Gow, on the latter's first coming to Edinburgh.

(2) ABRAHAM, his son (b. Edinburgh, June 15, 1769), followed his father's profession. He published 'Thirty new Strathspey Reels,' Edinburgh, folio (1792), and some other works. He removed about the beginning of the 19th century to Newcastle-on-Tyne, where he was established in 1807 as a musician and a teacher of dancing. For many interesting details of the Mackintosh family, see the late John Glen's work, 'The Glen Collection of Scottish Dance Music,' book i., 1891.

MACKLEAN, CHARLES, a violinist and composer who, living in Edinburgh in 1737, published in that year 'Twelve Solos or Sonatas for a Violin and Violoncello,' op. prima. R. Cooper, for the author, 1737. It is doubtful whether he is the same Charles M'Lean mentioned on the title-page of 'A Collection of Favourite Scots Tunes . . . by the late Mr. Chs. M'Lean and other eminent Masters,' ob. folio, c. 1772. This last-named collection is of some antiquarian interest.

MACLEAN, (1) CHARLES DONALD (b. Cambridge, Mar. 27, 1843; d. S. Kensington, London, June 23, 1916), educated at Shrewsbury and Exeter College, Oxford (he was both classical scholar and organist of the latter), studied music under Ferdinand Hiller at Cologne, and had an early career as a composer and organist in London. From 1871-75 he was musical director to Eton College. He then spent 22 years in India as a Civil servant, and subsequently his most important work for music was done in connexion with the International Musikgesellschaft. He became English editor of that society's publications in 1899 and general secretary of the whole society in 1908. He edited the Report volume of the society's Congress held in London 1911, and continued as secretary until the disruption of the society caused by the war (1914-18). (See INTERNATIONAL MUSICAL SOCIETY). His literary interests and his linguistic powers fitted him for such work as this. His compositions are numerous but not important.

His son (2) ALICK (ALEXANDER MORVAREN) (b. Eton, July 20, 1872), was educated at Eton and intended for the army. He began operatic composition with 'Crichton' (3-act comic opera) and the first version of 'Quentin Durward' (1892-93), and has had considerable success both as composer and conductor. In 1895 he won the Moody-Manners prize for a one-act opera by a British subject with 'Petrucchio'; he became musical director to Sir Charles Wyndham (1899), to the Spa Company at Scarborough (1911), and conducted at Chappell's Ballad Concerts (Queen's Hall, London), 1915-23. His principal operatic productions have been—

- 'Petrucchio,' June 1895, at Covent Garden.
Die Liebesglocke, Easter 1906, at Mayence.
'Maitre Sella,' Aug. 1909, by Moody-Manners, London.
'Quentin Durward,' Jan. 1920, by Carl Rosa at Newcastle.

M'LEOD, PETER (b. West Calder, Midlothian, May 8, 1797; d. Bonnington, near Edinburgh, Feb. 10, 1859),¹ published several collections of original airs to the words of Scottish poets, as 'Original National Melodies of Scotland' (1838), 'Original Scottish Melodies,' 'New National Songs, the melodies never before published,' etc., and was the composer of many now favourite Scots songs, 'Oh! why left I my hame?' being among the most famous of these. His collection of 'Original Scottish Melodies' was published with a view to the completion of the Burns Monument in Edinburgh, and the profits of it enabled this to be effected. F. K.

M'MURDIE, JOSEPH, Mus.B. (b. parish of St. Bride, London, 1792; d. Merton, Surrey, Dec. 23, 1878), graduated at Oxford in 1814. He was a pupil of Crotch, and composed many glees (principally for the Conectores Sodales) and songs, and made numerous arrangements for the pianoforte. He was for some time a director of the Philharmonic Society.

MCNAUGHT, (1) WILLIAM GRAY (b. London, Mar. 30, 1849; d. there Oct. 13, 1918), furthered the spread of popular music in England by many activities, but specially as a judge of the COMPETITION FESTIVALS (q.v.), and as editor of the Musical Times (1909-18)¹ in succession to F. G. EDWARDS (q.v.).

McNaught had been engaged in a business career before he entered the R.A.M. as a student (1872-76). During his studentship he was active as a choir conductor, notably at the Bow and Bromley Institute, with which he was closely associated for sixteen years. In such work he naturally became convinced of the practical value of the tonic sol-fa notation, and in his subsequent work as a teacher, lecturer, and journalist he laid stress on its uses. For some years he was in charge of music at the Homerton Training College, and he then became assistant inspector in music under the Board of Education. In 1892 the School Music Review was founded by Novello under his editorship, a publication through which a large number of folk-songs, national songs, and new compositions were made available for school use. As a judge at the Competition Festivals McNaught's wide experience and kindly good sense carried great weight and exerted a far-reaching influence on the quality of the performances achieved therein. His son

(2) WILLIAM (b. Sept. 1, 1883), educated at University College School and at Worcester College, Oxford, became assistant editor of the Musical Times under his father. He still (1927) holds that post, and until recently was on the musical staff of the Morning Post. C.

MAÇON, LE, opéra-comique in 3 acts; words by Scribe and Delavigne, music by Auber. Produced Opéra-Comique, May 3, 1825; in England, St. James's Theatre, Mar. 13, 1850. G.

MACPHERSON, CHARLES (b. Edinburgh, May 10, 1870; d. London, May 28, 1927), organist of St. Paul's Cathedral, spent a great part of his life in the service of the cathedral.

His father was Burgh Architect to the city of Edinburgh. At nine years old Charles Macpherson entered the choir of St. Paul's Cathedral and remained there till 1887, when he was appointed choirmaster under Dr. Pearce at St. Clement's, Eastcheap. Sir George Martin gave him organ lessons. He entered the R.A.M. in 1890, and won the Charles Lucas prize in 1892, becoming A.R.A.M. in 1896. After holding the post of private organist to the late Sir Robert Menzies, at Weem, Perthshire, and Mme. de Falbe, Luton Hoo, Bedfordshire, in succession, he was appointed in 1895 sub-organist of St. Paul's, a post of much responsibility as regards the choir as well as organ playing, and this position he filled until the death of Sir George Martin (q.v.) in 1916, when he succeeded to the organistship. He conducted the London Church Choirs Association from 1914 till his death, served as President of the R.C.O., and was a professor of the R.A.M. The degree of Mus.D. was conferred on him (honoris causa) by Durham University in 1919. His compositions include a setting of Psalm cxxxvii. for choir and orchestra; nine anthems and other church music; three Gaelic melodies, accompanied on strings and harp; an overture, 'Cridhe an Ghaidhil,' played at the Crystal Palace in 1895; a Highland suite for orchestra; another suite, 'Hallow'e'en'; a quartet for piano and strings in E flat; and two movements of a sextet for wind instruments. His glee, 'There sits a bird,' gained the prize given in 1893 by the Bristol Orpheus Glee Society. M.; addns. C.

MACPHERSON, STEWART (b. Liverpool, Mar. 29, 1865), teacher and writer on music, was educated at the City of London School, won the 'Sterndale Bennett' open scholarship at the R.A.M., entering that institution in 1880. He was a pupil of Sir G. A. Macfarren for composition, and of Walter Macfarren for the pianoforte. He gained the Balfe scholarship in 1882, the Charles Lucas medal for composition in 1884, and the Potter exhibition in 1885. At the conclusion of his studentship in 1887 he was appointed professor of harmony and composition and an Associate of the institution, becoming a Fellow in 1892. He was appointed organist of Immanuel Church, Streatham Common, in 1885, and in the same year became conductor of the Westminster Orchestral Society, a post which he held until 1902. He also conducted the Streatham Choral Society from 1886-1904. In 1898 he was appointed examiner to the Associated Board of the R.A.M. and R.C.M., and in that capacity visited Canada, Australia, New Zealand and Ceylon in 1900. In 1903 he succeeded Corder as professor of composition at the Royal Normal College for the Blind, and was appointed a member of the Board of Musical Studies in the University of London. He has lectured at the R.A.M., the Normal College and elsewhere, and has specialised in the teaching of 'Musical Appreciation' and kindred matters. His educational works (see list) have had a wide influence. He has edited a complete edition of Beethoven's PF. sonatas.

His compositions include a symphony in C, 1888; two overtures, and short pieces for orchestra, mostly written for the Westminster Orchestral Society. More important than these is a remarkably beautiful Mass in D for solo, choir and orchestra, produced at St. James's Hall, May 1898. Many songs, pianoforte pieces and services have been published; and 'Concerto alla fantasia,' for violin and orchestra, was played at the Queen's Hall Promenade Concert in 1904. His theoretical works are:

MACQUE, JEAN DE, a Flemish musician, pupil of Philip de Monte, who settled in Italy, living from 1576-82 in Rome, and from 1586 in Naples. Only in 1610 is he definitely named as being choirmaster to the Royal Chapel in Naples. His publications extend from 1576-1613, and consist almost entirely of madrigals, of which there were two Books a 6, six a 5, two a 4, one a 4, five, six, and two Books entitled 'Madrigaletti e Napolitane,' a 6. Some of these are now lost, and several have parts missing. A considerable number of his madrigals and a few motets were received into the various collections of the time. Two were adapted to English words in Yonge's 'Musica Transalpina' of 1588, and Morley's 'Italian Madrigals' of 1598.

MADAMA BUTTERFLY, opera in 2 acts, text by Luigi Illica and G. Giocosa, founded on David Belasco's dramatisation of a story by John Luther Long; music by Puccini. Produced Scala, Milan, in 1904, in a revised form; Brescia, May 28, 1904, the second act divided into two distinct parts; and Covent Garden, July 10, 1905; Washington, D.C., Oct. 1906; in English, Lyric Theatre (Moody-Manners Co.), Aug. 16, 1907.

MADAME SANS GÈNE, opera in 4 acts, text by Renato Simoni, after the play by Sardou and Moreau, music by Giordano. Produced New York, Metropolitan Opera House, Jan. 25, 1915.

MADIN (recte MADDEN), HENRI (b. Verdun, 1698; d. Versailles, 1748), came of Irish parents (from Eyrecourt, Co. Galway), and developed a taste for music at an early age. His uncle, Rev. Dr. Ambrose Madden, of Loughrea, was advanced to the bishopric of Kilmacduagh (Ireland) on the nomination of the Pretender, James III., in 1705. In 1730 we find Henri Madden a cleric, and maitre de musique in the Cathedral of Tours, a position which he vacated in 1737 for the more important one of deputy maitre de chapelle to the King. He published a treatise on counterpoint in 1742, and was nominated maitre de chapelle to the King, in succession to Campra (see CAMPRA, André). In June 1742 he is described as 'Canon of the Chapel Royal of St. Quentin and Master of the Music to the King.' Not only was he a good theorist, but he was also a successful choir-trainer, and composed many popular motets.

MADRIGAL (Ital. madrigale), a form of secular composition for two or more voices, practised originally in North Italy in the 14th century and revived in the 16th and early 17th centuries, during which period it assumed the style by which it is chiefly known and became popular over the greater part of Europe.

The etymology of the word has puzzled philologists for several centuries. It was applied originally to a particular form of short poem of pastoral character, and since such poems were often called mandriali in the 14th century, it was supposed that the word was derived from mandria (Latin mandra and Greek μάνδρα), a herd. The form madriale also appears, and gave rise to the theory that the madrigal was originally a hymn to the Virgin Mary. It has recently been shown by Prof. Leonardo Biadene of the University of Pisa that the word comes from a mediæval Latin word matricale meaning a rustic song in the mother tongue. Italian writers on literature in the early 14th century also make use of the words mandriale and marigale as synonymous, the latter word being more in common usage. The forms madrigale, marigale and madriale are all easily and naturally derived from matricale under the influence of various North Italian dialects; Biadene regards mandriale as a word invented by the literary men of the 14th century resulting from a fusion of madriale and mandria.

The madrigal as a musical composition makes its first appearance about 1340. Its origin may be traced to the CONDUCTUS (q.v.) of the French composers in the 13th century, but the great Florentine school of the 14th century has an individual style of its own. The most important composers of this school were Giovanni da Cascia, Jacopo da Bologna and Francesco Landini (d. 1397). Landini is described by contemporary writers as being not only a composer of very moving love-songs, but also as a marvellous performer on the organetto (portative organ). Specimens of his madrigals are quoted by Wooldridge (Oxford History of Music) and Ludwig (in Adler's Handbuch der Musikgeschichte). The madrigal of this period consists generally of two or three stanzas of three lines each, repeated to the same music and followed by a pair of lines in a different rhythm. The subjects are chiefly amorous, but often satirical or political as well. The music is generally for two voices. Another form common at this period is the caccia (chase), originally used for poems dealing with the chase; the music is for two voices in canon, with a free instrumental bass. It has been suggested by German writers that the English Catch is derived from the Caccia. Both madrigal and caccia often illustrate the words with a strong sense of musical wit. The madrigals often begin with long florid passages, and it has been suggested by Riemann and others that these were played by instruments.

The period of Landini shows secular music considerably in advance of music for the church, but in the 15th century the church seems to have taken the lead. The secular music of the early Netherland school is of comparatively little importance in the history of technical developments. From the beginning of the 16th century onwards the leadership passes to the Italians again. The madrigal and various other secular forms return to prominence, and by the end of the century the madrigal, especially in Italy, represents the most daring advance in the technique of musical composition. The transition is well summarised by Alfred Einstein (Adler's Handbuch der Musikgeschichte) as the passage of the principal melody from the tenor to the uppermost part. In the early years of the 15th century the favourite secular form was the chanson of the French and Netherlandish composers (see SONG, subsection FRANCE). It was in most cases a traditional popular tune, sung by the tenor and accompanied by the other voices in more or less elaborate counterpoint. During the course of the century composers gradually learned to give organic unity to their work by making the subsidiary voices sing free imitations on motives taken from the main tune. It has been well pointed out that the principle of perpetual free and fragmentary imitation was a very important step in musical technique, because it was the first step towards thematic unity and thematic development, neither of which were possible so long as the ideal of absolutely strict canon prevailed. This aspect of technique is best studied in the church music of the period which offered larger forms than the chanson in which to develop the principle. The chanson, which eventually imposed its definitely French style of expression on the Netherlanders as well, found its most artistic exponent in Josquin des Prés (d. 1521), who has been regarded by the general consensus of musical historians as the first composer whose music appeals unmistakably to our modern sense of the art. From Josquin onwards secular music maintains its own independent life as free composition, not merely the harmonisation of traditional tunes.

The name madrigale, after having been apparently forgotten (as a musical form) for over a hundred years, was revived again in 1533, when a collection of 'Madrigali noui de diuersi excellentissimi musici' was published by Valerio Dorico at Rome. Out of twenty compositions sixteen have Italian words, the rest French; the composers of the Italian pieces are given as Carlo (3), Constantio F[esta] (2), Sebastiano F[esta] (1), Maistre Jan (1), Jacobo de Tho[scana?] (1), Verdelot (7), and Anon. (1). The poetical form of the Madrigal has been variously defined, according as the authorities followed the examples of the 14th or the 16th centuries. Bembo, the greatest literary authority of the later madrigal period, to whom also the actual musical composition of madrigals owed some of its instigation, says that the madrigal is bound by no rule as to the number of its lines or the arrangement of its rhymes. It was a short poem rarely exceeding twelve lines; its rhymes could be arranged as the poet pleased, provided that the last two lines, which generally formed some sort of pointed coda, should rhyme together; and its lines were free as to length, the metre being iambic, usually of seven or eleven syllables, more rarely of five.

The literary aspect of the madrigal is of great importance. It has been discussed at some length by G. Cesari (R.M.I. xix.). There existed in Italy during the first years of the 16th century a type of song called FROTTOLE (q.v.), popular mainly in North Italy (Verona, Mantua, Padua, Venice, Bologna). The poems were frivolous, but obviously written by educated people for educated audiences; they are clever and amusing adaptations of the folk-song style. Some are intended for four unaccompanied voices, others for one voice with the lute or other instruments. Two things should be noted about them—their music is definitely melodious, with the melody at the top, and their poems are generally in stanzas with a refrain and in trochaic lines of eight syllables. The composers of the frottole are all Italians. The madrigal was a reaction against the frivolity and vulgarity of the frottole. In its early stages it was mainly the work of Netherlandish composers; but it could not have come into existence but for the incentive of Italian poets. Bembo was the leader of the movement towards an essentially aristocratic poetry that deliberately avoided all contact with that of the common people. The last collection of frottole was printed in 1531; Bembo's famous 'Canzoniere' appeared in 1530, and the first collection of madrigals set to music in 1533. The disciples of Bembo took Petrarch as their model, and Petrarch himself was one of the poets most often set to music by the madrigalists; but, as Symonds pointed out, the conditions of social life in Petrarch's own day were very different from those of the Renaissance, and the imitation of Petrarch in the 16th century merely led to preciousness and affectation. Yet this movement, disastrous as it was in some ways to poetry, had a certain very valuable influence on music. In the first place, it made the madrigal the musical expression of the highly cultivated life of the small Italian courts; a definitely aristocratic type of music was created. The Netherlandish composers brought to it the accomplished contrapuntal technique of the motet; but that technique soon had to learn to adjust its paces to the swift and supple rhythms of the new Italian poetry. A typical example of the early madrigal is the well-known poem of Monsignor Guidiccioni set to equally well-known music¹ by Arcadelt:

Il bianco e dolce cigno
Cantando more, ed io
Piangendo giungo al fin del viver mio.
Strana e diversa sorte,
Ch'ei more sconsolato,
Et io more beato.
Morte, che nel morire,
M'empie di gioia tutto e di desire;
Se nel morir altro dolor non sento,
Di mille mort' il di sarai contento.

The ingenious irregularity of its lines and rhymes compel the composer to invent musical forms that will correspond with them. As the ten lines are a complete poem there is no need for a simple tune to which a succession of stanzas are to be sung. The poem is short enough to admit of melismata and of contrapuntal elaboration, but, in conformity with the artificial spirit of the words, the counterpoint must be suggested rather than worked out. Music for a cultivated and elegant society must not become boring. Every line of the poem contains at least one word that is full of emotional suggestion—dolce, cantando, piangendo, strana, sconsolato, etc. The word morire bears the erotic double sense familiar in the madrigal poets of our own country. The epigrammatic point made by the final rhymed couplet gives the composer the opportunity of 'driving a point' of imitation, in order to end his work with an effective coda. In most madrigals, early or late, this coda, so carefully provided by the poet, is made still more pointed in the music by a repetition.

Most of these early madrigals are largely homophonic, but the parts (at this period four is the usual number) are all melodious and agreeable to sing, whether they move contrapuntally or not. They are intended to be sung by four unaccompanied voices; but it is clear that the uppermost part has the chief melody, and there can be little doubt that in many cases the three lower parts were played by instruments. There are definite records of madrigals being sung to instrumental accompaniment, voices and instruments sometimes uniting in all parts, sometimes a voice singing the top part only. But the fact that the collection of 1533 was the first issue of separate partbooks with the words printed in full for each part shows that musicians had begun to require a more careful adjustment of words to notes in all voices; the previous practice had been to print all four parts in the same book, not in score but on facing pages, and to print words for the soprano alone in full.

The madrigal composers of this early period are almost exclusively Netherlanders occupying positions at the various small Italian courts. The chief representatives are Arcadelt, Verdelot, Willaert and Gero. The only Italians of distinction are Costanzo Festa and Alfonso della Viola. The madrigal, however, soon became an important feature of the courtly life. At the marriage of Cosmo de' Medici and Eleonora of Toledo at Florence in 1539 a whole series of madrigals was performed, some as entr'actes to a comedy, others as accompaniments to the entrance and exit of the ducal couple. The list of madrigals, singers and instruments gives in itself quite a vivid picture of the scene.

Ingresso, à 8, sung over the archway of the great door of the Porta al Prato with 24 voices on one side and on the other 4 trombones and 4 cornetti in the entrance of the most illustrious Duchess.

Sacro al santo Ninnoso, à 8.

Vaiena almo riposo, à 4, sung by Aurora and played by a harp-chord and little organs with various stops at the beginning of the comedy.

Guardate almo pastore, à 6, sung at the end of the 1st act by 6 shepherds and then repeated by them and played as well by 6 other shepherds with storie (7 krummhorn).

Chi me l'a toll' ome, à 6, sung at the end of the 2nd act by 3 strens and 3 sea-monsters, played by 3 flutes and 3 sea-nymphs with 3 lutes all together.

O begli anni dell' oro, à 4, played at the end of the 3rd act by Silenus with a violone, playing all the parts and singing the soprano.

Hor chi mai cantera, à 4, sung at the end of the 4th act by 8 huntress nymphs.

Veniene almo riposo, à 5, sung at the end of the 5th act, at nightfall, and played by 4 trombones.

Bacco, Bacco evae, à 4, sung and danced by 4 bacchantes and 4 satyrs with various instruments all at once which at nightfall was the end of the comedy.

There were innumerable madrigals composed for social events such as weddings, as their words plainly show. Palestrina and others often allude to the lasciviousness of the madrigals; Cortecchia, the composer of the wedding madrigals just mentioned, apologised for this in the dedication to Cosmo de' Medici of these and others which he published in 1544, being then a priest. He excuses himself partly on the ground that they were composed in his youth but mainly because they had been printed incorrectly by unauthorised persons and ascribed to other composers. Peter Wagner (Das Madrigal und Palestrina, in Vierteljahrsschrift für Musikwissenschaft, viii, 423) quotes the words of a very curious specimen which must be left in the decent obscurity of a learned periodical.

The chief composers of the second period of madrigal writing are Willaert and his pupil Cipriano de Rore, who was also a Fleming; Orlando Lasso, Palestrina and Andrea Gabrieli also belong to this group, though Palestrina's contributions to madrigal literature are of comparatively small importance. The output of minor Italian composers, almost all of considerable merit, was enormous. The typical madrigal of this period is for five voices, which not only enriched the harmony but allowed of frequent division of the singers into opposing groups, the middle voice often having to do duty in both. Six-part madrigals are also common. Counterpoint becomes the adroit servant of emotional expression; phrases are much broken up by rests which emphasise the rhetoric of the words and illustrate the sighs and groans of unsatisfied desire; both words and music acquire a marvellously skilful technique of delicate voluptuousness. But love is by no means the only subject of the madrigals; the whole life of the later Renaissance is mirrored in them. Jacques du Pont, organist of S. Luigi dei Francesi at Rome, shows us the street seller of roast chestnuts; Giovanni Croce of Choggia teaches us to play the game of the Goose, still popular with Italian children today; Striggio describes the chattering of the women washing clothes in the river—their gossip of love-affairs, their grumbles at their mistresses, their ghost stories, their quarrels and the folk-songs which another group suddenly start to sing by way of putting an end to abusive language—and from Striggio it is only a short step to the 'Amfiparnaso' of Vecchi and the rather puerile buffooneries of Banchieri.

The third and most interesting period of the Italian madrigal is represented by Luca Marenzio, Monteverdi and Gesualdo Prince of Venosa. Their madrigals have been very severely criticised by earlier writers on musical history, such as Burney, Rockstro, Wooldridge and even Parry¹; but it may be noted that Martini, the teacher of Mozart, speaks of them with the highest praise. The free use of chromatic alteration brings about the complete break-down of the modal tonality; modulations are introduced which even to-day sound bewildering. In the earlier years of the madrigal it is fairly clear that madrigals were written more for the pleasure of the singers than for that of an audience; the delight of singing them arises from the fact that every part is contrapuntally interesting as well as admirably vocal. In the third period the personality of the composer dominates; the separate voices have to sink their individuality in the organic whole. The madrigal is not the choral expression of a corporate body such as may perhaps be found in the church music of the period; the voices are the skilled and sensitive servants of the composer, like the instruments in a late quartet of Beethoven. The madrigal becomes in fact a conscious and accomplished work of art.

The madrigal broke down in the early years of the 17th century because it was becoming steadily more and more literary. The madrigals of Monteverdi and Gesualdo, notwithstanding their daring harmonies and their consummate musical technique, seem to be inspired more by a passionate devotion to poetry than by a purely musical creative faculty. Some of the English composers described their madrigals as 'apt for voices or viols.' One could have Arcadelt's madrigals played by strings alone with no great loss to their beauty; but to treat those of Monteverdi and Gesualdo in this way would be unthinkable. Without their poems they would be meaningless; and perhaps the reason why some writers failed to appreciate the beauty of them was that they looked at them from too exclusively musical a point of view.

Galilei and Peri, the creators of the stilo recitativo which eventually became the foundation of the musical drama, had pushed the literary ideal of music still farther. We can see from the description of Cortecchia's wedding madrigals how the ideal of solo song accompanied by instruments had interested musicians almost a hundred years before; but it was the madrigal of Cipriano de Rore, Marenzio and Monteverdi himself which prepared the expressive technique of the early operas. Monteverdi took over the madrigal style in the choruses of his operas; but it must not be overlooked that the style of his recitatives is derived no less from that of the madrigals. The madrigal did not altogether die out in the 17th century, in spite of the new orientation of music. Madrigals were composed even by such men as Stradella, Alessandro Scarlatti and Lotti, though it must be admitted that their numbers are very few. In the 16th century Luzzasco Luzzaschi had composed elaborately florid madrigals with accompaniment of the harpsichord for three ladies who sang at the court of Ferrara, and it is probably from these that the name passed to contrapuntal duets for two voices with figured bass which were written in large quantities by Alessandro Scarlatti, Steffani, Handel, Perez and others in the late 17th and early 18th centuries.

Alongside of the madrigals there existed in the 16th century a number of smaller secular vocal forms. The frottole have already been described. The 'Giustiniana' belongs to the same date and to much the same category. It derives its name not (as Morley and Prætorius supposed) from that of a notorious courtesan of Bergamo but from Leonardo Giustiniani, the Venetian statesman and humanist (b. 1385), who in his youth was a prolific poet and composer of songs in the popular Venetian manner. They were greatly admired in his own day and won the praise even of Bembo. The later songs called by Giustiniani's name were of less value. Giustiniani in later life wrote 'laudi spirituali,' and it has been conjectured that some of his own melodies have been preserved in various collections of laudi. The 'villanella' (Venetian villota) is of the same type, and closely allied with it are the 'canti carnascialeschi,' four-part settings of poems in several stanzas. Their words show that they were to be sung by people dressed up in various characters, who in the carnival procession present themselves to the ladies with language that is generally more or less obscene. An amusing example is the 'Canto delle Lancresine' (i.e. le Inglesine, or Dames Anglaises, English nuns whose complaints of the discomforts of foreign travel oddly resemble those of the English spinster in Italy to-day). The 'canti carnascialeschi' generally have the melody in the tenor. The villanelle are more usually in three parts, and one of their characteristics is the frequent use of three or more consecutive triads. This practice was pursued not from ignorance but from a deliberate intention to offend the 'good taste' which cultivated the madrigal, as the words show pretty clearly. The villanelle were not written for the lower classes, but for the same classes as the madrigals were, and among their most spirited composers we find Orlando Lasso and Luca Marenzio. Fifths of exactly the same kind are numerous among the 'laudi spirituali,' as these were popular tunes, supplied, for words, with edifying parodies of the far from edifying originals.

More important is the 'balletto,' belonging chiefly to the second half of the 16th century; its principal exponent is Giovanni Gastoldi. The balletto, which, as its name implies, was a song for dancing, is mainly homophonic, and has a quasi-instrumental refrain to the syllables fa la la. Gastoldi's balletti enjoyed a great popularity outside Italy, and had a considerable influence on the English school of madrigal composers.

FRANCE

In the 16th century it is difficult to draw a clear distinction between the French and Netherlandish composers. A number of Josquin's pupils were connected with the French court in the days of Francis I. and Henri II.; several of them are mentioned by Rabelais and other contemporary men of letters. A collection of chansons by various composers, of whom Claude de Sermisy and Jannequin are the best known, was published by Attaignant in Paris in 1529. This was followed by a number of other collections, in which a definitely French style soon makes its appearance. The general technique is more or less that which we have seen in the works of Josquin and Arcadelt, but the characteristic rhythms of French poetry make themselves clearly felt. The French temperament reveals itself here as in the 17th century; instead of the outspoken passion of the Italians, which was often uncongenial to French taste, we find a more delicate sentimentality and a lighter handling of the frivolous aspects of love. Clement Marot was a favourite poet for musical setting. Jannequin appears to have been the creator of the descriptive style with his 'Bataille de Marignan' and 'Les Cris des oiseaux,' which even to-day sound extraordinarily vivid. Descriptive madrigals of this type were also composed by Nicholas Gombert and Guillaume Costeley. The style was not confined to France; street cries and cuckoo songs are to be found in Germany and England as well; but Jannequin is the most elaborate of the descriptive composers.

The French never pursued the Italian ideals of madrigal-writing as exhibited in Marenzio and Monteverdi. In the second half of the 16th century the French composers came under the literary influences of Ronsard and the Pliade. Ronsard, in spite of his deafness, was devoted to music; one of his first biographers tells us that he held the view 'que sans la Musique la Poësie était presque sans grâce.' Jannequin, Goudimel, Certon and eventually Orlando Lasso set his poems to music. The vers mesurés (quantitative verses) of Jean Antoine de Baif were set by Claude le Jeune, whose collection entitled 'Printemps' is dedicated to King James I. of England, and also by Jacques Mauduit, who lived on into the 17th century and contributed to the new ideals of dramatic music. These settings of Ronsard and Baif are almost entirely homophonic, though composed for four voices. Goudimel makes more use of counterpoint, but the general impression of the musical settings of Ronsard and his friends is frigid and formal.

The French chanson of the 16th century has a further historical importance in view of its connection with the Huguenot Psalter, for Goudimel's settings of the metrical versions of the Psalms made by Marot and Beza are clearly derived from the style of secular songs.

GERMANY

The 'Lochamer Liederbuch' (1460) and other manuscript collections of the same date contain secular polyphonic music by Dufay, Busnois and other Netherlanders, but also an important quantity of similar songs by German composers, who exhibit considerable skill in counterpoint. Most of these songs are folk-songs sung by a tenor and accompanied by instruments. The first German composer of distinction who composed original four-part songs for voices was Heinrich Finck (1445-1527); a collection was printed at Nürnberg in 1536. Like most of the leading German composers of his day he was attached to the court of the Emperor Maximilian, which resided chiefly at Innsbruck, Augsburg, Constance and Vienna. To this group belong Paul Hofhaimer (1459-1537), Heinrich Isaac (1450?-1517), known as Arrigo tedesco, but of Flemish origin, and Ludwig Senfl (1490-1550?), a Swiss. Isaac spent a considerable time at the court of Lorenzo il Magnifico at Florence, and composed French and Italian songs as well as German. His work shows the influence of the 'Canti carnascialeschi' and the frottole. Otto Kade says of these three that Hofhaimer is eminently a harmonist, Isaac a melodist and Senfl a contrapuntist. The German 'Carmina,' as they were generally called, show the influence of German folk-song and German poetry in their style, which is much heavier than that of the Italians—one might almost call it pedestrian. Another characteristic form of German vocal music was the 'Quodlibet,' in which each voice entered with a different folk-tune; these show considerable contrapuntal ingenuity, but the original melodies are of necessity much distorted. Towards the middle of the 16th century the German courts employed a large number of Netherlanders and Italians, to the detriment of the native German composers, who could seldom hope for anything better than municipal appointments. The foreigners seem, however, to have done their best to adapt themselves to German life. Matthäus Le Maistre, a Fleming, and his successor Antonio Scandello from Bergamo, both Kapellmeister at the court of Dresden, even became Protestants and composed Lutheran church music. Both of them wrote secular songs for four or five voices to German words, mostly of a convivial type, in the manner of the villanelle. With these may be associated Orlando Lasso during his residence at Munich; he, too, although a Catholic, set words of Luther himself and wrote characteristically German drinking songs. Regnart, another Netherlander, published three sets of 'kurtzweiligen teutschen Liedern' for three voices in the style of the Neapolitan villanelle, with their typical chains of consecutive fifths. In 1579, the year of Regnart's last collection, Leonhard Lechner, a German, rearranged Regnart's songs for five voices in correct counterpoint. Lechner, who came from Tyrol, was the teacher of Hans Leo Hassler (1564-1612), who is the chief German madrigalist. Hassler spent some fifteen months at Venice, and was the first notable German musician to be educated in Italy. Many of his madrigals are set to Italian words; but the 'Neue deutsche Gesang' of 1596 and the 'Lustgarten' of 1601 have German words written by Hassler himself. Hassler was influenced mainly by the two Gabriellis, from whom he derived his partiality for double chorus in 8 parts, and by Gastoldi; his German madrigals are full of life and feeling, but are mainly homophonic and squarely rhythmical. Like most of the Germans he avoids chromaticism. Johann Staden (1581-1634) is another composer of humorous and popular songs, but his chief work belongs to the style of the 17th century.

As in France, the secular vocal music of Germany is closely related to the Protestant musical movement. Another German product which must be mentioned here was the musical setting of classical Latin poems, chiefly the Odes of Horace. Horace was set to music in Latin by various composers outside Germany: 'Integer vitae' is to be found among the Italian frottole, and Goudimel also set some of the Odes. The earliest German settings are those of Petrus Tritonius of Ingolstadt (1507); there are others by Hofhaimer and Senfl, as well as by many lesser composers. They were written for use in schools, and it was only in Germany that this musical aid to classical education was systematically practised.

ENGLAND

is far in advance of any Continental work of its period, but it is an isolated specimen; nevertheless it may be presumed that in England at any rate other compositions of the same kind were produced in some quantity. Up to the death of Dunstable England took the lead in musical technique; after that the leadership passed to the Netherlanders, and English music is of less importance. A few secular songs for voices by Fayrfax and Cornyshe have been preserved, and the madrigalian period may be said to begin with the collection of secular songs published by Wynkyn de Worde in 1530. Edwards's 'In going to my naked bed,' which is not later than 1564, corresponds in its style to the early madrigals of Arcadelt. There are a few others by Tallis and Tye belonging to this period. The next collection to be printed in England was Thomas Whythorne's 'Songes of three, fower and five voyces' (1571). To judge from the examples quoted by Dr. Fellowes these songs, attractive as they are, are a long way behind the contemporary Italian music in their technique. Dr. Fellowes brings forward evidence to prove that Italian madrigals by Willaert, Verdelot, Lasso, Arcadelt and others, as well as contemporary French chansons, were sung in England as early as 1564. In 1588 Nicholas Yonge published his first volume of 'MUSICA TRANSALPINA,' a collection of Italian madrigals with words translated into English. This seems to have been the stimulus which produced the copious output of madrigals and kindred works by English composers from 1588-1627. But it is evident from Yonge's preface that 'Musica Transalpina' was published later in the year than Byrd's 'Psalmes, Sonets and Songs of Sadnes and Pietie,' also printed in 1588. In the 'Epistle to the Reader' Byrd says,

'If thou delight in Musicke of great compasse, heere are divers songs, which being originally made for Instruments to expresse the harmonie, and one voyce to pronounce the dittie, are now framed in all parts for voyces to sing the same. If thou desire songs of small compasse & fit for the reach of most voyces heere are most in number of that sort.'

On the opposite page is a list of 'these songs which are of the highest compasse.' The collection includes ten Psalms in metrical translations by an unknown author, sixteen 'sonnets and pastorals' of which only two are poems in sonnet-form, and nine 'songs of sadness and piety,' the last two being funeral songs for Sir Philip Sidney. All are for five voices, and it is fairly clear that all of them were originally solo songs with accompaniment for four viols. A large number have one voice marked as 'the first singing part,' which is generally the uppermost voice, sometimes the second and occasionally the third. Even where this direction is not given, the uppermost part can be clearly recognised as 'the first singing part.' It is distinguished from the accompanying parts by various characteristics. It does not enter until after the other voices, which often have a complete series of imitations on the theme; its successive entries are separated by rests while the other voices continue; its words are as a rule set in a strictly syllabic way, and they are never repeated, whereas in the other parts two or three notes may be given to one syllable, and sentences may be broken up and fragments repeated, in order to fill up the musical phrase, since the accompanying voices have many more notes to sing than the 'first singing part.' There are exceptions to these rules, but they are rare.

In view of what has already been said about the treatment of the madrigal in Italy, this collection of Byrd's seems to point to a very highly developed system of accompanied solo singing in England. These Psalms and songs of Byrd are akin to the frottole in that they are poems in square and simple metres with several stanzas sung to the same music; but their contrapuntal elaboration ranks them with the most accomplished of the Netherlandish madrigals. The Psalms, too, are a good deal more elaborate than Goudimel's, which may possibly have served as a model for them. Byrd's songs are akin further to the songs by various composers written for the plays of the Elizabethan choristers, and they exhibit the same rhythmical ingenuities. This appears to be peculiar to the English composers. Byrd's elaborate cross rhythms and alternations of 3/2 and 6/4 bars are hardly to be paralleled in the Italians, who were either more directly passionate or more directly jovial, and wasted no time on ingenious learning. But with Byrd this ingenious learning is far remote from pedantry, for Byrd's chief characteristic is his exuberance of melody; these English songs are conspicuously more tuneful, both in the 'first singing part' and in the others, than any of the chansons or carmina of Continental composers.

In Byrd's next Set (1589) he approximates more to the true madrigal style of Marenzio in some cases. In others we can still trace his habit of building up on a plain and regular tune, even when this is elaborated near the end with imitations and repetitions. Byrd's music, in spite of its wonderful constructive skill and its unfailing beauty of melody, is not expressive in the Italian manner; its inspiration is purely musical and hardly ever literary.

The next publication was Morley's 'Canzonets to three voyces' (1593). Morley is the most popular, the most attractive and perhaps the most characteristically English of all the English madrigalists. He was strongly influenced by Gastoldi and made the Ballet or Fa la as much an English as an Italian form of composition. Morley delighted in cheerful subjects, and his madrigals present many vivid and fascinating pictures of English country life. It is interesting to note that Morley's set of ballets was published by East in two separate editions, both in 1595, one with English words and the other with Italian words which in most cases, if not all, are the original poems of which the English is a translation. Another edition with German words was published at Nürnberg in 1609.

Thomas Weelkes and John Wilbye, unlike Byrd and Morley, were both quite young men in their early twenties when they produced their first Sets of Madrigals, and both of them showed remarkable originality and daring. They adopted the extreme chromatic style of the Italians and rivalled Marenzio and Monteverdi in their power of passionate expression. Like the Italians, they conceived of the body of singers as the instrument of the composer's own thought and feeling; their madrigals are works of art intended for listeners, whereas in the earlier writers it often seems as though they were composed mainly for the pleasure of the singers. Weelkes was not only a master of painful emotion, but also a very picturesque and dramatic writer of descriptive music; in his 'Ayres or Phantastick Spirites' of 1608 he shows himself a witty satirist and his ballets are fully equal to those of Morley.

Of the later madrigalists the most important are Orlando Gibbons, John Ward and Thomas Tomkins. Gibbons confined himself to madrigals of a serious type such as the well-known 'What is our life?' Ward, who seems to have been an amateur, had no great power of expression, but showed sound musicianship and constructive ability, which gives his madrigals a singular dignity. Tomkins, a pupil of Byrd, invented a happy combination of madrigal and ballet, in which he gave evidence of notable rhythmic originality.

Mention must also be made of Thomas Ravenscroft, whose three collections, 'Pammelia' (1609), 'Deuteromelia' (1609), 'Melismata' (1611), and 'A Brief Discourse of the True (but neglected) Use of Charactering the Degrees, by their Perfection, Imperfection and Diminution in Measurable Musick, against the Common Practise and Custome of these Times' (1614), are of great value for the history of popular English music. They contain a number of tavern songs, rounds, catches, etc., many of which, such as 'Three Blind Mice,' are still familiar to all Englishmen however unskilled in music. In England, as in France, there seems to have been no equivalent of the villanelle in the Neapolitan style, though these were well known to Morley.

England was the only country in which the Italian madrigal became completely naturalised; no other country outside Italy produced madrigals either in such quantity or in so high a standard of quality. Continental writers have sometimes suggested that the English school was no more than a mere imitation of that of Italy; but even in those composers, such as Morley, Weelkes and Wilbye, who came most obviously under Italian influence, a definitely English character is always apparent. The English language imposed its own rhythms on them, and English surroundings affected their style, partly by providing them with singers and audiences whose home was the English country-house instead of the Italian palace, and partly by offering them the sights and sounds of English rural life as appropriate subjects for illustration.

SPAIN

The records of early Spanish music are scanty compared with those of the other countries described above; but the 'caccia' was practised in Catalonia (Spanish caga), though chiefly to sacred words. Spain, during the 15th century, kept up a close musical connexion with the Netherlands; Spanish musicians went there to study, and it has recently been proved that Netherlandish and also English musicians went to Spain. Petrucci's 'Harmonice musices octhecaton' (1502) contains four Spanish tunes set in four parts, which seem to be more instrumental than vocal in character. J. B. Trend¹ suggests that the editor of the book, Petrus Castellanus, was a Spaniard. In the earlier part of the 16th century Spain produced a large number of 'villancicos,' which are the Spanish equivalent of the Italian frottole, the chief composer of them being Juan del Encina (1469-1534). Juan Vasquez (1560) and Diego Garzón are also attractive writers of villancicos. A manuscript collection in the Medinaceli library contains a large number of villancicos and madrigals by Spanish composers, along with sacred works of Gombert, Cipriano de Rore and others. Of the Spaniards, the brothers Pedro and Francisco Guerrero, and Rodrigo Cevallos are the most interesting among the early composers, but they seem to have been more at home in sacred music than in secular. Many of the madrigals and villancicos were afterwards adapted to sacred words in the manner of the Italian laudi spirituali. But the Spaniards were by no means without humour; there is in this collection an anonymous madrigal, rather in the style of Orazio Vecchi, describing a friar who mixes gallantry with religion and is ignominiously ridiculed by his two girl penitents. Comic madrigals were also written by Matheo Flecha (1481-1553), whose nephew, also called Matheo Flecha, published a set of Italian madrigals at Venice in 1568. But there seems to have been no great interest in madrigals in Spain, as compared with Italy and England; the only collections printed in Spain were those of Vasquez ('Villancicos y canciones,' Seville, 1551, and 1560), Brudieu ('Madrigales,' Barcelona, 1585) and Pedro Vila ('Madrigales,' Barcelona, 1561). In 1585 Joan Brudieu, a Frenchman by birth, but maestro de capilla at Urgell in the Pyrenees, composed a series of madrigals in Catalan for the reception at Barcelona of Charles Emmanuel, Duke of Savoy, who was on his way to Saragossa to marry Doña Catarina de Austria. (Cf. Corteccia's madrigals with instruments described above.) Victoria wrote no madrigals, and of Morales only two are known. Of the later period the most finished and elaborate madrigals are those of Pedro Ruimonte (Parnaso Español de Madrigales, Antwerp, 1614), which are worthy to stand by those of Marenzio.

MADRIGAL SOCIETY. Founded in 1741 by John IMMYNS (q.v.), this Society enjoys the distinction of being the oldest musical association in London.

Its first meetings were held at the Twelve Bells in Bride Lane, whence it removed to the Anchor and Crown, Whitefriars, as proved by the earliest minute-book in the Society's library, dated 1744. In 1745 the Society removed to the Founders' Arms, Lothbury, where rules were adopted limiting the number of members to sixteen, with an admission fee of 8s. and a subscription of 3s. per quarter. Having returned for a time to the Twelve Bells, its original home, the Society afterwards migrated to the Queen's Arms, Newgate Street, in 1748, when the rules were revised. One rule enacted 'That all musical performances shall cease at half an hour after ten o'clock, unless some of the members shall be cheerfully incited to sing catches, in which case they shall be indulged half an hour, and no longer.' Numerous fines were imposed for such offences as the retention of books from the Society's library; and any member eating his supper, or a part thereof, during practice time was to forfeit sixpence, to be applied to buying ruled paper. The performance on each night was to be divided into two 'acts,' with an interval of half an hour, and in each act four madrigals were to be sung.

Between 1750 and 1757 additional rules were adopted, by one of which each member, to whose turn it came to serve as President, was bound to present a score and parts of a madrigal ready for performance, or 'to forfeit a penny extraordinary to the plate' every night until he did so. By another rule any gentleman who had been educated in, or at the time belonged to, any cathedral or choir was to be admitted to visit the Society at his pleasure; and a similar privilege was accorded to any of 'the gentlemen of the Academy of Ancient Music.' Membership was confined to persons belonging to cathedral choirs, or those 'vouched for by two or more members of the Society as being capable of singing their part in concert both in time and in tune'; and others proposed for election were required, by way of probation, to sing between the acts their proper parts in an ancient madrigal for three or four voices, or some two-part song to be sung with double voices.

The Society at this time (1749-50) met every Wednesday evening, and consisted of twenty-one members, who subscribed 4s. 6d. a quarter. According to Sir John Hawkins (who was himself a member),

'most of them were mechanics, some weavers from Spitalfields, others of various trades and occupations, who were well versed in the practice of Psalmody and who, with a little pains and the help of the ordinary solmisation, which many of them were very expert in, became soon able to sing almost at sight a part in an English or even an Italian madrigal.'

At times they took country excursions, and the minutes record that on Whit-Monday, 1751, 'the party proceeded up the river, breakfasting at Wandsworth [Wandsworth], dining at Richmond, besides stopping to whet their whistles at Mortlake [Mortlake].' In 1768 the subscription was raised to 8s. a quarter, the number of members being about thirty, and it was agreed to hold an entertainment for their friends once at least every year. In 1769 the Society removed to the Feathers Tavern, Cheapside; in 1775 to the King's Arms, Cornhill; in 1778 they were at the Half Moon, Cheapside, and the London Tavern; in Apr. 1792, at the King's Head in the Poultry; in May 1792, at the Globe, Fleet Street; and in 1795 removed to the Crown and Anchor, when the charge for supper, 'on account of the advance in wine,' was raised to 2s. 6d. for members, 4s. for visitors, and 3s. for professors. Festival dinners were held in 1798, 1802, 1803 and 1809, and were continued at intervals, and in 1876 ladies dined at the festival for the first time. In 1814 the subscription was raised to £3, and in 1816 the charge for supper, including a pint of wine, was fixed at 6s. On Sept. 27, 1821, the supper meeting, after being held for eighty years, gave place to a monthly dinner, held, successively, at the Freemasons' Tavern, Willis's Rooms, and the Holborn Restaurant during the season, which then lasted from Oct. to July, but now numbers six meetings, beginning in Nov. Since 1919 the meetings have been held at Carpenter's Hall.

In 1811 was offered for the first time a prize of a silver cup, value ten guineas, 'for the best madrigal in not less than four nor more than six parts, the upper part or parts to be for one or two treble voices. The character of the composition to be after the manner of the madrigals by Bennei, Wilbye, Morley, Weekes, Ward, Marenzio, and others, and each part to contain a certain melody either in figure or imitation; therefore, a melody harmonised will be inadmissible.'

The prize was given to W. Beale's 'Awake, sweet muse.' The earlier members of the Society included:

Immys, Dr. John Worgan, Sir John Hawkins, Rev. C. Torriano, Jonathan Battishill, E. T. Warren, Dr. Arne and his son Michael, Luffman Atterbury, Theodore Aylward, Joah Bates, Dr. B. Cooke, James Bartleman, J. P. Street, librarian of the Society, R. J. S. Stevens, W. Horsley, Spofforth, Robert Cooke, W. Beale, Dr. Callcott, W. Hawes, W. Linley, G. E. Williams, Sir J. L. Rogers, T. Greatorex, J. T. Cooper, Jonathan Nield, Rev. W. J. Hall, P. J. Salomons, Vincent Novello, Thomas Oliphant, J. W. Hobbs, J. Calkin, G. Cooper, James Turle.

Up to 1820 the members presided in rotation, but in that year it was resolved to appoint Sir J. L. Rogers as permanent president. The office has since been filled by various well-known music-lovers and professional musicians, including,

Lord Saltoun, Lord Alverstone, Lord Howard de Walden, Sir E. E. Cooper, Otto Goldschmidt, Sullivan, Sir G. Martin, and Sir F. Bridge.

The conductors or musical directors permanently appointed since W. Hawes, 1809-46, have been: James Turle, 1846-49; James King, 1849-54; Cipriani Potter, 1855-70; Otto Goldschmidt, 1871-77; Sir John Stainer, 1878-87; Sir J. F. Bridge, 1887-1924; and Stanley Roper to the present time. Under the present rules the Society consists of forty members, elected by ballot, the subscription (including dinner fees) being five guineas. From 1881 two prizes, T. Molineux's of £10 and the Society's of £5 were awarded annually until 1889, and triennially from 1891. The office of hon. secretary, held from July 1871 by J. Edward Street, afterwards by his son, Oscar W. Street, is now filled by Stanley Edgar.

MAELZEL, JOHANN NEPOMUK (b. Ratisbon, Aug. 15, 1772; d. July 21, 1838), son of an organ-builder, was an inventor, whose fame is preserved by the METRONOME (q.v.) called by his name.

In 1792 he settled in Vienna, and devoted himself to teaching music, and to constructing an automaton instrument of flutes, trumpets, drums, cymbals, triangle, and strings struck by hammers, which played music by Haydn, Mozart and Crescentini, and was sold for 3000 florins. His next machine was the Panharmonicon; like the former, but with clarinets, violins and violoncellos added. It was worked by weights acting on cylinders, and was exhibited in Vienna in 1804. Maelzel then bought Kempelen's Chessplayer; and took it with the Panharmonicon to Paris. The Chessplayer he afterwards sold to Eugène Beauharnais. He next constructed a Trumpeter, which played the Austrian and French cavalry marches and signals, with marches and allegros by Weigl, Dussek and Pleyel. In 1808 he was appointed court mechanician, and about that time made some ear trumpets, one of which Beethoven used for years. In 1812 he opened the 'Art Cabinet,' among the attractions of which were the Trumpeter and a new and enlarged Panharmonicon; and soon afterwards made public a musical chronometer, an improvement of a machine by Stöckel, for which he obtained certificates from Beethoven and other leading musicians.

Maelzel and Beethoven were at this time on very friendly terms. They had arranged to visit London together, and Maelzel had meantime aided the great master in his impecuniosity by urging on him a loan of 50 ducats in gold. In order to add to the attractions of the Panharmonicon, which they proposed to take with them, Maelzel conceived and sketched in detail the design¹ of a piece to commemorate the battle of Vittoria (June 21, 1813), which Beethoven composed for the instrument. While it was being arranged on the barrel, Maelzel further induced him to score it for the orchestra, with the view to obtain funds for the journey; and it was accordingly scored, and performed at a concert on Dec. 8, 1813, the programme of which consisted of the Symphony No. 7, the marches of Dussek and Pleyel, by the automaton, and the Battle-piece. The concert was repeated on the 12th, and the two yielded a net profit of over 4000 florins. At this point Beethoven took offence at Maelzel's having announced the Battle-piece as his property, broke completely with him, rejected the Trumpeter and his marches, and held a third concert (Jan. 2, 1814) for his own sole benefit. After several weeks of endeavour to arrange matters, Maelzel departed to Munich with his Panharmonicon, including the Battle-piece, and also with a full orchestral score of the same, which he had obtained without Beethoven's concurrence and caused to be performed at Munich. Beethoven on this entered an action against him in the Vienna courts, and it is his memorandum of the grounds of the action, as prepared for his advocate, which is usually entitled his 'deposition.'² He further addressed a statement³ to the musicians of London, entreating them not to countenance or support Maelzel.

The action came to nothing, and Maelzel does not appear to have gone to London. He stopped at Amsterdam, and there got from Winkel, a Dutch mechanic, the idea of employing a new form of pendulum as a METRONOME (q.v.). He soon perfected the instrument, obtained a patent for it, and in 1816 we find him in Paris established as a manufacturer of this metronome, under the style of 'Mälzl et Cie.' A wish to repurchase Kmpelen's Chessplayer and to push his Metronome took him back to Munich and Vienna in 1817. Beethoven's good word was of more consequence than any one else's, and knowing Maelzel's cleverness, Beethoven's amenability to a good companion, and the fact that the performance on which the lawsuit was grounded having taken place out of Austria, the action could not lie, it need not surprise us to find that the suit was given up, and the costs divided equally. After this Maelzel travelled much, and even reached the United States, where he passed the rest of his life, except a voyage or two to the West Indies, exhibiting the Chessplayer, the Conflagration of Moscow and his other curious inventions.¹ He was found dead in his berth on board the American brig Otis. Maelzel was evidently a sharp, shrewd, clever man of business, with a strong propensity to use the ideas of others for his own benefit.

His Metronome was entirely different from the Stückel-Mälzel 'Chronometer,' and it was upon the latter and not upon the Metronome that Beethoven wrote the catch which is connected with the Allegretto of his Symphony No. 8.

MÄNNERGESANGVEREIN (Ger.), an association of men formed for the cultivation of singing in parts—tenors and basses. They sprang from the Liedertafeln; famous examples are those founded by Dr. A. Schmid in Vienna (1845), and by Franz Weber in Cologne. They now flourish and are an important part of the popular musical life in all German-speaking countries. (See LIEDERTAFEL.)

MÄNNERGESANGVEREIN ARION, see NEW YORK.

MÄSSIG=suitable. Applied to tempo it is the German equivalent of Moderato, used much by Schumann, as in the sixth of the fugues on the name Bach. 'Im mässigen Tempo' occurs in the fourth figure of his op. 72, 'Sehr mässig' in the Lager-scene, No. 3 of op. 76. His 'Mässig durchaus energisch,' in the second movement of the Fantasia in C, op. 17, is translated 'Moderato con energia.'

M.

MAESTOSO='with majesty,' or in a dignified way. It is used either alone, as a direction of time, in which case it indicates a pace rather slower than andante, or, combined with other indications of tempo, as a guide to the expression. Beethoven uses it frequently in both these ways.

M.

MAESTRO=master. Maestro di cappella is the exact Italian equivalent to the German term Kapellmeister, or conductor.

Maestro dei putti (master of the boys) is an office which was founded in 1538 (not, as is generally supposed, in the Papacy of Julius II., which was much earlier), and which was first held by Arcadelt. Its duties are to teach singing to the boys of St. Peter's, in Rome, and more or less to superintend the choir arrangements. It thus represents our 'Choirmaster.' (See ARCADELT.)

Maestro al cembalo was an officer at the Opera, next in importance to the conductor, and occasionally taking his place. His duties consisted of superintending the rehearsals of the music, and accompanying at them. This post was held by Handel at Hamburg, when he was quite young (see HANDEL), and afterwards by Mattheson.

MAGADA, or MAGAS (Greek), the semicircular wooden bridge fixed at one or both ends of the monochord. The name was also applied to the movable bridge inserted below the string of the monochord to mark the harmonic intervals (Boethius, iv. 18), and generally to the bridge in stringed instruments (Philostatus, 778). (See MONOCHORD.)

MAGADIS, an ancient Greek instrument, our knowledge of which is almost wholly derived from a passage in the fourteenth book of Athenaeus, in which the scattered references to it in Greek literature are brought together. Athenaeus died in A.D. 194. The instrument had then long been obsolete, and the doubts which existed as to its exact form and structure are no nearer solution at the present day. From the conflicting statements of the authorities quoted, some of whom identify it with the pectis, others with the sambuca and others again with the psaltery, it would seem that the magadis was an instrument of the dulcimer type, provided with a bridge (magas) or bridges so placed that octaves could be played on adjoining strings. It was introduced from the East through the Lydians, and was in use in Greece as early as the 6th century B.C., when Anacreon speaks of playing on a magadis of twenty strings. According to Aristoxenus it was played without a plectrum. The characteristic of the instrument was the production of sounds in octaves, and consequently we find the name also applied to a species of double flute, also said to be of Lydian origin, on which octaves could be played, and a verb magadizein signifying to play in octaves on any instrument (Pseudo-Aristotle, 18).

MAGALHÃES, FILIPPE DE (b. Azeitão, Lisbon, end of 16th cent.), Portuguese composer. After working with Manuel MENDES at Évora, he became choirmaster at the Misericórdia at Lisbon, and in 1614 master of the Chapel Royal, Lisbon, under the Spanish King Philip III. His printed works include 'Missarum Liber,' Lisbon, Craesbeck, 1631 (Evora Cathedral); 'Cantica B.V.,' Lisbon, Craesbeck, 1636. 'Cantus ecclesiasticus,' Lisbon, 1641, 1642; Antwerp, 1691 (B.M.).

MAGGIELLO (MAGIELLO), DOMINICO, of Valeggio, near Verona (second half of 16th cent.), composed 2 books of madrigals a 5 v. (Venice 1567 and 1568).

MAGGINI, GIO. PAOLO (b. Brescia, 1581; d. there, c. 1628), a celebrated Italian violin-maker. According to information culled from the Brescian State Archives, Maggini's family came originally from Botticino, a village in the neighbouring hills of Brescia. His grandfather, Bartolommeo de Maggini, lived and died at Botticino, but after his death his son Zovan or Giovanni, migrated with his wife Giulia, to Brescia, where Paolo, their second son, was born. The Brescian Income Tax papers for 1568 state that Gio. Paolo's elder brother was a shoemaker, but no mention is made of his father following any profession or trade. In all probability he was a retired farmer with private means.

Nothing is known of Gio. Paolo's childhood, or what caused him to adopt the profession of violin-making, but a legal document, signed by him in 1602, proves two things clearly: first, that his signature is that of a person of scanty education, and, secondly, that at the age of 21 he was working in Brescia as an apprentice under Gasparo da Salò. On Jan. 20, 1615, he married Maddalena Anna, daughter of Messer Faust Forrestio, and after his marriage he and his wife settled in a house in the Contrada del Palazzo Vecchio del Podesta. In this home, with the assistance of his apprentice, Jacopo de Lanfranchini, Maggini built up a very successful business in the manufacture of citharas, violoncellos, violas and violins. In 1626 he prospered still more, and acquired a second house and shop in the Contrada delle Bombasaire, whither he removed with his wife and family. He also purchased property in the hills and plains surrounding Brescia, and a residential farm-house and land, which abutted upon the grandfather's old home near the village of Botticino. The date of his death is conjectural. After 1626 the Brescian Income Tax papers cease to mention his name, and in 1632 he was undoubtedly dead, as, in a schedule presented in that year by his son Carlo, he uses the formula 'Filius quondam Johannis Pauli.' Although documentary evidence proves that Maggini's wife died on Nov. 24, 1651, and was buried in the church of St. Agatha, all research for the certificate of her husband's death and burial has been in vain. It is possible that as the town of Brescia was ravaged by an excessively severe plague in 1632, Maggini was one of its victims, and being taken to one of the 'pest-houses' which were organised for the sick, at the public expense, died away from home, without any note of his death or burial being made.

As a maker, Maggini's name is associated with many progressive innovations in the construction of the violin, and especially in the method of cutting the wood. In his earliest work these alterations are not discernible, as he was still under the influence of Gasparo da Salò, whose inaccuracy of modelling, rough workmanship, and dark brown varnish he at first copied. But when he once cast aside the methods of his veteran master, and of the old school of violin-makers, Maggini created an era in the history of violin-making, which has deservedly immortalised his name. He was among the first makers who discarded the then customary method of cutting the soft pine-wood used for the bellies of violins in what is termed 'slab fashion,' i.e. parallel with the upward growth of the tree, and instead, adopted the practice of using the wood the straight way of the grain, brought about by cutting it wedge-ways out of the tree from the bark inwards to the core. He was almost, if not quite the earliest maker to use corner blocks and linings such as are now employed, and he modulated his thicknesses with far more intention and accuracy than any of his predecessors. Maggini's purfling is beautifully executed. His instruments are mostly ornamentally or double purfled, but there are some violins of his bearing the single line. Three of these, and one viola are known to exist. Many of his violins bear a purfled or painted conventional design upon the back, but as his violin model advanced in originality, so he gradually discarded the customary ornamentations so dear to the violin-makers, probably having discovered that this practice only served to muffle the tone of his instruments. His violins are large in size, and are made of the best materials. The model is quite original, and bears no resemblance to the Amati pattern; the varnish of his best instruments is orange-yellow, the ff holes are clearly cut, the lower circles, in contradistinction to those of Stradivarius, being always smaller than the upper ones, a feature peculiar to Maggini. The scroll is well cut, but shorter than that of other makers, and for this reason appears to be wider than it really is. The labels are placed close to the centre of his instruments: they are in black Roman type, and, like those of his master da Salò, are undated.

Maggini was not a prolific maker, the result of his life's work, as represented by extant instruments, numbering about fifty violins and under two dozen tenors and violoncellos. For this reason authentic specimens of his work are scarce. Some of his finest fiddles have been in the hands of Ole Bull, Léonard, Vieuxtemps and de Bériot; the last-named possessed two fine examples, one of which he picked up in an old curiosity shop in Paris for 15 francs. An excellent summary of Maggini's contributions to the development of violins, violas and violoncellos is given in Lady Huggins's Gio. Paolo Maggini, published by the firm of Hill & Sons.

No authentic pupils of Maggini have come to light. None of his seven children followed their father's profession; his only surviving son, Carlo Francesco, became a silk merchant, but the Maggini influence can be clearly traced both in the Guarnerius and the 'Long Strad' models. In modern times few makers have been more copied, both honestly and dishonestly. Fine copies were made by Bernard Simon Fendt and Remy (two French makers who settled in London); by Darches, and N. F. Vuillaume in Belgium; by Gand (père), Bernadel, Chanot and Vuillaume in Paris, and at Mirecourt, where it is one of the favourite models.

MAGIC FLUTE, see ZAUBERFLÖTE.

MAGNARD, LUCIEN DENIS GABRIEL ALBÉRIC (b. Paris, June 9, 1865; killed at Baron, Oise, Sept. 3, 1914), French composer, was the son of Francis Magnard, who was editor of Le Figaro from 1879-94.

He studied the piano in his youth, and in 1886 matriculated at the Paris Conservatoire, where his first masters were Dubois (harmony) and Massenet (composition). He left this institution in 1888 and became a pupil of Vincent d'Indy. He was at that period strongly under the influence of Wagner's music. In 1889-90 he wrote his first symphony, and in 1891 completed his first dramatic score, 'Yolande.' This first symphony was performed in 1893 at Angers (no other performance was ever given), and 'Yolande' in 1893 at Brussels. The 'Chant funèbre,' written under the influence of his father's death, was completed in 1895, at a time when he was already planning his lyric drama 'Guercœur,' which was finished in 1901. In 1902 Ysaye and Pugno gave the first performance of his violin sonata. At that time Magnard, who was saturnine and distrustful by nature, had already developed a tendency to receive advances with suspicion, and an intense dislike for anything resembling self-advertisement. He became his own publisher, and thereby sacrificed all the aids to diffusion which a competent business organisation may provide. The public, on the other hand, did not prove responsive to his music (except at Nancy, where his friend and colleague, Guy Ropartz, made all his chief works known). The few, often inadequate, performances of his works that took place in Paris (e.g. string quartet, 1904; third symphony, 1906; concert performance of one act of 'Guercœur,' 1910; 'Bérénice' at the Opéra-Comique, 1911) did not create a profound impression except among a very small circle. But if his admirers were few, they were enthusiastic; and they never ceased to support his music staunchly. This was the one bright spot in the tragedy of his artistic career. At the outset of the war, when the Germans reached Baron, where he lived, he fired on them from his window; he was killed, and his house burned down. The fire destroyed the only existing copies of his 'Yolande,' of his songs op. 3, of the score two acts of 'Guercœur,' and of a newly completed set of twelve songs.

Magnard's music is austere in character. He did not believe in the possibility of poetic expression in music. Deeply interested in musical architecture, he devoted his utmost attention to form, and aimed at achieving new forms without infringing traditional principles. For colour and ornamentation he cared very little. His harmonic schemes and his scoring are plain and unadorned. Gaston Carraud¹ defines the main idiosyncrasies of his music thus:

'His tendency was to intensify the dramatic element in his instrumental music, and to introduce into dramatic music the logic and restraint of pure symphonic music. He expected from the co-operation of symphony and drama that symphony should govern the flow of dramatic matter, endow that matter with an order, a logic, a rhythm similar to its own. For him, symphony and drama are two parallel things, which, in the course of their evolution, may be brought closer to one another, but never intermingling. Symphonic music will acquire a greater wealth of dramatic significance without ceasing to be self-supporting; and the texture of dramatic music will be improved by the operation of principles which are those of pure music.'

His later works illustrate his progress in that twofold respect: the lyric drama 'Bérénice' is an instance of pure, severe classicism; whereas in the violoncello sonata and the fourth symphony the dramatic character is more intense than ever.

From the interpenetration of drama and music, Magnard expected the long-desired form which would satisfy both senses and mind, æsthetic conceptions and spontaneous emotions. His works are so many steps towards that gradual concourse of two modes of expressing the same inner activity.'

Magnard's works remain untried and practically unknown outside France. Even in France there has been no adjustment so far between the high praise of his admirers and the unqualified detractions of a limited number of writers. But what may be confidently asserted is that his music is worthy of earnest attention. It has, nevertheless become popular, but it has power and depth, and is remarkable for its impassioned earnestness, stern resolution, gravity, and concentration.

MAGNIFICAT. The 'Song of the Blessed Virgin Mary' has been used as the Vesper canticle of the Western Church from time immemorial; and the evening office has always been so constructed as to lead up to it as its chief point of interest.

In plain-song services it is sung to the same tones as the psalms, but to a different form, with more elaborate intonations and mediations (see PSALMODY).

After the invention of descant a custom arose of singing Magnificat in alternate verses of plain-song and FAUX BOURDON (q.v.). Sometimes the Faux Bourdon was simply a harmonised psalm-tune, with the melody in the tenor, as in the following example of a very beautiful 'Use' which has long been traditional in French cathedrals.

Magnificat, Primi Toni.

Sometimes the plain-song was contrasted with an original Faux Bourdon, written in the required mode, but not, like the former example, on the actual melody of the psalm-tone. Dr. Burney, during his visit to Rome, met with an exceedingly interesting MS. collection of Faux Bourdons of this description, by some of the greatest masters of the 16th century. From his autograph transcription of this volume—now preserved under the name of Studi di Palestrina, in the British Museum—we extract the following beautiful example by Giovanni Maria Nanini.¹

¹ It will be seen that Nanini has ended his chant with the harmony of the dominant, instead of that proper to the final of

Ton. IV.

But the development of the idea did not rest here. It is scarcely possible to name any great church composer who has not illustrated the text of the canticle with original music over and over again.

MAGPIE MADRIGAL SOCIETY, THE. In 1885 and 1886 Alfred Scott Gatty collected a small choir to sing choruses and glees at the concerts given by Helen Countess of Radnor for charitable purposes. These practices proved so popular that in November 1886 a society was founded under the name of 'The Magpie Minstrels,' its object being, to quote the Society's minutes—'to give Concerts for charitable purposes, the nature of which shall be left to the discretion and selection of the Committee.'

Lionel Benson was the conductor, and the numbers which in the first instance were limited to 80, rose by rapid degrees to nearly 200. In 1889 H.R.H. Princess Louise, Duchess of Argyll, became President of the Society. In 1889 the first Invitation Concert was given, and later one Charity Concert and one Invitation Concert were given annually. Over £1500 has been handed over to various Charitable Institutions. At first 'The Magpies' were associated at their concerts with 'The Wandering Minstrels' Amateur Orchestral Society,' also conducted by Lionel Benson. The name of the society was altered from 'The Magpie Minstrels' to 'The Magpie Madrigal Society' in 1896. In order to encourage good vocal part-writing 'a cappella' the society, from time to time, gave prizes for competition among the students of the R.C.M. and R.A.M., the prize works being performed at the Invitation Concerts. Many of the best known madrigals have been included in the programmes, but a special feature was the performance of many fine works the mode. A similar peculiarity is observable in many other Faux Bourdons adapted by the old masters to alternate verses of canticles and psalms. The reason of this is self-evident. One or other of the subsidiary cadences of the mode is employed, in order that its true final cadence may be reserved for the conclusion of the antiphon which is to follow. The Bistine Miserere may be cited as the exception which proves the rule. It ends with the proper final cadence, because, in the office of Tenebrae, it is always sung without an antiphon (see ANTIPHON).

of all schools of the 16th and 17th centuries. Most of them were unearthed and edited by the conductor. Nearly all the unaccompanied choral works of Brahms were performed by the society at one time or another; and some of the unaccompanied choral works of Peter Cornelius were introduced to the English public for the first time.

Many compositions were specially written for the society by Parry (who was elected President of the Society in 1906), Stanford, C. H. Lloyd, Alan Gray, Henschel, R. Vaughan-Williams, Eaton Fanning, Maude V. White, Arthur Somervell and J. Blumenthal. The society came to an end in 1911. MAGYAR ' (Hungarian) MUSIC. 'The so-called Hungarian style of music,' says the writer of two excellent articles on this subject in the Monthly Musical Record for Feb. and Mar. 1877,

'as it has come to be recognised, cannot by any means be regarded as indigenous, but may most properly be briefly defined as the product of a commixture of several races. More than one-fourth of the population of Hungary proper (i.e. Transilvanian Hungary, as it has come to be called since its union with the Austrian empire in 1869) consists of Magyars, the descendants of the ancient Scythians of the Tartar-Mongolian stock, who, after wandering from the Ural mountains to the Caspian Sea, and thence to Kiev, established themselves in Hungary in the 9th century. The remainder of the population is made up of Slavs, Germans, Wallachians, Jews and Gipsies. Of this mixed population, the Magyars, as the dominant lords of the soil, and the Gipsies, as the privileged musicians of the country, are in the main to be regarded as the joint originators of the national style.'

The union of these two latter races resulted in the combination of their musical characteristics. That of the Magyar music is the peculiarity of its rhythms, and that of the Gipsy music is the presence of turns, embellishments, and 'grace-notes' added to and built upon the melody, and eventually becoming a most important feature in it.²

This latter peculiarity, together with the scale which is characteristic of the music of Hungary in common with many other nations of Eastern Europe—a scale with two superfluous seconds, or the harmonic minor with a sharp fourth—seem to indicate an Asiatic origin. (The ordinary European scales are also in use.) These two chief characteristics will be examined in order.

(1) The rhythms, of Magyar origin.—The great distinctive feature of the bar-rhythms is syncopation, generally consisting of the accentuation of the second quaver in the bar of 2-4

time (the rhythm known as alla zoppa, 'in a limping way'), but sometimes extending over larger spaces, as in No. 2 of the 'Ungarische Tänze' of Brahms, bars 1-2, 5-6, etc., where the syncopation extends over two bars. Even where the melody is without syncopation, the accompaniment almost always has it. The phrase-rhythms are not confined to strains of 4 and 8 bars, but phrases of 3, 5, 6, 7, and 8 bars are not unfrequently to be met with. As examples of 3- and 6-bar rhythms may be cited the third and first of Brahms's 'Ungarische Tänze,' and of 7-bar rhythm, the first part of the following melody:

3-4 time, and consequently 6-8, is almost unknown in genuine Magyar music, although some modern Hungarian composers have introduced it in slow movements. The following very fine 'Hallgató' is referred to triple time by the best authorities; it is a 'Lassú' or slow movement, but is not intended for the dance—

In the 'Lassú' the actual value of the notes depends far more upon the accentuation of the words sung, than is the case in the quicker movements. A very beautiful rhythm of seven in a bar (written, for greater clearness, as a bar of 3-4 followed by a bar of common time) occurs in the 'Hungarian Song' on which Brahms has written variations, op. 21, No. 2.

(2) The turns and embellishments added to the melody, of Gipsy, and hence Oriental, origin.—This peculiarity has been observed by travellers in India, who say that in the performance of the natives any embellishments and 'floriture' are permitted to be introduced at the will of the performer, provided only that the time of the melody remains intact. The following is a list of the most characteristic turns and 'grace-notes' used in this music:

and the double cadence

to which may be added

But the importance of 'Hungarian' music lies not so much in its intrinsic beauty or interest, as in the use made of it by the classical masters, and the influence which it exercises on their works. The first composer of note who embodies its peculiarities is Haydn. The most obvious instance of course is the well-known 'Rondo all' Ongarese,' or 'Gipsy Rondo,' in the Trio No. 1 in G major; but there are many passages in his works which show that the years during which he held the post of conductor of Prince Esterhazy's private (and almost entirely Hungarian) band, were not without their effect. Instances of this may be found in many of the 'Salomon symphonies' (the symphony in B \flat , No. 9), etc. (see further, A Croatian Composer, by W. H. Hadow, 1897). The composer who has made the greatest use of 'Hungarian' characteristics is Schubert. Constantly throughout his works we come upon a peculiarity which at once tells us of its nationality. The C major symphony (No. 9) for instance, the A minor string quartet, and the fantasia in C major, op. 15, are full of 'Hungarian' feeling and character, while almost all the peculiarities of the style are present in the splendid 'Divertissement à la hongroise' (op. 54).

It is enough to cite the names of Liszt, Brahms and Joachim, to bring to the mind of every reader the use made by each of them of 'Hungarian' forms and themes. We may think it only natural that the first and the last of these should, being natives of Hungary, have a natural love for their national music, as we see in the 'Legend of St. Elizabeth,' the symphonic poem 'Hungaria,' the fourteen 'Rhapsodies hongroises,' by Liszt, and the noble Hungarian violin concerto of Joachim. In the case of Brahms, however, there is no national prejudice to which the partiality for the Hungarian element might be ascribed, and yet here we meet with many Magyar characteristics, not only in the 'Ungarische Tänze,' which are nothing more than transcriptions for the piano of the wild performance of the Hungarian bands (according to the best authorities on this subject), but also in the sextets for strings, the G minor quartet for pianoforte and strings, the pianoforte variations, etc.

The following are some of the most important Magyar forms of composition:

DANCES.—The Csárdás (the name derived from Csárda, an inn on the Puszta (plain), where this dance was first performed). It was introduced into Hungary from Bohemia by Csermák, and was very quickly adopted as a national dance. Every Csárdás consists of two movements,—a 'Lassú,' or slow movement, andante maestoso and a 'Fries,' or 'quickstep,' allegro vivace. These two alternate at the will of the dancers, a sign being given to the musicians when a change is wished.

The 'Kör-táncz,' or Society-Dance, of which a part consists of a Toborzó, or Recruiting dance. A great number of these were arranged or composed by Lavotta.

The 'Kanász-táncz,' or Swincherd's Dance, is danced by the lower classes only.

OPERAS.—Among national Magyar operas—i.e. operas of which the libretti are founded on national historic events, and the music is characterised by Magyar rhythms, etc.—may be mentioned 'Hunyady László,' 'Báthori Maria,' 'Bánk Bán,' and 'Brankovics,' by Franz Erkel, and the comic opera 'Ilka,' by Doppler. Besides these two composers, the names of Mocsonyi, Császár, Fay and Bartha, may be given as examples of operatic writers.

SONGS.—Many collections of Népdal, or popular songs, have been published. The best collection is that of Gyula Káldy, containing songs of the first part of the 19th century; the seven volumes of Bartalus, and the collection made in the middle of the 18th century by Adám Horváth, are of value. Panna Czinka's collection of gipsy melodies may also be mentioned. One tune, 'Repülj Fecsském,' has been made widely known by Remenyi's adaptation of it for the violin.

The famous national tune, the 'Rákoczy March,' was, in its original form, a lament for the hero Rákoczy, played on the tárogató—an instrument resembling a cor anglais—about the end of the 18th century. It was arranged as a march early in the 19th century by Schöll, the conductor of a military band at Nagyvárád, and was heard in this form by Berlioz, who introduced it into his 'Damnation de Faust,' with the result that it made a furore all over Europe.

Many of the best of the national songs of Hungary have become widely popular in England since the publication of F. Korbay's admirable arrangement of them with English words.

That the Magyars know how to value their own national music may be shown by the establishment at Budapest of a National Conservatorium, and of the Royal Academy of Music, of which Liszt was the first Director; there are two national theatres, one for opera and the other for drama, besides the 'Népszínház,' or People's Theatre. The interest in folk-song has borne excellent fruit in Hungary, where phonographic records have been made of many thousands of traditional tunes, and preserved in the National Museum at Budapest.

The chief musical periodical of Hungary is the Zenevilág, edited and carried on by Pongrácz Kacsóh. (Information from Arthur Diósy, Béla Bartók, etc.) M.

MAHILLON, a Belgian family rendered famous by (1) CHARLES MAHILLON (b. 1813; d. 1887), who founded in Brussels (1836) the firm of wind instrument-makers called by his name. Three of his sons entered the business.

Of them, (2) VICTOR (b. Brussels, Mar. 10, 1841; d. St. Jean, Cap-Ferrat, June 17, 1924) is of outstanding importance as a writer on acoustics and musical instruments, and the honorary and zealous custodian of the museum of the Brussels Conservatoire.

After studying music under some of the best professors there, he applied himself to the practical study of wind-instrument manufacture, and was taken into his father's business in 1865. He started a musical journal, L'Écho musical, in 1869, and continued it until 1886, when his time became too much occupied to attend to its direction. In 1876 he became the honorary curator of the museum of the Conservatoire, which, begun with Fétis's collection of 78 instruments, was, through his special knowledge and untiring energy, increased (1888) to upwards of 1500! An important contribution to it, of Indian instruments, has been a division of the fine collection of the Rajah Sir Sourindro Mohun Tagore between the Brussels Conservatoire and the R.C.M., London. Victor Mahillon published two very important works, besides three synoptical tables of harmony, voices and instruments. The first is Les Éléments d'acoustique musicale et instrumentale, an octavo volume published in 1874, which gained for him at Paris in 1878 the distinction of a silver medal. The other is the catalogue of the Conservatoire, which appeared in volumes annually from 1877, and is of the highest interest. As well as these noteworthy works he contributed to the ninth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica several historical and technical articles of great value upon wind instruments, both wood and brass. As soon as Mahillon could introduce a workshop into the Conservatoire he did so, and he had reproductions made of many rare instruments which, through their antiquity or the neglect of former owners, had become too much deteriorated for purposes of study. Among these reproductions the Roman LIRIUS and BUCCINA in the Music Loan Collection at Kensington, in 1885, will be remembered as prominent objects of interest in the fine selection contributed under Mahillon's auspices by the Brussels Conservatoire. He has reproduced from authentic sources the complete families of wind instruments that were in use in the 16th and 17th centuries.

Victor Mahillon's services to the Inventions Exhibition of 1885, in the above-named contribution of instruments to the Loan Collection, and the historical concerts under his direction performed by professors and students of the Brussels Conservatoire, at which several rare instruments were actually played upon in contemporary compositions, were so highly appreciated by the Executive Council of that Exhibition that a gold medal was awarded to him.

MAHLER, GUSTAV (b. Kalischt, July 7, 1860; d. Vienna, May 18, 1911), symphonic composer and conductor. As a composer he took the symphonic form and, with a seldom restrained impetuosity, enlarged and inflated it until it had lost all the features of balance and form which are generally taken to be its characteristics, and became something which though still structurally sound and self-sufficient yet differed in feeling and idea from the classical model. As a conductor and as a producer of opera he always worked at high tension and with a meticulous attention to detail which did much to raise the standard of performance both on the concert platform and the operatic stage.

Mahler was born at Kalischt in Czechoslovakia (at that time Bohemia), of Jewish parents, the second of a family of twelve. From 1869–75 he went to the grammar-school at Iglau, the neighbouring large town. From there he was sent to Vienna, where he studied in the Conservatoire until 1878, in which year he met Anton Bruckner, an occurrence which made a great impression on the younger man. Hugo Wolf had entered the Conservatoire in the same year as Mahler, but was not able for long to submit to its discipline. Mahler, however, prospered under such teachers as Julius Epstein for piano, Robert Fuchs for harmony (Helmeshberger is said to have excused him from counterpoint owing to his exceptional gifts of composition, a freedom which Mahler later regretted), and Theodor Krenn for composition. By 1877 he had started on a course of history, philosophy and the history of music at the University of Vienna, but in 1879 he gave up the course. In 1880 he left Vienna and took up the post of Kapellmeister during the summer season at Hall in Austria. This year saw the completion of his first mature composition, 'Das klagende Lied.'

From then onwards Mahler worked unremittingly as opera conductor in different towns in Austria and Germany, gradually making his way from post to post until he reached the summit of the profession. In 1881 he was Kapellmeister at Laibach, and in 1882 at Olmütz. In 1883 he was back again in Vienna, this time with a small appointment, chorus-master of the Italian opera at the Carltheater, and it was in this year that he made a pilgrimage to Bayreuth and was deeply moved on hearing 'Parsifal.' In 1883 he finished the 'Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen' and took up a fresh post, the most important and extended hitherto, that of Kapellmeister at Cassel. He stayed at this work for two years and conducted operas of all styles. His letters from this time show him dissatisfied with his situation. He was already beginning to find a second-rate position irksome.

In 1885 he went to fill a post at Prague similar to that which he had previously held at Olmütz. Anton Seidl was first Kapellmeister in Prague, but soon went on tour to America, leaving Mahler virtually in charge. At last things began to fall out for him as he had wished. His performance of Beethoven's 9th Symphony awakened enthusiasm, and to a great extent he was able to have his own way with productions of Mozart and Wagner. In 1886 he went, again as second Kapellmeister, to Leipzig, remaining in the post for two years and increasing his knowledge of opera scores and his capabilities as producer whenever the chance offered. Here his chief was Arthur Nikisch.

In 1888 he was given his first appointment as director, this time at Budapest, where he found affairs in a chaotic state with the new Intendant, von Beniczky, struggling to keep the balance between the old school of opera-goers who preferred Rossini and Meyerbeer and the new Magyar element which clamoured for national opera. Mahler signed a contract for ten years and started with the utterance 'I will work with enthusiasm.' But within two years he gave up the post and left Budapest disillusioned. While there he had managed to produce 'Don Giovanni' with such vitality that Brahms ejaculated 'famos' and 'grossartig' and called the young conductor a 'devil of a fellow.' In 1889 'Rheingold' and 'Die Walküre' were produced in Hungarian.

From 1891-97 he filled the post of first Kapellmeister in the municipal theatre at Hamburg. It was a step backward from his former directorship, but for all that these years in Hamburg were the most enjoyable of his life as a conductor of opera, and he was able to find real quiet, to give himself up to composition and to the comparatively unhindered production of opera. In 1892 he visited London and conducted performances of German opera, with a contingent from Hamburg, in Augustus Harris's season at Drury Lane. It was during these years that his second and third symphonies were finished. In 1895 he became a Roman Catholic.

In 1897 he was given the appointment of Kapellmeister at the Hofoper (now Staatsoper) in VIENNA (q.v.). The post came to him largely through the strong recommendation of Brahms. Shortly before this Mahler had visited Brahms at Ischl, where he lay dying, and it is possible that the elder man remembered the performance of 'Don Giovanni,' which had so stirred him at Budapest. It was not long after Mahler's return to Vienna that his duties were enlarged, and he was given the title of Artistic Director and placed at the real head of affairs. This had a liberating influence on his work, and enabled him to bring about the reforms which he at once started upon. During the ten years that he spent in this post he got through a mass of production of opera, wiped out the debt that had been crippling the Hofoper, and gathered about him not only a cultured and enthusiastic audience but a strong artistic following. There was nothing that he did not look into. Every detail of production as well as of stage deportment and musical phrasing he considered to be within his province and worthy of his close attention. And all this immense zeal was expended for the sake of the work. For himself he cared nothing, except in so far as he was a chosen instrument for the doctrines of faultless opera-production. But he lacked a sense of tactful management, and as fast as he made friends who were uplifted by his energy and by the largeness of his vision, he made enemies who could not brook the methods he employed of riding rough-shod over the feelings of all who had the misfortune to get in his way. And so the time came when affairs reached such a pass that it was borne in upon him that the only hope of the Hofoper pulling together was for him to depart and leave for his successor the possible continuation of his work. This he did.

The rest of his life was spent in a strenuous effort to amass, as swiftly as possible, a fortune large enough to ensure for himself a period of rest, and for his wife, Alma Maria Schindler, whom he had married in 1902, and his children a competency against the future. With this in view he journeyed to America as soon as his duties in Vienna were at an end in 1907. In the previous year he had visited that country, and now returned there to obtain a great success as conductor of the Philharmonic Society of New York. (See NEW YORK.) In 1908 he came again to America to fill this post. In this year also he conducted some memorable opera performances of Beethoven, Wagner and Mozart at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, and gave there the first American performances of 'The Bartered Bride' and of 'Pique Dame.' In 1910 he was once more in America. But this time he returned to Europe broken in health, and after a few concerts of his own works in Munich, Paris and Amsterdam (the last named, both then and since, the centre of the Mahler cult and the home of the most complete performances of his works under the guidance of his friend Willem Mengelberg), he returned to Austria and died in his 51st year.

SYMPHONIC COMPOSITIONS.—The symphonies of Mahler trace descent from Beethoven through Bruckner. From Brahms he got little, from Wagner much. It is worthy of note that this man, who had been so identified with the opera and had acquired such a sound technique in its production, should never, but for such early discarded attempts as 'Die Argonauten' and 'Der Herzog von Schwabe,' have made one of his own. It is probable that the looseness of structure and emotionalism which marks his works and increases with each fresh composition up to and including the 8th symphony may be put down to the influences which came to him from his very close connexion with the operatic stage, and a reason for the excellence of his two last completed works, the 'Lied von der Erde' and the 9th symphony, may well be found in the fact that by the time he wrote them he had given up for good his activities in opera.

Mahler gradually developed from an artist mainly interested in the manifestations of nature (the 1st, 2nd, 3rd and 4th symphonies), through a period when vaster problems attracted him; the soul of man, its relation to the world of nature which had held him in earlier years, its battle with circumstance (the 5th, 6th and 7th symphonies). In the last two works he had reached a period of resignation ('Das Lied von der Erde' and the 9th symphony). In each section one work may be discussed as a type.

The 2nd symphony is a good example of all Mahler's work, being lengthy, scored nearly always heavily for a large orchestra, restless and stormy in places, monumentally exalted in others. Van Wessem likens the first movement to a sequence of frescoes before which we quickly pass. The second movement is a light dance, a rather cultured Ländler, with a contrasted middle section. The third shows Mahler's habit of using up old material in his symphonies, the song 'Des Antonius von Padua Fischepredigt' ('Des Knaben Wunderhorn') being incorporated. The fourth is remarkable for the use of a contralto voice which sings some lines from the Wunderhorn, a beautiful calm preparation for the brilliant last movement which ends with orchestra and large chorus united on the word 'Auferstehen.'

The 5th symphony may be taken as typical of Mahler's second period. The change in the composer's mental outlook which had taken place since the earlier works can here be seen in its full effect. This symphony is disjointed in form and unsettled in matter. The orchestra used is not so large as that of the 2nd symphony, but the demands made on it are greater. The work is in three large parts. The first is subdivided into two movements, the first of which is the exposition, the second the working-out and restatement of the various subjects. The second part is a scherzo and the third a rondo of huge proportions, preceded by a short adagietto which points the way to the slow movement of the 9th symphony.

This 9th symphony, for orchestra alone, is characteristic of the comparative spiritual calm which Mahler reached in his later years. The orchestra used is, as ever, a large one, but the manner of its use is more personal, the individualities of each instrument receive more careful attention than hitherto. There are some moments of really delicate scoring. The thought, too, is clearer, and directed with more certainty. The slow movement which ends the work, written with great breadth and a fine command of the strings, reaches a plane which is surely the highest that Mahler ever attained to.

In a different category from the rest of his work, the 'Lied von der Erde' and the 8th symphony stand apart. The 8th symphony is set for a very large orchestra, two-part chorus, eight solo voices and boys' chorus. The work is in two parts. The words of the first part are those of the Latin hymn of Hrabanus Maurus, 'Veni, Creator Spiritus.' Those of the second are taken from the end of the second part of Goethe's 'Faust.' Between the two sets of words a certain affinity exists in the longing of the soul for the 'Creator Spiritus' and in Faust's yearning towards the 'Höchste Herrscherin der Welt,' and this linking of the two sections at certain well-chosen moments is strengthened by the use of themes in the second part which had previously served in the first part. Technically there is nothing new to note in the work. Apart from a tendency to use the chorus at places in an orchestral manner, the choral writing does not add anything to the technical invention of Mahler's contemporaries.

The 'Lied von der Erde' dates from the next year to that of the 8th symphony. Six poems from the Chinesische Flöte of Hans Bethge are set for voice (3 for tenor, 3 for alto or baritone) and full orchestra with as nice a sensibility of the underlying philosophy of the lines as ever Mahler showed. The change from the blustering of the 8th symphony to the fine perceptions of this set of songs is noteworthy. The scoring has often an almost Latin delicacy. Mahler's position as a composer will rest more certainly on these songs and on the 9th symphony than on all the remainder of his work, even including the 8th symphony.

MAHOON (MOHOON), JOSEPH, a London harpsichord and spinet maker near the middle of the 18th century. His name is present on the harpsichord figured in Hogarth's Rake's Progress, Plate II. 1735. In Rider's Court Register for 1759 he is entered as 'Joseph Mohoon, harpsichord maker to the king.' F. K.

MAHU, STEPHAN, a German composer, who flourished in the earlier part of the 16th century, is said to have been a singer in the chapel of the Archduke Ferdinand at Vienna, though this is only a conjecture from the fact of some of his compositions being received into Joanelli's Thesaurus of 1568. His works appeared only in collections. Ambros and others speak highly of a set of Lamentations a 4-6, which appeared in Joanelli, and have since been republished by Commer. Mahu's other works consist chiefly of a few contrapuntal settings a 4 and 5 of German songs, sacred and secular, in Ott, Rhau and Foster's collections. Eitner and Ambros judged his secular songs very favourably. The former¹ describes a setting of 'Ach hilf mich Leid und sehnlich Klag,' a 5, as excellent both in technique and expression. He also gives in shortened notes a characteristic setting of an old Tanzlied in triple time, 'Es ging ein wolbezogener Knecht.' Ott's Liederbuch of 1544, reprinted in 1872, contains four songs by Mahu, three sacred and one secular. From the text of one of the sacred songs, 'Lobt Gott ihr Christen all,' being a fierce diatribe against Roman abuses, as well as from the fact of Mahu having contributed a setting a 5 of Luther's 'Ein feste Burg' to Rhau's Geistliche Gesänge, 1544, we may conclude that Mahu was more Lutheran in his sympathies than Roman. J. R. M.

MAICHELBECK, FRANZ ANTON (b. Reichenaun, near Constance, 1702; d. June 14, 1750), was sent by some generous patrons to Rome to complete his musical training. He is afterwards described as being professor of the Italian language and praesentarius of the minster at Freiburg-im-Breisgau. By praesentarius would appear to be meant a prebendary or beneficed priest on the staff of a collegiate or cathedral church. Fétis took it to mean a 'beadle,' and mistakenly described Maichelbeck as 'bécœur de la cathédrale de Freyberg'; and unfortunately Eitner, in Q.-L., has adopted Fétis's mistake, though it was corrected, and the word itself sufficiently explained, in an article by E. von Werra in Haborl's Kirchenmusikalisches Jahrbuch, 1897, pp. 28-30. The whole staff of a collegiate church was denominated praesentia.

Maichelbeck's works are of some importance in the history of clavier-music. He cultivated the lighter Italian homophonic style, which influenced the earlier development of the clavier sonata. His opus 1 is entitled 'Die auf dem Clavier spielende und das Gehör vergnügende Cäcilia, das ist vill Sonaten, so nach der jetzigen wahren Art, Regel- und Gehör-mässig ausgeurtheilt' . . . Augsburg, 1736.

These eight sonatas are partly suites, having dance movements intermingled with adagios, allegros, capriccios and toccatas. The whole work shows the study of Italian models.² The only other known published work of Maichelbeck is his opus 2 entitled 'Die auf dem Clavier lehrende Cäcilia . . . Augsbürg, 1737.' The first two parts of this work are theoretical, but the third part consists of preludes, fugues and versetts on the eight church tones, which, however, are treated not in any proper organ style, but in the lighter and more florid clavier style. MAILLARD, JEAN, a French composer of the earlier part of the 16th century, is said to have been a pupil of Josquin des Prés.

Several masses by him were published separately by Le Roy and Ballard of Paris from 1557-1559, one of which, entitled 'Je suis déshéritée,' has a peculiar history, and is of interest because of its connexion with the work of Palestrina. It was republished by the same French firm, and almost about the same time, as being the work of another French composer, Nicholas de Marle, and there might thus have been considerable doubt as to its authorship, but it was also copied, probably at some earlier date, into the choir-books of the Sistine Chapel at Rome, and there ascribed to Maylard. It thus became known to Palestrina, who adopted the themes of Maillard's Mass for a Mass of his own, which was afterwards published as No. 3 'sine nomine,' of the sixth book of his masses 1592.¹ 'Je suis déshéritée' was in fact a popular French song, on which many musicians, including Lassus and Gombert, but especially French writers, composed masses, and this may account for the confusion between Marle and Maillard, as Marle may also have composed a Mass on it which was confused with that of Maillard. The song itself, as set for four voices by Pierre Cadéac, may be seen in Eitner's Selection of Chansons, 1899, No. 11; and a comparison of this with Palestrina's Mass will show that the tune, as given by Cadéac partly in the tenor, but even more completely in the descant, reappears in all the leading themes of Palestrina's work, and is given complete to start with, in the three divisions of the Kyrie. Palestrina's Mass should thus, equally with that of Maillard, be denominated 'Je suis déshéritée,' though Palestrina himself left it without a name, out of deference, no doubt, to the later ecclesiastical scruples against the use of secular names and tunes for works intended for the Church. But there is nothing really secular about the tune, and it is just worth notice that the opening strain of both song and Mass is identical with the opening strain of the oldest known German choral tune, 'Christ ist erstanden.'

Other works by Maillard besides the three Masses, a 4-5, and a Patrem for eight voices, are Magnificats, motets and chansons which appeared in the various collections of the time. Ambros describes his motets as characterised by a noble and expressive melodious elegance, and reckons him generally as one of the better masters of the French School. A chanson by Maillard, which has all this characteristic of melodious elegance, may be seen in Eitner's Selection of Chansons, No. 39. J. R. M.

MAILLART, Louis (called ARMÉ), (b. Paris, Mar. 24, 1817; d. Moulins, department of Alliers, May 26, 1871), was a pupil of the Conservatoire, where he studied composition with Halévy and Leborne, and the violin with Guérin. He won the Grand Prix de Rome in 1841, with his 'Lionel Foscari,' and the first of his six operas, 'Castibelza' (3 acts), was successfully produced in 1847. His 'Moulin des tilleuls' was given at the Opéra-Comique in 1849, and 'La Croix de Marie' in 1852, but the work which most kept his name before the public was 'Les Dragons de Villars,' produced at the Opéra-Comique in Paris in 1856. His later comic operas, 'Les Pêcheurs de Catane' (1860), and 'Lara' (1864), were less successful. Maillard also wrote some cantatas, such as 'La Voie sacrée' (1859), 'Le 15 août' (1860), etc. G. F.

MAINZER, JOSEPH, LL.D. (b. Trèves, 1801²; d. Manchester, Nov. 10, 1851). His father was a butcher at Trèves. He was educated in the Maîtrise of Trèves Cathedral, learnt to play several instruments, and developed considerable musical gifts, then spent some time in the coal-mines near Saarbruck, with the view of being an engineer, and at length embraced the ecclesiastical profession, was ordained priest in 1826, and afterwards became Abbé. His first practical introduction to music was as singing-master to the seminary at Trèves, for which he published a Singschule or Method (Trèves, 1831). His political tendencies obliged him to leave Germany, and we find him in 1833 at Brussels writing an opera ('Triomphe de la Pologne') and editing the musical portion of L'Artiste. His next destination, at the end of 1834, was Paris, where he opened workmen's classes for music and singing, joined the staff of the Gazette musicale and wrote the musical feuilletons for the National. Between 1835 and 1841 he published several educational works on music, chiefly for very young beginners, as well as other works, and an opera, 'La Jacquerie,' which was damned on Oct. 10, 1839. He came to England in June 1841, competed for the musical professorship at Edinburgh in 1844, lived in Edinburgh in 1842-47, and finally established himself at Manchester. In February of that year Hullah had started his classes on Wilhem's system, and Mainzer attempted to follow suit in the north, and with considerable success. His *Singing for the Million*³ (1842) was at that time well known, and went through many editions. He overworked himself in this cause, and died, much esteemed and regretted. He was buried at Rusholme Road Cemetery, Manchester. A periodical started by him in July 1842, and entitled Mainzer's Musical Times, was the predecessor and basis of the present Musical Times. See the Musical Herald for June 1895, and an extended notice in Chambers's Journal, Feb. 14, 1852. G.

MAISTRE, MATTHÄUS LE (d. circa 1577), a Flemish musician of the 16th century, supposed to have come originally from Liège, succeeded Johann Walther in 1554 as Kapellmeister to the Saxon court at Dresden. He retired on a pension in 1568. Otto Kade, in his otherwise excellent monograph on this composer (published 1862), made the mistake of identifying him with Matthias Hermann, surnamed Werrecorensis (see WERRECORE), choirmaster at Milan, and so represented Le Maistre as having come from Milan to Dresden; but the Milan choirmaster has since been proved to be a different person altogether from Le Maistre the Dresden Kapellmeister. Le Maistre's publications are (1) 'Catechesis' (Nuremberg, 1563); this work consists mainly of a few simple, note-for-note settings of the chief parts of the Lutheran Catechism in Latin, the Paternoster for four voices on the plain-song melody, the Creed, and other pieces, for three voices. (2) 'Geistliche und weltliche Gesänge' a 4 and 5 (Wittenberg, 1566), seventy sacred songs and twenty-two secular. (3) 'Liber I. sacrarum cantionum' (Dresden, 1570), fifteen Latin Motets a 5. (4) 'Deutsche und lateinische geistliche Gesänge' (Dresden, 1577), twenty-four numbers a 3. Two motets by Le Maistre were received into the great collection Theaurus musicus (Nuremberg, 1564), one of which Estote Prudentes for four voices, has been reprinted by Commer in his Collectio, etc., tom. viii. Also a mass a 5 was published in 1568. Other masses and officia have remained in MS. Kade's Monograph contains ten of Le Maistre's 'Geistliche Gesänge,' and five 'Weltliche Gesänge,' two of which are Quodlibets, that is, pieces with various texts and melodies combined. Two other pieces are contained in the Beilagen zu Ambros Geschichte. J. R. M.

MAÎTRE DE CHAPELLE, see CHAPELLE.

MAÎTRISE, a term formerly applied in France both to the quarters assigned in cathedrals and collegiate churches to the choristers and their master, and to the institution itself, which originally included a complete education, lay and ecclesiastical. These schools turned out many great men, several rising to be bishops and popes; among the latter Pope Urban IV., a cobbler's son, whose early years were passed in the 'Psallette' at Troyes. Some centuries later, when the Mâitrises had undergone great changes, they were still the only establishments in which even secular musicians could obtain their training. From the Mâitrises the Church obtained choristers, organists and maitres de chapelle, and the world its favourite composers. Here also, although instrumental music was neglected, and dramatic music positively forbidden, the regimental bands found their bassoon-players, and the lyric theatres their 'clavécinistes-accompagnateurs,' violoncellists and singers.

The Mâitrises were real schools of music, the pupils being maintained at the cost of the chapters. Indeed they much resembled the Conservatorios of Italy, both in their mode of administration, and in the course of instruction given. They were not, however, all organised alike, but varied with local circumstances. Thus in some the boys, the master, and the priests lived in common, in others separately; in some the maintenance of the children was in the hands of the master, in others there was a regular purveyor. But in all, the main end was the study of music. Before the Revolution there were in France 400 Mâitrises and choirs, with as many maitres de chapelle, maintained either by the chapters of cathedrals and collegiate churches, the curés or the monasteries. Each Mâitrise contained, on an average, from 25 to 30 persons, and the musicians thus diffused throughout the country numbered in all about 10,000, of whom 4000 were pupils or choristers. There was naturally much rivalry among the different establishments, which was of great benefit to music. (Cf. SONG-SCHOOL.)

The Mâitrises, though suppressed in 1791, were afterwards reconstituted, on a different footing. The CONSERVATOIRE DE MUSIQUE (q.v.) is now the great nursery of French musicians, but many a church has still its Mâitrise, where the choristers—boys and men—are trained by a maître de chapelle in everything necessary to ensure a good execution of plain-song and sacred music. We have already spoken of Choron's school of music (see CHORON), still in existence as the 'École Niedermeyer.' Niedermeyer and D'Ortigue also founded a periodical called La Mâitrise, specially devoted to sacred music. It survived only four years. Besides Gantex's work (Entretien des musiciens, Auxerres, 1643, sm. 12mo., very scarce), another book, also published in 1643 by Jean de Bordenave, a Canon of Béarn, L'Estat des églises collégiales et cathédrales, contains much information, though impaired by its want of method and arrangement. G. C.

MAJO, GIAN FRANCESCO DI (b. Naples, c. 1740; d. Rome, Jan. 18, 1771), was the son of Giuseppe de Majo (1698-1772), who was maestro di cappella to the King of the Two Sicilies in the early part of the 18th century, and wrote various church and chamber compositions.

The son was a pupil of Padre Martini, and first appeared as an opera composer in 1759, with 'Riccimero' at Naples; this was followed at short intervals by many others, written either by himself alone or in collaboration. 'Cajo Fabricio' was given at Naples in 1760, and the same year saw the production of 'Astrea placata'; in 1761 'L' Almeria' was given at Leghorn; in 1762 'Artaserse'; 'Ipermestra' in 1763; and in 1764 'Alcide negli Orti Esperidi' in Vienna; 'Adriano in Siria' was given in Rome about 1766; 'Ifigenia in Tauride' is of uncertain date; and his last, 'Eumene,' of which he only finished one act, was completed by Insanguine, and produced at Naples in 1771. Among the operas that have music by di Majo in them are 'Agamemnon,'

'Cleofide,' 'Demofónto,' and 'Ezio.' Two arias by him are quoted in Marx's Gluck und die Oper. Cantatas and church music are mentioned in Q.-L. M.

MAJOR. (1) When intervals have two forms which are alike consonant or alike dissonant, these are distinguished as major and minor, the former being always a semitone greater than the latter. Thus thirds and sixths have two forms, which are both consonant, and are respectively called major and minor. Seconds, sevenths and ninths have each two forms, which are dissonant, and are similarly distinguished as major and minor.

(2) The major forms of triads are such as contain a major third from the root note, and these are both more harmonious and better defined than the minor triads; for, in the first place, the major third agrees with the fourth harmonic of the fundamental tone, and, in the second, the combinational tones of the chord for the most part only double notes already existing in the chord; whereas in the minor triads the minor third does not correspond with any of the really perceptible harmonics of the root note, and the triad cannot in any position be free from false combinational tones. It is mainly for these reasons that the major chord is so often found at the conclusion of a piece of music in a minor mode in the works of the earlier masters, from Josquin des Prés up to Mozart. (See HARMONY; TIERCE DE PICARDIE.)

(3) The most important and best defined scale of modern music is called 'major,' because it has a major third from the tonic in the ascending series; whence in former times it was common to distinguish the scale or mode by the terms 'greater' or 'lesser' third, as, 'in the key of G with the greater third,' where one would now say 'G major.' This major scale is the natural diatonic series of modern music, represented by the series starting from C. It is fundamentally the most perfect for harmonic purposes, as it presents the greatest number of concords, and the larger proportion of those in their most harmonious form; and it also provides most perfectly and simply the means of making the tonal relationship intelligible, since, as Helmholtz points out, 'the tones [of the scale] are constituents of the compound tone of the tonic, or the fifth above or the fifth below it. By which means all the relations of tones are reduced to the simplest and closest relationship existing in any musical system—that of the fifth.' This scale corresponds to the Greek Lydian and the Ecclesiastical Ionian Mode.

(4) The term 'major' is also used in a theoretical sense of tones, to distinguish the interval of a tone which has the ratio 9:8 from that which has the ratio 10:9, which is called a minor tone. For example, in the key of C, C—D is a major tone and D—E a minor tone, and the difference between them is a comma. C. H. H. F.

MALÁT, JAN (b. Staré Bydžov, Bohemia, June 16, 1843; d. Prague, Dec. 2, 1915), collector of folk-songs, composer and podagogue.

From 1913 Malát was director of the Communal School for girls at Smíchov, a suburb of Prague. He was an enthusiastic collector of the folk-songs of Bohemia, Moravia and Slovakia, and the results of his life-work are published as 'Český národní poklad' (A Treasury of Czech National Songs) in a series of popular albums (Fr. Urbánek, Prague). A second collection, 'Zlatá pokladnice' (The Golden Treasury), is less of a household possession. He also harmonised a number of individual songs and transcribed a few in various instrumental arrangements. His original works include Czech Dances (Furiant, Round and 'Obkročák') for orchestra, and several good partsongs and choruses. His accompaniments to the folk-songs are full and pleasing, but his treatment of the national material is popular rather than scientific. R. N.

MALBECQUE (MALEBEKE), GUILLAUME DE MEDIATORIS, probably so-called from Malbecque in Flanders, a Papal singer, 1431–38 (except May to Aug. 1433). Five songs of his in a collective Codex of the Bodl. Lib. have been republished by Stainer. E. v. d. s.

MALBROOK, a French nursery song of the 18th or 17th centuries. Its connexion with our own Duke of Marlborough as the hero of the words is doubtful.

Upon the birth of one of Marie Antoinette's children, about 1781, a provincial girl named, or nicknamed, Madame Pointrinc, sang it to the child as a lullaby. The Queen was immensely taken with the song, and presently all the court were singing it. The tune, as current in England towards the end of the 18th century, is as follows, as printed in Aird's 'Selections of Scotch, English, Irish and Foreign Airs,' vol. iii. [1788].

The French words are a series of couplets beginning :

Malbrook s'en va-t-en guerre ;
Miron-ton, miron-ton, Miron-taine,
Malbrook s'en va-t-en guerre
Ne sait quand revendra.

The lengthy song goes on to say 'He will return at Easter' or perhaps at 'Trinity.' Malbrook does not return, and the lady mounts her castle and then beholds his page, who tells her that his lord is dead, etc.

The pretty and somewhat melancholy tune took Europe by storm, and numberless songs were set to it. The first English use of the tune the present writer can trace is a song on the defeat of the French and Spanish combined forces in the siege of Gibraltar on Sept. 13, 1782.

The first verse, out of many, runs :

D'Artols returns from Spain,
Oh, what a rare campaign (bis).
We thought that with a look
He would the place have took ;
But the thunders of his wrath
Was not a cracker worth. Etc.

This was published by Preston of London on a half-sheet music page.

About 1790, among other songs, the air was adapted to a lyric, 'The Maid of Primrose Hill.'

There have been many foolish statements made regarding the air. The favourite came from Chateaubriand, who, having heard (or fancied he had heard) the tune sung among the Arabs, assumed it to have been carried to the East by the Crusaders and sung by them before the walls of Jerusalem.

The air is now known in England solely by the convivial song, 'We won't go home till morning,' with the second verse 'For he's a jolly good fellow.'

MALCHAIR, JOHN BAPTIST (b. Cologne, 1731 : d. Oxford, Dec. 12, 1812). The son of a watchmaker, he early came to England and taught music. He had a talent for water-colour painting, and taught drawing in ladies' schools. He settled at Bristol and Hereford, and by his amiable qualities won many friends. He removed to Oxford, where he married. In 1760 he was appointed leader of the Oxford Music Room Band. He painted many interesting views round about Oxford, and made excursions into North Wales. Many of his drawings are in private hands at Oxford.

When William Crotch came as a young organist to Christ Church, Oxford, the two became great friends. Malchair took great pains in helping Crotch to gather materials for his 'Specimens of Various Styles of Music,' which formed the basis of a series of lectures which Crotch gave. (See CROTCH.)

Malchair entered into the musical life of Oxford and was greatly esteemed, though he does not appear to have published any compositions. He was a violinist of considerable ability. In the Bodleian Library there are some notes made by Crotch on his friend's musical life in Oxford. The Folk-Song Society possesses a manuscript book of airs noted by Malchair.

MALCOLM, ALEXANDER (b. Edinburgh, 1687), was author of A Treatise of Musick, Speculative, Practical and Historical, 8vo, Edinburgh, 1721 ; second edition, 8vo, London, 1730 ; a well-executed work. An ill-made abridgment by an 'eminent musician' appeared in London, 1776. In 1721 one Mitchell published 'An Ode on the Power of Musick,' dedicated to Malcolm, the greater part of which is prefixed to the two editions of the Treatise.

W. H. H.

His work is the first important treatise on the theory of music issued in Scotland. Prior to it are the few leaves of general instructions in the Aberdeen Cantus (1662, 1666, 1682), and a thin folio volume entitled An Introduction to the Knowledge and Practice of Musick, by A. B., 1717. The copy, probably unique, was sold at the Taphouse sale in 1905, and had bound up with it a contemporary manuscript essay on The Institutions of Musick wherein are set forth the practicall principles of Musicall Composition. Another manuscript treatise is of the 16th century, and written in the Scottish dialect. It is mentioned by Hawkins and belonged to him ; it is now in the British Museum.

Malcolm's work is in octavo, and the first edition contains 608 pp. with engraved musical examples ; it was issued at 'Edinburgh, printed for the author, 1721.'

Hawkins and later writers speak in the highest terms of its merits. The book was dedicated to the 'directors of the Royal Academy of musick' (i.e. the Italian Opera in London, see HANDEL), who are named individually.

It is advertised as just issued, in the Edinburgh Evening Courant of Nov. 6, 1721, and from this advertisement we learn that the author then lived 'in the Cowgate, opposite Burnet's Close.'

MALDÉGHEM, ROBERT JULLIEN VAN (b. Deuterghem, Flanders, 1810 ; d. Ixelles, near Brussels, Nov. 13, 1893), organist and composer, is chiefly memorable as the editor of Trésor Musical (q.v.), a collection in 29 volumes of vocal works, sacred and secular, by Flemish composers of the 16th century.

MALDERE, PIERRE VAN, the younger (b. Brussels, May 13, 1724 ; d. there, Nov. 2, 1768), younger brother of Jean Baptiste, a 2nd violinist at the Brussels Opera. Pierre was engaged as 1st violinist in the private music of the Duke of Lorraine who took him to Paris, where his first opera was performed in 1762. He acquired European fame as symphony and chamber music composer and retained his popularity until the arrival of Haydn (Q.-L. ; Riemann).

MALEINGREAU, PAUL DE (b. Trélon ex

Thiérache, Nov. 23, 1887), organist and composer. His father was Belgian and his mother French. Three years later the family removed to Namur. After some parental opposition he was allowed to enter the Brussels Conservatoire in 1905, and studied composition with Edgar Tinel. He devoted himself for some time to liturgical studies, and was on the point of accepting a remote organistship when he was recalled to the Conservatoire to superintend the harmony classes. During the period of the German occupation he gave many recitals on private organs, and after the war continued his work of popularising the best organ music and reviving forgotten masterpieces. In 1921-22 he gave, in a series of organ recitals at Brussels, the whole of Bach's works for that instrument. His compositions are mostly for organ, and, next to Bach, the influence most readily discerned in them is that of César Franck, especially in his spiritual fervour. Though somewhat aloof from the contending currents of contemporary music, he displays some degree of modern freedom in harmony and in form, combined with personal inventiveness. In addition to his compositions he has written some theoretical works.

MALHERBE, CHARLES THÉODORE (b. Paris, Apr. 21, 1853; d. Cormeil, Eure, Oct. 6, 1911). On the completion of his literary and legal studies (having reached the grade of 'licencié') he took up music and studied various branches of composition with Danhauser, Wormser and Massenet. From 1881 he contributed to various musical publications: Revue d'art dramatique; Le Ménestrel; Guide musical; Le Monde artiste; La Revue internationale de musique, and in 1896 was appointed 'archiviste-adjoint' to the Paris Opéra (1895), and in 1898 succeeded Nutter as archivist. His private collection of musical autographs became one of the richest in the world, after those of the public libraries of Berlin, Vienna, London and Paris. He bequeathed them to the library of the Paris Conservatoire.

The following may be mentioned among Malherbe's works on music: Notices of 'Esclarmonde' (1889) and 'Ascanio' (1890); the Catalogue bibliographique des œuvres de Donizetti (1897). In collaboration with M. A. Soubies: L'Œuvre dramatique de R. Wagner (1886); Précis de l'histoire de l'Opéra-Comique (1887; pseudonym, B. de Lomague); Mélanges sur Richard Wagner (1892); Histoire de la seconde Salle Favart (two vols., 1892 and 1893, crowned by the Institut); P. Tchaikovsky (1901); Le Galliamathias musicum de Mozart (Riemann's Festschrift, 1909); and a biography of Auber (Musiciens célèbres, 1911). Malherbe edited with Saint-Saëns the collected edition of Rameau's works. He composed several opéras-comiques ('L'Ordonnance,' etc., not published), incidental music for 'Les Yeux clos' (Odéon, 1896), orchestral and chamber music, as well as numerous transcriptions.

MALIBRAN, MARIA FELICITA (b. Paris, Mar. 24, 1808; d. Manchester, Sept. 23, 1836), one of the most distinguished singers of her time, was the daughter of Manuel GARCIA (q.v.).

When 3 years old she was taken to Italy, and at the age of 5 played a child's part in Paër's 'Agnese,' at the 'Fiorentini,' Naples. So precocious was she that, after a few nights of this opera, she actually began to sing the part of 'Agnese' in the duet of the second Act, a piece of audacity which was applauded by the public. Two years later she studied solfeggi with Panseron, at Naples; and Hérold gave her her first instruction on the piano. In 1816 Garcia took her to Paris with the rest of his family, and thence to London in the autumn of 1817. Already speaking fluently Spanish, Italian and French, Maria picked up a tolerable knowledge of English in the two and a half years she spent in London. Not long after, she learned German with the same facility.

At the early age of 15 she was made by her father to learn singing under his own direction. Two years had barely elapsed when (1824) Garcia allowed her to appear for the first time before a musical club which he had just established. There she produced a great sensation, and her future success was confidently predicted. Two months later, Garcia returned to London, where he was engaged as principal tenor; and here he set on foot a singing-class, in which the education of Maria was continued, if not completed. Fétis says that it was in consequence of a sudden indisposition of Mme. Pasta that the first public appearance of Maria was unexpectedly made; but this account is not the same as that given by Ebers or by Lord Mount-Edgcumbe. The latter relates that, shortly after the repair of the King's Theatre,

'the great favourite Pasta arrived for a limited number of nights. About the same time . . . & became necessary to engage a young singer, the daughter of the tenor Garcia who had sung here for several seasons. She was as yet a mere girl, and had never appeared on any public stage; but from the first moment of her appearance she showed evident talents for it both as singer and actress. Her extreme youth, her prettiness, her pleasing voice, and sprightly easy action, as Rosina in "Il barbiere di Siviglia," in which part she made her début, gained her general favour; but she was too highly extolled, and injudiciously put forward as a prima donna, when she was only a very promising débutante, who in time, by study and practice, would in all probability, under the tuition of her father, a good musician, but (to my ears at least) a most disagreeable singer, rise to eminence in her profession.

Ebers says, 'her voice was a contralto, and managed with great taste.'

Her début took place June 7, 1825. She was immediately afterwards engaged for the remainder of the season (about six weeks) at £500.¹ On July 23 she sang Felicia in 'Crociato.' At the end of the season, Garcia went, with his daughter, to the provincial festivals, and then embarked for New York. In this new sphere Maria rapidly improved, and acquired confidence, experience, and the habit of the stage. She appeared in 'Otello,' 'Romeo,' 'Don Giovanni,' 'Tancredi,' 'Cenerentola,' and in two operas written for her by her father, 'L'amante astuto,' and 'La figlia dell'aria.' She had scarcely made her début when the enthusiasm of the public knew no bounds; and, in the midst of her popularity, Garcia gave her in marriage to Malibran, an elderly and seemingly wealthy French merchant, in spite of her repugnance to the union. This marriage, celebrated Mar. 25, 1826, was as unhappy as it was ill-assorted; a year had hardly elapsed before the young wife found herself, on Malibran's bankruptcy, free to leave him, and she at once seized the opportunity. In Sept. 1827 she had returned to France. Preceded by a bright reputation, she began by reaping a harvest of applause in private concerts, followed in Jan. 1828 by a great and genuine success, at Galli's benefit, in 'Semiramide.' Her genius for dramatic singing was at once recognised, though her style was marred by a questionable taste in her choice of ornament. This she had, in Paris, the best opportunity of correcting. Engaged for the season at the Italian opera, she made her début, Apr. 8. The public, at first doubting, soon welcomed her as a really great singer.

In the season of 1829 Malibran made her reappearance in London, where she shared the applause of the public with Sontag, and the same result followed her singing with that artist at Paris in the autumn. She was principal soprano at the Gloucester Festival of 1829, and was engaged again at the Italian Opera in Paris in Jan. 1830.

Sontag, marrying and retiring from the stage early in 1830, left Malibran mistress of the field, and henceforth she had no rival, but continued to sing each season in London and Paris with ever-increased éclat. In 1830 an attachment sprang up between her and Charles de Bériot the violinist; and this ended only with her life. They built in 1831 a handsome villa at Ixelles, a suburb of Brussels, to which they returned after every operatic campaign. In the summer of 1832 a sudden inspiration took this impulsive artist to Italy in the company of Lablache, who happened to pass through Brussels; and an Italian tour was improvised, which was a sort of triumphal progress. Milan, Rome, Naples and Bologna were visited with equal success.

Malibran retired to Brussels in Dec. 1832, and her son, Charles Wilfrid, was born Feb. 12, 1833. In the following spring she came to London, and sang at Drury Lane, in English Opera.

Having played here in English versions of 'Sonnambula' and 'Fidelio,' Malibran returned to Naples, where she remained until May 1834, proceeding then to Bologna, and thence to Milan. She soon came back, however, to London for a flying visit; and was singing at Sinigaglia in July. On the 11th of the next month she went to Lucca, where her horses were taken from her carriage, which was drawn to her hotel by enthusiastic admirers after her last appearance. She next went to Milan, and thence to Naples where she sang at the Fondo in 'Otello,' and at the San Carlo, Dec. 4, 1834, in Rossi's 'Amelia.' Persiani's 'Ines de Castro' was produced at the San Carlo for her in the same winter. From Naples she went, in the same triumphant manner, to Venice, her arrival being announced by fanfares of trumpets. There she was besieged with fresh enthusiasm, which followed her in her return to Paris and London. She returned in August to Lucca.

At this juncture her marriage was annulled by the courts at Paris, and on Mar. 26, 1836, she married de Bériot, with whom she returned immediately to Brussels.

In the following April, once more in London, Mme. Malibran de Bériot had a fall from her horse and received serious injuries to her head, from which she never entirely recovered. She returned to Brussels, from whence she went to Aix-la-Chapelle, and gave two concerts there with de Bériot. In September she had come to England again, for the Manchester Festival—at which her short, brilliant life came to an end. She sang through three days of the festival, but on Wednesday, Sept. 14, her last notes in public were heard, in the duet, with Mme. Caradori Allan, 'Vanne se alberghi in petto,' from 'Andronico.' She died, after nine days of nervous fever, at the Moseley Arms Hotel, Market Street. She was buried on Oct. 1, in the south aisle of the collegiate church, Manchester. Her remains were, soon afterwards, removed to Brussels, where they were reinterred in the cemetery of Laeken, where a mausoleum was erected by de Bériot, containing a bust of the great singer by the celebrated sculptor Geefs.

Malibran's charm seems to have consisted chiefly in the peculiarity of timbre and unusual extent of her voice, in her excitable temperament which prompted her to improvise passages of strange audacity upon the stage, and on her strong musical feeling which kept those improvisations nearly, but not quite, always within the bounds of good taste. That her voice was not faultless, either in quality or uniformity, seems certain. It was a contralto, having much of the soprano register super-added, and with an interval of dead notes intervening, to conceal which she used great ingenuity, with almost perfect success.

Many portraits of Malibran have appeared, none very good. A large one, after Hayter, representing her with a harp, as 'Desdemona,' is usually accounted the best; but it is only indifferent. Another, by R. J. Lane, A.R.A., showing her made up as 'Fidalma,' and then, afterwards, in a stage-box, in her usual dress, is much better.

Several biographies have appeared of this extraordinary person; that which was written by the Comtesse Merlin is little better than a romance. Malibran composed and published many nocturnes, songs and chansonnettes; some of the unpublished pieces were collected and published by Troupenas at Paris under the name of 'Dernières Pensées musicales de Mario-Félicité Garcia de Bériot,' in 4to. MALIPIERO, G. FRANCESCO (b. Venice, Mar. 18, 1882), studied at first at the Liceo Musicale of Bologna, then in Germany with Max Bruch. In 1921 he was appointed professor of composition at the Royal Conservatoire of Parma, which position he still holds.

Malipiero belongs to the most advanced group of Italian composers of the present day. He has been described as 'a classic imbued with the restless spirit of romanticism.' The definition is hardly adequate. There is little in his music to connect its author either with classics or romantics. On the other hand, the desire to break new ground, the characteristic restlessness of the present time, is evident everywhere—in the string quartet which won the prize at the Coolidge competition of 1920, as in the works he has written for the theatre. These are all marked by strong individuality as by wealth and originality of invention. Malipiero repudiates thematic development as he repudiates anything which savours of tradition—the orchestra of Beethoven, the form of Italian opera. For him perfect fusion of drama and music is found only in 'Pelléas et Mélisande.' But the Debussy opera is far from giving Malipiero the solution of the old problem of the relation between voice and orchestra in an ideal form of art. He wants music to respect not only the claims of the word, but even more the claims of mimic action. These reforms are embodied in the four operas—'Pantea,' 'Sette canzoni,' 'Le Baruffe Chiozzotte,' 'Orfeo'—written in less than two years (1917–1919). Of these the most interesting is the 'Sette canzoni,' a succession of episodes each of which centres round a canzone, while the rest is mimic action. 'Pantea' is mimic action pure and simple, the protagonist being the dancer whose motions are not meant to suggest beauty but 'moods of the soul.' The 'Baruffe Chiozzotte' is lively comedy based on Goldoni's masterpiece of that name. 'Orfeo' is pure satire. The staging of these works for the theatre is not less revolutionary than the music, which obeys no traditional law of harmony but only the composer's fancy. 'Sette canzoni' can be staged with the help of Gordon Craig's screens. But 'Orfeo' demands not only a stage on the stage, but a stage on which three additional platforms are utilised. If Malipiero's outspoken criticism of existing institutions has been resented, his reforms and daring have won him some stout defenders and admirers, notably Henry Prunières and G. M. Gatti.

Besides the compositions already mentioned Malipiero has written:

FOR THE THEATRE

- * Ellen e Fuldano, in 3 acts; text by S. Benco.
- * Rognu d'un tramonto d'autunno, on D'Annunzio's poem.
- * Caosna, in 1 act, text by S. Benco.

His literary contributions include, besides articles published in the Rivista musicale italiana, a short monograph on The Orchestra (Zanichelli, Bologna) and the texts of the four works for the theatre, 'Pantea,' 'Sette canzoni,' 'Baruffe Chiozzotte,' 'Orfeo.' He is also director of the library of the Istituto Editoriale of Milan.

MALLINGER, MATHILDE (b. Agram, Croatia, Feb. 17, 1847; d. Berlin, Apr. 19, 1920), a distinguished dramatic singer, was first taught singing there by her father, a professor of music, and Professor Lichtenegger later by Gordigiani and Vogl at the Prague Conservatorium from 1863-66, and finally by Richard Lewy at Vienna.

On the recommendation of Franz Lachner she was engaged at Munich, where she made her début as Norma, Oct. 4, 1866. She was the original Eva in the 'Meistersinger,' June 21, 1868. She made her débuts at Berlin as Elsa, Apr. 6, and Norma, Apr. 9, 1869. She was an excellent actress and a great favourite, married the Baron Schimmelpfennig von der Oye at Berlin, and remained there during her whole musical career until 1882. On leave of absence she played with success at Vienna, Munich, etc., and in Italian opera at St. Petersburg and Moscow, but with indifferent success. About 1871 a certain section of the Berlin public tried to establish her claim as leading singer as against Pauline Lucca, the then reigning favourite. Endless quarrels ensued on their account, which culminated in a performance of the 'Nozze,' Jan. 27, 1872, where they were both playing. On Lucca's entry as Cherubino she was hissed—in consequence of which she broke her contract in the following autumn and left for America. In 1890 Mme. Mallinger became professor of singing in the Conservatorium of Prague, and in 1895 returned to Berlin to teach in the Eichelberg Conservatorium.

MALLORIE (MALORIE, MAILFERY MALORY), an English church composer of the 16th century. There is a 5-part Miserere by him in Ch. Ch. partbooks (984-8), and also the tenor part of an anthem, 'O consider mine adversitie' by 'Malorie' (B.M. Add. MSS. 22,597/67). Another late 16th century MS. (B.M. Add. MSS. 31,390) contains fancies, in Nomines and arrangements of anthems, motets, etc., for viols by 16th century (chiefly English) composers, and includes a 5-part In Nomine by 'Malory,' an arrangement of a 5-part anthem by him, 'Praise the Lord, O my sowll,' as well as a 'Sol re sol my sol' for 6 viols. These various compositions (all in MSS. of the same period) are apparently the work of the same man.

J. M^r.

MALTEN (properly MÜLLER), THERÈSE (b. Insterburg, Eastern Prussia, June 21, 1855), was taught singing by Gustav Engel of Berlin. She made her début as Pamina and Agatha at Dresden in 1873, where she remained for thirty years as principal soprano, retiring at last on a pension. Her parts included Armida, Iphigenia, Fidelio, Jessonda, Genoveva, Leonora ('Trovatore'), Margaret; the heroines of Wagner; the Queen of Sheba in Goldmark's opera of that name; the Princess Marie in Kretschmer's 'Folkunger' on its production in 1874; Fulvia on the production of Hofmann's 'Arminius' in 1877, etc. On leave of absence she played in London, Berlin, Vienna.

In Aug. 1882 she appeared at Bayreuth as Kundry, at the instance of Wagner, who had a very high opinion of her ability, again in 1884, and at Munich, where she played the same part in private before King Ludwig, from whom she received the gold medal of Arts and Science.

She made a great impression on her début at Drury Lane under Richter as Fidelio, May 24, 1882, and during the season as Elsa, May 27; Elizabeth, June 3, and Eva, June 7. She reappeared in England at the Albert Hall on the production of 'Parsifal,' Nov. 10 and 15, 1884; at a Richter Concert in 1886; and at the Bristol Festival of 1896.

She possessed a voice of extraordinary compass, with deep and powerful notes in the lower register, and was an admirable actress, being especially successful in Wagner's operas.

MALVEZZI, CRISTOFANO (b. Lucca, July 27, 1547; d. Florence, Dec. 25, 1597),¹ was in 1571 a canon at the church of San Lorenzo in Florence, and on the death of Francesco Cortecchia succeeded him as maestro di cappella to the Grand Duke of Tuscany.

He is chiefly known as the editor of a collection of dramatic intermezzi which were performed on the occasion of the marriage of the Grand Duke Ferdinand with Christina of Lorraine in 1589. The work was published in fourteen partbooks for voices and instruments under the title,

'Intermedi et concerti, fatti per la commedia rappresentata in Firenze nelle nozze del . . . Ferdinando Medici e Madama Christiana di Lorena' . . . Venice, 1591.

It is remarkable as a foreshadowing of the attempts made, a few years later, towards the creation of a proper dramatic music by means of vocal monody with instrumental accompaniment. It is only a foreshadowing, however, as the pieces are all written in a simple madrigal style for 3, 4, 5, 6, 8 voices with dialoghi for 6 to 15 voices. The instruments employed are chiefly lutes and viols of different kinds with trombones and organ. Only in the larger pieces are all the instruments employed with the voices. Besides the editor himself the composers represented are Luca Marenzio, Jacopo Peri, Emilio de' Cavalieri and Giovanni Bardi, the three latter becoming afterwards the creators of the later Monodic style. The piece composed by Luca Marenzio is entitled 'Il combattimento d' Apolline col serpente.' From this a madrigal chorus for four voices, 'O valoroso Dio,' is reprinted by Kiesewetter in his Schicksale und Beschaffenheit des weltlichen Gesanges, 1841, who also gives three other pieces by Peri, Cavalieri and Archilei, which, though written in the simplest four-part counterpoint, were sung by one voice with one or two instruments playing the other parts.

Other works by Malvezzi are a book of Madrigals a 5, Venice, 1583, and one a 6, Venice, 1584, also a book of Ricercari a 4, 1577. A MANARA, FRANCESCO, ducal musician at the court of Ferrara, and (according to Fétis) singer at S. Antonio, Padua, between c. 1548–1591. He composed 4 books of madrigals a 4 v., 1 book of madrigals a 6 v., psalms, vespers, etc. (Q.-L.).

MANCHESTER. Before the war (1914–18) Manchester was undoubtedly the most important centre of music in the English provinces. To some extent this pre-eminence was due to the generous support given to the two most important institutions—the Hallé Concerts and the Royal Manchester College of Music, both founded by Sir Charles Hallé. The war, however, was a severe test for Manchester, for, having ever extended a liberal invitation to foreign, and mostly German, musicians, it was consequently dependent on their co-operation for its most important concerts. The genuine love of music of the Lancashire man and the enterprise of Sir T. Beecham, however, won through the difficult period, and its orchestral concerts are now as prosperous an undertaking as they have ever been.

The HALLÉ SOCIETY was formed to finance and control the concerts founded by Sir Charles Hallé after the Manchester Exhibition in 1857. Under his guidance the concerts soon became famous in the North of England. The Manchester orchestra and its conductor extended their activities to other Lancashire and Yorkshire towns. After the death of Hallé (1895) the orchestra was conducted for a time by visiting conductors, but the plan did not work satisfactorily and a temporary solution was found with the appointment of Frederic Cowen. In the meantime, however, Hans Richter had retired from the position he had long held with great distinction in Vienna, and learning this, the Manchester committee approached him with an offer which was finally accepted. Richter became the conductor of the Hallé Concerts in 1899 and held the appointment until 1911, when he resigned.

In many ways those were the most prosperous years for music in Manchester. While the name of its conductor gave new lustre to the orchestra, Arthur Johnstone—whose high promise was cut short by untimely death—was doing much to stimulate interest in musical matters throughout the North of England with his brilliant contributions in the columns of the Manchester Guardian. Those were the years of Elgar's swift rise to fame, and the composer found in Richter not only a very gifted exponent but a friend. Between the two there sprang up a friendship of far-reaching importance. If Richter did much to make Elgar's music appreciated in the North, Elgar on his part made no secret of his preference for Richter and his orchestra. The Manchester orchestra and its conductor were engaged for the Elgar Festival at Covent Garden. Richter, who had first conducted 'The Dream of Gerontius' at Birmingham (1900), was again engaged with his Manchester orchestra for the festivals of 1903 and 1906, when 'The Apostles' and 'The Kingdom' were first produced. The first symphony of Elgar was produced for the first time in Manchester and dedicated by the composer to Richter, 'true artist and true friend.' In the meantime the excellent tuition imparted at the Royal Manchester College of Music began to bear fruit, and the orchestra found employment for many a capable player trained at the local college.

As for the programmes performed during the Richter regime certain lacunæ can be found, but they are far less important than one would have reason to expect in the case of an institution guided by one man, whose sympathies, however catholic, must needs have some limitation. As an interpreter of the classics Richter, of course, was supreme. His concert performances of acts from Wagner's operas were equally celebrated. Of French composers he liked Berlioz best and this name appeared frequently in Richter's programmes. Franck he did not appreciate. But he devoted great care to the preparation of a performance of Debussy's 'L'Après-midi d'un Faune,' and the remark he made that 'there was something in his music which was not apparent in the score' defines aptly impressionistic art. Richard Strauss's compositions were frequently performed and with considerable success.

After Richter's retirement the conductorship of the orchestra for a while passed through various hands. Visiting conductors were responsible for the concerts given in the season 1911–12. In 1912 Michael BALLIN (q.v.) was appointed and continued as conductor till the outbreak of war in 1914. Amongst the most notable musicians associated some time or other with the orchestra should be remembered L. Strauss, Willy Hess, Adolph Brodsky, C. Risegari, C. Rawdon Briggs and Arthur Catterall (leaders); Simon Speelman (leader of the violas), Vieuxtemp and Carl Fuchs (leaders of the violoncelli). The post of chorus-master to the Hallé Society was long held by R. Wilson, who retired in 1924. After the war Hamilton Harty was appointed conductor, and under his leadership the high traditions of the orchestra have been worthily upheld.

The Hallé Concerts are a development of a much older society—the GENTLEMEN'S CONCERTS. These trace their origin as far back as 1745, when the concerts appear to have been a meeting-place of Jacobites.¹ In recent times the Hallé and the Gentlemen's Concerts shared the conductor. Mayas, Schira, Julius Benedict and George Smart preceded Hallé and Richter. Before Richter's retirement, however, it was sought to give the older society individual character with the appointment of Sir Henry J. Wood. But the Gentlemen's Concerts which had been concerned in the Musical Festivals held in 1828 and 1836 had no longer a raison d'être after the establishment of the Hallé Concerts, and with the war their activities came to an end.

At the beginning of the century two new organisations were started—the LADIES' CONCERTS and the FRENCH CONCERTS—the latter given with the avowed purpose to popularise French music. Saint-Saëns was once the guest of the French Concert Society, whose concerts were held in the hall of the Midland Hotel. Neither society lived long. The war also inevitably brought to an end the excellent series of chamber concerts which used to be given under the direction of Carl Fuchs at the Schiller Anstalt.

As regards opera Manchester is entirely dependent on visiting companies. When Richter first held the conductorship of the Hallé orchestra he made various suggestions with a view to establish opera in the North on a sound basis. But his advice was rejected, as were also rejected various proposals made later by Beecham, who played a prominent part in the music of Manchester from 1914–19.

THE ROYAL MANCHESTER COLLEGE OF MUSIC was founded by Hallé in 1893. On his death the then leader of the Hallé orchestra, Adolph Brodsky, was appointed to succeed him, and the college has prospered under his able direction. Amongst the artists who taught there have been Fillunger, Marie Brema, Egon Petri, Willy Hess, Carl Fuchs and Arthur Catterall sometime student under Brodsky. Most teachers of theory in the College hold also lectureships in the Manchester University, and students can prepare for the degrees of Bachelor and Doctor of Music.

Chamber music is mainly represented by the BRODSKY QUARTET CONCERTS established in 1896, of which there are six every year—all well attended and much appreciated. The balance of the receipts is devoted to the assistance of the students at the Royal Manchester College of Music.

Of the other Concert Societies the most notable is the MANCHESTER PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY, founded in 1880 by G. Brand Lane. Its speciality is choral music, but thanks to the co-operation of Sir Henry J. Wood very successful orchestral performances have also been secured.

The Manchester Vocal Society was formed in 1867, largely on the initiative of J. St. J. B. Joule. In 1885 Dr. Henry Watson was appointed as conductor, an appointment held now by Dr. Keighley.

Manchester possesses two specially fine organs—one by Cavallé-Coll, in the Town Hall, and one by Henry Willis, at the Whitworth Hall of the Manchester University. Dr. J. Kendrick Pyne, the city organist, gives occasional recitals on the latter, and regular Saturday evening recitals on the former. For the Henry Watson Music Library, see LIBRARIES.

MANCHICOURT, PIERRE DE (b. Béthune, Artois), French-Flemish composer of the earlier part of the 16th century. In 1539 he is described as Phonascus or choirmaster of Tournai Cathedral, and some time before 1556 received a canonry at Arras. He is said to have lived afterwards at Antwerp. His compositions, fairly numerous, chiefly motets and chansons with a few masses, mostly appeared in the miscellaneous collections of the time. Some volumes, however, contain works exclusively or almost exclusively by Manchicourt; a book of motets, nineteen in all, a 4-6, was published by Attaignant in 1539, another book of motets containing 14 a 5-6, was published by Phalèse at Louvain in 1554. This latter volume was dedicated by Manchicourt to Antoine Perrenot, Bishop of Arras, known afterwards as Cardinal Granvelle, and probably it was to him that the composer owed his canonry at Arras. In 1545 Tylman Susato of Antwerp published a book of twenty-nine chansons by Manchicourt. One of these chansons, 'Sortez mes pleurs,' has been reprinted in Commer's Collectio, tom. xii. Eitner, in Q.-J. (which, with Fétis, contains full list of titles), speaks in the highest terms of a motet, 'Vidi Speciosam,' a 8, taken from the Thesaurus of Montanus and Neuber, 1564; but none of Manchicourt's motets have yet been reprinted in modern score.

MANCINELLI, LUIGI (b. Orvieto, Feb. 5, 1848; d. Rome, Feb. 2, 1921), conductor and composer. At the age of 12 he went to Florence to be a pupil of Sbolci. The boy showed great aptitude for the violoncello, and his progress was very rapid.

Mancinelli's professional career began in Florence, where he was for a time one of the first violoncello-players in the orchestra of La Pergola. He was engaged in the same capacity at the Apollo in Rome in 1874, when this theatre, by unexpected circumstances, was left without a conductor. The impresario Jacovacci, thought of trying the ability of his first violoncellist, of whom he had heard favourable reports; and so Mancinelli was suddenly raised from the ranks to appear as a conductor. 'Aida' was the first opera conducted by him. In the following year Mancinelli was engaged to be the musical director at Jesi during the fêtes of Spontini's centenary. On this occasion he revived Spontini's 'La Vestale,' and he was re-engaged for the direction of the orchestra of the Apollo. In 1876 Mancinelli had his first success as a composer with his intermezzi to 'Messalina,' a drama by Pietro Cossa. The following year he wrote intermezzi to the 'Cleopatra' of the same author.

Mancinelli left Rome in 1881 for Bologna, where he was engaged to be the Principal of the Liceo Musicale, and at the same time the conductor of the Teatro Comunale, and the maestro di cappella of San Petronio, the old basilica of the famous university town. During his stay there he composed two masses and many other sacred pieces, introduced several improvements in the Liceo, organised a symphony and quartet society, and was the first to acquaint the Bolognese with vocal and instrumental music by foreign composers. In 1884 he gave the first performance of his opera, 'Isora di Provenza,' which was well received.

After five years he left Bologna, attracted, perhaps, to other countries by the prospect of pecuniary improvement in his position. During the season of 1886 he visited London, and gave a concert, in which he conducted classical works and some of his own compositions. The success of this concert brought him an invitation to write an oratorio for the next Norwich Festival, and the engagement to conduct the Italian Opera during the Jubilee season at Drury Lane. His powers as a conductor received full recognition; and his oratorio 'Isaías,' performed at Norwich in Oct. 1887, was unanimously praised. He was re-engaged by Harris as conductor for the season of 1888 at Covent Garden, and revisited London annually many times. His opera, 'Ero e Leandro,' first performed in concert form at the Norwich Festival of 1896, was presented on the stage at Madrid, Nov. 30, 1897, and at Covent Garden on July 11, 1898. From 1888-95 Mancinelli held the place of musical director and conductor at the Theatre Royal of Madrid. He was conductor of the operatic enterprises carried on by Harris at the Metropolitan Opera, New York. His cantata, 'Saint Agnes,' was given at the Norwich Festival of 1905. His opera, 'Paolo e Francesca,' was produced at Bologna, Nov. 11, 1907.

MANCINI, FRANCESCO (b. Naples, 1679; d. there, 1739), an Italian composer, important in English musical history for his opera 'Hydaspes' or 'L' Idaspe fedele,' produced at the Haymarket (or Queen's) Theatre in London, May 23, 1710.

Mancini was a pupil at the Conservatorio di San Loreto at Naples and afterwards a teacher there and its principal master (1728). He composed at least 20 operas for performance at Naples, some oratorios, and other works, and his reputation in Italy was very high.

'Hydaspes' or 'L' Idaspe fedele' followed the anonymous 'ALMAHIDE' (q.v.) which was performed in the January of the same year. 'Almahide' and 'Hydaspes' were of the series of Italian operas given before Handel's advent in England, and were the first to be wholly given in that language. 'Camilla,' 1706, and some others were, according to Colley Cibber (Life, 1740 ed. p. 262), sung at their representation by the singers in their native tongues, Italian or English as the case might be. 'Hydaspes' was brought on to the stage by Nicolini, and the libretto was dedicated to the then Lord Chamberlain, the Marquis of Kent; it was staged with much finery in decoration. The principal singers in it were Nicolini, Valentini, Signora Margarita de l'Epine, afterwards the wife of Dr. Pepusch, and some other Italians. One of the features of the piece was a combat between Nicolini and a sham lion: this incident is amusingly treated in No. 13 of the Spectator. 'Hydaspes' was performed twenty-one times, and was well received. The songs were published in a folio volume by Walsh and Haro, contemporary with the production of the opera. At the Lincoln's Inn Fields Theatre in 1719 was performed a parody of it by a Mrs. Aubert, entitled 'Harlequin Hydaspes, or the Groshamite.'

F. K.

MANCINI, GIAMBATTISTA (b. Ascoli 1716; d. Vienna, Jan. 4, 1800), was a celebrated teacher of singing, a pupil of Bernacchi and Padre Martini. He settled in Vienna about 1760 as singing-teacher to the royal princesses. He produced a book on the art of coloratura singing called Pensieri e riflessioni pratiche sopra il canto figurato (1774), which was twice translated into French. (Riemann.) His estimate of Farinelli's art is quoted in the article FARINELLI (q.v.).

MANCINUS, THOMAS (b. Schwerin, Mecklenburg 1550; d. Wolfenbüttel, c. 1620¹), was cantor at the Dom-Schule (Cathedral School) at Schwerin from 1572-78; in 1584 became a member of the chapel of the Duke of Brunswick at Wolfenbüttel, and in 1587 was appointed Kapellmeister. He was afterwards employed as librarian to the Duke. He is the author of two simple settings of the Passion according to St. Matthew and St. John, first published in 1620, and since reprinted in Schöberlein's Schatz des liturgischen Gesanges. With the exception of a book of German secular songs a 4 and 5, his other works are mostly occasional compositions for weddings and funerals, in the form of motets and madrigals, with Latin or German texts. MANDOLINE (Ital. mandolino) is a small and very beautifully formed stringed instrument of the lute kind, with deeper convexity of back than the lute. It is, as its name implies, less in size than the MANDÓLA or MANDÓRA, a much scarcer instrument.¹ Mandóla, or mandóla, signifies 'almond,' and it has been supposed that the shape of the instrument has given it the name. But this cannot be accepted, since the almost universal use of the syllable 'man' unchanged, or changed by phonetic variation to 'ban,' 'pan,' 'tan,' etc., for the first syllable of names of lute instruments from East to West, removes it to a wider etymological field.

There are two varieties of mandoline, the Neapolitan (see PLATE XXIII. No. 2) and the Milanese; the former having four pairs of strings, the latter usually five. The Milanese 'mandurina' is tuned

There is one at South Kensington with six pairs, tuned

The Milanese variety, however, is rare in comparison with the Neapolitan, the tuning of which is like that of the violin, in fifths. The lowest pair of strings is of gut, spun over with silver or copper, like a guitar first string; the next of steel also spun over; the second and first pairs are of steel only. Mahillon,² says that the lowest pair is of gut, the third pair of steel, the second pair of copper, and the first pair of gut. Berlioz recommends that the G strings should be of gut spun with wire, the D strings of brass, the A of steel and the E of thin gut. The mandoline is played with a plectrum of tortoiseshell, whalebone, horn or ostrich-quill, more or less flexible, which is held in the right hand, the left being employed to stop the strings, for which purpose there are seventeen frets across the finger-board. The scale of the instrument is three octaves and one note, from the G below the treble staff to the octave of A above it. The serenade in Mozart's 'Don Giovanni,' 'Deh vieni,' was written to be accompanied by the mandoline, and Grétry wrote a charming accompaniment for it in the serenade in 'L'Amant jaloux.' There is a song with mandoline accompaniment in Michael Arne's 'Almena' (1764).³

The mandoline is not, however, the correct instrument for Don Juan, who would have played a bandurria, a kind of half-guitar and truly national Spanish instrument, sometimes incorrectly called a mandoline. The back of the bandurria is flat; it has only in common with the mandoline that it is played with a plectrum of tortoiseshell, called in Spanish 'púa,' and that it is the practice to insert a plate of the same substance in the table below the sound-hole to prevent the plectrum scratching. The bandurria has now twelve strings tuned in pairs, though in the 17th century it had only half that number; the higher three notes of catgut, the lower of silk overspun with metal. It is tuned much more deeply than the mandoline. The compass is in all three octaves.

In Spain the bandurria is not entirely a popular instrument. A trio of two bandurias and a guitar is an admirable combination for the performance of serious music in the open air; pieces by Falla, Albéniz, Granados, Debussy and even Domenico Scarlatti have been arranged for it, with very happy results.

Beethoven's friend Krumpholtz was a virtuoso on the mandoline, and this probably explains the fact of Beethoven's having written a piece for the instrument (Thayer, ii. 49). The autograph is to be found in the volume of MS. sketches and fragments preserved in the B.M., Add. MSS., 29,801. Though entitled 'Sonatina per il mandolina (sic). Composta da L. v. Beethoven,' it is only in one movement, and was probably printed for the first time in the first edition of this Dictionary. Together with an adagio in E flat for mandoline and harpsichord, it is contained in the supplementary volume (serie xxv.) of Beethoven's works in Breitkopf & Härtel's complete edition.

MANDORE (LUTINA, TESTUDO MINOR). A small stringed instrument of the lute class having a rounded back, 4 strings or sets of strings, a short neck, and played with a plectrum. (See PLATES XLV., XLVI.) The name is probably a corruption of the oriental word Pandoura (see PANDORE and TAMBURA). It was very popular with the Jongleurs of the 12th and 13th centuries, and appears in illustrations of English workmanship towards the close of the 14th century, but it does not seem to have been so much esteemed in this country as the citole and gittern. Among the sculptures and carvings which adorn our ancient churches it is frequently portrayed in the hands of angelic minstrels and placed across the breast. A 16th century collection of pieces for the mandore, preserved in the Advocate's Library, Edinburgh, shows us that it at that time had 5 pairs or sets of double strings and that either the fingers or a plectrum were used in playing it. The mandorichen or pandurina, described by Praetorius, was still smaller and could be

MANDYCZEWSKI, EUSEBIUS (b. Czernowitz, Aug. 18, 1857), is famous as an editor and as keeper of the archives of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in VIENNA (q.v.).

The son of a Greek Orthodox priest, Mandyczewski studied with Nottbohm in Vienna and there laid the foundation of his profound scholarship in the masters of the Viennese school. His publications are by no means commensurate with his learning, but we owe to him the complete edition of Schubert's works, and that of Haydn's works still (1927) in progress. In 1897 began his connexion with the Conservatorium at Vienna, where he has taught the history of music and of instruments, counterpoint and composition. (See Riemann.) C.

MANÉN, JUAN (b. Barcelona, Mar. 14, 1883), Spanish violinist and composer; author of the operas 'Neron y Acte' (performed Leipzig, Dresden, Cologno, Wiesbaden), 'Camino del Sol'; a symphony; violin concerto; caprices (vln. and orch.) and other works and transcriptions for violin. He has edited the complete works of Paganini, and is a violinist of outstanding ability and perfection of style.

MANENTI, GIOVANNI PIERO, of Bologna; musician to the Grand-Duke of Tuscany in 1574; still living in 1586. He composed 3 books of madrigals, 4-6 v., 1 book of songs (li pratolini) a 5 v., and single numbers in collective volumes (Q.-L.).

MANGOLD, a numerous 18th-century family of excellent musicians, the most prominent being (1) AUGUST DANIEL (b. Darmstadt, July 25, 1775; d. there, 1842). About the beginning of the 19th century he was solo violoncellist at the Frankfort Theatre, toured for some time with his nephew, the violinist Wilhelm, and in 1814 became solo violoncellist of the Grand-Ducal orchestra at Darmstadt with the title Konzertmeister. He wrote solos, etc., for his instrument. (2) WILHELM (b. Darmstadt, Nov. 19, 1796; d. there, May 23, 1875), nephew of August Daniel, studied under Rinck and Abbé Vogler, and through the recommendation of Spontini and Méhul he was permitted to study at the Paris Conservatoire under Méhul and Cherubini, 1815-18. He was an excellent violinist, and after the tour with his uncle in Holland he became court-Konzertmeister at Darmstadt in 1819 and court-Kapellmeister in 1825. He composed several operas, overtures, chamber music, etc. (3) KARL LUDWIG AMAND (b. Darmstadt, Oct. 8, 1813; d. Oberstdorf (Allgäu), Aug. 5, 1889), brother of Wilhelm, from whom and from his father he received his first musical education. He studied at the Paris Conservatoire, 1836-39; became court Musikdirektor in 1848, and after being pensioned he conducted the Mozart Society, 1869-73. He composed oratorios, operas, cantatas, orchestral works, etc., but his chief claim to fame rests on his excellent songs for male chorus which still retain their popularity (Q.-L.; Mendel; Riemann).

MANICORDE, see CLAVICHORD.

MANIER (Ger.), lit. 'manner'; derived, like our word 'manner,' through the French manière 'a manner,' and manier, 'to handle,' from the Latin manus, 'a hand.' It has two entirely distinct meanings, one dealing with the aesthetics of music, the other with its technicalities. In the first of these connections the word signifies 'mannerism,' or the faulty adherence to some peculiarity in style, bringing such peculiarity into undue prominence. It is the abuse of individuality, without which quality no great thing can be accomplished in any art.

The second meaning of the word is the same as the French agrément, ornaments introduced into, and built upon, the melody, whether indicated by small notes, or marks, or added at the will of the performer. (See ORNAMENT, where the subject is fully treated.) J. M.

MANN, ARTHUR HENRY, Mus.D. (b. Norwich, May 16, 1850), was a chorister in the cathedral under Dr. Buck. He was a Fellow of the College of Organists in 1871, and took the Mus. B. degree at Oxford in 1874 and that of Mus.D. in 1882. He held the post of organist at St. Peter's, Wolverhampton, from 1870; at Tottenham Parish Church from 1871; and was appointed to Beverley Minster in 1875. In the following year he was elected organist and director of the choir at King's College, Cambridge. Here his work as a choir-trainer has borne good fruit. His more ambitious compositions include an oratorio, 'Ecce Homo,' 1882; and a Te Deum, 1887, besides services, anthems, etc. He has written numerous hymn tunes, which have become widely known, and has edited several successful hymn-books, as well as bringing out an edition of Tallis's famous 'Forty-part Song' (1888). He is an earnest student of the work of Handel, and made a minute study of the sketches, etc., in the Fitzwilliam Museum, contributing an important section on them to the Catalogue of Music, published in 1893. In 1894 the discovery of the original wind parts of the 'Messiah' in the Foundling Hospital—in which he was partly concerned—was followed by a performance of the oratorio with a reconstructed score, in King's College Chapel. He was appointed choirmaster of the Norwich Festival in 1902. (Brit. Mus. Biog.) M.

MANNERS, CHARLES (real name SOUTHCOTE MANSEERGH) (b. London, Dec. 27, 1857), was the son of Colonel Mansergh, R.H.A. and J.P. for Cork and Tipperary. He was taught singing at the Royal Irish Academy of Music in Dublin and the R.A.M. in London, at the latter for a short time by Shakespeare, and later in Italy. In 1881 he began his career as a chorus-singer, and joined Carte's travelling company. On Nov. 25, 1882, he made a successful début as Private Willis on the production of 'Iolanthe' at the Savoy Theatre. He next sang in the provinces with the Carl Rosa Company, and appeared in 1890 at Covent Garden as Bertram in 'Roberto.' On Oct. 17, 1892, he sang the part of Prince Gremin on the production in England of Tchaikovsky's 'Eugene Oniegin' under Lago at the Olympic Theatre, and later as the King in 'Lohengrin.' In 1893 he sang in America. From 1894-96 he was engaged by Harris both for English and Italian opera, also by Hedmondt in the autumn of 1895, notably as the King in 'Maritana,' Mephistopheles, etc. His voice was a basso cantante of remarkably fine quality. In 1896-97 he undertook a successful English opera tour in South Africa. On his return he established the Moody-Manners Opera Company, and made extensive tours in the provinces, with three separate companies, the principal company being 115 in number, with a repertory of thirty operas. In 1902 and 1903 he gave two seasons at Covent Garden, and in 1904 a longer one at Drury Lane. In the latter year and in 1906, with characteristic generosity, he gave an operatic festival, without personal profit, at Sheffield, in aid of funds for the foundation of a university in that town. By giving prizes for the best operas produced by British composers, and by giving opportunities to provincial amateurs of seeing great operas, the Moody-Manners Company exerted a good influence on contemporary music.

His wife, née FANNY MOODY (b. Redruth, Cornwall, Nov. 23, 1866), was taught singing by Mme. Sinton-Dolby at her private Academy. On Apr. 25, 1885, she sang the principal soprano music in her mistress's last composition, 'Florimel,' a cantata for female voices, at a Memorial Concert at Prince's Hall, under Sinton. In Feb. 1887 she made her début as Arline in the 'Bohemian Girl' at Liverpool with the Carl Rosa Company, and on Apr. 30 appeared very successfully as Micaëla at Drury Lane. After singing in the provinces with that company for three years she reappeared at Drury Lane in 1890 as Mignon, Margaret, etc. She was married to Charles Manners on July 5, 1890, and in October sang in Italian as Margaret and Alice. In 1892 she was the original English Tatiana in Tchaikovsky's opera above mentioned. She accompanied her husband on all his tours, and sang in his London seasons, in addition to parts mentioned, Elizabeth, Elsa, Brünnhilde in 'Siegfried,' Juliet; Sept. 26, 1902, the heroine on the production of Pizzi's 'Rosalba' at Covent Garden; Sept. 22, 1903, Miliza on the production at Covent Garden of M'Alpin's 'Crescent and the Cross,' founded on Coppée's 'Pour la Couronne,' which won the £250 prize offered by the artists; on June 17, 1904, she sang the part of Senta in the revival of 'The Flying Dutchman,' at Drury Lane, etc. The possessor of a pleasant light soprano voice, an actress and singer of great charm, Madame Fanny Moody excelled in the poetic and pathetic parts formerly associated with Christine Nilsson.

MANNS, SIR AUGUST (b. Stolzenburg, near Stettin, Mar. 12, 1825; d. Norwood, Mar. 1, 1907), a German bandmaster, who settled in England, created the CRYSTAL PALACE SATURDAY CONCERTS (q.v.) and as their conductor exerted a powerful influence on English music.

Born of poor parents his first teacher was the village musician at the village of Torgelow, from whom he learnt the violin, clarinet and flute. His next instruction was received from Urban, the town musician of Elbing, near which his parents had removed, and to whom he was apprenticed. Here he had regular practice in an orchestra, especially that of the Dantzic opera company during its annual visits to Elbing; and this led to his entering one of the regimental bands of Dantzic as first clarinet, while he played among the first violins at the theatre. He now began to arrange and compose for the band, and generally to take a prominent part in the music of the place. In 1848 the regiment was transferred to Posen, and here Manns was noticed by Wicprecht, and through his assistance transferred himself from the military band to Gungl's orchestra in Berlin, and was at length advanced to the post of conductor and solo-violin player at Kroll's Garden—the Crystal Palace of Berlin. Here, under Gyer, he worked hard at harmony and composition, and produced much dance music and other pieces which were very popular. After the destruction of Kroll's establishment by fire in 1851, Manns was chosen by von Roon (subsequently war minister), then in command of a crack infantry regiment at Königsberg, to be his bandmaster. Colonel von Roon gave his bandmaster every opportunity of display. At his instance Beethoven's symphonies were arranged for the band, and in other ways the music of the regiment was made very prominent. It was soon afterwards moved from Königsberg to Cologne, and there enjoyed a still greater reputation. Manns, however, longed for a wider field, and he fortunately accepted, in the spring of 1854, an engagement as sub-conductor in the band of the Crystal Palace, then a wind band only, under Herr Schallehn. This position he gave up in October, and after following his profession at Leamington and Edinburgh (in Wood's opera band) he became conductor of the summer concerts at Amsterdam in 1855, and finally, in the autumn of that year, was engaged as conductor of the Crystal Palace band, a post upon which he entered on Oct. 14, 1855. Manns's duties as conductor, both of the daily music and of the Saturday concerts, as well as of the numerous fêtes and extra performances, where music had to be arranged for large combined masses of wind and string, were naturally very arduous. In 1859 he conducted the Promenade Concerts at Drury Lane, and the winter series at Glasgow in 1879 and following years. In 1883 he replaced Sir Michael Costa as conductor of the Handel Festival, and conducted the subsequent festivals until 1900. He conducted the Sheffield Festivals of 1896 and 1899. He continued to conduct the Saturday Concerts at the Crystal Palace until 1901. He was knighted in 1903.

It was said that—

'the German conductor makes the orchestra express all the modifications of feeling that an imaginative soloist would give voice to on a single instrument.'¹

To this power of wielding his band Manns accustomed his audience during the years of his conductorship. It is not too much to say that his persistent performance of the works of Schumann—to name but one composer out of several—in the early part of his career at Sydenham, made the London public acquainted with them years before they would otherwise have become so.

MANTIUS, EDUARD (b. Schwerin, Jan. 18, 1806; d. Ilmenau, Thuringia, July 4, 1874), a tenor singer of great reputation in Northern Germany. He studied law, first in 1825, at the university of Rostock, and afterwards at Leipzig. It was at the latter place that his fine voice attracted general attention and that he began to study singing under Pohlenz. After having sung with great success at a festival at Halle, conducted by Spontini, he went to Berlin, and by his interpretation of the tenor parts in Handel's oratorios (Samson, Judas, etc.), soon became the declared favourite of the Berlin public. How much his talent was appreciated in the house of the Mendelssohn family may be gathered from many passages in the published letters and other books relating to Mendelssohn. It was Mantius who sang the principal tenor part in the Liederspiel, 'Die Heimkehr aus der Fremde' ('Son and Stranger'), at the celebration of the silver wedding of the elder Mendelssohns (Devrient, p. 89). In 1830 he made his first appearance on the stage at Berlin as Tamino in the 'Zauberflöte.' In 1857 he gave his farewell performance as Florestan in 'Fidelio.' During twenty-seven years he had appeared in no less than 152 characters. After quitting the stage he devoted himself with much success to teaching. Mantius not only had an exceptionally fine voice, which he knew how to use in a truly artistic and musical manner, but was also a remarkably good actor. His representations of the tenor parts in Mozart's and Gluck's operas were justly regarded as models of their kind.

The term is used chiefly in reference to the organ, where the keyboards for the hands and the keyboard for the feet have, for convenience, to be distinguished by some brief and suggestive name. Clavier (from clavis, a key) simply means a keyboard, without reference to the members of the body with which it is to be played.

MANX MUSIC. The isolated position of the Isle of Man might be expected to produce a distinct type of national music. So little attention has hitherto been devoted to collecting the traditional melodies of the island that we are really left much in the dark as to the chief characteristics of the music that may be said to have had its origin there. In most of the tunes noted down from peasant singers in the Isle of Man the present writer finds much of Celtic character, a character common to certain classes of Gaelic music.

It must be admitted that in music claimed as Manx we find imperfect recollections of English and Irish folk-tunes, as well as of some well-known published airs. For instance, in one collection there is a shortened version of the well-known air 'Push about the Jorum,' and again the 17th-century tune, 'The Buff Coat hath no fellow' (see Chappell's 'Popular Music of the Olden Time'). There is also among Manx folk-song versions of the airs, generally accepted as Irish, 'Charley Reilly' (see Bunting, 1840), and 'Green Bushes,' while we also find 'Seventeen come Sunday,' and 'Colin and Phoebe.' This is sufficient to indicate that outside influence has had its effect at an early time on the music born of the people. The passing of fishermen to and from the Irish and Scottish coasts easily accounts for this diffusion of popular melody.

There can be no doubt that a great store of beautiful melody lies hid, or at any rate at one time existed among the farmers and the fishermen of the remoter districts, and it is to be hoped that following the lead of such bodies as the 'Folk-Song Society,' a combined effort will be made to rescue what is left of it.

Apparently the first notice of Manx national song is the mention made by Robert Burns in a letter to George Thomson, dated Nov. 1794. Speaking of the air now known as 'Ye Banks and Braes o' bonny Doon,' Burns, after mentioning that an Irish gentleman had told him that it was known among the old women of Ireland, continued, that 'a Countess informed me that the first person who introduced the air into this country was a baronet's lady of her acquaintance, who took down the notes from an itinerant piper in the Isle of Man.'

Probably what is now recognised as the national tune of the Isle of Man is 'Myle-charane.' The melody of this is strikingly original, with a peculiar plaintiveness in it. Several versions of it have been published, together with the long ballad associated with the air of which there are several translations. Copies of the air are to be found in 'English County Songs,' edited by Miss L. E. Broadwood and J. A. Fuller Maitland, 1893, and 'Manx National Songs' arranged by W. H. Gill (1896). Another song, and a very beautiful one, that has all the elements of original Manx feeling in it, is 'Ny Kirree fo-aniahtey' ('The Sheep under the Snow'). Copies of this are to be found in 'English County Songs,' 'Manx National Songs' (Gill), and Moffat and Kidson's 'Minstrelsy of England,' the version in this last case being taken from 'Mona's Melodies,' edited by C. St. George, and published in London in 1820. This work is the first attempt to put into print Manx melodies. The book is extremely scarce. It contains but thirteen tunes, and it is doubtful how much, or how little these airs have been 'edited.' The tunes have verses adapted to them bearing no relation to the Manx originals. The next issue of Manx music was in July 1896, 'Manx National Songs, with English words, selected from the MS. collection of The Deemster Gill, Dr. J. Clague, and W. H. Gill. (Boosey.) This contains fifty-one melodies, many of great excellence.

MANZUOLI, GIOVANNI (b. Florence, c. 1725). Having acquired a reputation in Italy, he repaired, in 1753, to Madrid, where he was engaged at a high salary by Farinelli. In 1764 and 1765 he came to London, and, by his performance, 'the serious opera acquired a degree of favour to which it had seldom mounted since its first establishment in this country.'¹ His voice was the most powerful soprano that had been heard on our stage since the time of Farinelli, and his style was full of taste and dignity. The applause he earned was hearty and unequivocal; 'it was a universal thunder.' Other singers had more art and feeling; none possessed a sweeter or fuller organ. As to execution, he had none; but he was a good actor, though unwieldy in figure, and ill-made. Nor was he young; but the sensation he excited seems to have been irresistible. All the composers struggled to have the honour of writing for him; even Dr. Arne composed his unsuccessful 'Olimpiade' for the popular singer. Manzuoli, however, left England at the end of the season, and did not return. In the same year he was at Vienna, and he shortly afterwards retired to his native place, with the title of 'Singer to the Court of the Grand Duke of Tuscany.'

In a letter of Mozart's,² his first after starting on his Italian tour, Jan. 7, 1770, he says of a singer whom he heard, 'canta un poco Manzuo-lisch ed a una bellissima voce forte ed è già vecchio,' etc. Burney heard him again, in September of that year, taking part in a service in a convent near Florence, and was delighted, though the voice seemed less powerful, even in a small church, than when he was in England. His name occurs once more, in one of the elder Mozart's letters, written in the following August, 'Manzuoli often visits us'; and he is included among 'the singers, not only celebrated in their profession, but good-hearted and sensible people.' He took part in the 'Serenata' composed by the young Mozart in honour of the nuptials of the Archduke Ferdinand, at Milan, Oct. 17, 1771, and was encoired in one of his songs. Mozart writes again, Nov. 24, 1771:

'Herr Manzuoli, the musico, who has always been considered and esteemed as the best of his class, has in his old age given a proof of his folly and arrogance. He was engaged at the Opera for the sum of 500 gigliati (ducats), but as no mention was made of the Serenata in the contract, he demanded 500 ducats more for singing in it, making 1000. The court only sent him 700 and a gold box (and enough too, I think), but he returned the 700 ducats and the box, and went away without anything. I don't know what the result of this history will be,—a bad one, I fear!'

A good portrait of Manzuoli was engraved by G. B. Betti, after a design by L. Botti. Among his pupils was the celebrated Coltellini.

MAPLESON, JAMES HENRY (b. 46 Leicester Square, London, May 4, 1830; d. London, Nov. 14, 1901), a well-known impresario. He became a student at the R.A.M. (1844), appeared in public as a singer, and for some time played among the violas in the orchestra. In Feb. 1854 he sang in opera at Verona, under the name of Enrico Mariani. Later he was assistant to E. T. Smith at Her Majesty's Theatre, and when Smith announced, in 1861, his intention of abandoning Italian Opera, Mapleson took the Lyceum, and began his career as a manager. He opened there on June 5, 1861; and on the 15th produced Verdi's 'Ballo in maschera' for the first time in England. His first season at Her Majesty's was 1862, when Trebelli made her début in England; the burning of Her Majesty's drove him to Drury Lane in 1868. He joined Gye in 1869; the coalition lasted two seasons, and in 1871 he returned to Drury Lane. On Apr. 28, 1877, he reopened Her Majesty's Theatre, and had a few seasons there with varying success. 'Colonel' Mapleson, as he was called, was in the habit of taking his company to the United States in the intervals of the London season. The Mapleson Memoirs, an amusing volume of reminiscences, appeared in 1888.

MARA, LA, see LIPSIVS, Marie.

MARA, GERTRUDE ELISABETH (b. Cassel, Feb. 23, 1749; d. Revel, Jan. 20, 1833), one of the greatest singers of the 18th century. Her mother died soon after the birth of this child, and her father, a poor musician, named Schmeling, is said to have adopted the plan of securing his little daughter in an arm-chair, while he attended to his affairs. From this cause, it appears, she fell into a rickety state, from which it was long ere she recovered, if indeed she ever recovered entirely. Schmeling contrived to increase his income by mending musical instruments, and the little Gertrude one day got hold of a violin, and began to draw musical sounds from it, being then only 4 years old. For this she was punished by her father; but the temptation was too strong to be resisted, and she seized every opportunity of practising on such instruments as she could find, whenever Schmeling's back was turned. He found her, however, before long, to his astonishment, playing on a violin, on which she had mastered a scale. Struck with her genius, he gave her a few lessons, and found her so apt a pupil that, not long afterwards, he was able to play duets with her before a few amateurs. But even now, in her fifth year, the poor child could not stand without support, and her father was obliged to carry her to the place where she was to play. By favour of an amateur, Schmeling and his child were enabled to visit the fair at Frankfort, where the little girl's performance excited great wonder. A subscription was set on foot, a better education was given to her, and when she had reached the age of 9 her health had improved, and she was able to proceed to Vienna with her father, and there give some concerts. The English ambassador advised Schmeling to take the child to England, advice on which the poor musician, furnished with letters of introduction by the ambassador, gladly acted. He soon obtained the patronage of many noble and influential persons, including the Queen, for his wonderful child. The little girl, potted and admired by all the great ladies, was, however, persuaded by them to give up the violin, which they thought an unfeminine instrument, and was encouraged to sing. Her voice was already resonant and clear, but she had, of course, had no instruction. Schmeling, by the help of her protectresses, placed the young Gertrude under the tuition of the musico Paradies. She made rapid progress, but it soon became necessary to remove her from the power of her profligate instructor.

Returning to Cassel, Schmeling found it impossible to get an engagement for his daughter, as he had hoped, at the court; for the King would not hear of any but Italian singers. Hiller now received her into his music school, at Leipzig, where she remained for five years. In 1771 she came out from this academy, with a voice remarkable for its extent and beauty, a great knowledge of music, and a brilliant style of singing. She was the first great singer that Germany had produced. Her education had been formed on the music of Hasse, Graun, Benda, Jommelli, Pergolesi, Porpora and Sacchini; but Hasse, with his vocal passages and facile style, was her favourite master. Her voice extended from the g' to e'''. She made her début in an opera of Hasse's at Dresden, and was successful. With difficulty, the King, Frederick II., was persuaded to hear her; and, though strongly prejudiced against her on account of her nationality, he was immediately converted by her singing an air of Graun's at sight, and finally engaged her for life to sing at court, with a salary of fr. 11,250. Here she profited by the hints of Concialini and Porporino, and perfected her singing of slow and legato airs.

It was at this juncture that, in spite of all advice, and although the King twice refused his consent, she married the violoncellist, Mara. She soon discovered her folly, and regretted it when too late. This part of her life was extremely unhappy; she was made miserable on the one hand by the excesses of a debauched and dissipated husband, and on the other by the tyranny of a king who allowed her no liberty or indulgence. On one occasion she was actually brought from her bed, by his orders, transmitted through an officer and guard of soldiers, and forced to sing at the Opera, though complaining, truly or untruly, of indisposition. She at length succeeded in escaping to Dresden, where she was detained by the Prussian ambassador. Frederick, however, who had lost some front teeth, and could no longer play the flute, cared now but little for music, and gave her a tardy permission to annul her engagement. Mme. Mara, free at last, arrived in 1780 at Vienna, where Storace was playing in opera buffa, for which the Emperor had a great liking. This was not Mara's line, and she was coldly received. Provided, however, with a letter to Marie-Antoinette from the Empress, she passed through Germany, Holland and Belgium, singing at various places on her way. At Munich Mozart heard her, but was not favourably impressed. He wrote, Nov. 13, 1780:

'Mara has not the good fortune to please me. She does too little to be compared to a Bastardella (yet this is her peculiar style), and too much to touch the heart like a Weber [Aloysia], or any judicious singer.'

He tells a story of her and her husband a few days later (letter of Nov. 24), which shows both of them in a very unpleasant light, as behaving with foolish effrontery and pretension. She was again at Vienna in Mar. 1781, and Mozart mentions her as giving a concert there. She reached Paris in 1782. Here she found the celebrated Todi, and a rivalry immediately sprang up between these two singers, which divided society into factions, as when Handel and Bononcini, or Gluck and Piccini, were opposed to each other by amateurs incapable of admiring both. Many anecdotes are told of the Mara and Todi dispute, among which one has become famous. At a concert where both singers appeared, an amateur asked his neighbour, 'Quelle était la meilleure': to which the other replied, 'C'est Mara.' 'C'est bien Todi' (bientôt dit) was the punning answer.

Two years later, in the spring of 1784, Mara made her first appearance in London, where her greatest successes awaited her. She was engaged to sing six nights at the Pantheon. Owing to the general election, she sang to small audiences, and her merits were not recognised until she sang at Westminster Abbey, in the Handel Commemoration, when she was heard with delight by nearly 3000 people. She sang in the repeated Commemoration in 1785, and in 1786 made her first appearance on the London stage in a serious pasticcio, 'Didone abbandonata,' the success of which was due entirely to her singing. In Mar. 1787 Handel's opera of 'Giulio Cesare' was revived for a benefit, and Mara played in it the part of Cleopatra, which Cuzzoni had sung in 1724. It was so successful that it was constantly repeated during the season. Mara again took a leading part in the Festival in Westminster Abbey in 1787, and she remained connected with the opera in London till 1791, after which, though she sang occasionally on the stage, and even in English ballad operas, she was more frequently heard in concerts and oratorios. For these she was better suited, as her figure was not good enough for the theatre, nor was she a good actress. It is, indeed, not impossible that her stage-presence was still to some extent spoiled by the disease which crippled her as a child; and there is a caricature in which she is shown, singing at a 'Wapping Concert' seated (Feb. 28, 1786), with the following apology below:

'MADAM MARY . . . begs her Polite Audience will excuse her sitting during the Performance, as she contracted in her infancy a Disorder called Le Genou Inflexible, or (Stiff Knee) which prevents her standing, even in the most Sacred Pieces of Music—her Enemies call it Pride, but it must appear only malice, when she could not rise before their Majesties; or at the Sacred Name of Jehovah.'

There is, again, a letter of Mara's extant,¹ in which she apologises for not being able even to sit on a platform throughout a concert, a thing she had never been able to do, owing to the heat and fatigue, which she could not bear. Her health was, in fact, never strong. She had, however, the advantage of knowing our language, which she had learnt in childhood, during her first visit to England; and she is said to have gained large sums here by her oratorio-singing.

In 1788 she was singing in the Carnival at Turin, and the following year at Venice. She returned to London in 1790, and went to Venice again in 1791. Coming once more to London in the next season, she remained here for ten years. After this time, she found her voice losing strength, and she quitted England in 1802, after enjoying a splendid benefit of over £1000 at her farewell concert. She sang without effect at Paris, where she had the misfortune to come after Grassini; and then, after passing through Germany, Mara retired to Moscow, where she bought a house.

Her worthless husband, and her numerous lovers—among whom the last was a flute player named Florio—had helped her to spend the immense sums which she had earned, until she found herself without means, and compelled to support herself by teaching. By following this occupation, she acquired a small competence, which was again lost to her (1812) in the fire of Moscow, which destroyed the merchant's house in which she had placed it. Forced to begin once more to seek a means of subsistence, when almost 64 years old, Mara travelled in Livonia, where she was kindly received, and settled in Revel. She now supported herself again for about four years by teaching, and then formed the strange desire to revisit London, the scene of her former glory. Here she arrived in 1819 (according to Fétis), though Lord Mount-Edgumbe puts her visit before the burning of Moscow. In any case, the poor old woman, announced in a mysterious manner by Messrs. Knyvett as 'a most celebrated singer whom they were not at liberty to name,' appeared at the King's Theatre, when it was discovered that not a shred of her voice remained—and never appeared again. She returned to Livonia, and died at the advanced age of 84, soon after receiving from Goethe a poem for her birthday, 'Sangreich war dein Ehrenweg' (Weimar, 1831).

A life of Mara, by G. C. Grosheim, was published at Cassel in 1823, and a more interesting one by Rochlitz in his Für Freunde der Tonkunst, vol. i. The best portrait of her was engraved (oval) by J. Collyer, after P. Jean, 1794. J. M.

MARAIIS, (1) MARIN (b. Paris, Mar. 31, 1656; d. there, Aug. 15, 1728), an important musician of the time of Lully.

At an early age he entered the choir of the Sainte-Chapelle, where he was a pupil of Chaperon. He learnt the bass viol from Hottemann (or Hautmann) and his pupil Sainte-Colombe. After studying six months with the latter his master dismissed him, saying that he could teach him nothing further. In 1685 he entered the Royal Band as a soloist; he was also a member of the orchestra of the Académie Royale de Musique, where he studied composition under Lully, sharing with Colasse the direction of the orchestra. In 1686 he published his first book of 'Pièces à son 2 violes,' dedicated to Lully; he was then living in the Rue du Jour, near St. Eustache. In the same year he produced at court, before the Dauphiness, an 'Idylle dramatique.' In Apr. 1693 he brought out at the Académie de Musique a setting of A. Houdart de la Motte's 'Alcide,' in which he collaborated with Louis de Lully. The work was revived in 1705, 1716 and 1744. With the same collaborator he wrote a 'Pantomime des pages,' part of the score of which is preserved at Berlin. His other writings for the stage were 'Ariane et Bacchus' (words by Saint-Jean), produced in 1696; 'Alcyone' (words by Houdart de la Motte), 1706; and 'Sémélé' (words by the same poet), 1709. The most successful of his operas was 'Alcyone,' in which was a representation of a storm, long much admired.

In 1692 he published a set of 'Pièces en trio pour les flûtes, violon et dessus de viole.' A second book of 'Pièces de viole' appeared in 1701; a third in 1711 (when he was living in the Rue de la Harpe); a fourth in 1717 and a fifth in 1725. Reprints of some of these exist. In 1723 he published a set of 'Sinfonies' for violin, viol and harpsichord, entitled 'La Gamme.' About 1725 Marais retired to his house in the Rue de Lourcine, where he occupied himself with horticulture. He still, however, gave lessons two or three times a week at a room in the Rue du Batoir. On his death in 1728, he was buried in the Church of St. Hippolyte in the Quartier Saint-Marcel. The parish was suppressed in 1791, and shortly afterwards the church was destroyed. No trace of it now remains, but the name is preserved in the Rue Saint-Hippolyte.

Marais left in MS. a To Deum (written and performed on the convalescence of the Dauphiness) and some concertos for violin and bass viol, written for the elector of Bavaria. At an early age Marais married Catherine Damicourt, who survived him. By her he had nineteen children, four of whom (three sons and a daughter) were also violists. On one occasion he presented his three musician sons to Louis XIV., before whom the children and their father gave a concert, while a fourth boy turned over the leaves of the music. One of his daughters married a musician named Bernier. Marais improved the bass viol by adding a seventh string, and by increasing the sonority of the three lower strings by covering or twisting them. There is a painting¹ of 'M. Marais, musicien,' in the museum at Blois, and there also exists a mezzotint of Marin Marais, painted and engraved by A. Bouys and published in 1704. In this he is represented seated, full length, with his bass viol across his knees. The seven strings and the covering of the lower strings of the instrument have evidently been emphasised by the artist. Of his musician sons, the name of (2) JEAN LOUIS MARAIS occurs in the imprint of the fourth and fifth books of 'Pièces de violes,' together with that of (3) ROLAND MARAIS, the only one who attained any distinction. He published (in 1711) a Nouvelle Méthode de musique, and in 1725 became a solo violist in the Royal Band, probably succeeding to his father's post. Quantz heard him in 1726, and praises him as a great performer. He published (in 1735 and 1738) two books of 'Pièces de violes.' w. B. S.

MARAZZOLI (MARAZZUOLI), MARCO, of Parma (d. Rome, Jan. 24, 1662), singer in the Papal Chapel, Rome, c. 1637, and a harp virtuoso. He assisted at the concerts of Queen Christina of Sweden, for whom he wrote in 1658 the music drama 'La vita humana,' and composed the two first comic operas, 'Chi soffro spero' (Rome, 1639) and 'Dal male il bene' (Rome, 1654), both the texts having been written by the Marquis Ruspigliosi, afterwards Pope Clemens IX. He composed two more operas, oratorios, cantatas and songs which remained in MS. (Riemann; Q.-L.).

MARBECK, see MERBECKE.

MARCATO (Ital.), 'in a marked, decisive manner.' The principal use of this direction is to draw the attention to the melody or subject when it is in such a position that it might be overlooked, as for instance, 'Il basso ben marcato,' in Chopin's Krakowiak, op. 11; or when there are two subjects both of which are to be brought prominently forward, as in the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven (last movement), where the two subjects come together in 6-4 time, the words being 'Freude, schöner Götterfunken,' and 'Soid umschlungen,' etc.; and in the Études symphoniques of Schumann, No. 2, 'Marcato il canto' and 'Marcato il tema.' Beethoven also uses 'Queste note ben marcato' (sic) in the string quartet, op. 18, No. 6, slow movement, and 'Melodia marcata,' in the Trio, op. 9, No. 2.

'Marcatissimo' is used by Chopin, Étude, op. 25, No. 11, at the end, by Schumann in the last movement of the Sonata in F# minor, op. 11, and in No. 8 of the Études symphoniques.

M.

MARCELLO, (1) BENEDETTO (b. Venice, July 31 or Aug. 1, 1686; d. Brescia, July 24, 1739), eminent composer, was son of Agostino Marcello and Paola Capello.

He was highly educated, and had great natural gifts for music, and was a pupil of Lotti and Gasparini. The violin was his first instrument, but he soon gave his whole attention to singing and composition. His father, objecting to the time thus occupied, sent him from home to study law, but on his death Benedetto returned to Venice, and contrived to combine the practice of music with his professional avocations. He held important government posts, was a member of the Council of Forty in 1711, and afterwards Provveditore of Pola (1730). Here he remained eight years, when his health having been ruined by the climate he became Camerlengo at Brescia, and there died. His monument in the church of S. Giuseppe states his age to have been 52 years, 11 months, and 23 days.¹ He was elected Cavaliere of the Filarmonici of Bologna in 1812, and was also a member of the Pastori Arcadi of Rome. In his youth he was wild, but sobered down in middle life.

His great work, in eight volumes, folio, 'Estro poetico-armonico, Parafrasi sopra i primi 50 Psalmi, Poesia di Girolamo Giustiniani,' appeared in two parts of twenty-five Psalms each (Venice, 1724-27). They are composed for one, two, three, and four voices, with figured basses, and occasionally with two violins and violoncello obbligati; and for expression far surpass any other work of the kind. Burney, in his notice of Marcello (Hist. iv. 543), considers that they have been overpraised, and that even in the composer's day his airs and themes were neither new nor original. In spite, however, of this judgment it is not too much to say that, as a whole, they constitute one of the finest productions of musical literature. An English edition, edited by Avison and Garth, was published in London in 1757 in 8 vols.; a second in Italian soon after (Venice); and a third by Valle (1803-08).

Marcello also composed instrumental concertos (1701), and 'Canzoni madrigaleschi' (Bologna, 1717); besides 'Calista in Orsa,' pastoral (libretto printed in 1725, music unpub.); 'La Fede riconosciuta,' opera (Vicenza, 1702); 'Arianna,' cantata; and 'Giuditta,' oratorio, all to his own words. As a poet he was above the average, and furnished the libretto for Ruggieri's 'Arato in Sparta' (Venice, 1709). In 1720 he published a satirical pamphlet, Il teatro alla moda, reprinted in 1727, 1733, 1738 (Venice), and 1741 (Florence). A German translation with notes by Alfred Einstein was published in 1917. The Library of St. Mark in Venice contains a MS. Teoria musicale; the State Library of Dresden ancient copies of two cantatas, 'Timotheus,' to his own Italian translation of Dryden's poem, and 'Cassandra'; the Court Library of Vienna many autographs and other works, including the cantatas 'La morte d'Adone,' 'Clori e Daliso,' and 'La stravaganza'; and the Royal Library of Brussels 'Il trionfo della musica nel celebrarsi la morte di Maria Vergine,' an oratorio for six voices and chorus. This score was once in the possession of Fétis, who speaks highly of its expression, pathos, and effective instrumentation. Rossini has borrowed one of the most prominent themes in his overture to the 'Siege of Corinth' note for note from Marcello's 21st Psalm. For Marcello's Lettera familiare, see LOTTI. A catalogue of his works is in M.f.M. vol. 23 (1891), pp. 187-97 supplemented in Q.-L. r. g., addns.

¹ Both Eitner and Riemann overlook this definite statement, and give the date of birth, like that of death, as July 24.

(2) ALESSANDRO (b. Venice, c. 1684; d. there, c. 1750), musician, philosopher and mathematician; elder brother of Benedetto. He composed under the name of Eterico Stinfalico, as member of the Academy of the Arcadians; held weekly meetings at his house, where chiefly his own compositions were performed. His published works are: solo cantatas, sonatas for violin and basso continuo, 6 concertos for 2 flutes or violins, 6 concertos for oboe or flute with violin principale and orchestra (Gerber; Fétis; Q.-L.). MARCH (Fr. marche; Ger. Marsch; Ital. marcia), a form originally associated with military movements, and afterwards imported into the music of the stage, the orchestra, the chamber and the oratorio. In ancient times the sound of instruments was used as a means of stimulating the action of large numbers of people, whether in processes of labour requiring consentaneous effort, or as a means of exciting ardour in armies advancing to battle by the tones of the 'shrill trump, the spirit-stirring drum, the ear-piercing fife'—equally familiar being Milton's reference to the effect of the sound 'of trumpets loud and clarions,' and the influence on a mighty host of 'Sonorous metal blowing martial sounds.' (Cf. MILITARY SOUNDS AND SIGNALS.) Like most forms, however, in instrumental music, the development of the march followed that of vocal music. We find marches in the early operas, in the stage works of Lully, and later in those of Handel and Rameau. In harpsichord music, too, it appears at a comparatively early date, the 'Suites des pièces' of the French composer Couperin offering examples.

Of the military march as now understood, as a strictly rhythmical and harmonised composition, written for a band of wind instruments, and intended not only to stimulate courage but also to ensure the orderly advance of troops, it does not appear that any examples are extant earlier than about the middle of the 17th century, and these seem to have originated during the Thirty Years' War, and are to be traced to the form of the Volkstied; war-songs, in which patriotic and military ardour was expressed lyrically, having long preceded the exclusive use of instruments for that purpose. A good specimen of the old German military march is that which Meyerbeer introduced in his 'Ein Feldlager in Schlesien,' and afterwards, with other portions of that work, in his 'L'Étoile du nord,' in the camp scene of which the fine old 'Dessauer March' stands prominently out from the elaborations with which the composer has surrounded it.

In England the military march would seem to be of considerable age. Sir John Hawkins, however, in his History of Music, says: 'It seems that the old English march of the foot was formerly in high estimation, as well abroad as with us; its characteristic is dignity and gravity, in which respect it differs greatly from the French, which, as it is given by Mersennus, is brisk and alert.' On this subject Sir John quotes a bon mot of Sir Roger Williams, a soldier of Queen Elizabeth's time, in answer to the French Marshal Biron's remark that 'the English march being beaten by the drum was slow, heavy and sluggish'; the reply being, 'That may be true, but, slow as it is, it has traversed your master's country from one end to the other.' Hawkins (writing in 1776) speaks of 'the many late alterations in the discipline and exercise of our troops, and the introduction of fifes and other instruments into our martial music'; and, in reference to an earlier condition thereof, quotes, from Walpole's Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors, a warrant of Charles I. to the following effect:

'Whereas the ancient custome of nations hath ever bene to use one certaine and constant forme of March in the warres, whereby to be distinguished one from another. And the March of this our nation, so famous in all the honourable achievements and glorious warres of this our kingdom in forraigne parts (being by the approbation of strangers themselves confest and acknowledged the best of all marches) was through the negligence and carelessness of drummers, and by long discontinuance so altered and changed from the ancient gravity and majestic thereof, as it was in danger utterly to have been lost and forgotten. It pleased our late deare brother prince Henry to revive and rectifie the same by ordaining an establishment of one certaine measure, which was beaten in his presence at Greenwich, anno 1610. In confirmation whereof wee are graciously pleased, at the instance and humble sute of our right trusty and right well-beloved cousin and counsellor Edward Viscount Winbledon, to set down and ordaine this present establishment hereunder expressed. Willing and commanding all drummers within our kingdom of England and principalltie of Wales exactly and precisely to observe the same, as well in this our kingdom, as abroad in the service of any forraigne prince or state, without any addition or alteration whatsoever. To the end that so ancient, famous, and commendable a custome may be preserved as a patterne and precedent to all posteritie,' etc. etc.

subscribed 'Arundell and Surrey. This is a true copy of the original, signed by his Majestie. Ed. Norgate, Windsor.'

The primary (indeed absolute) importance of the drum in the early form of the March is very evident. Rousseau, in his Dictionnaire de musique, in his article on that subject, thus defines it: 'Marche: Air militaire qui se joue par des instrumens de guerre, et marque le mètre et la cadence des tambours, laquelle est proprement la Marche.' The same author, writing towards the close of the 18th century, speaks of the superiority of the German military music, and says that the French troops had few military instruments for the infantry excepting fifes and drums; and very few marches, most of which were 'très malfaites.' Rousseau gives—as follows—the first part of the March of the Musketeers of the King of France, as illustrating 'L'accord de l'air et de la Marche.'

In its earlier instrumental form the German march had two reprises, each of eight, twelve or even sixteen bars, and its melodic origin would seem to have been influenced by the national dance called the 'Allemande,' in 2-4 time.

The modern march is now usually in common time—four crotchets in a bar—consisting of reprises of four, eight or even sixteen bars, and it usually begins with a crotchet before the opening phrase, with a subsidiary movement entitled a 'Trio' (generally in the dominant or sub-dominant key), which occupies a similar place to that of the trio associated with the MINUET or SCHERZO (q.v.) of a symphony; that is, following the march, which is repeated after it. With the ordinary (Parade) March, about 75 steps go to the minute; with the Quick March (Ger. Geschwind Marsch; Fr. Pas redoublé), about 108; while the Storming March (Ger. Sturm Marsch; Fr. Pas de charge) implies about 120 steps per minute, these being measured by rapid beats of the drum.

Military Marches, intended to stimulate enthusiasm, are generally written in a bright major key, trumpets, drums and other instruments of percussion being prominently used; and Funeral Marches in a solemn minor one—a remarkable exception to the latter rule being offered by the Dead March in 'Saul,' the key of which is C major. 'The stormy music of the drum' is still an important element, as it exercises a commanding influence on rhythmical precision, as already indicated. Formerly, as above indicated, that instrument was the all-essential feature in the march, instead of being, as afterwards, subsidiary in a musical sense.

Marches written for the stage and concert-room originally followed the simple structure of the military march, and conformed to their steady rhythmical design and avoidance of elaboration of figure. They are thus equally suitable for performance by a marching band, which, for purely physical reasons, the more developed type is not.

Chopin's Sonata in B flat minor has a Funeral March for slow movement which presents the feature of beginning on the strong beat. So also does Mendelssohn's 'Wedding March' and the March in 'Tannhäuser,' these further using the preliminary flourish of trumpets (see FANFARE) such as is found in some of the older marches. Beethoven's Sonata in A flat, op. 26, also has a Funeral March for slow movement, while in the 'Eroica' symphony there is an example of the march form treated symphonically. The freedom of structure in the 'Trauermarsch' in 'Die Götterdämmerung' is no less remarkable than is its preservation of the Funeral March spirit. Mention may also be made of the second movement of Elgar's Symphony in E flat, a symphonic Funeral March; of his 'Imperial' and Coronation Marches, or the set of military marches 'Pomp and Circumstance.'

There is also, as already said, a description of march in half time—2-4 (two crotchets in a bar), called with us the quick march—see Schubert's opp. 40 and 51; while in his op. 121 there are examples of marches in 6-8 tempo, one sometimes, but not often, employed in the march style; another such specimen worth referring to being the 'Rogues' March,' associated for more than a century (probably much longer) with army desertion. This is also in the style of the quick march, the tune being identical with that of a song once popular, entitled 'The tight little Island'—it having, indeed, been similarly employed in other instances. The following is the first part of this march, whose name is better known than its melody:

Besides the march forms already referred to, there is the torch-dance (see FACKELTANZ), which, however, is only associated with pageants and festivities. These and military marches being intended for use in the open air, are of course written entirely for wind instruments and those of percussion; and in the performance of these pieces many regimental bands, British and foreign, have arrived at a high degree of excellence. (See WIND BAND and WIND INSTRUMENTS.)

MARCHAND, (1) JEAN-BAPTISTE (b. Paris, c. 1670), son of Jean Marchand (b. 1656; d. Versailles, July 19, 1691), ordinaire of the king's music. Marchand entered the Chapel Royal in 1691 as player on the small lute and dessus de violon.¹ After the death of his brother Noël he obtained (June 1, 1710) the emoluments attached to his brother's post as lute-player 'de la chambre,' which he had held since 1705. According to Michel Brenet he was still living in 1754; on Dec. 1 Louis Joseph Francœur obtained his position as 'joueur de luth de la chambre du roi.' These posts as lutenist, or theorbist, were at that time sinecures. Musicians on whom they were conferred more often played the guitar.

(2) JEAN-NOËL (b. 1666; d. Paris, May 31, 1710), (? elder) brother of the preceding, lutenist 'de la chambre,' received on Aug. 2, 1674, the position of his father as 'ordinaire de la musique de la chambre.' He succeeded Chabanneau de la Barre in 1705.

MARCHAND, LOUIS (b. Lyons, Feb. 2, 1669²; d. Paris, Feb. 17, 1732), a French organist of great reputation whose encounter with J. S. Bach has remained famous. He was the son of Jean Marchand, 'maître de musique et joueur d'instruments.' He went to Paris at an early age, became renowned there for his organ-playing, and ultimately became court organist at Versailles. A confusion between him and Jean Louis Marchand of Auxerre (b. 1679) has led to much uncertainty as to the tenure of various posts as organist (see Q.-L.). Louis Marchand became organist of the church of the Jesuits, Rue St. Jacques, at St. Benoît (1699), at St. Honoré (1703), at the Royal Chapel (1708-14) and at the convent of the Cordeliers. By his recklessness and dissipated habits he got into trouble and was exiled in 1717. The story goes that the King, taking pity on Marchand's unfortunate wife, caused half his salary to be withheld from him and devoted to her sustenance. Soon after this arrangement, Marchand coolly got up and went away in the middle of a Mass which he was playing, and when remonstrated with by the King, replied, 'Sire, if my wife gets half my salary, she may play half the service.' On account of this he was exiled, on which he went to Dresden, and there managed to get again into royal favour. The King of Poland offered him the place of court organist, and thereby enraged Volumier, his Kapellmeister, who was also at Dresden, and who, in order to crush his rival, secretly invited Bach to come over from Weimar. At a royal concert, Bach being incognito among the audience, Marchand played a French air with brilliant variations of his own, and with much applause, after which Volumier invited Bach to take his seat at the harpsichord. Bach repeated all Marchand's showy variations, and improvised twelve new ones of great beauty and difficulty. He then, having written a theme in pencil, handed it to Marchand, challenging him to an organ competition on the given subject. Marchand accepted the challenge, but when the day came it was found that he had precipitately fled from Dresden, and, the order of his banishment having been withdrawn, had returned to Paris, where his talents met with more appreciation. He now set up as a teacher of music, and soon became the fashion, charging the then unheard-of sum of a louis d'or a lesson. In spite of this, however, his expensive habits brought him at last to extreme poverty, and he died in great misery. His organ works (wholly posthumous) reprinted in Guilman's 'Archives des maîtres de l'orgue,' comprise a 'Grand Dialogue,' 'Livre d'orgue,' 'Pièces choisies pour l'orgue,' 'Pièces d'orgue' (from MSS. at the Library of Versailles). For harpsichord: 'Pièces de clavecin,' 2 books (Paris, 1702-03) and an opera, 'Pyrame et Thisbé,' never performed.³

His ideas, says Fétis, are trivial, and his harmonies poor and incorrect. There is a curious criticism of him by Rameau, quoted by La Borde, Essai sur la musique (vol. iii.), in which he says that 'no one could compare to Marchand in his manner of handling a fugue'; but, as Fétis shows, this may be explained by the fact that Rameau had never heard any great German or Italian organist.

It is a well-known fact that J. S. Bach used some of his themes, namely, a fugue theme in one of his Brandenburg Concertos. Among his numerous pupils were Pierre du Mage and Louis-Claude Daquin. L. Marchand represents, with A. Raison, the French organ tradition of the 17th century; although to some extent an innovator, he yielded to the musical taste of his epoch; but his music bears certain characteristics which are well his own.

called MARCHESINI (b. Milan, 1755; d. there Dec. 18, 1829), one of the latest of the famous male sopranos of the 18th century.

His father, who played the horn in the orchestra at Modena, was his first teacher; but his wonderful aptitude for music and his beautiful voice soon attracted the attention of some amateurs, who persuaded the elder Marchesi to have the boy prepared for the career of a soprano. This was done at Bergamo, and young Marchesi was placed under the evirato Caironi, and Albujo, the tenor, for singing; while his musical education was completed by the maestro di cappella, Fioroni, at Milan.

Marchesi made his début on the stage at Rome in 1774, in a female character, the usual introduction of a young and promising singer with a soprano voice and beautiful person. Towards the close of 1775 the Elector of Bavaria engaged Marchesi for his chapel, but his sudden death, two years after, put an end to this engagement, and the young singer went to Milan, where he performed the part of 'second man,' with Pacchierotti as first, and to Venice, where he played second to Millico. He was advanced in that same year to first honours at Treviso. In the next and following years he sang as 'first man' at Munich, Padua and Florence, where he created a furore by his exquisite singing of 'Mia speranza, io pur vorrei,' a rondo in Sarti's 'Achille in Sciro.' In 1778 he had worked his way to the great theatre of San Carlo, and continued there during two seasons. He was now looked upon as the first singer in Italy, and was fought for by rival impresarij. Once more in Milan (1780), he sang in Mysliwiczek's 'Armida,' in which he introduced the famous rondo of Sarti, which all Italy had been humming and whistling since he sang it at Florence, and also an air by Bianchi, almost as successful, 'Se piangi e peni.' His portrait was engraved at Pisa, and the impressions were quickly bought up. He now sang in turn at Turin, Rome, Lucca, Vienna and Berlin, always with renewed éclat; and he went in 1785 to St. Petersburg with Sarti and Mme. Todi. The rigorous climate of Russia, however, filled him with alarm for his voice, and he fled rapidly back to Vienna, where he sang in Sarti's 'Giulio Sabino.'

We next find him (1788) in London, singing in the same opera by Sarti, having just completed an engagement at Turin. His style of singing now seemed to Burney 'not only elegant and refined to an uncommon degree, but often grand and full of dignity, particularly in the recitatives and occasional low notes.' From this time till 1790 he continued to delight the English, appearing meanwhile at short intervals in the various capitals and chief cities of Europe. In 1794 he sang at Milan in the 'Demofonte' of Portogallo, and was described in the cast as 'all' attual servizio di

S. M. il Re di Sardegna.' This memorable occasion was that of the début of Mmo. Grassini. He continued to sing at Milan down to the spring of 1806, when he left the stage. He composed some songs, published in London (Clementi), at Vienna (Cappi) and at Bonn (Simrock). An air written by him, 'In seno quest' alma,' was also printed.

A beautiful portrait of Marchesi was engraved (June 1790) by L. Schiavonetti, after R. Cosway; and a curious caricature (now rare) was published under the name of 'A Bravura at the Hanover Square Concert,' by J. N[ixon], 1789, in which he is represented as a conceited coxcomb, bedizened with jewels, singing to the King, Prince of Wales and courtiers. J. M.

MARCHESI, (1) SALVATORE, CAVALIERE DE CASTRONE, MARCHESE DELLA RAJATA (b. Palermo, Jan. 15, 1822; d. Paris, Feb. 20, 1908), husband of Mme. M. Marchesi, a baritone singer and teacher. His family belonged to the nobility, and his father was four years Governor-General of Sicily. In 1838 he entered the Neapolitan Guard, but, for political reasons, resigned his commission in 1840. Whilst studying law and philosophy at Palermo, he took lessons in singing and composition from Raimondi; and he continued his musical studies at Milan under Lamperti and Fontana. Having participated in the revolutionary movement of 1848, he was forced to seek shelter in America, where he made his début, as an operatic singer, in 'Ernani.' He returned to Europe to take instruction from Garcia, and settled in London, where, for several seasons, he was favourably known as a concert singer. He married Mlle. Graumann in 1852, and with her made numerous concert tours in England, Germany and Belgium, appearing also in opera with success, both in England and on the Continent. He held posts as teacher of singing at the Conservatoires of Vienna and Cologne, and was appointed chamber singer to the court of Saxo-Weimar, 1862. From the King of Italy he received the orders of the Knights of St. Maurice and St. Lazarus. Marchesi was known also as the composer of several German and Italian songs, and as the Italian translator of many French and German libretti — 'Medea,' 'La Vestale,' 'Iphigenia,' 'Tannhäuser,' 'Lohengrin,' etc. He wrote various books and some exercises. B. T.

(2) MATHILDE DE CASTRONE, née GRAUMANN (b. Frankfort-on-the-Main, Mar. 26, 1826; d. London, Nov. 17, 1913), mezzo-soprano and famous teacher of singing, was the daughter of a wealthy merchant. She was very highly educated, but in 1843, her father having lost his fortune, she adopted the musical profession.

She studied singing at Vienna with Nicolai, but in 1845 went to Paris to learn from Garcia. Here she took lessons in declamation from Samson, Rachel's master, and had the advan tage or hearing all the first singers of the age—Persiani, Grisi, Alboni, Duprez, Tamburini, Lablache. Her own aptitude for teaching was already so remarkable that Garcia, whilst prevented by the effects of an accident from giving his lessons, handed over his whole clientèle for the time to his young pupil. In 1849 Mlle. Graumann removed to London, where she obtained a high standing as a concert singer. She sang successfully in Germany, Belgium, Holland, Switzerland, France and the United Kingdom, married Salvatore Marchesi in 1852, and in 1854 accepted the post of professor of singing at the Vienna Conservatoire, the vocal department of which was then in its infancy. But she soon won high distinction for it and herself. Among her pupils at this period were Mlles. Ilma de Murska, Fricci and Kraus. She resigned her appointment in 1861, and removed with her husband to Paris, where pupils came to her from far and wide. At this time appeared her 'École de chant.' Rossini, in acknowledging the dedication of a volume of 'Vocalizzi,' extols her method as an exposition of the true art of the Italian school of singing, inclusive of the dramatic element; and specially valuable when, he complains, the tendency is to treat the vocal art as though it were a question of the capture of barricades! In 1865 she accepted a professorship at the Cologne Conservatoire, but resigned it in 1868 to return to Vienna to resume her post as teacher of singing at the Conservatoire, which she held for ten years. Among her famous scholars there were Mlles. d'Angeri and Smeroschi, Mmes. Schuch-Proska and Etelka Gerster. She resigned her appointment at the Conservatoire in 1878, but continued for some time to reside and teach in Vienna, where her services to art met with full recognition. From the Emperor of Austria she received the Cross of Merit of the first class, and she held decorations and medals from the King of Saxony, the Grand Duke of Saxe-Weimar, the Emperor of Germany and the King of Italy. She was a member of the St. Cecilia Society in Rome and of the Academy of Florence. In 1881 she returned to Paris, where she prepared many of the greatest singers of the younger generation for a public career, notably Melba. She published a Method of Singing, and twenty-four books of exercises.

B. T.

Her reminiscences appeared in 1897. She died at the house of her daughter, (3) BLANCHE (b. Paris, Apr. 4, 1863), to whom the book is dedicated. The latter was at first trained as a violinist, but from 1881 devoted herself to singing, and, until her marriage with Baron A. Caccamisi, assisted her mother in teaching. In 1895 she appeared at Berlin and Brussels, and on June 19, 1896, gave a vocal recital in the small Queen's Hall, London. Subsequently she lived in England and enjoyed great success as a concert singer and as the teacher of many pupils. She made an operatic début at Prague in 1900 as Brünnhilde in 'Die Walküre,' and occasionally appeared on the English stage with the Moody-Manners Company.

MARCHESINI, see LUCCHESINA; MARCHESI, Luigi.

MARCHETTI, FILIPPO (b. Bolognola, province of Macerata, Feb. 26, 1831; d. Jan. 18, 1901¹), successful composer of operas. At the age of 12 he began to study with a master named Bindi, and in his 15th year determined to make music his profession.

In 1850 his parents sent him to Naples, where he was admitted as a paying student at the Real Collegio di San Pietro a Majella. His principal instructor there was Carlo Conti, with whom he studied counterpoint and composition. In 1854 Marchetti left Naples and returned home, where he devoted himself to the composition of an opera, 'Gentile da Verano,' the libretto of which was written by his brother Raffaele. This work was produced at the Teatro Nazionale, Turin, in Feb. 1856, with so much success that the impresario of the theatre hastened to secure the performing rights of a second opera, 'La Demento,' upon which Marchetti was then engaged. 'La Demento' was produced at the Teatro Carignano, Turin, on Nov. 27, 1856, and in the following year it was revived at Rome and at Jesi. It was well received at both places, but Marchetti found it impossible to persuade any impresario to produce his next opera, 'Il Paria,' which in fact has never been performed or published. Marchetti fell back upon the composition of ballads and romances, of which he wrote many at this period of his career, though even those he found much difficulty in recommending to the good graces of publishers. In the year 1862 he was recommended by his brother to move his quarters from Rome to Milan, which was the real centre of musical life in Italy. In Milan Marchetti made the acquaintance of a young poet named Marcelliano Marcello, who persuaded him to undertake the composition of a new version of 'Romeo and Juliet,' the libretto of which he had himself arranged from Shakespeare's tragedy. Marchetti hesitated to attack a subject which had already been treated by Bellini and many other composers, and his diffidence would probably have been augmented had he known that Gounod was at the same time hard at work upon an opera founded upon the same subject. Marcello, however, succeeded in overcoming Marchetti's scruples, and the new 'Romeo e Giulietta' was produced at Trieste on Oct. 24, 1865. Its success at first was only moderate, but when it was revived two years later at the Teatro Carcano at Milan it was very favourably received, in spite of the formidable rivalry of Gounod's 'Roméo et Juliette,' which was being given at La Scala at the same time. With 'Ruy Blas,' his next work, which was produced at La Scala, Milan, on Apr. 3, 1869, Marchetti reached the zenith of his achievement. 'Ruy Blas,' written to a libretto taken by D'Ormeville from Victor Hugo's drama, speedily became popular in Italy, and in process of time carried the composer's fame across the Alps. It was performed in London with no little success at Her Majesty's Theatre, under the management of Mapieson, on Nov. 24, 1877, Mlle. Salla appearing as the Queen, Mlle. de Belocca as Casilda, Mme. Lablache as Donna de la Cueva, Signor Fancelli as Ruy Blas, and Signor Galassi as Don Sallustio. After 'Ruy Blas' Marchetti never succeeded in winning the popular suffrages. His two remaining works, 'Gustavo Wasa' (La Scala, Milan, Feb. 7, 1875) and 'Don Giovanni d' Austria' (Teatro Regio, Turin, Mar. 11, 1880), made little impression. After 1880 Marchetti wrote no more for the stage, but devoted his energies entirely to teaching. In 1881 he was appointed President of the Reale Accademia di Santa Cecilia in Rome, and in 1885 he undertook the onerous duties of director of the Liceo Musicale in the same city, a post which he held until his death. Marchetti's fame as a composer was short-lived. Changes in musical taste soon made 'Ruy Blas' seem old-fashioned, and in his later works the composer showed no power of adapting his style to the requirements of modern audiences. He may be described as a typical Italian composer of the second rank. In his music the influence of Verdi is not unnaturally supreme, but unfortunately it is the Verdi of earlier days, not the composer of 'Aïda' and the Manzoni Requiem, who served as Marchetti's model. Marchetti's capacity for sheer musical invention was limited; but in 'Ruy Blas,' his most careful and most meritorious work, the musicianship is often admirable, the orchestration effective without vulgarity, while the composer displays a commendable feeling for characterisation, notably exemplified in the music allotted to the three female characters.

MARCHETTUS of Padua, a musical theorist of the early part of the 14th century. Of his life nothing is known except that he was in the service of Rainier, Prince of Monaco, and that some of his works were written at Cesena and Verona. He was the author of two treatises, the Lucidarium in arte musicae planae and the Pomerium artis musicae mensurabilis, both of which are printed in the third volume of Gerbert's Scriptores. The dedications of these two books point to their having been completed later than 1309, though the Milan manuscript of the Lucidarium is said to be dated 1274 and the Vatican manuscript of the Pomerium, 1283.

The Lucidarium is remarkable for the chromaticism employed and for the division of the whole tone either into three-fifths and two-fifths (diatonic and enharmonic semitones) or into four-fifths and one-fifth (chromatic semitone and diesis). The Pomerium is of great interest as marking the transition from the Franconian system of notation, in which the shortest musical note admitted was the semibreve, equal to one-third of a breve, to the 'ars nova' of Philip de Vitry and his successors, in which the minim and semiminim were differentiated and brought into the scheme of perfection and imperfection. Marchettus meets the growing need for notes of smaller value by reckoning any number of semibreves from two to twelve to the breve, and distinguishes their values by the addition or omission of tails above or below.¹ He also points out the differences between Italian and French notation. An epitome of the Pomerium entitled Brevis compilatio Magistri Marchetti musici de Padua in arte musicae mensurate pruridibus et modernis is printed in the third volume of Coussemaker's Scriptores from a 14th-century manuscript at St. Dié, which also contains the Lucidarium, the Ars mensurabilis musicae of Franco, and other musical treatises. Fétis's manuscript containing the Lucidarium, the Pomerium and the Brevis compilatio is now in the Royal Library at Brussels. Other manuscripts are at Florence, at Pisa, and in the monastery of Einsiedeln.

Marchettus deserves credit for his attempt to amplify the means of musical expression, but his system of notation was too complex to become of practical utility, and was soon displaced by the bolder and simpler methods of the 'ars nova.' He suffered the penalty of failure, and met with much abuse at the hands of some of his successors. In 1410 Prosdocius de Beldemandis wrote an Opusculum contra theoricam partem sive speculativam Lucidarii Marcheti Patavini, of which there is a manuscript copy at Bologna. In it he asserts that Marchettus was altogether ignorant of theory, and scoffs at his presumption in posing as a scientific musician. Joannes Carthusiensis wrote that Marchettus deserved a schoolboy's whipping; and in the Musices opusculum of Nicolaus Burtius (Bologna, 1487) the worst that the author can say of his opponent, Ramis de Pareia, is that he 'imitated the crass stupidity and fatuity of Marchettus.'

MARCHISIO, The Sisters, (1) BARBARA (b. Turin, Dec. 12, 1834; d. Mira, Apr. 19, 1919); (2) CARLOTTA (b. Turin, Dec. 6, 1836; d. there, June 28, 1872). Both were taught singing at Turin by Luigi Fabbria, and both made their débuts as Adalgisa, the elder (who afterwards became a contralto) at Vienna in 1856, the younger at Madrid. They played at Turin in 1857-58, and made great success there as Arsace and Semiramide; also on a tour through Italy, and at the Paris Opéra on the production of 'Semiramis,' July 9, 1860. They first appeared in England with great success at Land's concerts, St. James's Hall, Jan. 2 and 4, 1862, in duets of Rossini and Gabussi, and made a concert tour through the provinces with Willert Beale. They also made a success in 'Semiramide' at Her Majesty's, May 1, 1860, on account of their excellent duet singing, though separately their voices were coarse and harsh, their appearance insignificant, and they were indifferent actresses. Carlotta played the same season Isabella in 'Robert,' June 14, and Donna Anna, July 9. They sang also at the Crystal Palace, twice at the New Philharmonic, at the Monday Popular, etc. They sang together for some time abroad. Carlotta married a Viennese singer, Eugen Kuhn (1835-75), who sang with her in concerts, and at Her Majesty's in 1862 under the name of Coselli, and who afterwards became a pianoforte manufacturer at Venice.

MARCOUX, VANNI (b. Turin, June 12, 1879), operatic baritone of French parentage. He first learned singing whilst studying for the law, but, after being admitted to the bar, relinquished the latter and went to Paris to complete his vocal training under Boyer. He had a naturally fine organ, with a dramatic quality and ringing timbre, as well as the histrionic temperament fitting him for a stage career. After a successful début at Bayonne in 1899 as Frère Laurent, he made his mark at Nice the same winter as Marcel in the first performance there of Puccini's 'La Bohème.' Then for four or five years he gained experience in France and also at the Brussels Monnaie. In 1905 he was engaged for Covent Garden, and among other parts sang Basilio in 'Il Barbiere' and created that of Vim-sei in Leon's 'L'oracolo.' Later on (1908-1914) he appeared in England in many of the leading baritone rôles, his best being Mephistopheles, Scarpia and Marcello. During the same period he was singing with unflinching success at the Paris Opéra, where he created (Jan. 1909) the rôle of Colonna in Février's 'MonnaVanna'; but perhaps his chief triumph in France was the creation, at Monte Carlo in Feb. 1910, of Don Quichotte in Massenet's opera of that name, which during the next six years he sang no fewer than 150 times at the Paris Opéra alone. His American career began, in 1912, at the Boston Opera House, with what was considered a singularly fine impersonation of Golaud in 'Pelléas et Mélisande.' Subsequently he joined the Chicago Opera Company and remained with it for several years.

MARÉCHAL, CHARLES HENRI (b. Paris, Jan. 32, 1842; d. there, May 10, 1924), opera composer, worked at first at solfège with A. Chevê and E. Batiste, studied the piano with Chollet, and harmony with B. Laurent; finally, at the Conservatoire, studied the organ with Benoist, counterpoint with Chauvet, and composition with Victor Massé. In 1870 he obtained the Grand Prix de Rome with the cantata 'Le Jugement de Dieu.' He was chorus-master at the Théâtre Lyrique in 1867, and was appointed in 1896 inspector of musical education. His first important composition was a sacred piece, 'La Nativité,' in 1875, but he afterwards devoted himself to the theatre, for which he wrote the following: 'Les Amours de Catherine' (one act, Opéra-Comique, 1876); 'La Caverne des Trabans' (three acts, gained the Prix Monbinne in 1876, produced Opéra-Comique, 1881); 'L'Étoile' (one act, 1881); 'Déidamie' (two acts, Opéra, 1893); 'Calendal' (four acts, Rouen, 1894); 'Ping-Sin' (1895); 'Daphnis et Chloé' (three acts, Théâtre Lyrique, 1899); incidental music for 'L'Ami Fritz' (Comédie Française, 1876), 'Les Rantzau,' 'Smilis,' 'Crime et châtiment,' etc. For the concert-room he wrote 'Les Vivants et les morts,' for vocal quartet with orchestra (1886); 'Le Miracle de Naim,' sacred drama (1887); 'Esquisses vénitiennes' (1894), and 'Antar' (1897), both for orchestra. He also published many choral and instrumental compositions. He published Souvenirs d'un musicien, Paris, 1907; Lettres et souvenirs, 1920.

MARÉCHAL, MAURICE (b. Dijon, Oct. 3, 1892), violoncellist, took the first prize at the Paris Conservatoire in 1911. After a remarkable début his career was interrupted by the war, but in 1919 he again took up his musical work.

He was soloist at the Concerts Lamoureux in 1919, at the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire in 1920, and at the Philharmonic in 1923. He became a member of the Board of examiners at the Paris Conservatoire in June 1921.

Maurice Maréchal has made a success throughout Europe and in the United States. He has played a number of compositions for the first time, such as the duo of Ravel (S.I.M., Apr. 1922) and the trio of Guy Ropartz (Nationale, 1921).

MARENZIO, LUCA (b. before 1560; d. Aug. 22, 1599). The oldest account we can find of this great Italian composer is given by O. Rossi,¹ in 1620. It tells us of Marenzio's birth at Coccaglia, a small town on the road between Brescia and Bergamo, of the pastoral beauty of his early surroundings, and the effect they may have had in forming the taste of the future madrigal composer, of the patronage accorded him by great princes, of his valuable post at the court of Poland, worth 1000 scudi a year, of the delicate health which made his return to a more genial climate necessary, of the kind treatment he received from Cardinal Cintio Aldobrandino at Rome, of his early death in that city, and burial at S. Lorenzo in Lucina. The same author gives an account of Giovanni Contini, organist¹ of the cathedral at Brescia, and later in the service of the Duke of Mantua, under whose direction Marenzio completed his studies, having for his fellow-pupil Lelio Bertani,¹ who afterwards served the Duke of Ferrara for 1500 scudi a year, and was even asked to become the Emperor's maestro di cappella.

Donato Calvi, writing in 1664,² anxious to claim Marenzio as a native of Bergamo, traces his descent from the noble family of Marenzi, and finds in their pedigree a Luca Marenzo. He adds further details to Rossi's account, how the King of Poland knighted the composer on his departure, how warmly he was welcomed by the court of Rome on his return, how Cardinal C. Aldobrandino behaved like a servant rather than a patron to him. We are also there told that he died Aug. 22, 1599, being then a singer in the Papal Chapel (though on this point compare later statements), and that there was a grand musical service at his funeral.

In the next account Brescia again puts in a claim, and Leonardo Cozzando³ asserts that Marenzio was born at Coccaglia, that his parents were poor, and that the whole expense of his living and education was defrayed by Andrea Masetto, the village priest. To Cozzando we are also indebted for a special article on Marenzio's great merits as a singer, and after reading of him under the head of Brescian composers, we find him further mentioned under 'Cantori.'⁴

A fourth account, quite independent of these, and one of the earliest of all, is that given by Henry Peacham, published in 1622.⁵ Of the composers of his time, Byrd is his favourite, Victoria and Lassus coming next. Then of Marenzio he says:

'For delicious Aire and sweete Invention in Madrigals, Luca Marenzio excolleth all other whosoever, having published more Sets than any Author else whosoever: and to say truth, hath not an ill Song, though sometime an oversight (which might be the Printer's fault) of two eights or fifts escape him; as between the Tenor and Base in the last close, of I must depart all haplesse: ending according to the nature of the Dittie most artificially, with a Minim rest. His first, second, and third parts of Thyrsis, Veggio dolce mio ben che fœ hoggi mio Sole Cantava, or sweete singing Amaryllis,⁶ are Songs, the Muses themselves might not have bene ashamed to have had composed. Of stature and complexion, hee was a little and blacke man: he was Organist in the Popes Chappell at Rome a good while, afterward hee went into Poland, being in displeasure with the Pope for overmuch familiaritie with a kinswoman of his (whom the Queene of Poland, sent for by Luca Marenzio afterward, she being one of the rarest women in Europe, for her voyce and the Lute :) but returning, he found the affection of the Pope so estranged from him, that hereupon hee tooke a conceipt and died.'

The above accounts agree in all important points, and even the descent from a noble Bergamese family is not inconsistent with the parents' poverty and their residence at Coccaglia. Marenzio certainly died at a comparatively early age, in 1599, and we may therefore place his birth about 1560, though not later, for he began to publish in 1581. On Apr. 10 in that year he was in Venice, dedicating his first book of madrigals (a 6) to Alfonso d' Este, Duke of Ferrara. He was in Rome, Dec. 1, 1582,⁷ on Apr. 24,⁸ and Dec. 15, 1584,⁹ was maestro de cappella to the Cardinal d' Este in the same year,¹⁰ and was still in the same city on July 15, 1585.¹¹

We do not think he went to Poland just yet, but we have no more publications for some years. Marenzio probably received his appointment soon after the accession of Sigismund III. (1587), and is said to have kept it for two years, either from 1588-90, or from 1591-93.

He was back in Rome in 1595, writing to Dowland, July 13,¹² and to Don Diego de Campo, Oct. 20,¹³ and in the same year is said to have been appointed to the Papal Chapel.¹⁴ It was now that he lived on such familiar terms with Cardinal Aldobrandino, the Pope's nephew, and taking into this account Peacham's tale may have some truth in it, and Marenzio may have fallen in love with a lady belonging to his patron's family. If, however, he died of a broken heart, as is suggested, it must have been caused simply by the Pope's refusal to allow a marriage.

Marenzio's principal works are: 9 books of madrigals (a 5), 6 books (a 6), each book containing from 13 to 20 nos., and 1 book (a 4) containing 21 nos.; 5 books of 'Villanelle e arie alla Napolitana', containing 113 nos. (a 3) and 1 (a 4); 2 books of four-part motets, many of which have been printed in modern notation by Proske¹⁵; 1 Mass (a 8), two books of motets (4 v.), 1588, 1592; a book of motets (12 v.), 1614; a book of 'Sacri concenti', 1616; a complete series of motets for all church festivals. (See list in Q.-L.) Haberl has republished the motets of Marenzio. The first five books of madrigals a 5 were printed 'in uno corpo ridotto,' in 1593, and a similar edition of those

Marenzio's works were introduced into England in 1588, in the collection entitled 'MUSICA TRANSALPINA' (q.v.) (1588) and two years afterwards a similar book was printed, to which he contributed 23 out of 28 numbers.¹ His reputation here was soon established, for in 1595 John Dowland, the lutenist, 'not being able to dissemble the great content he had found in the proffered amity of the most famous Luca Marenzio,' thought the mere advertisement of their correspondence would add to the chance of his own works being well received. Burney does not hesitate to say that the madrigal style was brought to the highest degree of perfection by Marenzio's superior genius, and that the publication of the 'Musica transalpina' gave birth to that passion for madrigals which became so prevalent among us when our own composers so happily contributed to gratify it.² Thus it came to pass that Luca Marenzio became bound up in our own musical history, and few foreign musicians of the 16th century have been kept so constantly before the English public. The Madrigal Society became a home for his works more than 150 years ago, and they have been sung continually by much younger societies. 'To guard faithfully and lovingly the beautiful things, and to reverence the great masters, of olden times, is quite a part of the English character, and one of its most beautiful traits.'³

MARESCHALL, SAMUEL (b. Tournay, May 1554; d. after 1640), was town and university organist at Basle from 1577 to his death some time after 1640. In 1606 he published at Basle a Choralbuch for four voices, containing Lobwasser's German versified translation of the Psalter with the original French tunes as in Goudimel, the melody, however, in the soprano; also some additional German hymns and tunes. Some of his settings are given in Winterfeld and Schöberlein. In MS. there exist a large number of his organ arrangements of some of these French psalm tunes, and other French and German songs. MARIA ANTONIA WALPURGA (or WALPURGIS) (b. Munich, July 18, 1724; d. Dresden, Apr. 23, 1780), Electress of Saxony, daughter of the Elector of Bavaria, afterwards the Emperor Charles VII., learnt music from Giovanni Ferraudini, Porpora, and finally Hasse. She was a member of the Arcadian Academy in Rome, and the initials of her academical name, 'Ernelinda Talia Pastorella Arcada' were used by her to sign her compositions. The most important of these were two operas, 'Il trionfo della fedeltà,' performed at Potsdam in 1753 before Frederick the Great, and furnished with additional numbers by him, Hasse, Graun and Benda; and 'Talestri Regina dell' Amazone,' performed in 1763. Both were published by Breitkopf & Härtel, the former in 1766 being one of the first printed with their newly invented types, and the latter appearing in 1765. MARIANI, ANGELO (b. Ravenna, Oct. 11, 1822; d. Genoa, Oct. 13, 1873), a famous Italian conductor; began to study the violin when quite young, under Pietro Casolini; later on he had instruction in harmony and composition from a monk named Levrimi, of Rimini, who was a celebrated contrapuntist. He was at the Liceo Filarmonico at Bologna, where he had instruction from Rossini. It was in 1844, at Messina, that he assumed the baton—which after all was only the bow of his violin, for at that time the conductor of an Italian orchestra was named Primo Violino direttore dell' orchestra.

After several engagements in different theatres in Italy, Mariani was appointed, in 1847, conductor of the Court Theatre at Copenhagen. While there he wrote a Requiem Mass for the funeral of Christian VIII. At the beginning of 1848 he left Denmark and went to Italy to fight in the ranks of the volunteers for the freedom of his country. At the end of the war he was called to Constantinople, where his ability won him the admiration of the Sultan, who made him many valuable presents; and Mariani, as a mark of gratitude, composed a hymn which he dedicated to him. In Constantinople also he wrote two grand cantatas, 'La fidanzata del guerriero' and 'Gli esuli,' both works reflecting the aspirations and attempts of the Italian movement. He returned to Italy in 1852, landing at Genoa, where he was at once invited to be the conductor of the Carlo Police. In a short time he reorganised that orchestra so as to make it the first in Italy. His fame soon filled the country and spread abroad; he had offers of engagements from London, St. Petersburg and Paris, but he would never accept them; he had fixed his headquarters in Genoa, and only absented himself for short periods at a time, to conduct at Bologna, at Venice, and other important Italian towns. Mariani exercised an extraordinary personal fascination on all those who were under his direction. For him, no matter the name of the composer, the music he conducted at the moment was always the most beautiful, and he threw himself into it with all his soul. Great masters as well as young composers were happy to receive his advice, and he gave it in the interest of art and for the improvement of the work. At rehearsal nothing escaped him in the orchestra or on the stage.

In 1864 Mariani was the director of the grand fêtes celebrated at Pesaro in honour of Rossini, and was himself greeted enthusiastically by the public, which was in great part composed of the most eminent musicians of the world. On Nov. 1, 1871, he introduced 'Lohengrin' at the Comunale of Bologna, and, thanks to his efforts, the opera was such a success that it was performed through the season several times a week—and he had only nine orchestral rehearsals for it! On this occasion Richard Wagner sent him a large photograph of himself, under which he wrote 'Evviva Mariani.'

The day of Mariani's funeral was a day of mourning for the whole of Genoa. His body was transported to Ravenna at the request of the latter city. The Genoese municipality ordered a bust of him to be placed in the vestibule of the Carlo Felice; all the letters written to him by the leading composers and literary men of the day to be preserved in the town library; the portrait sent by Wagner hung in one of the rooms of the Palazzo Civico; and his last baton placed by the side of Paganini's violin in the civic museum.

Besides the works already named, and other orchestral pieces, he published several collections of songs, all of which are charmingly melodious: 'Rimembranze del Bosforo,' 'Il Trovatore nella Liguria,' 'Liete e tristi rimembranze,' 'Otto pezzi vocali,' 'Nuovo album vocale.'

MARIMBA, a curious instrument (said to possess great musical capabilities) in use in the southern parts of Mexico. In type it is of the wooden harmonica species, but is much larger, of more extended range, and has a sound-box to each note. Its compass is five octaves extending upwards from A. A large table-like frame, five or six feet in length, on legs supports a graduated series of strips of hard and well-seasoned wood. Below each of these is fixed an oblong cedar box equally graduated in size. The box, which serves as a resonator, is entirely closed except at the top, but has a small hole covered with thin bladder at the lower end. The wooden note being struck with a drumstick has its vibrations increased by the resonator with the addition of a peculiar buzzing sound. The instrument, which also bears another name, 'Zapotecano,' is to be played by four performers, each armed with a pair of drumsticks varying in size and weight, the heads generally of soft crude indiarubber. A description, with illustrations from photographs, is to be seen in the Mus. T. for May 1901 (cf. XYLOPHONE).

The marimba is also known in Africa, its original home, where it is formed in a similar but rather more primitive fashion, gourds taking the place of the wooden sound-boxes. (PLATE XXIV. No. 7). F. K.

MARIMBA GONGS, an instrument which takes its name from the foregoing but is akin to the GLOCKENSPIEL in effect. It consists of a series of bell-metal plates fitted with resonators which produce a fairy-like tone.

MARIN, José (b. Madrid, 1619; d. there, Mar. 17, 1699), Spanish composer. In 1644 he was engaged as tenor in the choir of the Convent of the Incarnation at Madrid. Twelve years later, however, he is mentioned by a contemporary diarist as being one of three notorious highwaymen, imprisoned for robbery with violence. Marin and one of the others are described as belonging to the clergy; and Marin is further identified by the description musico de la Encarnación. He is called the best musician in Madrid, but one who had already committed a murder and had fled to Rome and there been ordained priest. He was put to the torture, deprived of his orders, and sentenced to banishment for ten years. Meanwhile he was strictly confined in chains; but he managed to escape, and lived to be a celebrated musician, known in Italy as well as Spain. He died in old age, full of honour; his death was announced in the official gazette. His songs, with continuo, or with accompaniment definitely written for the guitar, have something approaching the quality of Purcell. Examples are given by Podrrell in his 'Teatro lirico,' iv. (1897); his MSS. are preserved in the Bibl. Nac., Madrid, and other songs by him are found in a MS. in the Bibl. Marciana, Venice (Cod. 470. Gir. Contarini). J. B. T.

MARIN, MARIE-MARTIN MARCEL DE, Viscount, of Venetian descent (b. St. Jean de Luz, Bayonne, Sept. 8, 1769; still living in 1861), excellent harpist, violinist and composer; Fétis characterises his harp compositions as truly classical. On his second voyage to Italy in 1783 he was elected member of the Arcadians at Rome. At the outbreak of the French Revolution he came to London, where he met with great success, and some of his harp sonatas, etc., were published by Clementi in 1799–1800. He settled afterwards at Toulouse. Fétis gives a list of his compositions for harp and for violin, sonatas and chamber music, as well as an account of his varied adventures (See also Q.-L.)

MARINI, BIAGIO (b. Brescia; d. ? Padua, c. 1660), was employed as a violinist in Venice in 1617, was director of the music at Sant'

Eufemia in Brescia in 1620; in 1622 entered the service of Ferdinand Gonzaga at Parma, and in 1626 was maestro della musica to the Duke of Bavaria. He was at Düsseldorf about 1640, and in 1653 was maestro to the Accademia della Morte at Ferrara, and in the following year to Santa Maria della Scala at Milan. He is said by Fétis to have died at Padua, where he was a member of the Academy of the Occulti; the date of his death is given in Cozzando's Libreria Bresciana as 1660. He is important as one of the earliest of those Italian violinists who published concerted instrumental music. The following is a list of the most important:

MARIO (GIOVANNI MATTEO), CAVALIERE DI CANDIA (b. Cagliari, Oct. 17, 1810¹; d. Rome, Dec. 11, 1883), the greatest operatic tenor of his generation, was of an old and noble family. His father had been a general in the Piedmontese army; and he himself, after ten years in the Turin Military Academy, was an officer in the Piedmontese Guard, when he first came to Paris in 1836, and immediately became a great favourite in society. Never was youth more richly gifted for the operatic stage; beauty of voice, face and figure, with the most winning grace of Italian manner, were all his. But he was then only an amateur, and as yet all unfitted for public singing, which his friends constantly suggested to him, even if he could reconcile his pride with the taking of such a step. Tempted as he was by the offers made to him by Duponchel, the director of the Opéra—which are said to have reached the sum of frs. 1500 a month, a large sum for a beginning—and pressed by the embarrassments created by expensive tastes, he still hesitated to sign his father's name to such a contract; but was finally persuaded to do so at the house of the Comtesse de Merlin, where he was dining one evening with Prince Belgiojoso and other well-known amateurs; and he compromised the matter with his family pride by signing only the Christian name, under which he became afterwards so famous—Mario.

He is said to have spent some time in study, directed by the advice of Michelet, Ponchard and the great singing-master, Bordogni; but it cannot have been very long nor the study very deep, for there is no doubt that he was a very incomplete singer when he made his first appearance. This was on Nov. 30, 1838, in the rôle of 'Robert le Diable.' Notwithstanding his lack of preparation and want of habit of the stage, his success was assured from the first moment when his delicious voice and graceful figure were first presented to the French public. Mario remained at the Opéra during that year, but in 1840 he passed to the Italian Opera, for which his native tongue and manner better fitted him.

In the meantime, he had made his first appearance in London, where he continued to sing through many years of a long and brilliant career. His début here was in 'Lucrezia Borgia,' June 6, 1839: but, as a critic² of the time observed,

'the vocal command which he afterwards gained was unthought of; his acting did not then get beyond that of a southern man with a strong feeling for the stage. But physical beauty and geniality, such as have been bestowed on few, a certain artistic taste, a certain distinction—not exclusively belonging to gentle birth, but sometimes associated with it—made it clear, from Signor Mario's first hour of stage-life, that a course of no common order of fascination was begun.'

Mario sang, after this, in each season at Paris and in London, improving steadily both in acting and singing, though it fell to his lot to 'create' but few new characters—scarcely another beside that of the 'walking lover' in 'Don Pasquale,' a part which consisted of little more than the singing of the serenade 'Com'è gentil.' In other parts he only followed his predecessors, though with a grace and charm which were peculiar to him, and which may possibly remain for ever unequalled.

'It was not till the season of 1846 that he took the place of which no wear and tear of time had been able to deprive him.'

He had then played Almaviva, Gennaro, Raoul, and had shown himself undoubtedly the most perfect stage-lover ever seen, whatever may have been his other qualities or defects. His singing in the duet of the fourth Act of the 'Ugonotti' raised him again above this; and in 'La favorita' he achieved, perhaps, his highest point of attainment as a dramatic singer.

Like Garcia and Nourrit, Mario attempted 'Don Giovanni,' and with similarly small success. The violence done to Mozart's music partly accounts for the failure of tenors to appropriate this great character; Mario was unfitted for it by nature. The reckless profligate found no counterpart in the easy grace of his love-making; he was too amiable in the eyes of the public to realise for them the idea of the 'Dissoluto punito.'

As a singer of 'romances' Mario has never been surpassed. The native elegance of his demeanour contributed not a little to his vocal success in the drawing-room; for refinements of accent and pronunciation create effects there which would be inappreciable in the larger space of a theatre. Mario was not often heard in oratorio, but he sang 'Then shall the righteous,' in 'Elijah,' at the Birmingham Festival of 1849, and 'If with all your hearts,' in the same oratorio, at Hereford, in 1855. For the stage he was born, and to the stage he remained faithful during his artistic life. To the brilliance of his success in opera he brought one great helping quality, the eye for colour and all the important details of costume. His figure on the stage looked as if it had stepped out of the canvas of Titian, Veronese or Tintoretto. Never was an actor more harmoniously and beautifully dressed for the characters he impersonated—no mean advantage, and no slight indication of the complete artistic temperament.

For five-and-twenty years Mario remained before the public of Paris, London and St. Petersburg, constantly associated with Mme. Grisi. In the earlier years (1843-46) of that brilliant quarter of a century, he took the place of Rubini in the famous quartet, with Tamburini and Lablache; this, however, did not last long; and he soon remained alone with the sole remaining star of the original constellation, Mme. Grisi. To this gifted prima donna Mario was united, after the dissolution of her former marriage; and by her he had three daughters. He left the stage in 1867, and retired to Paris (his farewell appearance took place at Covent Garden in 1871, in 'La favorita'), and then to Rome, where he died. About 1880 it became known that he was in reduced circumstances, and his friends got up a concert in London for his benefit.

MARIONETTE-THEATRE, a small stage on which puppets, moved by wires and strings, act operas, plays and ballets, the songs or dialogue being sung or spoken behind the scenes. The repertoires included both serious and comic pieces, but mock-heroic and satiric dramas were the most effective. Puppet-plays,¹ in England and Italy called 'fantoccini,' once popular with all classes, go back as far as the 15th century.² From that period to the end of the 17th century Punch was so popular as to inspire Addison with a Latin poem, 'Machinae gesticulantes.' In 1713 a certain Powell erected a Punch theatre under the arcade of Covent Garden, where pieces founded on nursery rhymes, such as the 'Babes in the Wood,' 'Robin Hood' and 'Mother Goose,' were performed; later on they even reached Shakespeare and opera. About the same period marionette-theatres were erected in the open spaces at Vienna, and these have reappeared from time to time ever since.³ Prince Esterhazy, at his summer residence, Esterházy, had a fantastically decorated grotto for his puppet-plays, with a staff of skilled machinists, scene-painters, playwrights, and above all a composer, his Kapellmeister Haydn, whose love of humour found ample scope in these performances. His opera 'Philemon und Baucis' so delighted the Empress Maria Teresa, that by her desire Prince Esterhazy had the whole apparatus sent to Vienna for the amusement of the court. In London, fantoccini were playing between the years 1770 and 1780 at Hickford's large Rooms in Pantion Street, Haymarket, Marylebone Gardens and in Piccadilly. In Nov. 1791 Haydn was present at one of these performances⁴ in the elegant little theatre called Variétés Amusantes, belonging to Lord Barrymore, in Savile Row. He was much interested, and wrote in his diary, 'The puppets were well-managed, the singers bad, but the orchestra tolerably good.' The playbill may be quoted as a specimen.

MARIO

From a mezzotint engraved by George Zobel

'Théâtre Guignol' the same kind of entertainment maintained its popularity for many years in the Champs Elysées, Paris.

With the 20th century a new era, one of more conscious artistry, began in the life of the marionette-theatre. In Rome the Teatro dei Piccoli, directed by Vittorio Podrocca, particularly attracted musicians by the production of a repertory of complete operas acted by the puppets and sung by singers behind the stage. The 'Teatro dei Piccoli' visited London (New Scala) in Apr. 1923, giving, amongst other things, 'The Sleeping Beauty,' an opera written for them by RERIGHI (q.v.). Falla's 'El Retablo' ('The puppet show of Master Pedro') is among the most delightful of modern experiments in the technique of the marionette-theatre. (See FALLA.) C.

MARIOTTE, ANTOINE (b. Avignon, Dec. 22, 1875), composer, started life as a naval officer. He retired in 1897, and became, on the foundation of the Schola Cantorum in Paris, the pupil of Vincent d'Indy. He was conductor first of the orchestra at St. Étienne, then at Lyons, being appointed director of the Orleans Conservatoire in 1920. He has written for the theatre in a way which shows dramatic temperament expressed in a rich style, with characteristic harmonies and daring effects.

WORKS.—PF. sonata: 'Sonatines d'automne'; 'Impressions urbaines'; 20 songs for voice and PF.; operas: 'Isolomé' (Lyons, 1908; Paris, Opéra, 1919); 'Le Vieux Roi' (Lyons, 1913); 'Ester' (Paris, Opéra, 1925); unpublished: 'Gargantua'; 'Nela Dooryn' (Enoch).

MARKULL, FRIEDRICH WILHELM (b. Reichenbach, near Elbing, Prussia, Feb. 17, 1816; d. Danzig, Apr. 30, 1887), studied composition and organ-playing under Friedrich Schneider at Dessau; became in 1836 principal organist at the Marienkirche at Danzig, and conductor of the 'Gesangverein' there. Markull enjoyed a high reputation as a pianist, and gave excellent concerts of chamber music, besides acting as critic for the Danziger Zeitung. His compositions include three operas, 'Maja und Alpino,' or 'Die bezauberte Rose' (1843); 'Der König von Zion' (1848); 'Das Walpurgisfest' (1855); two oratorios, 'Johannes der Täufer' and 'Das Gedächtniss der Entschlafenen,' produced by Spohr at Cassel in 1856, the 86th Psalm, several symphonies, numerous works for organ, voice and piano, a 'Choralbuch' (1845), and arrangements. H. S. O., with addns.

MARMONTEL, (1) ANTOINE FRANÇOIS (b. Clermont-Ferrand, Puy de Dôme, July 16, 1816¹; d. Paris, Jan. 16, 1898), pianoforte pupil of Zimmermann at the Paris Conservatoire, where he obtained the first prize in 1832. Succeeding his master in 1848, he taught pianuntil 1887, and enjoyed a high reputation as a teacher. Amongst his pupils were Guiraud, Paladilhe, A. and E. Duvernoy, Bizet, Dubois, etc. His piano compositions are of an instructive character. He wrote also: L'Art classique et moderne du piano (1876), Les Pianistes célèbres (1878), Symphonistes et virtuoses (1881), Histoire du piano et de ses origines, influence de sa facture sur le style des compositeurs et virtuoses (1885), etc.

(2) ANTONIN EMILE LOUIS CORBAZ (b. Paris, Apr. 24, 1850; d. there, July 23, 1907), son of the preceding, also a well-known pianist and teacher, obtained the first piano prize in 1867 at the Conservatoire, where he became teacher of a women's class from 1901 till his death. He won a 'mention honorable' at the Rome Concours, and acted as second chorus-master at the Opéra, 1878-89. M. L. P.

MARMONTEL, JEAN FRANÇOIS (b. Bort, Limousin, July 11, 1723; d. Abloville,² Eure, Dec. 31, 1799), librettist and defender of Piccini. He wrote: Essai sur les révolutions de la musique en France (1777). M. L. P.

MARPURG, FRIEDRICH WILHELM (b. Marburgshof, near Seehausen, Brandenburg, Nov. 21, 1718³; d. Berlin, May 22, 1795), eminent writer on music. Little is known of his musical education, as Gerber gives no details, although Marpurgh furnished him with the history of his life. Spazier⁴ says that in 1746 he was secretary to General Rothenburg (or Bodenburg) in Paris, and there associated with Voltaire, Maupertuis, D'Alembert and Rameau. He lived later in Berlin and Hamburg, and from 1763 until his death was director of the government lottery in Berlin. Eberhard remarks that his acquaintance with good society would account for his refined manners and his tact in criticism. The absence in his works of personality and of fine writing, then so common with musical authors, is the more striking as he had great command of language and thoroughly enjoyed discussion. His active pen was exercised in almost all branches of music—composition, theory, criticism and history.

Of his theoretical works the most celebrated are—the Handbuch bey dem Generalbasse und der Composition, founded on Rameau's system (3 parts, 1755-62, Berlin); Der critische Musicus an der Spree (Berlin, 1750), containing, on p. 129, a lucid explanation of the old Church Modes; the Anleitung zur Singe-composition (Berlin, 1758), and the Anleitung zur Musik (Berlin, 1763), both still popular: the Kunst das Clavier zu spielen (1750); the Versuch über die musikalische Temperatur (Breslau, 1776), a controversial pamphlet intended to prove that Kirnberger's so-called fundamental bass was merely an interpolated bass; and the Abhandlung von der Fuge, 62 plates (Berlin, 1753-54; 2nd edition, 1806; French, Berlin, 1756), a masterly summary of the whole science of counterpoint at that period, with the solitary defect that it is illustrated by a few short examples, instead of being treated in connexion with composition. This Marpurge intended to remedy by publishing a collection of fugues by well-known authors, with analyses, but he only issued the first part (Berlin, 1758).

Of his critical works the most important is the Historisch-kritische Beyträge, 5 vols. (Berlin, 1754-78). Among the historical may be specified a MS. Entwurf einer Geschichte der Orgel, of which Gerber gives the table of contents; and the Kritische Einleitung in die Geschichte der . . . Musik (Berlin, 1759). A jeu d'esprit, Legende einiger Musikeheiligen von Simeon Metaphrastes dem Jüngeren (Cologne, 1786), appeared under a pseudonym.

Of compositions he published, besides collections of contemporary music, '6 Sonaten für das Cembalo' (Nuremberg, 1756); 'Fughe e capricci' (Berlin, 1777); and 'Versuch in figurirten Chorälen,' vols. 1 and 2; 'Musikalisches Archiv,' an elucidation of the Historisch-kritische Beyträge, was announced, but did not appear. MARRE, LA (LAMARE), JACQUES MICHEL HUREL DE (b. Paris, May 1, 1772; d. Caen, Mar. 27, 1823), a famous violoncello virtuoso, who was called by Clementi 'the Rode of the violoncello.' He toured all over Europe with immense success, and visited Russia, but retired from public life in 1815. Four concertos and an air varié published under his name are the work of his friend, the famous AUBER (E. van der Straeten, History of the Violoncello).

MARSCHNER, HEINRICH AUGUST (b. Zittau, Saxony, Aug. 16, 1795; d. Hanover, Dec. 14, 1861), celebrated German opera composer, began to compose sonatas, Lieder, dances, and even orchestral music, with no further help than a few hints from various musicians with whom his beautiful soprano voice and his pianoforte-playing brought him into contact.

As he grew up he obtained more systematic instruction from Schicht of Leipzig, whither he went in 1813 to study law. Here also he made the acquaintance of Rochlitz, who induced him to adopt music as a profession. In 1816 he travelled with Count Thaddäus von Amadée, a Hungarian, to Pressburg and Vienna, where he made the acquaintance of Koželuh and of Beethoven, who is said to have advised him to compose sonatas, symphonies, etc., for practice.

In Pressburg he composed 'Der Kyffhäuserberg,' 'Saidon,' 'Heinrich IV. und Aubigné.' Weber produced the last at Dresden, July 19, 1820, and Marschner was in consequence appointed in 1823 joint-Kapellmeister with Weber and Morlacchi of the German and Italian Opera there. He was appointed musikdirector in 1824, but resigned on Weber's death in 1826, and after travelling for some time, settled in 1827 at Leipzig as Kapellmeister of the theatre. Here he produced 'Der Vampyr' (Mar. 28, 1828), his first romantic opera, to a libretto by his brother-in-law Wohlbrück, the success of which was enormous in spite of its repulsive subject. In London it was produced, Aug. 25, 1829, in English, at the Lyceum, and ran for sixty nights, and Marschner had accepted an invitation to compose an English opera, when Covent Garden Theatre was burnt down. His success here doubtless led to his dedicating his opera 'Des Falkners Braut' to King William IV., in return for which he received a gracious letter and a golden box in 1833. His attention having been turned to English literature, his next opera, 'Der Templer und die Jüdin' (produced at Leipzig, Dec. 1829), was composed to a libretto constructed by himself and Wohlbrück from 'Ivanhoe.' The freshness and melody of the music ensured its success at the time, but the libretto, disjointed and overloaded with purely epic passages which merely served to hinder the action, killed the music. In 1831 Marschner was appointed court Kapellmeister at Hanover.

He produced 'Hans Heiling' at Berlin (May 24, 1833) to a libretto by Eduard Devrient, which had been urged upon Mendelssohn in 1827.² This opera is Marschner's masterpiece. Its success was instantaneous and universal, and it retains to this day an honourable place at all the principal theatres of Germany. In 1836 it was performed under his own direction at Copenhagen with marked success, and he was offered the post of Generalmusikdirector in Denmark, an honour which the warmth of his reception on his return to Hanover induced him to decline. After 'Hans Heiling'—owing chiefly to differences with the management of the theatre—Marschner composed little for the stage, and that little has not survived. He was pensioned, with the title of Generalmusikdirector, in 1859. A monument was erected to his memory at Hanover in 1877. Besides the operas already mentioned he composed 'Schön Eli' (incidental music) (1822); 'Der Holzdieb' (Dresden, 1825); 'Lucretia' (Danzig, 1826); 'Des Falkner's Braut' (Leipzig, 1832; Berlin, 1838); 'Der Bäbu' (Hanover, 1837); 'Das Schloss am Aetna' (Berlin, 1838); 'Adolf von Nassau' (Hanover, 1843); 'Austin' (1851). He also composed incidental music for von Kleist's play 'Die Hermannsschlacht,' and published over 180 works of all kinds and descriptions, but principally Lieder for one and more voices, and choruses for men's voices, many of which are excellent. An overture, embodying 'God save the King,' is mentioned as being performed in London at a concert on the occasion of the baptism of the Prince of Wales (King Edward VII.), Jan. 25, 1842.

As a dramatic composer of the romantic school, Marschner ranks next to Weber and Spohr, but it is with the former that his name is most intimately connected, though he was never a pupil of Weber. The strong similarity between their dispositions and gifts, the harmonious way in which they worked together, and the cordial affection they felt for each other, are interesting facts in the history of music. Marschner's favourite subjects were ghosts and demons, whose uncanny revels he delineated with extraordinary power, but this gloomy side of his character was relieved by a real love of nature and outdoor life, especially in its lighter and more humorous characteristics. He worked with extreme rapidity, which is the more remarkable as his scores abound in enharmonic modulations, and his orchestration is unusually brilliant and elaborate. Such facility argues an inexhaustible store of melody, and a perfect mastery of the technical part of composition.

MARSEILLAISE, LA. The words and music of this popular French hymn are the composition of Claude Joseph ROUGET DE LISLE, a captain of engineers, who was quartered at Strassburg when the volunteers of the Bas Rhin received orders to join Luckner's army. Dietrich, the Mayor of Strassburg, having, in the course of a discussion on the war, regretted that the young soldiers had no patriotic song to sing as they marched out, Rouget de Lisle, who was of the party, returned to his lodgings,¹ and in a fit of enthusiasm composed, during the night of Apr. 24, 1792, the words and music of the song which has immortalised his name. With his violin he picked out the first strains of this inspiring and truly martial melody; but being only an amateur, he unfortunately added a symphony which jars strangely with the vigorous character of the hymn itself. The following copy of the original edition, printed by Dannbach of Strassburg under the title 'Chant de guerre pour l'armée du Rhin, dédié au Maréchal Lukner' (sic), will be interesting from its containing the symphony, which has been since suppressed, and from an obvious typographical error, the crochet marked * being evidently intended for a quaver.

The 'Chant de guerre' was sung in Dietrich's house on Apr. 25, copied and arranged for a military band on the following day, and performed by the band on the Garde Nationale at a review on Sunday the 29th. On June 25 a singer named Mireur sang it at a civic banquet at Marsilles with so much effect that it was immediately printed, and distributed to the volunteers of the battalion just starting for Paris. They entered Paris on July 30, singing their new hymn; and with it on their lips they marched to the attack on the Tuileries on Aug. 10, 1792. From that day the 'Chant de guerre pour l'armée du Rhin' was called 'Chanson' or 'Chant des Marseillais,' and, finally, 'La Marseillaise.' The people, shouting it in the streets, probably altered a note or two; the musicians, Edelman, Grétry, and most of all, Gossec, in their accompaniments for pianoforte and orchestra, greatly enriched the harmonies, and soon the 'Marseillaise,' in the form we have it now (which need hardly be quoted),² was known from one end of France to the other.

² See Mus. T. Sept. 1915, p. 551, where four versions are quoted by Tom H. Wotton, viz.: (1) The melody as given in the official military band arrangement approved by the French Minister of War; (2) Berlioz's arrangement (see article by E. Newman, Mus. T., Aug. 1915, p. 461); (3) Gossec's version; (4) The first edition as quoted above.

The original edition contained only six couplets; the seventh was added when it was dramatised for the Fête de la Fédération, in order to complete the characters—an old man, a soldier, a wife, and a child—among whom the verses were distributed. Rouget de Lisle had been cashiered for expressing disapproval of the events of Aug. 10, and was then in prison, from which he was only released after the fall of Robespierre, on the ninth Thermidor (July 28), 1794. The following fine stanza for the child was accordingly supplied by Dubois, editor of the Journal de Littérature:

Nous entrérons dans la carrière,
Quand nos aînés n'y seront plus;
Nous y trouverons leur poussière
Et la trace de leurs vertus.
Bien moins jaloux de leur survie
Que de partager leur cercueil
Nous aurons le sublime orgueil
De les venger ou de les suivre.

Dubois also proposed to alter the concluding lines of the sixth stanza—

Que tes ennemis expirants
Voient ton triomphe et notre gloire to

Dans tes ennemis expirants
Vois ton triomphe et notre gloire.

That Rouget de Lisle was the author of the words of the 'Marseillaise' has never been doubted—indeed Louis Philippe conferred a pension upon him; but it has been denied over and over again that he composed the music. Strange to say, Castil-Blaze,¹ who should have recognised the vigour and dash so characteristic of the French, declared it to have been taken from a German hymn.

In F. K. Meyer's Versailler Briefe (Berlin, 1872) there is an article upon the origin of the 'Marseillaise,' in which it is stated that the tune is the same as that to which the Volkslied 'Stand ich auf hohen Bergen' is sung in Upper Bavaria. The author of the article heard it sung in 1842 by an old woman of seventy, who informed him that it was a very old tune, and that she had learnt it from her mother and grandmother. The tune was also said to exist in the Credo of a MS. Mass composed by Holtzmann in 1776, which is preserved in the parish church of Meersburg.² Subsequently inquiry (Aug. 1879) on the spot from the curate of Meersburg has proved that there is no truth in this story.

Fétis, in 1863, asserted that the music was the work of a composer named Navoigille, and reinforces his statement in the second edition of his Biographie universelle. Georges Kastner³ and several other writers, including the author of this article⁴ have clearly disproved these allegations; and the point was finally settled by a pamphlet, La Vérité sur la paternité de la Marseillaise (Paris, 1865), written by A. Rouget de Lisle, nephew of the composer, which contains precise information and documentary evidence, establishing Rouget de Lisle's claim beyond a doubt. The controversy is examined at length by Loquin in Les Mélodies populaires de la France, Paris, 1879. The 'Marseillaise' has been often made use of by composers. Of these, two may be cited—Salicri, in the opening chorus of his opera 'Palmira' (1795), and Grison, in the introduction to the oratorio 'Esther' (still in MS.), both evidently intentional. Schumann slyly alludes to it in the 'Faschingsschwank aus Wien,' uses it in his song of the Two Grenadiers with magnificent effect, and also introduces it in his Overture to 'Hermann und Dorothea.'

A picture by Pils, representing Rouget de Lisle singing the 'Marseillaise,' is well known from the engraving. G. C.

MARSH, (1) ALPHONSO (bapt. St. Margaret's, Westminster, Jan. 28, 1627; d. Apr. 9, 1681), son of Robert Marsh, one of the musicians in ordinary to Charles I., was appointed a gentleman of the Chapel Royal in 1660. Songs composed by him appear in 'The Treasury of Musick' (1669), 'Choice Ayres and Dialogues' (1676), and other publications of the time. His son (2) ALPHONSO (d. Apr. 5, 1692) was admitted a gentleman of the Chapel Royal, Apr. 25, 1676. Songs by him are contained in 'The Theater of Music' (1685-87), 'The Banquet of Musick' (1688-92), and other publications. He was buried, Apr. 9, in the west cloister of Westminster Abbey.

MARSH, JOHN (b. Dorking, 1752; d. 1828), a distinguished amateur composer and performer, was articulated to a solicitor at Romsey in 1768, resided at Salisbury (1776-81), Canterbury (1781-86), and Chichester (1787-1828), in each of which places he led the band at the subscription concerts and occasionally officiated for the cathedral and church organists. He composed two services, many anthems, chants and psalm tunes, glees, songs, symphonies, overtures, quartets, etc., and organ and piano-forte music, besides treatises on harmony, thorough-bass, etc. A fully detailed account of his career is given in the Dictionary of Musicians, 1824.

1833), a Scottish musician. As a boy he entered the service of the Duke of Gordon, rising, during a thirty years' residence in the family, to the posts of butler, house-steward and factor. He taught himself the violin, and became the best amateur performer of his day. His compositions, which are Strathspeys and a similar class of Scottish violin music, have been held in much favour, the best known being 'The Marquis of Huntley's' and 'Miss Admiral Gordon's' Strathspeys, the latter being the air to which Burns wrote 'Of a' the airts the wind can blaw.' He married in 1773, and had a family, dying in his 85th year. A number of his compositions appear in the Gow publications, but Stewart of Edinburgh issued a couple of small collections of his Strathspeys in 1781. A third and much fuller collection was published in 1822 and a later one, after his death, in 1847. An excellent portrait of Marshall is extant, engraved by Turner; it is reproduced in The Glen Collection of Scottish Dance Music, book ii., 1895, where there is also much interesting information concerning him. F. K.

MARSHALL, (1) WILLIAM, Mus.D. (b. Oxford, 1806; d. Handsworth, Aug. 17, 1875), son of William Marshall of Oxford, music-seller, was a chorister of the Chapel Royal under John Stafford Smith and William Hawes. He was appointed organist of Christ Church Cathedral and St. John's College, Oxford, in 1825, and was also organist of All Saints' Church from 1839. He graduated as Mus.B. Dec. 7, 1826, and Mus.D. Jan. 14, 1840. He resigned his Oxford appointments in 1846, and afterwards became organist of St. Mary's Church, Kidderminster. He was author of The Art of Reading Church Music (1842), the composer of some church music and songs, and editor (jointly with Alfred Bennett) of a collection of chants, 1829, and also editor of a book of words of anthems, 1840, fourth edition, 1862.

His younger brother, (2) CHARLES WARD (b. 1808; d. Islington, Feb. 22, 1874), appeared about 1835, under the assumed name of Manvers, on the London stage as a tenor singer, with success. In 1842 he quitted the theatre for concert and oratorio singing, in which he met with greater success. After 1847 he withdrew from public life. W. H. H.

MARSICK, MARTIN PIERRE JOSEPH (b. Jupille, near Liège, Mar. 9, 1848; d. Oct. 1924), violinist. At the age of 8 he entered the Liège Conservatoire, studying under Desiré Heynberg, and gaining, two years later, the first prize in the preparatory class. In 1864 he secured the gold medal of the institution for 'exceptional merit.' In the following year and until 1867 he was pupil of Léonard (violin) and Kufferath (composition), and in 1868-69 of Massart at the Paris Conservatoire, the expense of his musical training being defrayed by a music-loving lady of distinction. In 1870-71 he was the recipient of a stipend from the Belgian Government, and was enabled to proceed to Berlin to study under Joachim. Thus exceptionally equipped, he made a successful début, in 1873, at the 'Concerts populaires' in Paris, travelled a good deal in various European countries, founded a Quartet at Paris in 1877 with Rémy, Von Waefelghem and Delsart, and 1892-1900 was violin professor at the Conservatoire in succession to Massart. In 1895-1896 he toured in the United States, and occasionally visited England, but without achieving in either country a great popular success. His compositions include three concertos and a number of smaller pieces for the violin. W. W. C.

MARSOLO, PIETRO MARIA, Doct. Jur., of Messina, maestro di cappella at Ferrara Cathedral, 1612; composed 3 books of motets and 5 books of madrigals, one apparently lost (Q.-L.).

MARSON, GEORGE (d. Canterbury, Feb. 1631/2), organist and composer. About the year 1598 he became master of the choristers and organist of Canterbury Cathedral and held office till his death. The Cathedral registers record his burial on Feb. 5, 1631/2, and state that he was formerly one of the minor canons. He was married at Canterbury in 1599. According to Wood he took the B.Mus. degree at Cambridge in 1601, and Wood also states that Marson was a relative of Nathaniel GILES (q.v.). He contributed an excellent 5-part madrigal to 'The Triumphes of Oriana'—'The nymphs and shepherds danced lavoltas.' Some church music of Marson is in MS. at the R.C.M. and includes a service, preces and psalms and a few anthems. E. H. F.

MARTEAU, HENRI (b. Rheims, Mar. 31, 1874), professor of the violin at the Geneva Conservatoire. His father was an amateur violinist and president of the Philharmonic Society of Rheims; his mother, an accomplished pianist, a pupil of Madame Schumann.

Sivori first discovered Henri Marteau's talent, and presented him with a violin, at the same time persuading his parents to allow him to study it as a profession. His first master was Bunzl, a pupil of Molique, his second, Léonard. In 1884, when only 10 years of age, he appeared under Richter at the Vienna Philharmonic Society, and elsewhere in Germany and Switzerland; in the year following he was chosen by Gounod to play the violin obbligato of a piece composed for the Joan of Arc Centenary celebration at Rheims. In July 1888 he appeared at a Richter concert in London. In 1892 he gained the first prize at the Paris Conservatoire, and Massenet wrote a concerto expressly for him. He toured in America with success in 1893 and 1898, and in Russia in 1897-99. Having studied composition with Théodore Dubois, he brought out a cantata,

'La voix de Jeanne d'Arc,' for soprano, chorus and orchestra, in 1896. Marteau's compositions include a quantity of chamber music, 2 violin concertos, a violoncello concerto and an opera, 'Meister Schwalbe' (Plauen, 1921). In 1900 he became teacher at the Geneva Conservatorium and succeeded Joachim (1908-15) as violin teacher in the Berlin Hochschule. In 1921 he became teacher at the Prague Conservatoire.

MARTELÉ, and MARTELLATO (Ital.), from marteler and martellare, to 'hammer'; said of notes struck or sung with especial force, and left before the expiration of the time due to them. Notes dashed, dotted or emphasised by > or fz. are Martelé or Martellate in execution. The term Martellament is sometimes employed for acciaccatura. J. H.

In violin, violoncello and viola music this sign is used to indicate a detached hammered style of bowing. The effect is usually produced by a series of short quick up and down strokes at the point of the bow, without allowing the bow to leave the strings. The stick is held firmly, and the thumb pressed in the direction of the index finger, as each note is played. The arm should remain quite loose, and care should be taken to give a stronger pressure to the up bow than the down bow, or else the Martelé will become uneven.

MARTHA, opera in 3 acts, music by Flotow. Produced—Vienna, Nov. 25, 1847. London, Drury Lane (in German), June 5, 1849; Covent Garden (in Italian), July 1, 1858; Drury Lane (in English), Oct. 11, 1858. New York, Niblo's Garden (in English), Nov. 1, 1852. Paris, Salle Ventadour (in Italian), Feb. 11, 1858; Théâtre Lyrique, Dec. 16, 1865.

The opera is an extension of 'Lady Henriette, ou La Servante de Greenwich,' ballet-pantomime in 3 acts, by St. Georges, with music by Flotow, Burgmüller and Doldevez, produced, Opéra, Paris, Feb. 21, 1844. The necessary alterations in the book were made by St. Georges, and the German translation by Friedrich.

MARTIN, CLAUDE, of Couches, near Autun, lived in Paris c. 1540-55. A Magnificat a 4 v., published by Attaignant 1540, and 9 chansons a 4 in collective volumes by Claude du Chemin, are the only compositions of his still left; he also wrote two theoretical works (titles, etc., in Q.-L.).

MARTIN, SIR GEORGE CLEMENT (b. Lambourne, Berks, Sept. 11, 1844; d. London, Feb. 23, 1916), received instruction in organ-playing from J. Pearson and Sir John (then Dr.) Stainer, also in composition from the latter during the time he was organist there at the parish church. He was appointed private organist to the Duke of Buccleuch, at Dalkeith, in 1871; master of the choristers, St. Paul's Cathedral, in 1874, deputy organist at the same on the death of George Cooper in 1876, and organist on the resignation of Stainer in 1888. He received the degrees of Mus.B., Oxon., in 1868, Fellow of the College of Organists in 1875, and Mus.D. (degree conferred by the Archbishop of Canterbury) in 1883, and was appointed the same year teacher of the organ at the R.C.M., which post he later resigned. He was made Mus.D. of Oxford in 1912. His compositions include Morning Communion Service in C for voices and orchestra; Communion Service in A, Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis in A, for the same; the same in B \flat for voices, organ and military band; the same in G for voices and orchestra; 7 anthems; also a variety of compositions for parochial use; songs, part songs, etc. His most important work is the Te Deum sung on the steps of St. Paul's at the Diamond Jubilee of Queen Victoria, 1897, shortly after which event he was knighted. (See Mus. T., July 1897.) Martin died in London and was buried in the crypt of St. Paul's Cathedral. A memorial tablet with portrait in relief was placed near the grave by public subscription. (See Mus. T., Dec. 1917.)

MARTIN, GEORGE WILLIAM (b. Mar. 8, 1828; d. Bolingbroke House Hospital, Wandsworth, Apr. 16, 1881), received his early musical education in the choir of St. Paul's Cathedral under William Hawes. He was professor of music at the Normal College for Army Schoolmasters; music-master at St. John's Training College, Battersea (1845-53), and organist of Christ Church, Battersea, in 1849. He composed many glees, madrigals and part songs, for some of which he was awarded prizes, and edited and published cheap arrangements of the popular oratorios and other works of Handel, Haydn and others. For some years he directed performances given under the name of the National Choral Society, which was begun in 1860. He had an aptitude for training choirs of school children, and conducted many public performances by them. He edited the Journal of Part Music in 1861-62, and did much to make good music popular. He died in great poverty at Bolingbroke House Hospital.

MARTIN, JONATHAN (b. 1715; d. April 4, 1737), was a chorister of the Chapel Royal under Dr. Croft. On quitting the choir he was placed under Thomas Roseingrave for instruction on the organ, and soon attained such proficiency as to be able to act as deputy for his master at St. George's, Hanover Square, and for Weldon at the Chapel Royal. On June 21, 1736, he was admitted organist of the Chapel Royal on the death of Weldon, and promised 'to compose anthems or services for the use of His Majesty's Chapel, whenever required by the Subdean for the time being.' Probably he was never called upon to fulfil his promise, as his only known composition is a song in Rowe's tragedy, 'Tamerlane,' 'To thee, O gentle sleep.' He died of consumption, and was buried (Apr. 9) in the west cloister of Westminster Abbey.

MARTINENGO, GABRIELE, composed 2 books of madrigals a 4 v. (Venice, Scotto, 1544 and 1548), 1 book of madrigals a 5 v. (Venice, Gardano, 1580); also madrigals and motets in collective volumes (1548-77).

MARTINES (MARTINEZ), MARIANNE (b. Vienna, May 4, 1744; d. Dec. 13, 1812), composer, was daughter of the master of the ceremonies to the Pope's Nuncio.

Metastasio, a great friend of her father, lived for nearly half a century with the family, and undertook her education. Haydn, then young, poor, and unknown, occupied a wretched garret in the same house, and taught her the harpsichord, while Porpora gave her lessons in singing and composition, her general cultivation being under Metastasio's own care. Of these advantages she made good use. Burney, who knew her in 1772,¹ speaks of her in the highest terms, specially praising her singing; and she also won the admiration of both Hasse and Gerbert. After the death of the parents, and of Metastasio, who left them well off, she and her sister gave evening parties, which were frequented by all the principal artists. On one of these occasions Kelly² heard Marianne play a 4-hand sonata of Mozart with the composer. Latterly Marianne devoted herself to teaching talented pupils. In 1773 she was made a member of the Musical Academy of Bologna. In 1782, the Tonkünstler Societät performed her oratorio 'Isacco,' to Metastasio's words. She also composed another oratorio 'Santa Elena al Calvario,' a Mass, and other sacred music; a Psalm, to Metastasio's Italian translation, for four and eight voices; solo-motets, arias and cantatas, concertos, overtures and symphonies, and harpsichord sonatas, two of which were reprinted by E. Pauer ('Alte Meister'). The Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde possesses the autographs of many of these works. Marianne died a few days after the death of her younger sister Antonio.

MARTINI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA (or GIAMBATTISTA, commonly called 'Padre Martini') (b. Bologna, Apr. 24, 1706; d. Oct. 3^d or Aug. 4,⁴ 1784), one of the most important scientific musicians of the 18th century; was first taught music by his father, Antonio Maria, member of a musical society called 'I Fratelli.' Having become an expert violinist, he learned to sing and play the harpsichord from Padre Predieri, and counterpoint from Antonio Riccieri, a castrato of Vicenza, and composer of merit. At the same time he studied philosophy and theology with the monks of San Filippo Neri.

Having passed his noviciate at the Franciscan convent at Lago, he was ordained on Sept. 11, 1722, and returning to Bologna in 1725 became maestro di cappella of the church of San Francesco. Giacomo Perti held a similar post at San Petronio, and from him Martini received valuable advice on composing church music, at the same time laying a scientific foundation for the whole theory of music by a conscientious study of mathematics with Zanotti, a well-known physician and mathematician. He thus gradually acquired an extraordinary and comprehensive mass of knowledge, with an amount of literary information far in advance of his contemporaries. His library was unusually complete for the time,⁵ partly because scientific men of all countries took a pleasure in sending him books. Burney, whose own library was very extensive, expressed his astonishment at that of Martini, which he estimates to contain 17,000 vols.⁶ After his death a portion found its way to the court library at Vienna; the rest remained at Bologna in the Liceo Filarmónico.

His reputation as a teacher was European, and scholars flocked to him from all parts, among the most celebrated being Paolucci, Ruttini, Sarti, Ottani and Stanislao Mattei, afterwards joint founder of the Liceo Filarmónico. These he educated in the traditions of the old Roman school, the main characteristic of which was the melodious movement of the separate parts. Martini was also frequently called upon to recommend a new maestro di cappella or to act as umpire in disputed questions. He was himself occasionally involved in musical controversy; the best-known instance being his dispute with Redi about the solution of a puzzle-canon by Giovanni Animuccia, which he solved by employing two keys in the third part. This, though approved by Pitoni, was declared by Redi to be unjustifiable. To prove this point Martini, therefore, wrote a treatise maintaining that puzzle-canons had not infrequently been solved in that manner, and quoting examples. Another important controversy was that held with EXIMENEO (q.v.). In spite of these differences of opinion his contemporaries describe him as a man of great mildness, modesty and good nature, always ready to answer questions and give explanations. It is difficult to think without emotion of the warm welcome which he, the most learned and one of the oldest musicians of his country bestowed on Mozart when he visited Bologna in 1770 as a boy of 14. His courtesy and affability brought the Bolognese monk into friendly relations with many exalted personages, Frederick the Great and Frederick William II. of Prussia, Princess Maria Antonie of Saxony and Pope Clement XIV. among the number.

He suffered much towards the close of his life from asthma, a disease of the bladder and a painful wound in the leg; but his cheerfulness never deserted him, and he worked at the fourth volume of his Storia della musica up to his death. His favourite pupil Mattei stayed with him to the last. Zanotti's Requiem was sung at his funeral, and on Dec. 2, the Accademia Filarmonica held a grand function, at which a funeral Mass, the joint composition of thirteen maestri di cappella, was performed, and an 'Elogio' pronounced by Lionardo Volpi. All Italy mourned for him, and a medalion to his memory was struck by Tadolini. He was a member of two Accademie, the 'Filarmonici' of Bologna, and the 'Arcadici' of Rome, his assumed name in the latter being Aristoxenus Amphion.

Martini's two great works are the Storia della musica (3 vols. Bologna, 1757, 1770, 1781), and the Esemplare ossia saggio . . . di contrappunto (2 vols., Bologna, 1774, 1775). The first is a most learned work; each chapter begins and ends with a puzzle-canon, the whole of which were solved and published by Cherubini. The three volumes all treat of ancient music; the music of the Middle Ages down to the 11th century was to have been the subject of the fourth volume, which he did not live to finish. A report having sprung up that the completed MS. was in the Minorite convent at Bologna, Fétis obtained access to the library through Rossini, but found only materials, of which no use has yet been made. The Saggio is a most important collection of examples from the best masters of the ancient Italian and Spanish schools, and a model of its kind. Besides a number of small treatises and controversial writings (for list see Fétis) Martini left masses and other church music in the style of the time. The following were printed: 'Litaniae,' op. 1 (1734); 'XII Sonate d' intavolatura,' op. 2 (Amsterdam, Le Cène, 1741), excellent and full of originality; 'VI Sonate per organo e cembalo' (Bologna, 1747). 'Duetti da camera' (Bologna, 1763). The Liceo of Bologna possesses the MSS. of a Mass, a Requiem, etc., three oratorios, 'San Pietro' (two separate compositions), 'Il sacrificio d' Abramo,' and 'L'assunzione di Salomone al trono d' Israele'; a farsetta 'La Dirindina'; and three intermezzi, 'L'impresario delle Canarie,' 'Don Chisciottto,' and 'Il maestro di musica.' A Requiem (103 sheets), and other church compositions are in Vienna. Pauer, in his 'Alte Klaviermusik,' gives a gavotte and ballet of Martini's. Farrenc has published twelve sonatas in the 'Trésor musical,' and other works are given by Lück, Körner, Ricordi, etc. (See Q.-L.) F. G.

MARTINI IL TEDESCO ('the German'), the name by which the musicians of his time knew JOHANN PAUL AEGIDIUS SCHWARTZENDORF (b. Freistadt, Upper Palatinate, Sept. 1, 1741; d. Paris, Feb. 10, 1816), who was organist of the Jesuit seminary at Neustadt, on the Danube, when he was 10 years old. From 1758 he studied at Freiburg, and played the organ at the Franciscan convent there. When he returned to his native place, he found a step-mother installed at home, and set forth to seek his fortune in France, notwithstanding his complete ignorance of the language. At Nancy he was befriended, when in a penniless condition, by the organ-builder Dupont, on whose advice he adopted the name by which he is known.

From 1761-64 he was in the household of King Stanislaus, who was then living at Nancy. After his patron's death Martini went to Paris, and immediately obtained a certain amount of fame by successfully competing for a prize offered for the best march for the Swiss Guard. At this time he wrote much military music, as well as symphonies and other instrumental works. In 1771 his first opera, 'L'amoureux de quinze ans,' was performed with very great success, and after holding various appointments as musical director to noblemen, he was appointed conductor at the Théâtre Feydeau, when that establishment was opened under the name of Théâtre de Monsieur for the performance of light French and Italian operas. Having lost all his emoluments by the decree of Aug. 10, 1792, he went to live at Lyons, where he published his Mélopée moderne, a treatise on singing. In 1794 he returned to Paris for the production of his opera 'Sapho,' and in 1798 was made inspector of the Conservatoire; then professor of composition. From this post he was ejected in 1802, by the agency, as he suspected, of Méhul and Catel. At the restoration of 1814 he received the appointment of superintendent of the court music, and wrote a Requiem for Louis XVI., which was performed at St. Denis, Jan. 21, 1816. Besides the operas mentioned above he wrote 'Le Rendez-vous nocturne' (1773); 'Henri IV' (1774); 'Le Droit du seigneur' (1783); 'L'Amant sylphe' (1795); 'Annette et Lubin' (1789); 'Camille ou le souterrain' (1796); and 'Ziméo' (1800). In the department of church music he wrote several masses, psalms, Requiems, etc. (See Q.-L.) A cantata written for the marriage of Napoleon with Marie Louise exists, besides much chamber music, but Martini's best-known composition is probably the charming song, 'Plaisir d'amour.' M.

MARTIN Y SOLAR, VICENTE (b. Valencia,¹ c. 1754; d. May 1810), was a choir-boy in the cathedral of his native town, and afterwards organist at Alicante. On the advice of an Italian singer, named Giuglietti, he went to Florence, where he was commissioned to write an opera for the next Carnival. His 'Ifigenia in Aulide' was accordingly brought out in 1781. Soon after this he produced a new opera, 'Astartea,' in Lucca, as well as a ballet, 'La Regina di Golconda.' In 1783 'La donna festeggiata' and 'L'accorta cameriera' were brought out at Turin, and in the following year 'Ipermestra' at Rome. In 1785 he went to Vienna, where he became acquainted with Da Ponte, who wrote for him the libretto of 'Il burbero di buon cuore,' produced Jan. 4, 1786. Here as elsewhere he speedily became the fashion, his operas 'La capricciosa corretta,' 'L'arbore di Diana' and 'Una cosa rara' following one another in quick succession. This last work, produced Nov. 11, 1786, for a time threw 'Figaro' (produced six months before) into the shade. (See MOZART.) In the autumn of the following year 'Don Giovanni' appeared, and Martin unwittingly obtained immortality at the hands of his rival, since a theme from 'Una cosa rara' makes its appearance in the second finale of Mozart's masterpiece.² (See also Köchel's Catalogue, pp. 582, 583.) In 1788 Martin was appointed director of the Italian Opera at St. Petersburg, where he brought out 'Gli sposi in contrasto,' and a cantata, 'Il sogno.' In 1801 the fashion for Italian opera passed away for a time, and French opera took its place. Martin, thus deprived of his post, employed the rest of his life in teaching. A Mass, a 'Domine saluum fac,' and another opera, 'L'île de l'amour,' are mentioned in Q.-L., and the latter is stated to have been produced in Florence about 1784. M.

MARTORETTA, GIANDOMENICO LA (2nd half of 16th cent.), of Calabria, composer of 3 books of madrigals and a book of motets between 1548 and 1566; single numbers in collective volumes. (See Q.-L.)

² The article in Mendel's Lexikon contains several mistakes, such as the statement that 'Don Giovanni' was brought out before 'Una cosa rara' (in which case it would have been difficult for Mozart to have used one of the themes from the latter opera in the former!), and the inclusion, among works by him, of the book of canons with pianoforte accompaniment, published by Birchall in London, and edited by Cianchettini. These are by Padre Martini.

MARTUCCI, (1) GIUSEPPE (b. Capua, Jan. 6, 1856; d. Naples, June 1, 1909), pianist, orchestral conductor and composer.

He was taught the elements of music by his father, a military bandmaster, and made, as a child, some stir in Naples by his clever performances on the piano. At the age of 11 he was admitted to the R. Conservatorio in that city. Here he devoted five years to the study of the pianoforte under Beniamino Cesi, whose training was supplemented by lessons in theory and composition with Carlo Costa, Paolo Serrao and Lauro Rossi. He left the Conservatorio in 1872; but after two years passed in teaching and playing in public he returned to it as professor, gaining the post by competition. Having appeared with remarkable success at concerts in Rome and Milan, Martucci undertook, in 1875, a tour through France, Germany and England. In London, where he played at Arditi's Concert, St. George's Hall, June 14, the character of his reception warranted a stay of four months; he also played in Dublin. On the occasion of a second visit to Paris in 1878 he was heard by Rubinstein, who not only expressed the highest opinion of his executive talent, but honoured Martucci as a composer by directing a performance of his Concerto in B \flat minor with Cesi at the piano. The work was also played in after years by Eugen d'Albert at the Berlin Philharmonic.

Martucci's progress at home was marked by his association with the Quartetto Napoletano whose performances he directed during eight years, and still further by his appointment as conductor of the orchestral concerts instituted by the Prince d'Ardore, a choice fully justified by his enterprise in introducing classical and modern masterpieces before unheard in Naples. He also took his orchestra from Naples to Turin, where he gave a series of performances during the exhibition of 1884. Nominated director of the Liceo Musicale at Bologna in 1886, Martucci continued his concerts in other towns. His programmes, broadly eclectic, sometimes included the works of Hubert Parry, Stanford and other English composers. During his residence in Bologna he made his only appearance as orchestral conductor in a theatre to direct the first performance in Italy of Richard Wagner's 'Tristan und Isolde' (1888). After an absence of sixteen years he was once more recalled to the scene of his early labours, having been named director of the R. Conservatorio in Naples, Mar. 5, 1902. He was a member of the Accademia Reale di Naples, Commendatore della Corona d'Italia and Cavaliere dei S.S. Maurizio e Lazzaro. Martucci occupied a place in the front rank of pianoforte virtuosos. As an author his style was formed on the best classical models. His works are remarkable for their finish, and often display considerable originality. In writing for the pianoforte his intimate knowledge of its resources produced effects of a quite exceptional kind.

His very numerous compositions include :

- Symphony No. 1 in D minor (op. 76) played at the R.C.M., Mar. 18, 1898. A detailed analysis is in R.M.J., III, 125.
 Symphony No. 2 in F major (op. 81).

(2) PAOLO (b. Naples, Oct. 8, 1883), son and pupil of the above, is an excellent pianist, who settled for a time in England, then in America; he taught at the Cincinnati Conservatory (1911) and in New York (1913).

MARTY, EUGÈNE GEORGES (b. Paris, May 16, 1860; d. there, Oct. 11, 1908), was a pupil of the Conservatoire, where he obtained the first prize in solfège in 1875, the first in harmony in 1878, and the Grand Prix de Rome in 1882 with his cantata, 'Edith.' In 1892 he was appointed chorus-master at the Théâtre Eden, and in the same year was made director of the vocal ensemble classes at the Conservatoire, a post he resigned in 1904; he was chorus-master at the Opéra in 1893, and conducted the Opéra-Comique in 1900. From June 12, 1901, till 1908, he was conductor of the Concerts du Conservatoire. From 1906 he conducted classical concerts at the Casino of Vichy. Marty wrote much, and was greatly influenced by his master, Massenet. We may mention: 'Ballade d'hiver' (1885); 'Balthazar' overture (1887); a suite, 'Les Saisons' (1888); a symphonic poem, 'Merlin enchanté,' all for orchestra; 'Lysic,' a one-act pantomime (1888); 'Le Duc de Ferrare,' 3-act opera, Théâtre Lyrique (1899); 'Daria,' 2-act opera (Opéra, Jan. 27, 1905); songs, and pianoforte pieces, etc.

MARTYRS, LES, see POLYEUCTE.

MARX, ADOLPH BERNHARD (b. Halle, May 15, 1795; d. Berlin, May 17, 1866), learned musician and author, son of a physician, learned harmony from Türk, studied law, and held a legal post at Naumburg. His love of music led him to Berlin, where he soon gave up the law, and in 1824 he founded, with Schlesinger the blisner, the Berliner Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung. This periodical, which only existed seven years, did important service in creating a juster appreciation of Beethoven's works in North Germany, a service to which Beethoven characteristically refers in a letter¹ to Schlesinger, Sept. 25, 1825. His book on the same subject, however, Beethovens Leben und Schaffen (Berlin, 1859; 2nd ed., 1865; 5th, 1901), is a fantastic critique, too full of mere conjecture and misty aestheticism. In 1827 he received his doctor's diploma from the University of Marburg, and was made 'Docent,' or tutor, in the history and theory of music, at the University of Berlin. He became professor in 1830, and in 1832 Musikdirector of the university choir. In 1850 he founded with Kullak and Stern the 'Berliner Musikschule,' afterwards the 'Berliner Conservatorium,' and now the 'Sternsche Conservatorium,' but withdrew in 1856 (Kullak having resigned in 1855), and henceforth devoted himself to his private pupils and to his work at the University.

His numerous works are of unequal merit, the most important being the Lehre von der musikalischen Composition, four vols. (Breitkopf & Härtel, 1837, 1838, 1847). His Glück und die Oper (Berlin, two vols., 1863) contains many ingenious observations, but is of no historical value. The others are Über Malerei in der Tonkunst (1828), Über die Geltung Händelschen Sologesänge, etc. (1829), Allgemeine Musiklehre (1839), Die alte Musiklehre (1842), Die Musik des 19. Jahrhunderts, etc. (1855), Anleitung zum Vortrag Beethovenschen Klavierwerke (1863), Erinnerungen (1865), and a posthumous work, Das Ideale und die Gegenwart (1867). Besides what he did for Beethoven's music, Marx deserves credit for bringing to light many little-known works of Bach and Handel. His compositions are not remarkable; neither his oratorios 'Johannes der Täufer,' 'Moses' and 'Nahid und Omar,' nor his instrumental music, obtaining more than a 'succès d'estime.' His opera, 'Jery und Bätely,' was performed at Berlin in 1827, and a melodram, 'Die Rache wartet,' in 1829. Nevertheless some particulars given in his Erinnerungen (Berlin, 1865) as to his manner of composing are well worth reading, as indeed is the whole book for its interesting picture of the state of music in Berlin between 1830 and 1860. With Mendelssohn he was at one time extremely intimate, and no doubt was in many respects useful to him; but his influence diminished as Mendelssohn grew older and more independent.

MARX, JOSEPH (b. Graz, Austria, May 18, 1882), composer, studied history of arts and music, taking a Ph.D. degree with a dissertation on 'The Functions of Intervals in Harmony and Melody for the Comprehension of Time-complexes.' In 1922 he was appointed director of the Academy of Music in Vienna succeeding Ferdinand Loewe.

At the age of 18 he wrote his first songs, which immediately attracted keen interest for the delicate and exquisite charm therein expressed. Starting in the popular manner of Robert Franz he was for some time strongly influenced by Hugo Wolf till he found his own style, which shows clearly marked local colour, bold part-writing, abundant feeling and richly coloured orchestral sound. A pure romanticist, he belongs to the transition-period between Brahms, Wolf and Schoenberg, with all of whom he has certain affinities in clear architectural structure and freshness of thought. In his later years he has produced chamber music and orchestral works.

MARXSEN, EDUARD (b. Nienstädten, near Altona, July 23, 1806; d. Altona, Nov. 18, 1887). His father was organist at Altona. He was intended for the Church, but devoted himself to music, which he studied at home and with Clasing of Hamburg. He then assisted his father till the death of the latter in 1830, when he went to Vienna, and took lessons in counterpoint from Seyfried, and the pianoforte from Bocklet. He also composed industriously, and on his return to Hamburg gave a concert (Oct. 15, 1834) at which he played eighteen pieces of his own composition. He subsequently lived at Hamburg in great request as a teacher. Brahms was his most illustrious pupil. Of his sixty or seventy compositions, one for full orchestra, called 'Beethoven's Schatten,' was performed in 1844 and 1845 at concerts in Hamburg.

MARYLEBONE GARDENS. This once celebrated place of entertainment was situated at the back of and appurtenant to a tavern called 'The Rose of Normandy' (or briefly 'The Rose'), which stood on the east side of High Street, Marylebone, and was erected about the middle of the 17th century. The earliest notice of it is in Memoirs by Samuel Sainthill, 1659, printed in The Gentleman's Magazine, vol. 83, p. 524, where the garden is thus described:

'The outside a square brick wall, set with fruit trees, gravel walks, 204 paces long, seven broad; the circular walk 485 paces, six broad, the centre square, a Bowling Green, 112 paces one way, 88 another; all except the first double set with quickset hedges, full grown and kept in excellent order, and indented like town walls.'

It is next mentioned by Pepys, May 7, 1668:

'Then we abroad to Marrowbone and there walked in the garden, the first time I ever was there, and a pretty place it is.'

bone, half a mile distant from London, is mentioned in the London Gazette, Jan. 11, 1691/92. Count de Tallard, the French ambassador, gave a splendid entertainment before leaving England to the Marquis of Normanby (afterwards Duke of Buckingham) and other persons of note 'at the great Bowling Green at Marylebone,' in June 1699. About that time the house became noted as a gaming-house much frequented by persons of rank; Sheffield, Duke of Buckingham, was a constant attendant, and, as Quin told Pennant, gave, every spring, a dinner to the chief frequenters of the place, at which his parting toast was 'May as many of us as remain unchanged next spring meet here again.' It was he who was alluded to in Lady Mary Wortley Montagu's oft-quoted line, 'Some dukes at Marybone bowl time away.' Gay, in his 'Beggar's Opera,' 1727, makes Marylebone one of Macheath's haunts, and mentions the 'deep play' there. Prior to 1737 admission to the gardens was gratuitous, but in that year Daniel Gough, the proprietor, charged 1s. each for admission, giving in return a ticket which was taken back in payment for refreshments to that amount.

In 1738 Gough erected an orchestra and engaged a band of music 'from the opera and both theatres,' which performed from 6 to 10 o'clock, during which time they played eighteen pieces. In August 'two Grand or Double Bassoons, made by Mr. Stancesby, junior, the greatness of whose sound surpass that of any other bass instrument whatsoever; never performed with before,' were introduced. In 1740 an organ was erected by Bridge. In 1746 robberies had become so frequent and the robbers so daring that the proprietor was compelled to have a guard of soldiers to protect the visitors from and to town. In 1747 Miss Falkner appeared as principal singer (a post she retained for some years), and the admission to the concert was raised to 2s. In 1748 an addition was made to the number of lamps, and Defesch was engaged as first violin, and about the same time fireworks were introduced. In 1751 John Trusler became proprietor; 'Master [Michael] Arne' appeared as a singer, balls and masquerades were occasionally given, the doors were opened at 7, the fireworks were discharged at 11, and 'a guard was appointed to be in the house and gardens, and to oblige all persons misbehaving to quit the place.' In 1752 the price of admission was reduced to 6d., although the expense was said to be £8 per night more than the preceding year. In 1753 the bowling green was added to the garden, and the fireworks were on a larger scale than before.

In 1758 the first burletta performed in the gardens was given; it was an adaptation, by Trusler junior and the elder Storace, of Pergolesi's 'La Serva Padrona,' and for years was a great favourite. The gardens were opened in the morning for breakfasting, and Miss Trusler made cakes which long enjoyed a great vogue. In 1762 the gardens were opened in the morning gratis, and an organ performance given from 5 to 8 o'clock. In 1763 the place passed into the hands of Thomas (familiarily called Tommy) Lowe, the popular tenor singer, the admission was raised to 1s. and Miss Catley was among the singers engaged. In the next year the opening of the gardens on Sunday evenings for tea-drinking was prohibited; and in October a morning performance, under the name of a rehearsal, was given, when a collection was made in aid of the sufferers by destructive fires at Montreal, Canada, and Honiton, Devonshire. Lowe's management continued until 1768, when he retired, having met with heavy losses. In 1769 ARNOLD (q.v.) became proprietor, and engaged Mrs. Pinto (formerly Miss Brent), Master Brown and others as vocalists, Pinto as leader, Hook as organist and music director, and Arne to compose an ode. In 1770 Barthélemon became leader, and Mrs. Barthélemon, Bannister and Reinhold were among the singers. A burletta by Barthélemon, called 'The Noble Pedlar,' was very successful. In 1771 Miss Harper (afterwards Mrs. John Bannister) appeared, Miss Catley reappeared, and several new burlettas were produced. In 1772 Torrè, an eminent Italian pyrotechnist, was engaged, and the fireworks became a more prominent feature in the entertainments, to the great alarm of the neighbouring inhabitants, who applied to the magistrates to prohibit their exhibition, fearing danger to their houses from them. Torrè, however, continued to exhibit during that and the next two seasons. But the gardens were losing their popularity; in 1775 there appear to have been no entertainments of the usual kind, but occasional performances of Baddeley's entertainment, 'The Modern Magic Lantern,' deliveries of George Saville Carey's 'Lecture upon Mimicry,' or exhibitions of fireworks by a Signor Caillot. In 1776 entertainments of a similar description were given, amongst which was a representation of the Boulevards of Paris. The gardens closed on Sept. 23, and were not afterwards regularly opened. In or about 1778 the site was let to builders, and is now occupied by Beaumont Street, Devonshire Street, and part of Devonshire Place. The tavern, with a piece of ground at the back, used as a skittle alley, continued to exist in nearly its pristine state until 1855, when it was taken down, and rebuilt on its own site and that of an adjoining house, and on the ground behind it was erected the Marylebone Music Hall. A list of names of artists who appeared at Marylebone Gardens is given, with dates, in J. T. Smith's Book for a Rainy Day. W. H. H.

MASANIELLO, the name in England of Auber's opera, LA MUETTE DE PORTICI; in 5

acts; words by Scribe and Delavigne. Produced at the Paris Opéra, Feb. 29, 1828; Drury Lane, in English (3 acts), May 4, 1829; in Italian, Covent Garden (3 acts), Mar. 15, 1849; Her Majesty's, Apr. 10, 1851, as 'La muta di Portici.'

An earlier opera on the same subject was based on a contemporary account of the rebellion at Naples under Tommaso Annello; D'Urfev was the author, and Samuel Ackeroyde (or Akeroyde) the principal composer. It was printed in 1700, with the title, 'The famous history of the rise and fall of Massaniello, in two parts.' The songs remained in favour through the early part of the 18th century.

MASCAGNI, PIETRO (b. Leghorn, Dec. 7, 1863), an eminent composer of opera.

His father, who was a baker, intended his son to be a lawyer, and discouraged his attempts to learn the rudiments of music. The budding composer, compelled to prosecute his musical studies by stealth, entered himself surreptitiously as a pupil at the Istituto Luigi Cherubini, where his principal instructor was Alfredo Soffredini. In due course Mascagni's father found out how his son was spending his leisure time, and the musical career of the future composer of 'Cavalleria rusticana' would thereupon have come to an untimely close had it not been for the intervention of an amiable uncle, who came forward and offered to adopt the young musician. Transferred to his uncle's house, Mascagni devoted himself in earnest to music, and the first fruits of his labours appeared in the shape of a symphony in C minor for small orchestra, and a 'Kyrie' written to celebrate the birthday of Cherubini, both of which were performed at the Istituto in 1879. These were followed after two years by 'In Filanda,' a cantata for solo voices and orchestra, which was favourably mentioned in a prize competition instituted by the International Exhibition of Music at Milan. These successes reconciled Mascagni's father to the idea of making his son a musician; and at the death of his uncle in 1881 the boy returned to his father's house, when he was allowed to pursue his musical studies in peace. His next composition was a setting of a translation of Schiller's 'Ode to Joy,' which was performed at the Teatro degli Avvalorati with so much success that Count Florestano de Larderel, a wealthy amateur, offered on the spot to pay for the composer's education at the Milan Conservatoire. Mascagni's career at Milan was not a success. In spite of the sympathy and encouragement of his teachers, among whom were Amilcare Ponchielli and Michele Saladino, he found the course of regular study insupportable. For some time he chafed silently against the trivial round of counterpoint and fugue, and eventually took French leave of his professors, joined a travelling operatic company in the capacity of conductor, and turned his back upon

Milan to seek his fortune elsewhere. For many years he led a life of obscurity and privation, travelling through the length and breadth of Italy with one company after another. He had no spare time for composition, but doubtless gained much valuable experience in practical orchestration. After many wanderings Mascagni married and settled at Cerignola near Foggia, where he managed to make a meagre livelihood by giving pianoforte lessons and managing the municipal school of music.

From this obscurity he was suddenly rescued by the success of his one-act opera, 'Cavalleria rusticana,' which won the first prize in a competition instituted in 1889 by the publisher Sonzogno, and was produced at the Costanzi Theatre in Rome, May 18, 1890. The libretto was founded by Signori Menasci and Targioni-Tozzetti upon a well-known story of Sicilian village life by Giovanni Verga. The opera was received at its first performance with tumultuous applause, and the next day Mascagni awoke to find himself famous. 'Cavalleria' at once made the tour of Italy, and speedily crossed the Alps. It was produced in Berlin in the summer of 1890, and in London, at the Shaftesbury Theatre, under the management of Signor Lago in Oct. 1891. It was first performed in Paris at the Opéra-Comique, Jan. 19, 1892. Everywhere its success was unquestionable. The public, tired, perhaps, of imitations of Wagner, welcomed the crisp action and direct emotional appeal of the little work. It became the fashion, and was responsible for a mushroom crop of one-act melodramas.

Since the days of 'Cavalleria' Mascagni's fame has steadily declined. His next work, 'L' amico Fritz' (Teatro Costanzi, Rome, Oct. 31, 1891), an adaptation of Erckmann-Chatrian's well-known novel, made by Daspuro under the anagram of P. Suardon, had more refinement than 'Cavalleria,' and was more carefully written, but the composer scarcely attempted to fit his grandiose manner to the exigencies of an idyll. 'I Rantzau' (Teatro della Pergola, Florence, Nov. 10, 1892), another adaptation from Erckmann-Chatrian, by Menasci and Targioni-Tozzetti, was even less successful than 'L' amico Fritz.' 'Guglielmo Ratcliff' (La Scala, Milan, Feb. 1895) was a work of the composer's student days, subsequently revised and rewritten. Mascagni had conceived the extraordinary notion of setting to music a literal translation of Heine's gloomy tragedy, which was alone sufficient to doom the work to failure, and his music did little to relieve the tedium of the libretto. No less decisive was the failure of 'Silvano' (La Scala, Milan, Mar. 1895), a half-hearted bid for popularity in the composer's most hackneyed manner. Meanwhile (1895) Mascagni had been appointed director of the Conservatoire at Pesaro, where his next opera, 'Zanetto,' was produced, Mar. 2, 1896. 'Zanetto' is slight in structure, being scored only for strings and harp, but has considerably more refinement of thought and expression than is customary in Mascagni's work. 'Iris' (Teatro Costanzi, Rome, Nov. 22, 1898), on a Japanese subject, is handicapped by a singularly unpleasant libretto, but nevertheless has won more favour than any of the composer's works since 'Cavalleria.' It shows much skill in the handling of the orchestra, but its lack of original invention is conspicuous. Mascagni's idea of producing his next work, 'Le maschere' (Jan. 17, 1901), simultaneously in seven different cities, was a piece of audacious impertinence; but no amount of advertisement could galvanise 'Le maschere' into a success. At Milan, Venice, Verona, Naples and Turin it was soundly hissed, while at Genoa the audience would not even allow the performance to be finished. Only at Rome was it received with any degree of favour. 'Amica' (Monte Carlo, Mar. 1905), though produced in more modest fashion, shared the fate of its predecessor.

Mascagni wrote a cantata for the Leopardi centenary, which was performed at Recanati in 1898, and incidental music for Hall Caine's play, The Eternal City, which was produced at His Majesty's Theatre, London, in October 1902. Later operas of Mascagni are: 'Isabeau' (libretto by Illica), first performed at Buenos Ayres, 1911; 'Parisina' (on a text by D'Annunzio), given at Milan, 1913; 'Lodolletta' (text by G. Forzano), produced at Rome, 1917, and 'Il Piccolo Marat' (text by G. Forzano and Giovanni Targioni-Tozzetti), given at Rome, 1921. The composer has also written an operetta in 3 acts, entitled 'Si,' on a book supplied by C. Lombardo and A. Franci, which was first produced at Rome in 1919. A Requiem in memory of King Humbert was performed in the Pantheon at Rome in 1900. There exists also a 'Rapsodia satanica,' a symphonic poem written for a film.

Mascagni has won some fame as a conductor, chiefly owing to repeated tours with specially chosen orchestras through the cities of Europe and America. A protracted tour in the United States in 1903 cost him his place at Pesaro.

Mascagni's reputation rests almost entirely upon 'Cavalleria rusticana.' It owes much to its direct if somewhat brutal libretto, but the music undeniably shows a natural instinct for theatrical effect, and it boasts plenty of catchy, commonplace tunes. The speedy exhaustion of a shallow vein of musical invention, together with the carelessness engendered by a dangerously sudden success, is in great part responsible for the complete collapse of what at one time seemed a talent of bright promise.

MASCHERA, FLORENTO, succeeded Merulo, Aug. 1, 1557, as organist of Brescia Cathedral; composed a book of instrumental Canzone a 4 v. (Brescia, 1584; republ. Venice, 1588 and 1593). Whether he was still alive at the latter date (1593) is uncertain. Some of his pieces for organ (also for lute) appeared in collective volumes (Q.-L.).

MASCHERONI, EDOARDO (b. Milan, Sept. 4, 1857), composer, and eminent conductor of Italian opera.

As a boy he showed no special aptitude for music, and was sent to the Liceo Beccaria, where he distinguished himself particularly in mathematics. As he grew up he developed a marked taste for the study of literature, and joined the little band of enthusiasts, among whom were De Marchi, Pozza, G. Mazzucato and Borghi, who founded the journal, La vita nuova, to which he contributed numerous articles on literary subjects. But with manhood came the consciousness that music was to be his career, and he placed himself under Boucheron, a composer and teacher well known in Milan at the time, with whom he worked assiduously for several years. In his younger days Mascheroni composed much music of various kinds, but as time went on he became persuaded that his real vocation lay in conducting. He made his first serious essay in this branch of his art in 1883, when he was engaged as conductor at the Teatro Goldoni at Leghorn. From Leghorn Mascheroni moved to Rome, where he had been appointed conductor of the Teatro Apollo. Here he remained seven years, gaining each year in experience and reputation, so that at last he might fairly claim to be considered the leading Italian conductor of his day, a claim which was tacitly recognised in 1893 by his being chosen to produce and conduct Verdi's 'Falstaff' at La Scala.

Mascheroni, although best known as conductor, has also won laurels as a composer. During his Roman period he wrote a good deal of chamber music, which was performed with much applause, and an Album for pianoforte of his won a prize in a Concorso at Palermo. But his masterpiece at that time was the Requiem for solo voices, chorus and orchestra, which he wrote in memory of the death of Victor Emmanuel. So profound an impression did this work create, that the composer was commissioned by the royal family to write another Requiem for voices only, for exclusive performance in the Royal Chapel, where it was at once performed. In spite of his success in conducting other men's music, Mascheroni did not himself tempt fortune on the stage until his 'Lorenza' was produced successfully at the Teatro Costanzi, Rome, on Apr. 13, 1901. Another opera, 'La Perugina,' libretto by Illica, was performed and favourably received at the S. Carlo Theatre, Naples, in 1909. R. A. S.; addns. F. B.

MASINI, ANGELO (b. Forlì, 1845), is the only

Italian tenor of that generation who won a very high position without having appeared on the operatic stage in England. He came to this country in 1875 as a member of the famous quartet, which, under the composer's own direction, sang at the Albert Hall in Verdi's Requiem Mass, the other singers being Mme. Stoltz, Mme. Waldmann and Signor Medini. At that time Masini was the first of the younger tenors of Italy, and in 1876 he sang the part of Rhadamès when, with Verdi himself conducting, 'Aida' was produced for the first time in Paris. This performance added greatly to his reputation, and in 1879 Mapleson engaged him to sing at Her Majesty's Theatre. A stupid contretemps, however, for which Masini was himself solely responsible, prevented his appearance. The story is fully set forth in the Mapleson Memoirs. This blunder proved a bar to his future career in England, as Mapleson had an injunction against him for breach of contract—compromised at last by the payment of £200. In Madrid, Buenos Ayres and elsewhere, however, Masini sang with the utmost success, and gained both fame and fortune. He was for many seasons the leading tenor at the Italian Opera at St. Petersburg, resigning his position at last for the reason that he could no longer withstand the severe climate. At St. Petersburg, late in his career, he sang Lohengrin to the Elsa of Sigrid Arnoldson. That Masini at his best was a tenor of exceptional gifts cannot be doubted. Distinguished singers, who appeared with him at St. Petersburg, have spoken of him in enthusiastic terms. It was stated at the time that before the production of 'Falstaff' in Milan, Verdi offered to write a romance for Masini if he would undertake the part of Fenton. However, nothing came of the proposal. Possibly Masini thought that, even with a song thrown in, it was a poor compliment to offer him a small part, and no set-off against the distinction Verdi had conferred on his great rival, Tamagno, by selecting him for Otello.

MASNADIERI, I—i.e. The Brigands—opera in 4 acts; libretto by Maffei, from Schiller's 'Die Räuber,' music by Verdi. Produced Her Majesty's Theatre, London, July 22, 1847, Verdi conducting. An experiment had been made by Mercadante eleven years before on a libretto adapted from the same play, under the title of 'I briganti,' produced at the Italiens, Paris, Mar. 22, 1836. G.

MASNELLI (MASENELLI), PAOLO (b. Verona), court organist at Mantua, Feb. 6, 1585–Mar. 24, 1592; afterwards organist at Verona Cathedral (c. 1596). He composed 1 book of madrigals a 4 v. (1582); 2 books of madrigals a 5 v. (1586, 1596) (Q.-L.).

MASON, DANIEL GREGORY (b. Brookline, Mass., Nov. 20, 1873), American composer, author, lecturer and associate professor of music at Columbia University (New York). He graduated from Harvard in 1895; his teachers in music were Johns, Nevin, Paine, Whiting, Chadwick and Goetschius, and later d'Indy. Although associated with Columbia since 1910, his activities as lecturer have extended to numerous other institutions, and for the Board of Education he has given some hundreds of popular lectures. His books are many; particularly notable are:

From Grieg to Brahms (1902).
Beethoven and his Forerunners (1904).
The Romantic Composers (1906).
Contemporary Composers (1918).
The Appreciation of Music (1907) with T. W. Surette.
 He was editor-in-chief of The Art of Music, 14 vols. (1914-17).

His compositions include:

Symphony, C minor, op. 11.
 Prelude and Fugue, piano and orchestra, op. 20.
 Russians, harp and orchestra, op. 18.
 Quartet, piano and strings, op. 7.
 Three Pieces for Flute, Harp and String Quartet, op. 13.
 Pastorale, violin, clarinet and piano, op. 8.
 String Quartet on Negro Themes, op. 19.
 Intermezzo, string quartet, op. 17.
 Sonata, violin and piano, op. 6.
 Sonata, clarinet and piano, op. 14.
 Many piano pieces and songs.

MASON, GEORGE (f. 1618), with John Earsden composed and published:

'The Ayres that were sung and played, at Brougham Castle in Westmerland, in the King's Entertainment; given by the Right Honourable the Earle of Cumberland, and his Right Noble Sonnes the Lord Clifford.'

The authorship of the words is attributed to Thomas CAMPIAN (q.v.) in Percival Vivian's edition of Campian's works.

MASON, JOHN, Mus.B. (d. 1543¹), was admitted clerk of Magdalen College, Oxford, in 1508, graduated Feb. 12, 1509, and was in the same year appointed instructor of the choristers and chaplain of Magdalen College. Wood says he was in much esteem in his profession. He was collated prebendary of Pratum Minus, July 21, and of Putston Minor, July 22, 1525, and treasurer of Hereford Cathedral, May 23, 1545. He is mentioned by Morley in his Introduction as one of those whose works he had consulted. Four motets (tenor wanting) are at PH.

W. H. H.

MASON, (1) LOWELL, Mus.D. (b. Medfield, Massachusetts, Jan. 24, 1792; d. Orange, New Jersey, Aug. 11, 1872), was self-taught, and in his own words 'spent twenty years of his life in doing nothing save playing on all manner of musical instruments that came within his reach.' At 20 he went to Savannah in Georgia, as clerk in a bank, and there continued to practise, lead and teach. In the course of these labours he formed, with the help of F. L. Abel, a collection of psalm tunes based on Gardiner's 'Sacred Melodies'—itself adapted to tunes extracted from the works of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven. (See GARDINER.) This collection was published by the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston in 1822 under the title of 'The Handel and Haydn Society's collection of Church Music,' Mason's name being almost entirely suppressed. The book sold well; it initiated a purer and healthier taste for music in New England, and it led to Mason's removal to Boston and to his taking 'a general charge of music in the churches there,' in 1827. He then became president of the society; but as his object was not so much the cultivation of high-class music as the introduction of music as an essential element of education in the common schools, he soon left it and established (with G. J. Webb) the Boston Academy of Music in 1832. He founded classes on the system of Pestalozzi, and at length in 1838 obtained power to teach in all the schools of Boston. He also published a large number of manuals and collections which have sold enormously and produced him a handsome fortune. He visited Europe first in 1837 with the view of examining the methods of teaching in Germany, and embodied the results in a volume entitled Musical Letters from Abroad (New York, 1853). He was for long closely connected with the Public Board of Education of Massachusetts. His degree of Doctor in Music, the first of the kind conferred by an American College, was granted by the New York University in 1835. The last years of his life were spent at Orange in New Jersey, the residence of two of his sons. He formed a very fine library, which he collected far and wide, regardless of expense. The list of his popular collections of secular and sacred music is given in Baker.

Of his sons, (2) WILLIAM (b. Boston, Jan. 24, 1829; d. New York, July 14, 1908) received a liberal education in music, and after a successful début at Boston in 1846, and a period of study at Leipzig in 1849, under Moscheles, Hauptmann and Richter, and at Weimar, under Liszt, was long recognised as a leading pianist in New York. He founded chamber-music concerts with Theodore Thomas and others in 1854, and received the degree of Mus.D. from Yale University in 1872. Special interest attaches to his Memories of a Musical Life (New York, 1901), which contains a valuable account of the Weimar circle in 1853.

A. W. T.

MASON, MATHIAS, groom of the chamber to James I., is mentioned in Dowland's 'Varieties of Lute Lessons' (1610) as having invented three frets for the lute.

MASON, REV. WILLIAM (b. Kingston-upon-Hull, Feb. 12, 1724; d. Aston, Apr. 5, 1797), son of a clergyman, graduated at Cambridge, B.A. 1745, M.A. 1749; took orders 1754, became rector of Aston, Yorkshire, in that year, and afterwards prebendary (1756), canon residentiary and precentor (1763) of York Minster. He was appointed chaplain to Lord Holderness in 1754 and to the King in 1757. In 1782 he published a book of words of anthems, to which he prefixed a Critical and Historical Essay on Cathedral Music (another edition, 1794). He also wrote essays On Instrumental Church Music, On Parochial Psalmody, and On the Causes of the Present imperfect Alliance between Music and Poetry. (See also PIANO-FORTE, subsection THE SQUARE PIANO). He composed some church music, the best known of which is the short anthem 'Lord of all power and might.' He was author of several poems, and of two tragedies, 'Elfrida' and 'Caractacus' (see ARNE, Thomas Augustine), and was the friend and biographer of the poet Gray. He also invented an instrument called the 'Celestinette.' W. H. H., addns.

MASQUE (MASKE, MASK). A dramatic entertainment—usually upon an allegorical or mythological subject, and combining poetry, vocal and instrumental music, scenery, dancing, elaborate machinery and splendid costumes and decorations—which was performed at court or at noblemen's houses on festive occasions, the performers being usually persons of rank. Masques were frequently exhibited at the courts of James I. and Charles I., and vast sums were lavished upon their production. The Masque of the Inner Temple and Gray's Inn, presented in Feb. 1612/13, on the marriage of the Princess Elizabeth to the Elector Palatine of the Rhine, cost £1086:8:11.¹ The principal author of those masques was Ben Jonson, whose genius was peculiarly fitted to a style of composition which afforded him ample opportunity of displaying his erudition. Beaumont, Chapman, Samuel Daniel, Campian, Shirley, Heywood and Carew also employed their talents upon masques, as did a greater than they, Milton, whose 'Comus' was represented at Ludlow Castle in 1634. Inigo Jones devised the machinery and designed the costumes and scenes for the court masques²; Lanieri and others painted the scenery; and FERRABOSCO, CAMPIAN, H. and W. LAWES, IVE (IVES), LANIERE, LOCKE, C. GIBBONS and others composed the music. (See OPERA, subsection ENGLISH MASQUES.) Two of Ben Jonson's masques—'The Masque of Queens,' 1610, and 'The Twelfth Night's Revels,' 1606—were printed from his autograph MSS. in the British Museum by the Shakespeare Society at the end of Cunningham's Life of Inigo Jones. The evolution of the masque in its dramatic and literary form is traced in Herford and Simpson's Ben Jonson (Masques and Entertainments, vol. ii.).

After the Restoration what were called masques were occasionally given at court, but they appear to have been rather masked or fancy-dress balls than dramatic entertainments. An exception was Crowne's masque, 'Calisto; or, the Chaste Nymph,' performed at court by the princesses and courtiers, Dec. 15 and 22, 1675. In the 18th century masques were not unfrequently to be seen on the public stage. The 'pantomimes' produced by Rich (for most of which Galliard composed the music) were really masques with harlequinade scenes interspersed. More recently masques have been performed on occasion of royal weddings; thus 'Peleus and Thetis,' a masque, formed the second act of the opera 'Windsor Castle,' by William Pearce, music by J. P. Salomon, performed at Covent Garden on the marriage of the Prince of Wales, 1795, and 'Freya's Gift,' masque by John Oxenford, music by G. A. Macfarren, was produced at the same house on the marriage of Edward VII., 1863. Soon after the death of Sir Walter Scott in 1832, 'The Vision of the Bard,' masque by James Sheridan Knowles, was produced at Covent Garden. In 1887, in honour of Queen Victoria's Jubilee, 'The Masque of Flowers' was revived at Gray's Inn, and was again performed in 1897 for the Diamond Jubilee. 'Comus' (with the music of Lawes) has received repeated performances in all sorts of conditions. Revivals of the earlier 17th-century masques are becoming more frequent in the 20th century. A masque by Campian was given at the G.S.M. under the title of 'The Golden Tree,' by the Worshipful Company of Musicians, June 29, 1905. (See Mus. T., 1900, p. 248.) Another masque of Campian was given at Hatfield Palace, May 30, 1924, and a limited edition privately printed by the Cayme Press, Chelsea.

MASS (missa) is employed as a musical term for a setting of the unvarying portion of the text of the Liturgy, called the Ordinary, and consisting normally and mainly of Kyrie, Gloria in excelsis, Credo, Sanctus and Agnus Dei. For the varying portions little music besides the original Gregorian chant has ever been provided: their turn and opportunity for performance came too rarely. The main exception to this general statement is the Requiem. Because of the frequent repetition of this form of Mass, it has been worth while to provide fresh settings of the variables—the Introit Gradual, etc.—as well as of the invariable elements which make up the Ordinary of the Mass. See REQUIEM; GREGORIAN MUSIC.

THE LITURGICAL FORM

Many different plain-song settings of the component parts of the Ordinary were made in the period between the 9th and the 12th centuries; but they remained isolated compositions, unconnected in idea and even in tonality. Among them the Credo was the most stable element, for it kept to its one original setting, ¹ In regarding these figures the difference in the value of money then and now must be borne in mind.

² Many of his sketches for this purpose are in the possession of the Duke of Devonshire. Several are reproduced in Herford and Simpson, Ben Jonson.

But of the rest, any setting of Kyrie, Gloria, Sanctus or Agnus might be associated with it; and these individually were freely chosen from the stock available without reference to one another, and combined at will. In time a certain allotment of the repertory took place. But the pieces were still viewed individually and allocated severally to particular occasions—Easter, Greater Saints' Days, etc.—rather than associated with one another. Such allotment as there was took place rather at haphazard and without any uniform practice. Thus the 'Mass,' as an art-form—a cantata in four or five movements—did not yet exist.

It was only at the end of the Middle Ages that anything like the Missæ de Angelis, a plain-song Mass continuous in theme and tonality, came into existence. The way to it had been made, not by monody but by polyphony. When part-singing arose, under the name of Organum or Diaphonia, it began to make its way into the church music, though long faced by considerable opposition. The earliest Organa were probably improvisations, analogous to those which find favour with Bantu tribes, or to those which are still to be heard in Russian churches. As such, they could be applied as easily to the variable items as to the invariables; and indeed the latter as belonging to special days and great feasts seem at first to have had the preference. The examples given in the Theorists show this; and the earliest large collection of two-part Organa that we have—those in the Winchester Troper (Henry Bradshaw Society) bear this out. But as the writer of Organa became more scientific, he fastened upon those curious interpolations called the tropes as giving him his best field. For in the tropes only a single syllable was set to each note; and this arrangement facilitated the task of writing and singing in two parts. So while the main text was sung in unison, the intercalated tropes gave occasion for organum. Among all the tropes those of the Ordinary, recurring as they did in frequent use, supplied the best opportunities. The farsed Kyries, and the tropes of Gloria, Sanctus and Agnus are the best samples of the earliest harmony in two parts.

While this remained the position so far as the Mass-music was concerned through the 12th and 13th centuries, the art of harmony was being considerably developed meanwhile, in another connexion, namely, by the MOTET (q.v.). The motet in origin was a trope or prose that broke away from the host of which it had been a parasite, and set up for itself an independent existence. Consisting thus of a canto fermo, drawn out of some liturgical text, with one or more added parts, it acquired a freedom, which any composition that remained embedded in its liturgical position could not secure. The development was then made with considerable rapidity. New canti fermi could soon be taken at will, and modified freely as to rhythm and time values. This freedom facilitated also the combining of a known melody with a canto fermo, or the superposing of new parts. And with this freedom came the clearer conception of measurable, as distinct from plain, chant, and the development of the Ars nova discantus.

In course of time the contrapuntal skill, learned in connexion with the motet, became available for the Mass. Not merely the intercalated trope but the whole liturgical melody then could be made mensurable and taken as canto fermo: and there thus emerged a setting in two or three parts of a whole Sanctus or Agnus. The earliest known setting in parts of the whole ordinary comes from the first half of the 14th century. The canto fermo for each portion is drawn from the plain-song repertory. The result is a 'Mass' in the special sense of the term: but as yet there is still no unity in it. The combination of Kyrie, Gloria, Credo, Sanctus and Agnus is still fortuitous; and the Mass is a group of five distinct compositions in different modes, not a single uniform composition in five connected movements. In the Gloria and Credo the liturgical intonation, as sung by the celebrant, is preserved; and the choir begins the words 'Et in terra' and 'Patrem omnipotentem' respectively.

A further stage of development yet remained which should bring the whole into a unity linked by common thematic material and a uniform tonality. This change was brought about only gradually in the course of the 15th century; and it was to a large extent bound up with the gradual emancipation of composers from the traditional habit of using the plain-chant as canto fermo throughout. When this was gone the component parts drew together. In this emancipation probably the motet led the way and the Mass followed. The Credo was the latest portion of the ordinary to be brought into line, partly because it was that which most pertinaciously preserved its old plain-song melody, and partly also, perhaps, because, like the Gloria in excelsis, it was not always needed, not being used on ordinary week-days, or in Advent and Lent. But eventually and by degrees all fell into line, and the homogeneous Mass in 5 movements arose, more or less closely knit. While this emancipation was coming, the door was also opening for another great advance. The thematic material could be polyphonically employed, imitation and other devices of counterpoint could come increasingly into use, and there arose new rhythmic independence among the parts. Thus the composer had worked himself free to write his four or five parts unhampered, and free to choose as his theme and starting-point either a plain-song phrase in the old manner or some secular melody like 'L'Homme armé' or 'The Western Wind,' or else an original phrase or motto: free also to handle his themes and develop them at will.

Those are the principal stages to be noted in tracing the development of the 'Mass' as a musical form. Incidentally there are many curious details to be observed. It is not possible to do more than mention two here. (1) In regard to the handling of the tenor—it long continued to be the lowest voice; and this arrangement remained the rule even after the experiment had been made of placing it in the highest voice, or in the middle one of the parts. It was only in the 16th century that it became commonly identified with the 'tenor voice.' (2) In regard to the handling of the liturgical text—in the earlier stages this was sung in duo order and respectfully treated. The alternation of unisonous plain-song with occasional passages set in harmony did not alter this; though it had the result that the choir-books exhibited only some portions of the text, to the exclusion of the rest, which was sung to the plain-chant. But the growing elaboration of the harmonised music brought in some disrespect for the text. A notable example is afforded by the Sanctus. The settings became so long that they were not concluded by the time when the celebrant reached the Consecration. So, to overcome this difficulty, the text was cut into two portions. It was clumsily divided. The logical point of subdivision would have been before the first 'Hosanna,' for that begins a new section, which is both historically an addition to the primitive Sanctus and also logically distinct from it; but an unintelligent division into two equal halves was made at 'Benedictus qui venit.' This gave the composer the opportunity of dividing his work into two movements of more or less equal length, one occupying the available time up to the Consecration, and the other the available time after it. But the sense suffered; and this unfortunate mishandling has its evil effects even until now. Musically it is convenient, but ritually it is indefensible. Other results of disrespect to the words may be found in the course of the history—clauses of the Credo are sung simultaneously by different voices, or omitted altogether, because the composer had spent too much time over the rest. And, more generally speaking, a habit of making meaningless repetitions of the words grew out of the exigencies of imitation and counterpoint; and again the sense suffered.

But in spite of these flaws, the development of the Mass as an art-form was a great achievement. It was completed by the early part of the 16th century. Since, then, though music has gone through many phases, and most of them have made some contribution to the great series of masses extending down to the present day, the form itself has remained stable.

INDIVIDUAL DEVELOPMENTS

Only the briefest summary can be attempted here of the principal influences which have modified composers' treatment of the Mass from the time when the individual artist assumed complete freedom of action.

(1) The development of what is known as the polyphonic style can be most consistently traced in the several generations of composers proceeding from the Netherlands, of which the names of DUFAY, OREGHEM, OBRECHT, JOSQUIN DES PRÉS and Orlandus LASSUS are representative. Various national groups owed their technical methods to the Netherlands; Robert FAYRFAX, followed by the early Tudor composers, TAVERNER and TYE in England, by ISAAC in Germany, SERMISY (Claudin), DE FEVIN and MOUTON in France, are representative names. The Italian school of the 16th century, of which PALESTRINA is the head and forefront, drew to itself composers both from the Netherlands and Spain (see GUERRERO, MORALES, VICTORIA), and formed the culmination of the style (see under POLYPHONY: Principles of the 16th century). William BYRD, whose three masses are masterpieces, is the last landmark of the contrapuntal Mass in England, after religious and political considerations had banished the Latin Office from the English Church. (See SERVICE.)

Up to this point church music with the Mass as its central feature had guided secular music (cf. MADRIGAL). From the beginning of the 17th century onward the growth of instruments and the rise of the opera becoming the most potent factors in the development of the art as a whole, reversed this position. Henceforward developments in the music of the Mass (as of all other Latin church music) consisted in the adoption of the devices of secular music.¹

(2) The method adopted by VIADANA (q.v.) in his 'Cento concerti ecclesiastici' introduced new principles of construction into church music (see THOROUGH-BASS). His Mass for 1-3 voices with basso continuo for organ (1605) marks the starting-point of the new style in which BANCHIERI, MERULA and other Italians followed him. In the first half of the century the conflict between the polyphonic and monodic styles, the ecclesiastical and the secular, is traceable in composers of the Roman school. The victory of the latter, however, soon becomes decisive. The growth of instrumental accompaniment keeps pace with the operatic orchestra; the musical form accommodates itself to the aria, the dramatic chorus and ensemble of solo-singers. The masses of Alessandro SCARLATTI exhibit fully all the qualities of his style in opera and cantata.¹

(3) Broadly speaking, the same is true of the Neapolitan school which followed Scarlatti in the 18th century, of which VINCI, LEO, DURANTE and PERGOLESI are representative. They are a 'school' in virtue of their operatic productions, and they wrote masses in the style cultivated by the theatre.²

(4) Bach's Mass in B minor stands alone as a supreme musical setting of the Mass in the middle of the 18th century. It must be remembered, however, that it was not conceived primarily as a setting of the Mass as a whole, but was begun with a view to performance of those parts of the text sung in Lutheran churches. The whole might be more fitly considered to be a series of church cantatas. The splitting up of Gloria and Credo into distinct movements (soli and chorus), according to the individual taste of the composer, had already become prevalent in the more elaborate settings intended for liturgical use, and was the natural outcome of the adoption of the aria form into the Mass.

(5) Later in the century the Viennese school as represented by the two brothers HAYDN, and by MOZART, dominated the situation and lasted into the 19th century in the works of BEETHOVEN, SCHUBERT, HUMMEL and others. The style, in so far as it is anything besides purely individualistic, is governed by the conditions of patronage in which composers worked. The resources of the private chapels and the wishes of patrons determined the form of the works produced, in many cases entirely unfitting them for transference to the conditions of public worship.

(6) The rise of the public concert in the 19th century completes the list of secular influences operating on the composition of the Mass. Beethoven's 'Missa solennis' in D, despite its ecclesiastical origin, stands beside its companion work, the 'Choral Symphony,' as music for public performance on the scale of the festival choir and symphonic orchestra. The most conspicuous Masses and Requiems of the century are essentially works of the concert-room. To this category belong those of SPOHR, BERLIOZ, SCHUMANN, LISZT, VERDI, DVOŘÁK, BRUCKNER, notwithstanding the fact that some of them were undertaken for special occasions of the Church. In all, despite their different styles, the text is regarded as a libretto for dramatic and emotional treatment in music intended to be heard as a self-sufficient work of art.

(7) Meantime, the tradition of strict church writing was not entirely destroyed. From CARLSTADT, the last composer to write a Mass on the old tune, 'L'Homme armé,' it survived through the 18th century in Italy, notably by means of the teaching of Padre MARTINI, to find more than a reflection of its original manner in the contrapuntal masses of CHERUBINI. An ever-decreasing stream of what came to be known as a cappella works (in distinction from the operatic and instrumental masses) trickled through the ages, and the tradition was maintained more vigorously in the Catholic churches of Southern Germany than anywhere else in Europe. It has been enriched through that revival of scholarship in the latter half of the 19th century which has included research into the principles of the ancient plain-song, carried on by the monks of SOLESMES (q.v.), the re-study of the MONES (q.v.), the publication of the complete works of Palestrina (see HABERL), and of much other music of the same period. In England it has had the special stimulus of what almost amounts to a rediscovery of a national school of composition of the 16th century, ranging from TAVERNER to BYRD.³ The realisation of these achievements of the past has brought several significant works from modern composers of which the Mass by R. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS is an outstanding example.

MASSAINO (MASSAINI), TIBURTIO (b. Cremona), Augustinian monk, maestro di cappella at Salò 1587, Prague 1590, Salzburg 1591, Cremona 1594, Piacenza 1598 and Lodi 1600. He composed masses, psalms, motets, madrigals, also canzonas, including one each for 8 trombones, for 4 violins and 4 lutes, and one for 16 trombones. (For list see Q.-L.; Riemann.)

MASSART, JOSEPH LAMBERT (b. Liège, July 19, 1811; d. Paris, Feb. 13, 1892), a famous violin teacher, professor at the Paris Conservatoire. Massart received his first instruction in violin-playing from an amateur named Delavau, who was so impressed with the talent displayed by his pupil, that he persuaded the municipal authorities of Liège to grant him a scholarship which would enable him to study in Paris. On his arrival in the city Massart sought admission as a student to the Conservatoire, but was refused by the then director, Cherubini, on account of his being a foreigner. Notwithstanding this first rebuff, Massart's gifts were soon recognised by Rudolph Kreutzer, who willingly undertook the task of developing the young artist's talents. Although Massart became a fine executant under Kreutzer's tuition, yet, on account of his excessive shyness, he never attained much fame as a public player. An instance of his modesty, when his performance with Liszt of the Kreutzer Sonata was shouted down by an audience anxious to hear Liszt's Fantasia on 'Robert le Diable,' is related by Sir Charles Hallé in his Autobiography. In 1843 the Paris Conservatoire appointed him professor of the violin, and in this position his energy and thoroughness gained for him a world-wide renown. Among his many famous pupils were: Henri Wieniawski, Lotto, Pablo de Sarasate, Martin Marsick and Teresina Tua. Massart was an excellent quartet-player, and together with his wife, Louise Aglaé Marson—who succeeded Farrenc as professor of piano at the Paris Conservatoire—gave many delightful chamber-music concerts.

MASSÉ, FÉLIX MARIE (known as VICTOR) (b. Lorient, Mar. 7, 1822; d. Paris, July 5, 1884), entered the Conservatoire at 12, obtained the first prizes for piano, harmony and fugue, and in 1841, after some years' study with Halévy, the Grand Prix de Rome for composition. His cantata 'Le Rénégat' was given three times at the Opéra (Feb. 1845), a rare event. During his stay in Rome he composed a 'Messe solennelle,' performed at the church of St. Louis des Français (May 1, 1846), a careful and clever work, though wanting in religious sentiment—never Massé's strong point. The unpublished score is in the library of the Conservatoire. After his two years in Rome he travelled through Italy and Germany, and returned to Paris, where he was much appreciated in society. Publishers readily accepted his 'Mélodies' and 'Romances,' and he gained access to the stage with little delay. 'La Chambre gothique' (Opéra-Comique, 1849), and 'La Chanteuse voilée,' one-act (Opéra-Comique, Nov. 26, 1850), were followed by 'Galathée,' two acts (Apr. 14, 1852), and 'Les Noces de Jeannette' (Feb. 4, 1853), a charming lyric comedy in 1 act. These early successes justified the hope that in Massé the French stage had found a composer as fruitful and melodious, if not as original, as Auber; but his later efforts were less fortunate. 'La Reine Topaze' (Dec. 27, 1856) indeed succeeded completely, but 'La Fiancée du Diable' (June 3, 1854), 'Miss Fauvette' (Feb. 13, 1855), 'Les Saisons' (Dec. 22, 1855), 'Les Chaises à porteurs' (Apr. 28, 1858), 'La Fée Carabosse' (Mar. 7, 1859), 'Marianne la Promise' (1862), 'La Mule de Pedro' (Mar. 6, 1863), 'Fior d' Aliza' (Feb. 5, 1866), and 'Le Fils du brigadier' (Feb. 25, 1867), though fairly received, soon disappeared. Some, however, contain good music, especially

'Les Saisons' and 'Fior d' Aliza.' In 1860 he became chorus-master to the Opéra and in 1866 succeeded Leborne as professor of composition at the Conservatoire—gratifying appointments, as showing the esteem of his brother artists, although the work they entailed left him little time for composition. On June 20, 1872, he was elected to the Institut as successor to Auber.

After a long period of silence Massé produced 'Paul et Virginie,' three acts (Nov. 15, 1876; given in Italian at Covent Garden, June 1, 1878). In spite of its success and its evident ambition, this opera seems less original and less homogeneous in style than 'Galathée' or 'Les Noces de Jeannette,' and its best parts, as in all his operas, are the short pieces and the simple romances.

To complete the list of his operas we may mention 'La favorita e la schiava' (Venice, 1855), and 'Le Cousin Marivaux' (Baden, 1857); also two drawing-room operettas, 'Le Prix de famille' and 'Une Loi somptuaire' (published in 1879). He published three sets of twenty songs each, selected from his numerous romances. Many of these are charming little pieces. In 1877 he was made an officer of the Legion of Honour.

G. C.

A painful illness compelled him to resign his post at the Opéra in 1876, and rendered him totally incapable of active work. During seven years of suffering his only consolation lay in composition, and in this way his opera 'Une Nuit de Cléopâtre,' intended for the Opéra, was written. After his death, a representation of the work took place at the Opéra-Comique in the composer's honour (Apr. 25, 1885), though the reception of 'Paul et Virginie' did not hold out much hope of success for a work evidently written in the same style and aiming too high.

BIBL.—LÉO DELIBES, Notices sur Victor Massé; DELABORDE, Notices sur la vie et les ouvrages de Victor Massé (Paris, 1886, 1888).

MASSENET, JULES ÉMILE FRÉDÉRIC (b. Montaud, near St. Étienne, May 12, 1842; d. Paris, Aug. 13, 1912) was one of the most famous composers of French opera of his day.

When Massenet was 6 years old his father, an ironmaster and the inventor of a steel-hammer, was obliged for reasons of ill-health to leave his foundry and remove to Paris. Here his mother, who was his father's second wife and bore three other musical children besides the composer, helped to support the family by turning her musical talents to account and giving lessons on the pianoforte. From her he first learnt to play, and at the age of 11 he was sufficiently advanced in music to be able to pass successfully into the Conservatoire, where he became a pupil of Adolphe Laurent at the pianoforte, and of Savard in solfège. When the family, again for reasons of health, left Paris for Chambéry, he went too, but returned for good after some months' absence, and in 1860 entered Reber's harmony class and shortly after took up composition with Ambroise Thomas. Whilst still at the Conservatoire he earned a small pittance first by playing triangle at the Gymnase, and then by acting as drummer three nights a week at the Théâtre Lyrique, and with the knowledge of instrumentation which he thus acquired he scored for orchestra a Mass for military band by Adam. After having won successively the first prize for pianoforte, and the second and first prizes for fugue, he gained the 'Prix de Rome' in 1863 with a cantata, 'David Rizzio.' At the Villa Medici, where he had as fellow-students Carolus Duran the painter and Chaplain the engraver, he met Liszt, and at his request gave lessons to the daughter of Mme. Sainte-Marie who, before his three years in Rome were up, became his wife. On his return to Paris with the MS. of an opera, 'Esméralda,' which was never performed or printed, he was again driven to do hack-work, but owing to the influence of Ambroise Thomas had his first opera, 'La Grand'tante,' produced at the Opéra-Comique (1867), and Paderloup played his first orchestral suite at one of his popular concerts the same year. Soon after this he made the acquaintance of Hartmann the publisher, who accepted his two song-cycles 'Poème d'avril' and 'Poème du souvenir.' After the Franco-Prussian War his second orchestral suite, 'Scènes hongroises,' was played by Paderloup; and then by the production of his opéra-comique 'Don César de Bazan' in three acts and four tableaux (1872) he found himself in the front rank of the younger composers of the day. An opera, 'Méduse,' completed two years before this, remains unpublished, and another one, 'La Coupe du roi de Thulé,' was never performed, for though it gained a proxime accessit in a competition organised by the Ministère des Beaux-Arts, Massenet recognised the justice of the jury's opinion that it was unsuited to the stage, and remodelled the best numbers, transferring some of them to his next opera, 'Le Roi de Lahore' (1877), and others to the incidental music which he wrote for Leonce de Lisle's drama Les Erynnies (1873). This incidental music did not make much impression, but it contained an air which, issued separately as an 'Élégie' with accompaniment for violoncello and pianoforte, became one of the most famous of all his songs.

Between the production of 'Don César de Bazan' and that of 'Le Roi de Lahore' came two small operas produced in the Cercle de l'Union Artistique—'L'Adorable Bel-Boul,' which was suppressed by the composer, and 'Bérangère et Anatole'—together with a large harvest of miscellaneous works in the shape of two more orchestral suites, 'Scènes drama-tiques' and 'Scènes pittoresques,' an 'Overture de Concert,' an overture to Phédre, a 'Sarabande espagnole' for orchestra, some choruses for four equal voices, various works for pianoforte, and a number of songs and duets. The most important, however, of his compositions at this period (1872-77), was the oratorio, or 'Sacred Drama' as it was called, 'Marie Magdeleine,' which was produced by Colonne in 1873 with Mme. Pauline Viardot-Garcia in the part of the Magdalen, and which at once brought him fame. In 1906 this work was rearranged as an opera and given at the Opéra-Comique, with Mme. Aino Ackté and M. Salignac in the parts of the Magdalen and Christ. Owing to the success of the music in its original form as an oratorio, Massenet composed two more works on much the same model, 'Evo' (1875), which was almost as great a success as 'Marie Magdeleine' and 'La Vierge' (1880), which was a failure. Soon after the production of 'Le Roi de Lahore' he wrote a cantata, 'Narcisse,' for voice and orchestra, and eventually three more orchestral suites, 'Scènes napolitaines,' 'Scènes alsaciennes,' and 'Scènes de féerie,' all of which were produced at the Concerts du Châtelet. These, with a short work, 'Biblis,' for voice and orchestra, another oratorio, 'La Torre promise' (1900), a pianoforte concerto (1903) and various songs, practically constitute, with the works already mentioned, the whole of Massenet's miscellaneous output. Every thing else was written for the theatre.

In 1881 'Hérodiade' was produced at Brussels, where it enjoyed success for a season, and after being partly rewritten was given three years later in Paris at the Opéra Italien, where it was sung in Italian with Victor Maurel, Fidès-Devriès, Tremelli and the two De Reszkes in the cast. It did not meet with favour at the time, though when revived in 1903 at the Théâtre de la Gaîté, with Emma Calvé as Salome, it soon grew into public favour, and has since then been popular in America, where Lina Cavalieri has played Salome, and has even penetrated into England, having been given under the title of 'Salome,' with the scene transferred to Ethiopia and certain details altered to suit the requirements of British taste, at Covent Garden in 1904. 'Manon,' which came out at the Opéra-Comique in 1884, is usually considered to be Massenet's operatic masterpiece. In it he used leading themes in the manner of Wagner and tried the experiment of having the dialogue not sung in the usual recitativo secco but spoken over a slightly orchestrated accompaniment. The work has been played in the leading opera-houses in most countries, and the number of famous singers who have been heard in the rôles of Manon and Des Grieux is legion.

His other works for the stage are as follows:

- * Le Cid (Opéra, 1885).
- * Éclairmonde, lyric drama in 4 acts (Opéra-Comique, May 15, 1889).
- * Le Mage, opera in 5 acts (Opéra, Mar. 16, 1891).
- * Werther, opera in 3 acts (Vienna, Feb. 16, 1892).
- * Le Carillon, 1-act ballet (Vienna, Feb. 21, 1892).
- * Thaïs, lyric comedy in 3 acts (Opéra, 1894).

Besides these operas Massenet wrote a one-act ballet, 'Cendrillon' (Vienna, 1892), and a divertissement-ballet in two acts, 'La Cigale,' as well as incidental music to Sardou's plays Théodora and Le Crocodile (Th. Porte St. Martin, 1884, 1886) and to Phèdre (Th. Sarah Bernhardt, 1901). He also orchestrated and completed the opera 'Kassya,' which Delibes had left unfinished at the time of his death.

In 1878 he was appointed professor of advanced composition at the Conservatoire, where Alfred Bruneau, Gustave Leroux, Gabriel Pierné and Gustave Charpentier were amongst his pupils, and held the post until his death. The same year he was elected a member of the Académie des Beaux-Arts in place of Bazin, whom he had succeeded at the Conservatoire, and to the exclusion, by five votes, of Saint-Saëns. He was only 36 at the time, and was the youngest member ever elected to the Académie des Beaux-Arts. In 1876 he was decorated with the Légion d'Honneur and became Grand-Officier in 1899.

During his lifetime, and for a period of some forty years, Massenet, thanks to his undoubted gifts for melody of a suave, voluptuous character—gifts which are as much in evidence in his operas and larger choral and orchestral works as in his songs for single voice and pianoforte—ingratiated himself with that large section of the public which, whether in Paris or elsewhere, regards music as an agreeable after-dinner entertainment. At the same time he was a sufficiently astute musician not merely to reflect the taste of his day (which he gratified by his regular and effortless supply of what M. Vincent d'Indy called a 'discreet and semi-religious eroticism') but even to some extent to mould it. By grafting the idiom of Gounod on to the method of Wagner with a sensibility to the requirements of singers and an understanding of effective but conventional characterisation that belonged essentially to the theatre, he succeeded in appealing to 'the average sensual man'¹ without alienating those who expected opera to be something more than a series of pleasant tunes. His own tunes, whilst invariably singable, were usually short-winded and, in the operas at least, had a way of reverting, after a series of mild attempts at getting under way, to a restatement of the initial subject; the orchestration, often piquant, was unambitious and varied little from scene to scene. In fact with all his skill as a composer Massenet was strictly confined by a temperament of narrow range, so that to have heard 'Manon' is to have heard the whole of him. His personal charm and the continued vogue during the last quarter of the 19th century of the kind of musical delicacies he enjoyed purveying, account for his popularity during his lifetime. There have since been signs of reaction. But however far this reaction may go it would be absurd to deny that within its marked limitations, of which he himself was obviously aware, 'Manon,' so eminently typical both of the composer and of the public for which he wrote, is in its own way a masterpiece.

MASSOL, JEAN ÉTIENNE AUGUSTE (b. Lodève, Hérault, 1802; d. Paris, Oct. 31, 1887), was taught singing at the Paris Conservatoire in 1823–25, and gained a first prize there. He made his début at the Opéra as Licinius ('Vestale'), Nov. 17, 1825, and remained there until Oct. 8, 1845. He first played second tenor parts in several new operas and the baritone parts of Tell and Jolicœur ('Philtre'), etc. He played for a time in Brussels, London (Drury Lane, 1846), etc., and returned as principal baritone to the Opéra in 1850, where he remained until his farewell benefit, Jan. 14, 1858. The Emperor was present on that occasion, immediately after the attempt made on his life by Orsini on his arrival at the theatre. His best new parts were Reuben (Auber's 'Enfant prodigue'), Dec. 6, 1850, and Ahasuerus (Halévy's 'Juif errant'), Apr. 23, 1852. He was a good singer, admirably suited for heroic drama, having the proper figure and height, and a splendid voice.

MASSON, ELIZABETH (b. 1806; d. Jan. 9, 1865), was taught singing by Mrs. Henry Smart, sen., and in Italy by Mme. Pasta. She made her first appearance in public at Ella's second subscription concert, in the Argyll Rooms, Mar. 11, 1831, and sang afterwards at the Ancient Concerts, Mar. 16, 1831, and at the Philharmonic, Mar. 11, 1833; she sang frequently at those Societies' concerts during a public career of about twelve years, and revived there forgotten airs of Handel, Purcell, Pergolesi, Gluck, Mozart, etc. She was in great request at private concerts, since she possessed, apart from her musical attainments, great talents and accomplishments, and was an excellent linguist. She sang occasionally in oratorio, viz. at the festival in Westminster Abbey, 1834, and at the Sacred Harmonic Society, where she took the parts of Solomon, Nov. 22, 1839, and Storge on the revival of 'Jephtha,' Apr. 7, 1841. She afterwards devoted herself to teaching and composition. She wrote many songs to the words of Scott, Byron, Adelaide Proctor, etc., and edited a series of 'Original Jacobite Songs' (Lonsdale, 1839), and 'Songs for the Classical Vocalist' (Leader & Cock, first series of twelve songs, 1845; a second series, 1860), which enjoyed a well-deserved popularity. She founded the Royal Society of Female Musicians in 1839 (see ROYAL SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS), and was its hon. treasurer until her death. A. C.

MATASSINS (MATACINS; MATACHINS)—also called Bouffons—a dance of men in armour, popular in France during the 16th and 17th centuries. It was probably derived from the ancient Pyrrhic dance, although the name has been traced to an Arabic root. Jehan Tabourot in his Orchésographie (Langres, 1588) gives a long and interesting account of this dance, with six illustrations of the different positions of the dancers,

'qui sont vestus de petits corcelets, avec fimbries és espaulles, et sous la ceinture. une pence de faissets souls icelles, le morlon de papier doré, les bras nus, les sonnettes aux jambes, l'espee au poing droit, le bouclier au poing gauche.'

The Matassins were four in number, generally all men, but sometimes two men and two women. They danced several distinct figures, between which they performed mimic fights with one another. Molière has introduced Matassins into his comédie-ballet of 'M. de Pourceaugnac,' and the dance is said to have been common at Bordeaux, Marseilles and Strassburg as late as 1735. The following, according to Tabourot, is the air which usually accompanied the dance.

Air des Bouffons.

MATELOTTE, a Dutch sailors' dance somewhat similar to the English hornpipe. The dancers wore wooden shoes, and their arms were interlaced behind their backs. The music of the Matelotte consists of two parts in 2-4 time, and is remarkable for its short decided rhythm. There is a sabot dance in Lortzing's 'Czaar und Zimmermann,' but it is not a true Matelotte, being written in waltz time. Schubert, Die Tanzmusik (Leipzig, 1867) gives an example of the time. W. B. S.

MATERNA, AMALIE (FRAU FRIEDRICH) (b. St. Georgen, Styria, July 10, 1845; d. Jan. 18, 1918), a distinguished prima donna in German opera.

Her father was a schoolmaster at St. Georgen. Her first stage appearance was made at the Thalia-Theater, Gratz, about 1864. She married soon afterwards Karl Friedrich, a popular German actor, and together with him was engaged at the suburban Karlstheater, Vienna, where she sang for some time in operetta. But her qualifications for the higher lyrical walks could not long remain undiscovered, and in 1869 she made her début at the Imperial Opera House as Solika in the 'Africaine,' with signal success, at once winning for herself a high position among opera-singers of the German school. With a soprano voice of unusual volume, compass and sustaining power, a fine stage presence, and much musical and dramatic intelligence, Materna left nothing to be desired in the great Wagner parts. At the Wagner Festival at Bayreuth, 1876, she first earned a world-wide reputation by her magnificent impersonation of Brünnhilde in the Nibelungen Trilogy. She sang in England with great success at the Wagner concerts at the Albert Hall in 1877. She was the first exponent of the part of Kundry in 'Parsifal,' on July 28, 1882, at Bayreuth, and she retired on Apr. 23, 1897. B. T.

MATHIEU, EMILE LOUIS VICTOR (b. Lille, Oct. 16, 1844), composer and teacher, was the son of musical parents, his father having been eminent as a singer and as director of the theatre at Antwerp, while his mother was a professor of singing in the Académie des Beaux-Arts at Louvain. Emile Mathieu began his studies very early at the Brussels Conservatoire, and in 1869 obtained the second Prix de Rome with his cantata, 'La Mort du Tasse,' which was performed four years afterwards in Brussels. In 1881 he was appointed director of the Académie de Musique at Louvain, and moved from there to Ghent, where he succeeded Adolphe Samuel as director of the Conservatoire Royal (1896-1924). His compositions include a Te Deum for soli, chorus and orchestra; six Ballads from Goethe for voice and piano; three descriptive poems, 'Le Hoyoux,' 'Freyir' and 'Le Sorbier,' for soli, chorus and orchestra. For the stage he has composed a series of dramatic works, of which, for the most part, he has written the words himself: 'Richilde,' in four acts (the leading part created by Mme. Rose Caron at the Théâtre de la Monnaie in 1888); 'L'Enfance de Roland' (1889); and three opéras-comiques, dating from his earlier years—'Georges Dandin' (after Molière), given at Brussels in 1879; 'L'Exchange' (Liège, 1863); and 'Le Bernoise' (Brussels, 1885) to a poem by M. Lucien Solvay. M. K.

MATRIMONIO SEGRETO, IL, opera buffa in 2 acts; libretto by Bertatti, adapted from Colman's Clandestine Marriage, music by Cimarosa. Produced Vienna in 1792; London, 1794¹; Paris, May 10, 1801; in English, Covent Garden, Nov. 1, 1842, and with new translation by W. Grist, Crystal Palace, Dec. 13, 1877. G.

MATTEI, FILIPPO (commonly known as 'Pipo'), a violoncellist in London, and performer at the operas given by the Royal Academy of Music in the theatres in the Haymarket in the early 18th century. His claim to remembrance is based on Handel's MS. conducting score of the opera 'Muzio Scaevola,' in which 'Pipo' is mentioned as the composer of the first act, which has often been ascribed to Attilio Ariosti (q.v.), the second and third being by Bononcini and Handel respectively. See Chrysander's G. F. Handel, vol. ii. p. 56, where the opera 'Arsace, ovvero Amore e Maestà' is attributed to him. See also Mus. Ant. i. 255. M.

MATTEI, STANISLAO, ABBATE (b. Bologna, Feb. 10, 1750; d. May 12, 1825), pupil of Martini and master of Rossini. Though of humble parentage (his father was a locksmith) he was sent to the Latin school. Having been present accidentally at a service in the Minorite convent, he was so enchanted with the music that he became a constant attendant, and thus attracted the notice of Padre Martini, by whose advice he entered upon his noviciate. Master and pupil became tenderly attached, and as soon as Mattei had been ordained he became the Padre's confessor, and remained with him till his death. He acted as Martini's deputy from 1770, and succeeded him as maestro di cappella. From 1776 his compositions were produced in the service. On the suppression of the monasteries in 1798 he went to live with his aged mother, and began an active career as a teacher. From this time he was known as the Abbate Mattei. Later he became maestro di cappella of San Petronio, and professor of counterpoint at the Liceo from its foundation in 1804. Among his pupils were Rossini, Morlacchi, Donizetti, Perotti, Robuschi, Palmerini, Bertolotti, Tadolini, Tesei and Pilotta, who succeeded him at San Petronio. He lived in complete retirement, accessible only to his pupils. He was president of the Filarmonici in 1790 and 1794, and was a member of the Subalpine Académie and of the Institut de France (Jan. 24, 1824). He had a thorough practical acquaintance with the old traditions, as may be seen by his Prattica d' accompagnamento sopra bassi numerati, 3 vols. (Bologna, 1788, 1829, 1830), which consists mainly of well-chosen examples, with a few rules. The libraries of San Giorgio and the Minorite convent in Bologna contain most of his compositions, including eight masses, much church music, and the scores of an intermezzo, 'La bottega del libraio,' and of a Passion performed in 1792.

MATTEIS, (1) NICOLA, an eminent Italian violinist, came to England about 1672. The earliest notice of him is found in Evelyn's Diary under date of Nov. 19, 1674:

'I heard that stupendous violin, Signor Nicholas (with other rare musicians), whom I never heard mortal man exceed on that instrument. He had a stroke so sweet, and made it speak like the voice of a man, and, when he pleased, like a concert of several instruments. He did wonders upon a note, and was an excellent composer. Here was also that rare lutanist, Mr. Wallgrave, but nothing approached the violin in Nicholas's hand. He played such ravishing things as astonished us all.'

Roger North also² speaks very highly of his abilities. When he first came to England he exhibited many singularities of conduct which he afterwards abandoned. He published here, without date (about 1688):

(1) 'Arie, preludj, alemande, sarabande, etc., per il violino. Libro primo.'

(2) 'Altre Arie, etc., più difficile e studiosa per il violino. Libro secondo.'

(3) 'Ayres for the Violin, to wit, Preludes, Fuges, Alemands, Sarabands, Courants, Gigue, Fancies, Divisions, and likewise other Passages, Introductions, and Fuges for Single and Double stops with divisions somewhat more artificial for the Improving of the Hand upon the Base-Viol or Harpsichord. The Third and Fourth Books.'

This last has the date 1685 concealed in the ornamentations of the title-page; other books of the series are dated 1687. The books are in oblong octavo, engraved on copper-plates by T. Greenhill. A set was sold at the Taphouse sale in 1905. He was likewise author of 'The False Consonances of Musick, or, Instructions for playing a true Base upon the Guittarre, with Choice Examples and clear Directions to enable any man in a short time to play all Musickall Ayres. A great help likewise to those that would play exactly upon the Harpsichord, Lute, or Base-Viol, showing the delicacy of all Accords, and how to apply them in their proper places. In four parts,' —which even in North's time had become scarce, and is now excessively rare. In 1696 Matteis composed an Ode on St. Cecilia's Day for the then annual celebration in London, and was also one of the stewards of a Cecilian celebration at Oxford. Another and lesser known work by the same composer is 'A Collection of New Songs set by Mons. Nicola Matteis, made purposely for the use of his Scholars: Fairly engraven on Copper plates.'

two books, 1696, folio, Walsh and Hare. A copy of this was sold at Dr. Rimbault's sale. With 'Symphonies for two flutes by a person of quality, fairly engraved on copper plates,' these songs by Matteos are advertised by Walsh and Hare in the London Gazette for May 11, 1696. A song by him is included in a collection of 'Twelve New Songs,' published in 1699. According to North,

'he fell into such credit and imployment that he took a great house, and after the manner of his country lived luxuriously, which brought diseases upon him of which he died.'

He is said to have been the inventor of the half-shift, but it is claimed also for others.

His son, (2) NICHOLAS, was taught the violin by his father, and became an excellent player. He went to Germany and resided for some time at Vienna, being a member of the court orchestra there from 1700, but in 1737 returned to England and settled at Shrewsbury as a teacher of languages as well as of the violin, where Burney learned French and the violin of him. He died there about 1749. (See Burney's History, iii. p. 515, etc.)

MATTHAY, TOBIAS (b. London, Feb. 19, 1858), a successful teacher of the pianoforte whose many publications on technique and psychology in association, embodying the sum of his thinking, have become known as the 'Matthay System.'

Matthay's parents came from North Germany; his father was a naturalised British subject. Matthay entered the R.A.M. in 1871, where he won the Sterndale Bennett scholarship. He became a sub-professor in 1876, and full professor in 1880, and maintained his connexion with the R.A.M. until 1925, when he left it to continue his work in his own school founded in 1900. The Art of Touch (1903), in which he made a close analysis of the pianist's touch, was the first important enunciation of his views. The First Principles of Pianoforte Playing, Relaxation Studies, Method in Teaching and Musical Interpretation, all deal with various aspects of the application of the problem with which The Art of Touch grapples. He has composed a considerable amount of pianoforte music, but it is of slight importance in comparison with his educational work. In 1893 he married JESSIE, youngest daughter of David KENNEDY (q.v.). Mrs. Tobias Matthay is well known as a reciter. O.

MATTHESON, JOHANN (b. Hamburg, Sept. 28, 1681; d. there, Apr. 17, 1764), German musician and writer, son of a clerk of exile.

As a child he showed striking symptoms of versatility, which his parents carefully cultivated. Besides the ordinary education he studied music, and at 9 years could play the harpsichord and organ, sing and compose. His ability and versatility were truly extraordinary. A good classical scholar and a proficient in modern languages, a student of law and political science, a fine player both on harpsichord and organ, and thoroughly skilled in theory, an elegant dancer, a master of fence, and a cultivated man of the world. The first step in his changeful career was his appearance in 1696 as a singer (of female parts) in the Hamburg opera, then in its most flourishing condition. In 1699 he produced his first opera, 'Die Pleyaden'; in another, 'Cleopatra' (1704), he took the part of Antony, and after singing his part on the stage, was in the habit of sitting down at the harpsichord to conduct the orchestra. To this period belongs his acquaintance, and the famous duel with Handel, who came to Hamburg in 1703, Mattheson tells us that he recognised Handel's genius immediately, that they became at once attached and that their friendship continued, with occasional breaks caused by Mattheson's vanity, during the whole time of Handel's stay in Hamburg (1709) (see HANDEL). He claims to have done Handel an important service by introducing him to the musical world of Hamburg, at that time very celebrated; but he acknowledges that he picked up from him many a 'contrapuntal device.' In 1703 he went with Handel to Lübeck in order to see whether the post of organist, which he had been offered by the town in succession to Buxtehude, were to his liking. The offer was not accepted by Mattheson, he feeling unable to comply with one clause in the agreement, which stipulated that the new organist should marry Buxtehude's daughter. In 1704 he was invited to Holland as organist at Haarlem, but refused. Handel's 'Nero' (1705) was the last opera in which Mattheson appeared; he then retired from the stage, and declined more than one organist's post which was offered to him. He became tutor to the son of the English envoy, Sir Cyril Wych, and in 1706 was made secretary of legation. His post was one of labour and responsibility, but he still continued to teach, conduct, compose and write on musical subjects. In 1712, on the death of Wych, Mattheson filled the post of English Resident in Lower Saxony until Wych's son, Mattheson's old pupil, was appointed, Mattheson continuing in the post of secretary. In 1715 he was appointed cantor and canon of the cathedral; and took an active part in the development of the church cantata, so soon after carried to its highest pitch by J. S. Bach (see CANTATA). This was the result of an attempt, made more particularly by the Hamburg composers, to vary the monotony of congregational singing by the introduction of airs, duets, choruses, etc., and was considered by the orthodox an impious and sacrilegious innovation. Mattheson supported this 'adapted dramatic' style, as it was called, both as a composer and as a pamphleteer; and even ventured on a further innovation, by introducing female singers into church.

In 1719 he received from the Duke of Holstein the title of court Kapellmeister. In 1728 he was attacked with deafness, which obliged him to resign his post at the cathedral. Thenceforward he occupied himself chiefly with writing. He is said to have resolved to publish a work for every year of his life, and this aim he more than accomplished, for when he died at 83 his printed literary works amounted to eighty-eight, besides a still larger number of completed MSS.

He composed twenty-four oratorios and cantatas; eight operas; sonatas for flute and violin; suites for clavier; arias; pièces de circonstance for weddings, funerals, etc. (See Q.-L. for list.) His vocal music is overburdened with declamatory passages—a fault easily explained by his own experience on the stage, but one which is often detrimental and must have been very incongruous in church music.

His books are of far greater value than his compositions. In these, notwithstanding a peculiar self-satisfied loquacity, he shows himself a ready and skilful champion for earnestness and dignity in art, for progress, and for solidity of attainment in the practical part of music. In both branches, theoretical and practical, he attacked and demolished much that was antiquated, furnishing at the same time a great deal that was new and instructive, and bequeathing to posterity a mine of historical material. He also found time for much other literary work, especially translations (chiefly from English works on politics and jurisprudence), and even translated a small treatise on tobacco. This extraordinary versatility and his untiring industry go far to redeem the vanity which animated his character and actions and continually shows itself in his writings. His autobiography in the Ehrenpforte contains an amusingly egotistical description of his manifold labours. His more important books are standard sources of information on the state of music at that period, especially in Hamburg. These are Das neu eröffnete Orchester (1713), followed by Das beschülzte and Das forschende Orchester (1717 and 1721); Critica musica (1722–25); Der musikalische Patriot (1728); and the Grundlage einer Ehrenpforte (1740),¹ a collection of biographies of contemporary musicians. The last two are the most important. His theoretical works are the Exemplarische Organisten Probe (1719), republished in 1731 as the Grosse Generalbassschule; the Kleine Generalbassschule (1735); the Kern melodischer Wissenschaft (1737); and finally the Vollkommene Capellmeister (1739), perhaps his most valuable work. As a controversial writer he was wanting in temper; his 'Ephorus Göttingensis' (1727), directed against Professor Joachim

Meyer of Göttingen on the church cantata question, is the only work of that class we need specify. The complete list of his writings is given in Q.-L. A. M.; rev. S. G.

MATTHIAS, HERMANN, see WERRECOORE.

MATZENAUER, MARGARET (b. Temesvár, Hungary, June 1, 1881), operatic mezzo-soprano, was educated at Hanover and studied singing under various teachers at Berlin. She made her début in 1901, as Fatima in 'Oberon,' at the Stadttheater, Strassburg, and remained there until 1904. She was next engaged for the Hoftheater at Munich, where she sang for seven years and by degrees established her reputation as an artist of rare ability. Possessing a voice of exceptional range, richness and power (admirably trained by Fritz Emerich in the school of Manuel Garcia), and endowed with unusual dramatic intelligence and versatility, she acquired a repertory which practically covered the whole field of modern opera. She excelled alike in soprano and mezzo-soprano rôles, proving herself equally at home, for example, as Aïda and Amneris, Azucena and Leonora, Amelia and Ulrica, Donna Anna and Donna Elvira, Ortrud and Venus, Brünnhilde and Erda, Norma and Mignon, Carmen and Santuzza, Selika and La Gioconda. No part came amiss to her, since her choice was always tempered by discretion, her command of character and tessitura correctly judged. She sang frequently as 'guest' at Bayreuth and Munich, but her European career practically closed from the season (1911–12) when she first appeared at the Metropolitan Opera House, won the undivided suffrages of the American public, and settled down permanently in New York. She sang at Covent Garden during the summer that the war began, making her début here as Kundry and appearing also as Ortrud, but has not since been heard in this country. She was the recipient of many German decorations, including the Saxe-Coburg medal for 'Kunst und Wissenschaft.' H. K.

MAUCOTEL (1) ADOLPHE (b. Mirecourt, Lorraine, 1820; d. 1858), French violin-maker. He worked under J. B. Vuillaume in Paris from 1839–44, and then opened a workshop of his own in the Galérie Vivienne. Later he removed to the Rue Croix-des-Petits-Champs, and lastly settled in the Rue Princesse. His instruments are greatly esteemed for their tone, their durability and their excellent workmanship. H. copied the Stradivarius model very successfully, and but for his untimely end should have ranked among the foremost French makers. He committed suicide at the age of 38, by cutting his throat whilst in a state of feverish delirium. The Paris Conservatoire owns a violoncello by this maker, which is considered to be the finest instrument he ever produced. His brother (2) CHARLES (b. Mirecourt, 1807;

d. 1860), was also an excellent violin-maker and a pupil of Bloise Mast, of Mirecourt. He went to Paris in 1834 and studied under Gand, after which, in 1850, he established himself in London.

(3) ERNEST (b. 1867), great-nephew of Charles and Adolphe, is also a luthier of some renown. In 1892 he entered the house of H. C. Silvestre, great-nephew of the no less celebrated Pierre and Hippolyte Silvestre, with whom he entered into partnership on Apr. 1, 1900. Left sole partner, Ernest Maucotel applied to Paul Deschamp (b. Mar. 7, 1887), a talented violinist and an expert on violin-making, who became his partner in 1922. Their house, in the Rue de Rome, contains, in addition to instruments of their own make, a wonderful collection of old instruments. M. P.

MAUDUIT, JACQUES (b. Paris, Sept. 16, 1557; d. Aug. 21, 1627), French lute-player and composer. He succeeded his father as 'grosier des requêtes,' registrar in the courts of justice at Paris, but his talent and reputation as a musician acquired for him in France the title of Père de la Musique. In 1581 he obtained the first prize at the musical competition, which took place yearly at Evreux in Normandy, for the best motets and chansons. A Requiem a 5 by Mauduit, written for the funeral of the poet Ronsard, was published by the Père Mersenne in the seventh book of his Harmonie universelle, 1636. Ambros speaks slightly of this work, describing it as a simple Fauxbourdon without any particular merit. In 1570 the poet Antoine Baif received permission from Charles IX. to found the Académie Française de Musique et de Poésie, the original object of which was to bring about a closer union between music and poetry by making musical rhythm entirely subordinate to the metrical rhythm of prosody. Mauduit would appear to have associated himself with the efforts which Baif made in this direction, and to have taken part in the concerts which were held in Baif's house. Henry Expert, in his collection entitled Les Maîtres-musiciens de la Renaissance Française, has republished the 'Chansonnettes mesurées de Jan-Antoine de Baif mises en musique à quatre parties par Jacques Mauduit,' Paris, 1586, in which Mauduit has endeavoured to carry out the classical theories of Baif. They are slight compositions, but graceful enough. After Baif's death in 1590, the concerts continued to be carried on by Mauduit, but as Brenet¹ says, 'The equilibrium jealously maintained by Baif, between poetry and music, was broken to the advantage of the latter,' and more freedom was gained for the independent development of music by the greater prominence given to instrumental music. For the story of his saving Claude Le Jeune's manuscripts from the flames, see JEUNE, Le.

MAUGARS, ANDRÉ,² viol-player of the early 17th century, was a politician-musician of the French court. He is described by THOINAN (q.v.) as

'Célèbre Joueur de Viole, Musicien du Cardinal de Richelieu, Conseiller, Secrétaire, Interprète du Roi en langue Anglaise, Traducteur de F. Bacon, Prieur de Saint-Pierre Eynac.'

About 1620 he spent four years in England playing the viol at the court of James I., and the first-fruit of his sojourn was a translation of Bacon's Advancement of Learning, which was published in Paris in 1624 (P. Billaine), under the title Le Progrez et avancement aux sciences divines et humaines, dedicated to de Lomenie. Soon after this he became a creature of Cardinal Richelieu, useful to that prelate in the capacity of Secretary-Interpreter, in which capacity he served likewise in the court of Louis XIII., and became a favourite butt of the courtier-wit Bois-Robert, whom he distinguished by a hatred which, though impotent, has passed into history. His political satires, etc., and the story of his various quarrels, may be read in the authorities referred to below. All that we know of his death is the record of Tallemant to the effect that he 'returned to France and died a few years later. On his death-bed he sent to ask forgiveness of his old enemy Bois-Robert.' To this period belongs his pamphlet, reprinted by Thoinan, Response faite à un curieux sur le sentiment de la musique d'Italie, écrite à Rome le premier Octobre 1639.

As a violist he was classed by Mersenne³ with Hottman, and his eulogy is similarly expressed by Jean Rousseau in his Traité de la viole. His compositions, which must have been significant, appear wholly lost to posterity, but he himself lauds their excellence with no uncertain voice.

MAUREL, VICTOR (b. Marseilles, June 17, 1848; d. New York, Oct. 22, 1923), operatic baritone, received instruction at the Paris Conservatoire in singing from Vauthrot, and in opera from Duvernoy, and gained the first prizes in both subjects, co-equal with Gailhard, in 1867. He made his début at the Opéra as De Nevers ('Huguenots') and Conte di Luna ('Trouvère') in 1868. He was next in Italy, where he played the Cacicco on the production of Gomes's 'Guarany' at Milan, Mar. 19, 1870. He made his début at the Royal Italian Opera, London, as Renato, Apr. 21, 1873, made a great success, and was engaged there every year until 1879 inclusive. His parts comprised Don Giovanni, Tell, Almaviva, Hocl, Peter the Great, Valentine, Hamlet, the Caciue; in operas new to England, Telramund, May 8, 1875; Wolfram, May 6, 1876; the Flying Dutchman, June 16, 1877; and Domingo in Massé's 'Paul et Virginie,' June 1, 1878. He reappeared at the French Opéra as Hamlet, Nov. 28, 1879, and also played Amonasro on the production in Paris of 'Aïda,' Mar. 22, 1880. After a tour in Spain, he undertook, in 1883, the management with Corti of the Italian Opera at the Théâtre des Nations (afterwards the Théâtre Sarah - Bernhardt), with disastrous financial results, in spite of a company including Mesdames Marimon, Adler-Dévières, Nevada and Tremelli, Gayarré, the brothers De Reszke and himself, and the successful production of Massenet's 'Hérodiade,' Feb. 1, 1884. He played at the Opéra-Comique (Peter), Oct. 6, 1885, Falstaff in Thomas's 'Songe d'une nuit d'été,' and Zampa, Jan. 19, 1886, with great success. He played again at Covent Garden in 1886, and at Drury Lane for the first time in 1887 in favourite parts. Between those engagements he created, with the greatest success, Iago in Verdi's 'Otello,' Milan, Feb. 5, 1887, and showed himself the best acting baritone on the Italian stage since Faure. He introduced this fine impersonation to the English public at the Lyceum Theatre on July 5, 1889, and on Feb. 9, 1893, created the part of Falstaff in Verdi's last opera at Milan. Both these parts were sung by him for the first time in Paris in 1894, the latter first in London on June 10, 1895. In 1896 he returned to the Opéra-Comique, where he created the part of Mathias in Erlanger's 'Juif polonais,' Apr. 11, 1900. For a short time after that he appeared as an actor at non-musical theatres, but returned to the operatic stage and reappeared in London in the part of Rigoletto on Nov. 15, 1904. In 1909 he settled as a teacher in New York. His Dix ans de carrière (1897) was translated into German by Mme. Lilli Lehmann. Other publications are Le Chant renoué par la science (1892), Un Problème d'art (1893) and A propos de la mise-en-scène de Don Juan (1896). A. C.

MAURER, LUDWIG WILHELM (b. Potsdam, Feb. 8, 1789; d. St. Petersburg, Oct. 25, 1878), distinguished violinist, pupil of Haak, Konzertmeister to Frederick the Great.

At 13 he appeared with great success at a concert given in Berlin by Mara, and was in consequence admitted to the royal chapel as a probationer. After the battle of Jena (1806) the chapel was dismissed, and Maurer travelled, first to Königsberg and Riga, where he made the acquaintance of Rode and Bailot, and then to Mittau and St. Petersburg, his playing being everywhere appreciated. At Moscow he again met Bailot, through whose good offices he became Kapellmeister to the Chancellor Wsowologsky, who had a private orchestra. Here he remained till 1817, when he made another successful tour, being particularly well received in Berlin and Paris. In 1832 he returned to Wsowologsky and stayed till 1845, when after another tour he settled finally in Dresden. His compositions include a 'Symphonie concertante' for four violins and orchestra, first played in Paris by himself, Spohr, Müller and Wich in 1838; and three Russian airs with variations (op. 14). Of his operas 'Alonzo' (c. 1830), 'Aloise' (1838), 'Der entdeckte Diebstahl' and 'Der neue Paris,' the overtures only were printed. He also published several concertos—one of which was at one time very often played at the Philharmonic Concerts in London—and two collections of quartets (opp. 17 and 26). His two sons, WSEVOLOD, a violinist, and ALEXIS, a violoncellist, were good musicians who settled in Russia. F. G.

MAXWELL, FRANCIS KELLY (sometimes called JOHN), D.D. (d. 1782), chaplain of the Asylum, Edinburgh, published anonymously An Essay upon Tune, being an attempt to free the scale of music and the tune of instruments from imperfection (Edinburgh, 1781; London, 1794)—an able work. W. H. H.

MAY, (1) EDWARD COLLETT (b. Greenwich, Oct. 29, 1806; d. Jan. 2, 1887), son of a ship-builder at Greenwich. His first teacher was his brother Henry, an amateur musician and composer of considerable ability. When about 15 years of age, Thomas Adams, then organist of St. Paul's, Deptford, and an intimate friend of the May family, struck by the promise and intelligence of Edward, offered to take him as a pupil. Subsequently he became a pupil of Cipriani Potter for the pianoforte, and of Crivelli for singing. In 1837 he was appointed organist of Greenwich Hospital, an office he held till the abolition of the institution in 1869. From 1841 to his death he devoted himself enthusiastically and exclusively to the musical teaching of the masses. At one institution alone, the National Society's Central School, more than a thousand teachers and many more children were instructed by him. At Exeter Hall, the Apollonicon Rooms, and subsequently St. Martin's Hall, several thousand adults passed through his classes; while for many years he was the sole musical instructor at the Training Schools, Battersea, St. Mark's, White-lands, Home and Colonial, and Hockerill; institutions from which upwards of 250 teachers were annually sent forth to elementary schools. After many years' connexion with the Institution, May was appointed in 1880 professor of vocal music in Queen's College, London. J. H.

His daughter, (2) FLORENCE, became known in London as a pianoforte-player of considerable cultivation and power, and a successful teacher. She had the great advantage of being a pupil of Brahms, and distinguished herself as an interpreter of his music, playing many of his pianoforte works for the first time in England. She wrote The Life of Johannes Brahms, 2 vols., 1905.

MAYER, CHARLES (b. Königsberg, Mar. 21, 1799; d. Dresden, July 2, 1862), pianist. His father, a clarinet-player, went soon after the boy's birth to St. Petersburg, and four years after to Moscow, where he settled with his family.

Charles first learned from his mother, a good pianoforte teacher, and later became a pupil of Field. After the burning of Moscow in 1812 the family fled to St. Petersburg, where the mother became pianoforte teacher, and where the lessons with Field were resumed. The pupil played so exactly like his master that connoisseurs were unable to tell which was at the piano if a screen was interposed. In 1814 Mayer accompanied his father to Paris, where he was well received. He first played his concert-variations on 'God save the King' in Amsterdam. In 1819 he returned to St. Petersburg, where he worked hard and successfully at teaching, and formed as many as 800 pupils. In 1845 he travelled to Stockholm, Copenhagen, Hamburg, Leipzig and Vienna, but this was his last tour. In 1850 he settled in Dresden, where he taught, gave concerts, and composed up to his death. His pieces reach the astonishing number of 900. A mazurka by him in F \sharp major was for some time considered to be by Chopin, and as such was included in the first issue of Klindworth's edition. It has been removed from later issues.

MAYNARD, JOHN, a lutenist, published in 1611

'The XII Wonders of the World, Set and composed for the Violl de Gambo, the Lute and the Voyce to sing the Verse, all three jointly and none severall; also Lessons for the Lute and Base Violl to play alone; with some Lessons to play Lira-waye alone, or if you will to fill up the parts with another Violl set Lute-waye.'

The work contains twelve songs severally describing the characters of a Courtier, Divine, Soldier, Lawyer, Physician, Merchant, Country Gentleman, Bachelor, Married Man, Wife, Widow and Maid; and twelve pavans and galliards for the lute. A curious canon, 'Eight parts in one upon the Plaine Song,' is on the title-page. The composer described himself as 'Lutenist at the most famous Schoole of St. Julian's in Hartfordshire,' and dedicated his work 'To his ever-honoured Lady and Mistris the Lady Joane Thynne, of Cause Castle in Shropshire.' Some organ pieces by one Maynard (presumably the same) are contained in a MS. in the library of the Sacred Harmonic Society (R.C.M.). W. H. H.

MAYR, JOHANN SIMON (SIMONE MAYER) (b. Mendorf, Bavaria, June 14, 1763; d. Dec. 2, 1845), esteemed opera composer in the beginning of the 19th century. He early showed talent for music, which he first learned from his father, the village schoolmaster and organist.

When about 10 he entered the Jesuit seminary at Ingolstadt, but did not neglect his music either then or when, after the banishment of the Jesuits, he studied law in Ingolstadt. Having made the acquaintance of a nobleman, Thomas de Bessus of the Grisons, he lived in the house as music master, and was afterwards sent by his patron to Bergamo to study with Lenzi, maestro di cappella there. Mayr found, however, that his master knew little more than himself, and was on the point of returning to Germany when Count Presenti, a canon of Bergamo, provided him with the means of going to F. Bertoni in Venice. Here again his expectations were deceived, but he picked up some practical hints and a few rules from Bertoni, and hard work and the study of good books did the rest. He had already published some songs in Ratisbon; and in Bergamo and Venice he composed masses and vespers. After the success of his oratorio 'Jacob a Labano fugiens,' composed in 1791 for the Conservatorio dei Mendicanti and performed before a distinguished audience, he was commissioned to compose three more oratorios for Venice ('David,' 'Tobiae matrimonium' and 'Sisara'). For Forlì he wrote 'Jephte' and a Passion. Thrown on his own resources by the sudden death of his patron, he was urged by Piccinni to try the stage, and his first opera, 'Saffo, ossia i riti d' Apollo Leucadio,' was so well received at the Fenice in Venice (1794) that he was immediately overwhelmed with commissions, and between that date and 1814 composed no less than seventy-seven operas. Indeed it was not till Rossini's success that his fame declined. Many of his melodies were sung about the streets, such as the pretty cavatina 'O quanto l' anima' from 'Lauso e Lidia.' In 1802 he became maestro di cappella of Santa Maria Maggiore in Bergamo, and was so much attached to his work there that he declined not only invitations to London, Paris, Lisbon and Dresden, but also the post of censor to the Conservatorio of Milan, his appointment to which had been signed by the Viceroy of Italy in 1807. As professor of composition in the Musical Institute of Bergamo—founded in 1805, reorganised in 1811—he exercised great and good influence; Donizetti was one of his pupils there. He was the founder of two institutions for decayed musicians and their widows, the Scuola Caritatevole di Musica and the Pio Istituto di Bergamo. From 1816 onwards he wrote only church music, such as masses, psalms, motets, etc. (See Q.-L.) He had been blind for some years before his death. The city of Bergamo erected a monument to him in 1852, and in 1875 his remains and those of Donizetti were removed with much ceremony to the church of Santa Maria Maggiore. The most celebrated of his operas are 'Lodoïska' (1800), 'Ginevra di Scozia' (1801), 'Medea' (1813) and 'Rosa bianca e Rosa rossa' (1814). Q.-L. mentions 28 operas as still extant. He is said to have been the first to introduce the crescendo of the orchestra to which Rossini owes so much of his fame. He wrote a small book on Haydn (1809), a biography of Capuzzi the violinist, and poems on his death in 1818; also La dottrina degli elementi musicali, still in MS. in Bergamo.

MAYR, RICHARD (b. Salzburg, Oct. 18, 1877), operatic baritone or basso-cantante. After preliminary study at the local Gymnasium in Salzburg, where his father was a wealthy brewer, he decided to take up medicine, and for that purpose worked some time at the University of Vienna. During that period, however, his fine natural voice gradually attracted so much attention that he decided to abandon the career of a physician for that of a singer. Accordingly he entered the Conservatoire, and, from the age of 21 until he was nearly 25, studied hard to master an extensive repertory of operatic rôles. Declining any tentative appearance at the smaller theatres, he imitated the unique example of the Dutch singer, Anton van Rooy, by obtaining his initial engagement at Bayreuth, where he sang for the first time on any stage in Sept. 1902, as Hagen in 'Götterdämmerung.' His resonant voice and splendid declamation won for him an unequivocal success: but his supreme gifts as an actor were yet to be made manifest in their full maturity. The opportunity for development was immediately afforded through his engagement by Gustav Mahler for the Hofoper at Vienna. Making his début as Don Gomez in 'Ernani,' he sang there for several years in succession, and, whilst laying in a rich store of experience, displayed amazing versatility in a round of leading parts of various schools, serious and comic alike, that extended from the Wotan of the 'Ring' to the Baron Ochs in 'Der Rosenkavalier.' The latter, a superb creation in every detail, was the character in which he made his first appearance at Covent Garden when Strauss's opera was revived on May 23, 1924. This success was enhanced in the following year, when he sang with no less ability in other strongly-contrasted rôles.

MAYSEDER, JOSEPH (b. Vienna, Oct. 26, 1789; d. Nov. 21, 1863), violinist and composer, son of a poor painter. Beginning at 8, he learnt the violin from Suche and Wranitzky. Schuppanzigh took a great interest in the lad, and entrusted him with the second violin in his quartet. In 1800 he gave his first concert in the Augarten with brilliant success. In 1816 he entered the court chapel, in 1820 became solo-violin at the court theatre, and in 1835 was appointed chamber-violinist to the Emperor. The municipality awarded him the large gold Salvator Medal in 1811, and presented him with the freedom of the city in 1817. In 1815 he gave, with Hummel (afterwards replaced by Moscheles) and Giuliani, the so-called 'Dukaten Konzerte.' He also gave concerts with Merk the violoncellist, but after 1837 he never appeared in public. He never played abroad; even on his visit to Paris in 1820, he would only play before a select circle of artists, including Kreutzer, Baudiot, Cherubini, Habeneck, Lafont and Viotti. In 1862 the Emperor bestowed on him the order of Franz-Joseph. With the exception of a Mass he composed only chamber music. He published sixty-three works, including concertos, polonaises, variations, five quintets and eight quartets for strings, études and duets for violin, four trios, sonatas, etc., for PF., trio for violin, harp and horn, etc. C. F. P.

MAZAS, JACQUES-FÉLIX (b. Beziers, Sept. 23, 1782; d. there, 1849), French violinist and composer. He entered the Paris Conservatoire in 1802, and after having studied for three years under Baillot, obtained the first prize for violin-playing. He had great success at Paris, especially with his performance of a violin-concerto, written for him by Auber, at the Conservatoire. He travelled through a very large part of Europe, and returned in 1829 to Paris, without, however, gaining his former success. In 1837 he left Paris again, and accepted the directorship of a music-school at Cambrai, remaining there till 1841.

Mazas wrote a large number of brilliant violin pieces, quartets, trios and duets for stringed instruments, an instruction-book for the violin and one for the viola. Fétis mentions also two operas (one, 'Le Kiosque,' performed in Paris in 1842), two violin-concertos and an overture. P. D.
